BUG-JARGAL

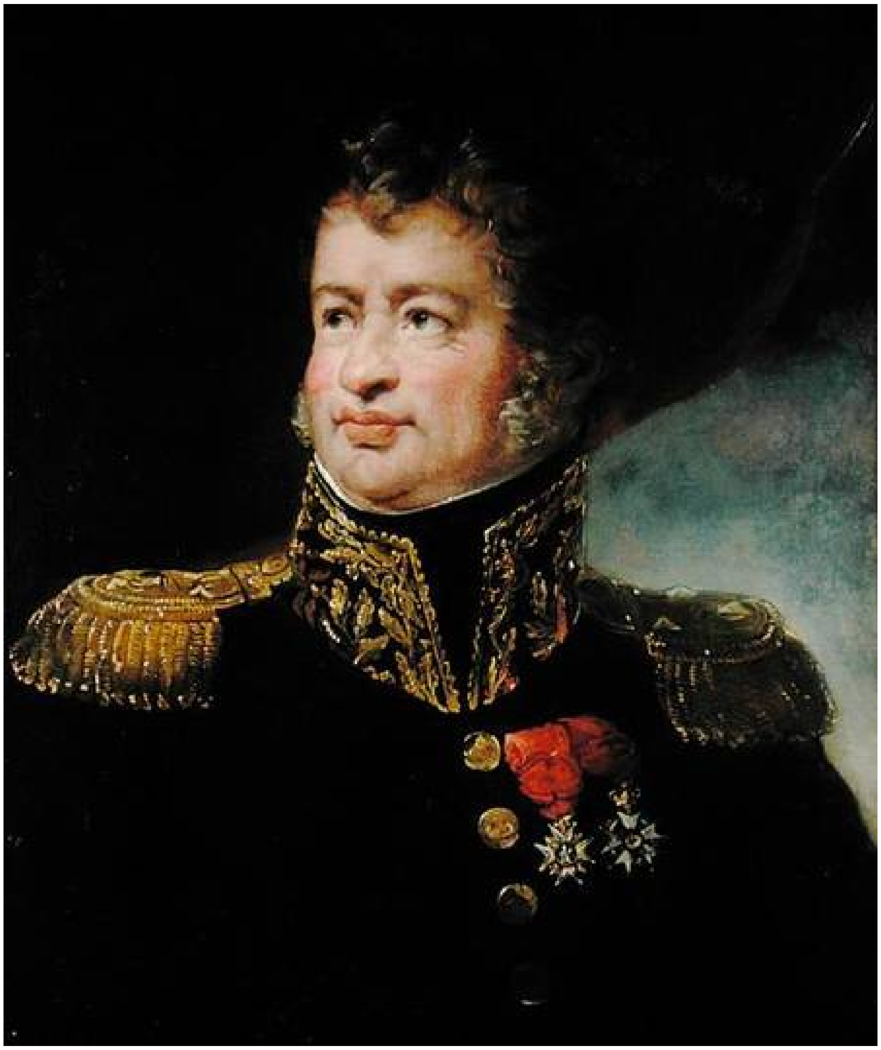
Anonymous translation, 1833

Written in 1818, this is Hugo’s first novel. Completed by the author in fifteen days, after a bet at the age of sixteen, Bug-Jargal appeared in the Conservateur littéraire, Hugo brothers’ magazine, in 1820. The story occurs in Santo Domingo and features a friendship between the enslaved African prince of the title and a French military officer named Leopold D’Auverney, during the tumultuous early years of the Haitian Revolution.



Général d’Empire Joseph Léopold Sigisbert Hugo (1773-1828), Victor Hugo’s father, who fought in Napoleon’s army

Battle on Santo Domingo, 1804 — one of the main historical events in Hugo’s first novel

PROLOGUE

WHEN it came to the turn of Captain Leopold d’Auverney, he gazed around him with surprise, and hurriedly assured his comrades that he did not remember any incident in his life that was worthy of repetition.

“But, Captain d’Auverney,” objected Lieutenant Henri, “you have — at least report says so — traveled much, and seen a good deal of the world; have you not been to the Antilles, to Africa, and to Italy? and above all, you have been in Spain. But see, here is your lame dog come back again!”

D’Auverney started, let fall the cigar that he was smoking, and turned quickly to the tent door, at which an enormous dog appeared, limping toward him.

In another instant the dog was licking his feet, wagging his tail, whining, and gamboling as well as he was able; and by every means testifying his delight at finding his master; and at last, as if he felt that he had done all that could be required of a dog, he curled himself up peaceably before his master’s seat.

Captain d’Auverney was much moved, but he strove to conceal his feelings, and mechanically caressed the dog with one hand, while with the other he played with the chin-strap of his shako, murmuring from time to time, “So here you are once again, Rask, here you are!” Then, as if suddenly recollecting himself, he exclaimed aloud, “But who has brought him back?”

“By your leave, Captain—”

For the last few seconds Sergeant Thaddeus had been standing at the door of the tent, the curtain of which he was holding back with his left hand, while his right was thrust into the bosom of his greatcoat. Tears were in his eyes as he contemplated the meeting of the dog and his master, and at last, unable to keep silence any longer, he risked the words, “By your leave, Captain.”

D’Auverney raised his eyes.

“Why, it is you, Thaddeus? and how the deuce have you been able — eh? Poor dog, poor Rask! I thought that you were in the English camp. Where did you find him, Sergeant?”

“Thanks be to Heaven, Captain, you see me as happy as your little nephew used to be when you let him off his Latin lesson.”

“But tell me, where did you find him?”

“I did not find him, Captain; I went to look for him.”

Captain d’Auverney rose, and offered his hand to the sergeant, but the latter still kept his in the bosom of his coat.

“Well, you see, it was — at least, Captain, since poor Rask was lost, I noticed that you were like a man beside himself; so when I saw that he did not come to me in the evening, according to his custom, for his share of my ration bread — which made old Thaddeus weep like a child; I, who before that had only wept twice in my life, the first time when — yes, the day when—” and the sergeant cast a sad look upon his captain. “Well, the second was when that scamp Balthazar, the corporal of the Seventh half brigade, persuaded me to peel a bunch of onions.”

“It seems to me, Thaddeus,” cried Henri, with a laugh, “that you avoid telling us what was the first occasion upon which you shed tears.”

“It was doubtless, old comrade,” said the captain kindly, as he patted Rask’s head, “when you answered the roll-call as Tour d’Auvergne, the first grenadier of France.”

“No, no, Captain; if Sergeant Thaddeus wept, it was when he gave the order to fire on Bug-Jargal, otherwise called Pierrot.”

A cloud gathered on the countenance of D’Auverney, then he again endeavored to clasp the sergeant’s hand; but in spite of the honor that was attempted to be conferred on him, the old man still kept his hand hidden under his coat.

“Yes, Captain,” continued Thaddeus, drawing back a step or two, while D’Auverney fixed his eyes -upon him with a strange and sorrowful expression— “yes, I wept for him that day, and he well deserved it. He was black, it is true, but gunpowder is black also; and — and—”

The good sergeant would fain have followed out his strange comparison, for there was evidently something in the idea that pleased him; but he utterly failed to put his thoughts into words, and after having attacked his idea on every side, as a general would a fortified place, and failed, he raised the siege, and without noticing the smiles of his officers, he continued:

“Tell me, Captain, do you recollect how that poor negro arrived all out of breath, at the moment when his ten comrades were waiting on the spot? We had had to tie them though. It was I who commanded the party; and with his own hands he untied them, and took their place, although they did all that they could to dissuade him; but he was inflexible. Ah, what a man he was;

you might as well have tried to move Gibraltar! And then, Captain, he drew himself up as if he were going to enter a ball-room, and this dog, who knew well enough what was coming, flew at my throat—"

"Generally, Thaddeus, at this point of your story you pat Rask," interrupted the captain; "see how he looks at you."

"You are right, sir," replied Thaddeus, with an air of embarrassment; "he does look at me, poor fellow; but the old woman Malajuda told me it was unlucky to pat a dog with the left hand, and—"

"And why not with your right, pray?" asked D'Auverney, for the first time noticing the sergeant's pallor, and the hand reposing in his bosom.

The sergeant's discomfort appeared to increase. "By your leave, Captain, it is because — well, you have got a lame dog, and now there is a chance of your having a one-handed sergeant."

"A one-handed sergeant! What do you mean? Let me see your arm. One hand! Great heavens!"

D'Auverney trembled, as the sergeant slowly withdrew his hand from his bosom, and showed it enveloped in a blood-stained handkerchief.

"This is terrible," exclaimed D'Auverney, carefully undoing the bandage. "But tell me, old comrade, how this happened."

"As for that, the thing is simple enough. I told you how I had noticed your grief since those confounded English had taken away your dog — poor Rask, Bug's dog. I made up my mind today to bring him back, even if it cost me my life, so that you might eat a good supper. After having told Mathelet, your bât man, to get out and brush your full-dress uniform, as we are to go into action to-morrow, I crept quietly out of camp, armed only with my saber, and crouched under the hedges until I neared the English camp. I had not passed the first trench when I saw a whole crowd of red soldiers. I crept on quietly to see what they were doing, and in the midst of them I perceived Rask tied to a tree; while two of the milords, stripped to here, were knocking each other about with their fists, until their bones sounded like the big drum of the regiment. They were fighting for your dog. But when Rask caught sight of me, he gave such a bound that the rope broke, and in the twinkling of an eye the rogue was after me. I did not stop to explain, but off I ran, with all the English at my heels. A regular hail of balls whistled past my ears. Rask barked, but they could not hear him for their shouts of 'French dog! French dog!' just as if Rask was hot of the pure St. Domingo breed. In spite of all I crushed through the thicket, and had almost got clean away when two red coats confronted me. My saber accounted for one, and would have rid me of the other had his pistol not unluckily had a bullet in it. My right arm suffered; but ‘French dog’ leaped at his throat as if he were an old acquaintance. Down fell the Englishman, for the embrace was so tight that he was strangled in a moment — and here we both are. My only regret is that I did not get my wound in to-morrow’s battle.”

“Thaddeus, Thaddeus!” exclaimed the captain in tones of reproach; “were you mad enough to expose your life thus for a dog?”

“It was not for a dog, it was for Rask.”

D’Auverney’s face softened as Thaddeus added: “For Rask, for Bug’s dog.”

“Enough, enough, old comrade!” cried the captain, dashing his hand across his eyes; “come, lean on me, and I will lead you to the hospital.”

Thaddeus essayed to decline the honor, but in vain; and as they left the tent the dog got up and followed them.

This little drama had excited the curiosity of the spectators to the highest degree. Captain Leopold d’Auverney was one of those men who, in whatever position the chances of nature and society may place them, always inspire a mingled feeling of interest and respect. At the first glimpse there was nothing striking in him — his manner was reserved, and his look cold. The tropical sun, though it had browned his cheek, had not imparted to him that vivacity of speech and gesture which among the Creoles is united to an easy carelessness of demeanor, in itself full of charm.

D’Auverney spoke little, listened less, but showed himself ready to act at any moment. Always the first in the saddle, and the last to return to camp, he seemed to seek a refuge from his thoughts in bodily fatigue. These thoughts, which had marked his brow, with many a premature wrinkle, were not of the kind that you can get rid of by confiding them to a friend; nor could they be discussed in idle conversation. Leopold d’Auverney, whose body the hardships of war could not subdue, seemed to experience a sense of insurmountable fatigue in what is termed the conflict of the feelings. He avoided argument as much as he sought warfare. If at any time he allowed himself to be drawn into a discussion, he would utter a few words full of common-sense and reason, and then at the moment of triumph over his antagonist he would stop short, and muttering “What good is it?” would saunter off to the commanding officer to glean what information he could regarding the enemy's movements. His comrades forgave his cold, reserved, and silent habits, because upon every occasion they had found him kind, gentle and benevolent. He had saved many a life at the risk of his own, and they well knew that though his mouth was rarely opened, yet his purse was never closed when a comrade had need of his assistance.

D'Auverney was young; many would have guessed him at thirty years of age, but they would have been wrong, for he was some years under it. Although he had for a long period fought in the ranks of the Republican army, yet all were in ignorance of his former life. The only one to whom he seemed ever to open his heart was Sergeant Thaddeus, who had joined the regiment with him, and would at times speak vaguely of sad events in his early life. It was known that D'Auverney had undergone great misfortunes in America; that he had been married in St. Domingo, and that his wife and all his family had perished in those terrible massacres which had marked the Republican invasion of that magnificent colony. At the time of which we write, misfortunes of this kind were so general that any one could sympathise with, and feel pity for, such sufferers.

D'Auverney, therefore, was pitied less for his misfortunes than for the manner in which they had been brought about. Beneath his icy mask of indifference the traces of the incurably wounded spirit could be at times perceived. When he went into action his calmness returned, and in the fight he behaved as if he sought for the rank of general; while after victory he was as gentle and unassuming as if the position of a private soldier would have satisfied his ambition. His comrades, seeing him thus despise honor and promotion, could not understand what it was that lighted up his countenance with a ray of hope when the action commenced, and they did not for a moment divine that the prize D'Auverney was striving to gain was simply — death.

The Representatives of .the People, in one of their missions to the army, had appointed him a Chief of Brigade on the field of battle; but he had declined the honor upon learning that it would remove him from his old comrade Sergeant Thaddeus. Some days afterward, having returned from a dangerous expedition safe and sound, contrary to the general expectation and his own hopes, he was heard to regret the rank that he had refused. "For," said he, "since the enemy's guns always spare me, perhaps the guillotine, which ever strikes down those it has raised, would in time have claimed me."

Such was the character of the man upon whom the conversation turned as soon as he had left the tent.

“I would wager,” cried Lieutenant Henri, wiping a splash of mud off his boot which the dog had left as he passed him— “I would wager that the captain would not exchange the broken paw of his dog for the ten baskets of Madeira that we caught a glimpse of in the general’s wagon.”

“Bah!” cried Paschal the aid-de-camp, “that would be a bad bargain: the baskets are empty by now, and thirty empty bottles would be a poor price for a dog’s paw; why, you might make a good bell-handle out of it.”

They all laughed at the grave manner in which Paschal pronounced these words, with the exception of a young officer of Hussars named Alfred, who remarked:

“I do not see any subject for chaff in this matter, gentlemen. This sergeant and dog, who are always at D’Auverney’s heels ever since I have known him, seem to me more the objects of sympathy than raillery, and interest me greatly.”

Paschal, annoyed that his wit had missed fire, interrupted him: “It certainly is a most sentimental scene; a lost dog found, and a broken arm—”

“Captain Paschal,” said Henri, throwing an empty bottle outside the tent, “you are wrong; this Bug, otherwise called Pierrot, excites my curiosity greatly.”

At this moment D’Auverney returned, and sat down without uttering a word. His manner was still sad, but his face was more calm; he seemed not to have heard what was said. Rask, who had followed him, lay down at his feet, but kept a watchful eye on his master’s comrades.

“Pass your glass, Captain D’Auverney, and taste this.”

“Oh, thank you,” replied the captain, evidently imagining that he was answering a question, “the wound is not dangerous; there is no bone broken.”

The respect which all felt for D’Auverney prevented a burst of laughter at this reply.

“Since your mind is at rest regarding Thaddeus’s wound,” said Henri, “and, as you may remember, we entered into an agreement to pass away the hours of bivouac by relating to one another our adventures, will you carry out your promise by telling us the history of your lame dog, and of Bug — otherwise called Pierrot, that regular Gibraltar of a man?”

To this request, which was put in a semi-jocular tone, D'Auverney at last yielded.

"I will do what you ask, gentlemen," said he; "but you must only expect a very simple tale, in which I play an extremely second-rate part. If the affection that exists between Thaddeus, Rask, and myself leads you to expect anything very wonderful, I fear that you will be greatly disappointed. However, I will begin."

For a moment D'Auverney relapsed into thought, as though he wished to recall past events which had long since been replaced in his memory by the acts of his later years; but at last, in a low voice and with frequent pauses, he began his tale.

CHAPTER ONE

I WAS born in France, but at an early age I was sent to St. Domingo, to the care of an uncle, to whose daughter it had been arranged between our parents that I was to be married. My uncle was one of the wealthiest colonists, and possessed a magnificent house and extensive plantations in the Plains of Acul, near Fort Galifet. The position of the estate, which no doubt you wonder at my describing so minutely, was one of the causes of all our disasters, and the eventual total ruin of our whole family.

Eight hundred negro slaves cultivated the enormous domains of my uncle. Sad as the position of a slave is, my uncle’s hardness of heart added much to the unhappiness of those who had the misfortune to be his property. My uncle was one of the happily small number of planters from whom despotic power had taken away the gentler feelings of humanity. He was accustomed to see his most trifling command unhesitatingly obeyed, and the slightest delay on the part of his slaves in carrying it out was punished with the harshest severity; while the intercession either of my cousin or of myself too often merely led to an increase of the punishment, and we were only too often obliged to rest satisfied by secretly assuaging the injuries which we were powerless to prevent.

Among the multitude of his slaves, one only had found favor in my uncle’s sight; this was a half-caste Spanish dwarf, who had been given him by Lord Effingham, the Governor of Jamaica. My uncle, who had for many years resided in Brazil, and had adopted the luxurious habits of the Portuguese, loved to surround himself with an establishment that was in keeping with his wealth. In order that nothing should be wanting, he had made the slave presented to him by Lord Effingham his fool, in imitation of the feudal lords who had jesters attached to their households. I must say that the slave amply fulfilled all the required conditions.

Habibrah, for that was the half-caste’s name, was one of those strangely formed, or rather deformed, beings who would be looked upon as monster if their very hideousness did not cause a laugh. This ill-featured dwarf was short and fat, and moved with wondrous activity upon a pair of slender limbs, which, when he sat down, bent under him like the legs of a spider. His enormous head, covered with a mass of red curly wool, was stuck between his shoulders, while his ears were so large that Habibrah’s comrades were in the habit of saying that he used them to wipe his eyes when he wept. On his face there was always a grin, which was continually changing its character, and which caused his ugliness to be of an ever-varying description. My uncle was fond of him, because of his extreme hideousness and his inextinguishable gayety. Habibrah was his only favorite, and led a life of ease, while the other slaves were overwhelmed with work. The sole duties of the jester were to carry a large fan, made of the feathers of the bird of paradise, to keep away the sand-flies and the mosquitoes from his master. At meal-times he sat upon a reed mat at his master’s feet, who fed him with titbits from his own plate. Habibrah appeared to appreciate all these acts of kindness, and at the slightest sign from my uncle he would run to him with the agility of a monkey and the docility of a dog.

I had imbibed a prejudice against my uncle’s favorite slave. There was something crawling in his servility; for though outdoor slavery does not dishonor, domestic service too often debases. I felt a sentiment of pity for those slaves who toiled in the scorching sun, with scarcely a vestige of clothing to hide their chains; but I despised this idle serf, with his garments ornamented with gold lace and adorned with bells Besides, the dwarf never made use of his influence with his master to ameliorate the condition of his fellow-sufferers; on the contrary, I heard him once, when he thought that he and his master were alone, urge him to increase his severity toward his ill-fated comrades. The other slaves, however, did not appear to look upon him with any feelings of anger or rancor, but treated him with a timid kind of respect; and when, dressed in all the splendor of laced garments and a tall pointed cap ornamented with bells, and quaint symbols traced upon it in red ink, he walked past their huts, I have heard them murmur in accents of awe, “He is an obi” (sorcerer).

These details, to which I now draw your attention, occupied my mind but little then. I had given myself up entirely to the emotion of a pure love, in which nothing else could mingle — a love which was returned me with passion by the girl to whom I was betrothed — and I gave little heed to anything that was not Marie. Accustomed from youth to look upon her as the future companion of my life, there was a curious mixture of the love of a brother for a sister, mingled with the passionate adoration of a betrothed lover.

Few men have spent their earlier years more happily than I have done, or have felt their souls expand into life in the midst of a delicious climate and all the luxuries which wealth could procure, with perfect happiness in the present and the brightest hopes for the future. No man, as I said before, could have spent his earlier years more happily —

[D’Auverney paused for a moment, as if these thoughts of by-gone happiness had stifled his voice, and then added:]

And no one could have passed his later ones in more profound misery and affliction.

CHAPTER TWO

IN the midst of these blind illusions and hopes, my twentieth birthday approached. It was now the month of August, 1791, and my uncle had decided that this should be the date of my marriage with Marie. You can well understand that the thoughts of happiness, now so near, absorbed all my faculties, and how little notice I took of the political crisis which was then felt throughout the colony. I will not, therefore, speak of the Count de Pernier, or of M. de Blanchelande, nor of the tragical death of the unfortunate Colonel de Marchiste; nor will I attempt to describe the jealousies of the Provincial House of Assembly of the North, and the Colonial Assembly (which afterward called itself the General Assembly, declaring that the word “Colonial” had a ring of slavery in it). For my own part, I sided with neither; but if I did espouse any cause, it was in favor of Cap, near which town my home was situate, in opposition to Port au Prince.

Only once did I mix myself up in the question of the day. It was on the occasion of the disastrous decree of the 15th of May, 1791, by which the National Assembly of France admitted free men of color to enjoy the same political privileges as the whites. At a ball given by the Governor of Cap, many of the younger colonists spoke in impassioned terms of this law, which leveled so cruel a blow at the instincts of supremacy assumed by the whites, with perhaps too little foundation. I had, as yet, taken no part in the conversation, when I saw approaching the group a wealthy planter, whose doubtful descent caused him to be received merely upon sufferance by the white society. I stepped in front of him, and in a haughty voice I exclaimed, “Pass on, sir! pass on! or you may hear words which would certainly be disagreeable to those with mixed blood in their veins.” He was so enraged at this insinuation that he challenged me. We fought, and each was slightly wounded. I confess that I was in the wrong to have thus provoked him, and it is probable that I should not have done so on a mere question of color; but I had for some time past noticed that he had had the audacity to pay certain attentions to my cousin, and had danced with her the very night upon which I had insulted him.

However, as time went on, and the date so ardently desired approached, I was a perfect stranger to the state of political ferment in which those around me lived; and I never perceived the frightful cloud which already almost obscured the horizon, and which promised a storm that would sweep all before it. No one at that time thought seriously of a revolt among the slaves — a class too much despised to be feared; but between the whites and the free mulattoes there was sufficient hatred to cause an outbreak at any moment, which might entail the most disastrous consequences.

During the first days of August a strange incident occurred, which threw a slight shade of uneasiness over the sunshine of my happiness.

CHAPTER THREE

ON the banks of a little river which flowed through my uncle’s estate was a small rustic pavilion in the midst of a clump of trees. Marie was in the habit of coming here every day to enjoy the sea breeze, which blows regularly in St. Domingo, even during the hottest months of the year, from sunrise until evening. Each morning it was my pleasant task to adorn this charming retreat with the sweetest flowers that I could gather.

One morning Marie came running to me in a great state of alarm. Upon entering her leafy retreat she had perceived, with surprise and terror, all the flowers which I had arranged in the morning thrown upon the ground and trampled under foot, and a bunch of wild marigolds, freshly gathered, placed upon her accustomed seat. She had hardly recovered from her terror, when, in the adjoining coppice, she heard the sound of a guitar, and a voice, which was not mine, commenced singing a Spanish song; but in her excitement she had been unable to catch the meaning of the words, though she could hear her own name frequently repeated. Then she had taken to flight, and had come to me full of this strange and surprising event.

This recital filled me with jealousy and indignation. My first suspicions pointed to the mulatto with whom I had fought; but even in the midst of my perplexity I resolved to do nothing rashly. I soothed Marie’s fears as best I could, and promised to watch over her without ceasing, until the marriage tie would give me the right of never leaving her.

Believing that the intruder whose insolence had so alarmed Marie would not content himself with what he had already done, I concealed myself that very evening near the portion of the house in which my betrothed’s chamber was situated.

Hidden among the tall stalks of the sugarcane, and armed with a dagger, I waited; and I did not wait in vain. Toward the middle of the night my attention was suddenly attracted by the notes of a guitar under the very window of the room in which Marie reposed. Furious with rage, with my dagger clutched firmly in my hand, I rushed in the direction of the sound, crushing beneath my feet the brittle stalks of the sugar-canes. All of a sudden I felt myself seized and thrown upon my back with what appeared to be superhuman force; my dagger was wrenched from my grasp, and I saw its point shining above me; at the same moment I could perceive a pair of eyes and a double row of white teeth gleaming through the darkness, while a voice, in accents of concentrated rage, muttered, “Te tengo, te tengo!” (I have you, I have you).

More astonished than frightened, I struggled vainly with my formidable antagonist, and already the point of the dagger had pierced my clothes, when Marie, whom the sound of the guitar and the noise of the struggle had aroused, appeared suddenly at her window. She recognized my voice, saw the gleam of the knife, and uttered a cry of terror and affright. This cry seemed to paralyze the hand of my opponent. He stopped as if petrified; but still, as though undecided, he kept the point of the dagger pressed upon my chest. Then he suddenly exclaimed in French, “No, I cannot; she would weep too much,” and, casting away the weapon, rose to his feet, and in an instant disappeared in the canes; and before I could rise, bruised and shaken from the struggle, no sound and no sign remained of the presence or the flight of my adversary.

It was some time before I could recover my scattered faculties. I was more furious than ever with my unknown rival, and was overcome with a feeling of shame at being indebted to him for my life. “After all, however,” I thought, “it is to Marie that I owe it; for it was the sound of her voice that caused him to drop his dagger.”

And yet I could not hide from myself that there was something noble in the sentiment which had caused my unknown rival to spare me. But who could he be? One supposition after another rose in my mind, all to be discarded in turn. It could not be the mulatto planter to whom my suspicions had first been directed. He was not endowed with such muscular power; nor was it his voice. The man with whom I had struggled was naked to the waist; slaves alone went about half-clothed in this manner. But this could not be a slave; the feeling which had caused him to throw away the dagger would not have been found in the bosom of a slave — and besides, my whole soul revolted at the idea of having a slave for a rival. What was to be done? I determined to wait and watch.

CHAPTER FOUR

MARIE had awakened her old nurse, whom she looked upon almost in the light of the mother who had died in giving her birth, and with them I remained for the rest of the night, and in the morning informed my uncle of the mysterious occurrence. His surprise was extreme, but, like me, his pride would not permit him to believe that a slave would venture to raise his eyes to his daughter. The nurse received the strictest orders from my uncle never to leave Marie alone for a moment; but as the sittings of the Provincial Assembly, the threatening aspect of the affairs of the colony, and the superintendence of the plantation allowed him but little leisure, he authorized me to accompany his daughter whenever she left the house, until the celebration of our nuptials; and at the same time, presuming that the daring lover must be lurking in the neighborhood, he ordered the boundaries of the plantation to be more strictly guarded than ever.

After all these precautions had been taken, I determined to put the matter to further proof. I returned to the summer-house by the river, and repairing the destruction of the evening before, I placed a quantity of fresh flowers in their accustomed place. When the time arrived at which Marie usually sought the sweet shades of this sequestered spot, I loaded my rifle and proposed to escort her thither. The old nurse followed a few steps behind.

Marie, to whom I had said nothing about my having set the place to rights, entered the summer house the first. “See, Leopold,” said she, “my nest is in the same condition in which I left it yesterday; here are your flowers thrown about in disorder and trampled to pieces, and there is that odious bouquet which does not appear at all faded since yesterday; indeed, it looks as if it had been freshly gathered.”

I was speechless with rage and surprise. There was my morning’s work utterly ruined, and the wild flowers, at whose freshness Marie was so much astonished, had insolently usurped the place of the roses that I had strewn all over the place.

“Calm yourself,” said Marie, who noticed my agitation; “ this insolent intruder will come here no more; let us put all thoughts of him on one side, as I do this nasty bunch of flowers.”

I did not care to undeceive her, and to tell her that he had returned; yet I was pleased to see the air of innocent indignation with which she crushed the flowers under her foot. Hoping that the day would again come when I should meet my mysterious rival face to face, I made her sit down between her nurse and myself.

Scarcely had we done so when Marie put her finger on my lips: a sound, deadened by the breeze and the rippling of the stream, had struck upon her ear. I listened; it was the notes of a guitar, the same melody that had filled me with fury on the preceding evening. I made a movement to start from my seat, but a gesture of Marie's detained me.

"Leopold," whispered she, "restrain yourself; he is going to sing, and we shall learn who he is."

As she spoke, a few more notes were struck on the guitar, and then from the depths of the wood came the plaintive melody of a Spanish song, every word of which has remained deeply engraved on my memory:

Why dost thou fear me and fly me?
Say, has my music no charms?
Do you not know that I love you?
Why, then, these causeless alarms?
Maria!

CHAPTER FIVE

A PROLONGED quavering note upon the guitar, like a sob, concluded the song.

I was beside myself with rage. King! black! slave! A thousand incoherent ideas were awakened by this extraordinary and mysterious song. A maddening desire to finish for once and all with this unknown being, who dared to mingle the name of Marie with songs of love and menace, took possession of me. I grasped my rifle convulsively and rushed from the summer-house. Marie stretched out her arms to detain me, but I was already in the thicket from which the voice appeared to have come. I searched the little wood thoroughly, I beat the bushes with the barrel of my rifle, I crept behind the trunks of the large trees, and walked through the high grass.

Nothing, nothing, always nothing! This fruitless search added fuel to the fire of my anger. Was this insolent rival always to escape from me like a supernatural being? Was I never to be able to find out who he was, or to meet him? At this moment the tinkling of bells roused me from my reverie. I turned sharply round, the dwarf Habibrah was at my side.

"Good-day, master," said he, with a sidelong glance full of triumphant malice at the anxiety which was imprinted on my face.

"Tell me," exclaimed I, roughly, "have you seen any one about here?"

"No one except yourself, senor mio," answered he, calmly.

"Did you hear no voice?" continued I.

The slave remained silent, as though seeking for an evasive reply.

My passion burst forth. "Quick, quick!" I exclaimed. "Answer me quickly, wretch! did you hear a voice?"

He fixed his eyes boldly upon mine; they were small and round, and gleamed like those of a wild cat.

"What do you mean by a voice, master! There are voices everywhere — the voice of the birds, the voice of the stream, the voice of the wind in the trees—"

I shook him roughly. "Miserable buffoon!" I cried, "cease your quibbling, or you shall hear another voice from the barrel of my rifle. Answer at once; did you hear a man singing a Spanish song?"

"Yes, senor," answered he, calmly. "Listen, and I will tell you all about it. I was walking on the outskirts of the wood listening to what the silver bells of my gorra [cap] were telling me, when the wind brought to my ears some Spanish words — the first language that I heard when my age could have been counted by months, and my mother carried me slung at her back in a hammock of. red and yellow wool. I love the language; it recalls to me the time when I was little without being a dwarf — a little child, and not a buffoon; and so I listened to the song."

"Is that all you have to say?" cried I, impatiently.

"Yes, handsome master; but if you like I can tell you who the man was who sang."

I felt inclined to clasp him in my arms. "Oh, speak!" I exclaimed; "speak! Here is my purse, and ten others fuller than that shall be yours if you will tell me his name."

He took the purse, opened it, and smiled. "Ten purses fuller than this," murmured he; "that will make a fine heap of good gold coins. But do not be impatient, young master, I am going to tell you all. Do you remember the last verse of his song — something about 'I am black, and you are white, and the union of the two produces the beautiful light'? Well, if this song is true, Habibrah, your humble slave, was born of a negress and a white, and must be more beautiful than you, master. I am the offspring of day and night, therefore I am more beautiful than a white man, and—"

He accompanied this rhapsody with bursts of laughter.

"Enough of buffoonery," cried I; "tell me who was singing in the wood!"

"Certainly, master; the man who sang such buffooneries, as you rightly term them, could only have been — a fool like me! Have I not gained my ten purses?"

I raised my hand to chastise his insolence, when a wild shriek rang through the wood from the direction of the summer-house. It was Marie's voice. Like an arrow I darted to the spot, wondering what fresh misfortune could be in store for us, and in a few moments arrived, out of breath, at the door of the pavilion. A terrible spectacle presented itself to my eyes.

An enormous alligator, whose body was half concealed by the reeds and water plants, had thrust his monstrous head through one of the leafy sides of the summer-house; his hideous, widely-opened mouth threatened a young negro of colossal height, who with one arm sustained Marie's fainting form, while with the other he had plunged the iron portion of a hoe between the sharp and pointed teeth of the monster. The reptile struggled fiercely against the bold and courageous hand that held him at bay.

As I appeared at the door, Marie uttered a cry of joy, and extricating herself from the support of the negro, threw herself into my arms with, “I am saved! I am saved!”

At the movement and exclamation of Marie the negro turned abruptly round, crossed his arms on his breast, and casting a look of infinite sorrow upon my betrothed, remained immovable, taking no heed of the alligator, which, having freed itself from the hoe, was advancing on him in a threatening manner. There would have been a speedy end of the courageous negro had I not rapidly placed Marie on the knees of her nurse (who, more dead than alive, was gazing upon the scene), and coming close to the monster, discharged my carbine into its yawning mouth. The huge reptile staggered back, its bleeding jaws opened and shut convulsively, its eyes closed; and after one or two unavailing efforts it rolled over upon its back, with its scaly feet stiffening in the air. It was dead.

The negro whose life I had so happily preserved turned his head, and saw the last convulsive-struggles of the monster; then he fixed his eyes upon Marie, who had again cast herself into my arms, and in accents of the deepest despair, he exclaimed in Spanish, “Why did you kill him?” and without waiting for a reply leaped into the thicket and disappeared.

CHAPTER SIX

THE terrible scene, its singular conclusion, the extraordinary mental emotions of every kind which had accompanied and followed my vain researches in the wood, had made my brain whirl. Marie was still stupefied with the danger that she had so narrowly escaped, and some time elapsed before we could frame coherent words, or express ourselves otherwise than by looks and clasping of the hands.

At last I broke the silence: “Come, Marie, let us leave this; some fatality seems attached to the place.”

She rose eagerly, as if she had only been waiting for my permission to do so, and leaning upon my arm, we quitted the pavilion. I asked her how it had happened that succor had so opportunely arrived when the danger was so imminent, and if she knew who the slave was who had come to her assistance; for that it was a slave was shown by his coarse linen trousers — a dress only worn by that unhappy class.

“The man,” replied Marie, “is no doubt one of my father’s negroes, who was at work in the vicinity when the appearance of the alligator made me scream; and my cry must have warned him of my danger. All I know is, that he rushed out of the wood and came to my help.”

“From which side did he come?” asked I.

“From the opposite side from which the song came, and into which you had just gone.”

This statement upset the conclusion that I had been drawing from the Spanish words that the negro had addressed to me, and from the song in the same language by my unknown rival. But yet there was a crowd of other similarities. This negro of great height and powerful muscular development might well have been the adversary with whom I had struggled on the preceding night. In that case his half-clothed person would furnish a striking proof. The singer in the wood had said, “I am black” — a further proof. He had declared himself to be a king, and this one was only a slave; but I recollected that in my brief examination I had been surprised at the noble appearance of his features, though of course accompanied by the characteristic signs of the African race.

The more that I thought of his appearance, the nobleness of his deportment, and his magnificent proportions, I felt that there might be some truth in his statement that he had been a king. But then came the crushing blow to my pride: if he had dared to gaze with an eye of affection upon Marie, if he had made her the object of his serenades — he, a negro and a slave — what punishment could be sufficiently severe for his presumption? With these thoughts all my indecision returned again, and again my anger increased against the mysterious unknown. But t at the moment that these ideas filled my brain, Marie dissipated them entirely by exclaiming, in her gentle voice:

“My Leopold, we must seek out this brave negro, and pay him the debt of gratitude that we owe him; for without him I should have been lost, for you would have arrived too late.”

These few words had a decisive effect. They did not alter my determination to seek out the slave, but they entirely altered the design with which I sought him; for it was to recompense and not to punish him that I was now eager.

My uncle learned from me that he owed his daughter’s life to the courage of one of his slaves, and he promised me his liberty as soon as I could find him out.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Up to that time my feelings had restrained me from going into those portions of the plantation where the slaves were at work; it had been too painful for me to see so much suffering which I was powerless to alleviate. But on the day after the events had taken place which I have just narrated, upon my uncle asking me to accompany him on his tour of inspection, I accepted his proposal with eagerness, hoping to meet among the laborers the preserver of my much-beloved Marie.

I had the opportunity in this visit of seeing how great a power the master exercises over his slaves, but at the same time I could perceive at what a cost this power was bought; for though at the presence of my uncle all redoubled their efforts, I could perceive that there was as much hatred as terror in the looks that they furtively cast upon him.

Irascible by temperament, my uncle seemed vexed at being unable to discover any object upon which to vent his wrath, until Habibrah the buffoon, who was ever at his heels, pointed out to him a young negro, who, overcome by heat and fatigue, had fallen asleep under a clump of date-trees. My uncle stepped quickly up to him, shook him violently, and in angry tones ordered him to resume his work.

The terrified slave rose to his feet, and in so doing disclosed a Bengal rose-tree upon which he had accidentally lain, and which my uncle prized highly. The shrub was entirely destroyed.

At this the master, already irritated at what he called the idleness of his slave, became furious. Foaming with rage, he unhooked from his belt the whip with wire-plaited thongs which he always carried with him on his rounds, and raised his arm to strike the negro who had fallen at his feet.

The whip did not fall. I shall, as long as I live, never forget that moment. A powerful grasp arrested the hand of the angry planter, and a negro (it was the very one that I was in search of) exclaimed, “Punish me, for I have offended you; but do not hurt my brother, who has but broken your rose-tree.”

This unexpected interposition from the man to whom I owed Marie’s safety, his manner, his look, and the haughty tone of his voice, struck me with surprise. But his generous intervention, far from causing my uncle to blush for his causeless anger, only increased the rage of the incensed master, and turned his anger upon the newcomer.

Exasperated to the highest pitch, my uncle disengaged his arm from the grasp of the tall negro, and pouring out a volley of threats, again raised the whip to strike the first victim of his anger.

This time, however, it was torn from his hand, and the negro, breaking the handle studded with iron nails as you would break a straw, cast it upon the ground and trampled upon the instrument of degrading punishment.

I was motionless with surprise, my uncle with rage; for it was an unheard-of thing for him to find his authority thus contemned. His eyes appeared ready to start from their sockets, and his lips quivered with passion.

The negro gazed upon him calmly, and then, with a dignified air, he offered him an ax that he held in his hand. “White man,” said he, “if you wish to strike me, at least take this ax.”

My uncle, beside himself with rage, would certainly have complied with the request, for he stretched out his hand to grasp the dangerous weapon; but I in my turn interfered, and seizing the ax threw it into the well of a sugar-mill which was close at hand.

“What have you done?” asked my uncle, angrily.

“I have saved you,” answered I, “from the unhappiness of striking the preserver of your daughter. It is to this slave that you owe Marie; it is the negro to whom you have promised liberty.”

It was an unfortunate moment in which to remind my uncle of his promise. My words could not soothe the wounded dignity of the planter.

“His liberty!” replied he, savagely. “Yes, he has deserved that an end should be put to his slavery. His liberty indeed! we shall see what sort of liberty the members of a court-martial will accord him.”

These menacing words chilled my blood. In vain did Marie later join her entreaties to mine. The negro whose negligence had been the cause of this scene was punished with a severe flogging, while his defender was thrown into the dungeons of Fort Galifet, under the terrible accusation of having assaulted a white man. For a slave who did this; the punishment was invariably death.

CHAPTER EIGHT

You may judge, gentlemen, how much all these circumstances excited my curiosity and interest. I made every inquiry regarding the prisoner, and some strange particulars came to my knowledge. I learned that all his comrades displayed the greatest respect for the young negro. Slave as he was, he had but to make a sign to be implicitly obeyed. He was not born upon the estate, nor did any one know his father or mother: all that was known of him was that some years ago a slave ship had brought him to St. Domingo. This circumstance rendered the influence which he exercised over the slaves the more extraordinary, for as a rule the negroes born upon the island profess the greatest contempt for the Congos — a term which they apply to all slaves brought direct from Africa.

Although he seemed a prey to deep dejection, his enormous strength, combined with his great skill, rendered him very valuable in the plantation. He could turn more quickly, and for a longer period, than a horse the wheels of the sugar-mills, and often in a single day performed the work of ten of his companions to save them from the punishment to which their negligence or incapacity had rendered them liable. For this reason he was adored by the slaves; but the respect that they paid him was of an entirely different character from the superstitious dread with which they looked upon Habibrah the Jester.

What was more strange than all was the modesty and gentleness with which he treated his equals, in contrast to the pride and haughtiness which he displayed to the negroes who acted as overseers. These privileged slaves, the intermediary links in the chain of servitude, too often exceed the little brief authority that is delegated to them, and find a cruel pleasure in overwhelming those beneath them with work. Not one of them, however, had ever dared to inflict any species of punishment on him, for had they done so, twenty negroes would have stepped forward to take his place, while he would have looked gravely on, as though he considered that they were merely performing a duty. The strange being was known throughout the negro quarter as Pierrot.

CHAPTER NINE

THE whole of these circumstances took a firm hold upon my youthful imagination. Marie, inspired by compassion and gratitude, applauded my enthusiasm; and Pierrot excited our interest so much that I determined to visit him and offer him my services in extricating him from his perilous position. As the nephew of one of the richest colonists in the Cap, I was, in spite of my youth, a captain in the Acul Militia. This regiment, and a detachment of the Yellow Dragoons, had charge of Fort Galifet; the detachment was commanded by a non-commissioned officer, to whose brother I had once had the good fortune to render an important service, and who therefore was entirely devoted to me.

[Here the listeners at once pronounced the name of Thaddeus.]

You are right, gentlemen; and as you may well believe, I had not much trouble in penetrating to the cell in which the negro was confined. As a captain in the militia, I had of course the right to visit the fort; but to evade the suspicions of my uncle, whose rage was still unabated, I took care to go there at the time of his noonday siesta. All the soldiers too, except those on guard, were asleep, and guided by Thaddeus I came to the door of the cell. He opened it for me, and then discreetly retired.

The negro was seated on the ground, for on account of his height he could not stand upright. He was not alone; an enormous dog was crouched at his feet, which rose with a growl, and moved toward me.

“Rask!” cried the negro.

The dog ceased growling, and again lay down at his master’s feet, and began eating some coarse food.

I was in uniform, and the daylight that came through the loophole in the wall of the cell was so feeble that Pierrot could not recognize my features.

“I am ready,” said he, in a clear voice.

“I thought,” remarked I, surprised at the ease with which he moved, “that you were in irons.”

He kicked something that jingled.

“Irons; oh, I broke them!”

There was something in the tone in which he uttered these words that seemed to say, “I was not born to wear fetters.”

I continued: “I did not know that they had permitted you to have a dog with you.”

“They did not allow it; I brought him in.”

I was more and more astonished. Three bolts closed the door on the outside, the loophole was scarcely six inches in width, and had two iron bars across it.

He seemed to divine my thoughts, and rising as nearly erect as the low roof would permit, he pulled out with ease a large stone placed under the loophole, removed the iron bars, and displayed an opening sufficiently large to permit two men to pass through. This opening looked upon a grove of bananas and cocoanut trees which covered the hill upon which the fort was built.

Surprise rendered me dumb; at that moment a ray of light fell on my face. The prisoner started as if he had accidentally trodden upon a snake, and his head struck against the ceiling of the cell. A strange mixture of opposing feelings passed over his face — hatred, kindness, and astonishment being all mingled together; but recovering himself with an effort, his face once more became cold and calm, and he gazed upon me as if I was entirely unknown to him.

“I can live two days more without eating,” said he.

I saw how thin he had become, and made a movement of horror.

He continued: “My dog will only eat from my hand, and had I not enlarged the loophole, poor Rask would have died of hunger. It is better that he should live, for I know that I am condemned to death.”

“No,” I said; “no, you shall not die of hunger.”

He misunderstood me. “Very well,” answered he, with a bitter smile, “I could have lived two days yet without food, but I am ready: to-day is as good as to-morrow. Do not hurt Rask.”

Then I understood what he meant when he said “I am ready.” Accused of a crime the punishment for which was death, he believed that I had come to announce his immediate execution; and yet this man endowed with herculean strength, with all the avenues of escape open to him, had in a calm and childlike manner repeated, “I am ready!”

“Do not hurt Rask,” said he, once more.

I could restrain myself no longer. “What!” I exclaimed, “not only do you take me for your executioner, but you think so meanly of my humanity that you believe I would injure this poor dog, who has never done me any harm!”

His manner softened, and there was a slight tremor in his voice as he offered me his hand, saying, “White man, pardon me; but I love my dog, and your race have cruelly injured me.”

I embraced him, I clasped his hand, I did my best to undeceive him. “Do you not know me?” asked I.

“I know that you are white, and that a negro is nothing in the eyes of men of your color; besides, you have injured me.”

“In what manner?” exclaimed I, in surprise.

“Have you not twice saved my life?”

This strange accusation made me smile; he perceived it, and smiled bitterly: “Yes, I know it too well: once you saved my life from an alligator, and once from a planter; and what is worse, I am denied the right to hate you. I am very unhappy.”

The strangeness of his language and of his ideas surprised me no longer; it was in harmony with himself. “I owe more to you than you can owe to me. I owe you the life of Marie — of my betrothed.”

He started as though he had received some terrible shock. “Marie!” repeated he in stifled tones, and his face fell in his hands, which trembled violently, while his bosom rose and fell with heavy sighs.

I must confess that once again my suspicions were aroused; but this time there were no feelings of anger or jealousy. I was too near my happiness, and he was trembling upon the brink of death, so that I could not for a moment look upon him as a rival; and even had I done so, his forlorn condition would have excited my compassion and sympathy.

At last he raised his head. “Go,” said he; “do not thank me.” After a pause he added, “And yet my rank is as lofty as your own.”

These last words roused my curiosity. I urged him to tell me of his position and his sufferings; but he maintained an obstinate silence.

My proceedings, however, had touched his heart, and my entreaties appeared to have vanquished his distaste for life. He left his cell, and in a short time returned with some bananas and a large cocoanut; then he reclosed the opening and began to eat. As we conversed, I remarked that he spoke French and Spanish with equal facility, and that his education had not been entirely neglected. He knew many Spanish songs, which he sang with great feeling. Altogether he was a mystery that I endeavored in vain to solve, for he would give me no key to the riddle. At last, with regret, I was compelled to leave him, after having urged on my faithful Thaddeus to permit him every possible indulgence.

CHAPTER TEN

EVERY day at the same hour I visited him. His position rendered me very uneasy, for in spite of all our prayers, my uncle obstinately refused to withdraw his complaint. I did not conceal my fears from Pierrot, who however listened to them with indifference.

Often Rask would come in with a large palm-leaf tied round his neck. His master would take it off, read some lines traced upon it in an unknown language, and then tear it up. I had ceased to question him in any matters connected with himself.

One day as I entered he took no notice of me; he was seated with his back to the door of the cell, and was whistling in melancholy mood the Spanish air, “Yo que soy contrabandista” (“A smuggler am I”). When he had completed it, he turned sharply round to me, and exclaimed: “Brother, if you ever doubt me, promise that you will cast aside all suspicion on hearing me sing this air.”

His look was earnest, and I promised what he asked, without noticing the words upon which he laid so much stress, “If you ever doubt me.” He took the empty half of a cocoanut which he had brought in on the day of my first visit, and had preserved ever since, filled it with palm wine, begged me to put my lips to it, and then drank it off at a draught. From that day he always called me brother.

And now I began to cherish a hope of saving Pierrot’s life. My uncle’s anger had cooled down a little. The preparations for the festivities connected with his daughter’s wedding had caused his feelings to flow in gentle channels. Marie joined her entreaties to mine. Each day I pointed out to him that Pierrot had had no desire to insult him, but had merely interposed to prevent him from committing an act of perhaps too great severity; that the negro had at the risk of his life saved Marie from the alligator; and besides, Pierrot was the strongest of all his slaves (for now I sought to save his life, not to obtain his liberty); that he was able to do the work of ten men, and that his single arm was sufficient to put the rollers of a sugar-mill in motion. My uncle listened to me calmly, and once or twice hinted that he might not follow up his complaint.

I did not say a word to the negro of the change that had taken place, hoping that I should soon be the messenger to announce to him his restoration to liberty. What astonished me greatly was, that though he believed that he was under sentence of death, he made no effort to avail himself of the means of escape that lay in his power. I spoke to him of this.

"I am forced to remain," said he simply, "or they would think that I was afraid."

CHAPTER ELEVEN

ONE morning Marie came to me radiant with happiness; upon her gentle face was a sweeter expression than even the joys of pure love could produce, for written upon it was the knowledge of a good deed.

"Listen," said she. "In three days we shall be married. We shall soon—"

I interrupted her.

"Do not say soon, Marie, when there is yet an interval of three days."

She blushed and smiled. "Do not be foolish, Leopold," replied she. "An idea has struck me which has made me very happy. You know that yesterday I went to town with my father to buy all sorts of things for our wedding. I only care for jewels because you say that they become me; I would give all my pearls for a single flower from the bouquet which that odious man with the marigolds destroyed. But that is not what I meant to say. My father wished to buy me everything that I admired; and among other things there was a basquina of Chinese satin embroidered with flowers, which I admired. It was very expensive. My father noticed that the dress had attracted my attention. As we were returning home, I begged him to promise me a boon after the manner of the knights of old: you know how he delights to be compared to them. He vowed on his honor that he would grant me whatever I asked, thinking of course that it was the basquina of Chinese satin; but no, it is Pierrot's pardon that I will ask for as my nuptial present."

I could not refrain from embracing her tenderly. My uncle's word was sacred, and while Marie ran to him to claim its fulfillment, I hastened to Fort Galifet to convey the glad news to Pierrot.

"Brother," exclaimed I, as I entered, "rejoice! your life is safe. Marie has obtained it as a wedding present from her father."

The slave shuddered.

"Marie — wedding — my life! "What reference have these things to one another?"

"It is very simple," answered I. "Marie, whose life you saved, is to be married—"

"To whom?" exclaimed the negro, a terrible change coming over his face.

"Did you not know that she was to be married to me?"

His features relaxed. “Ah, yes,” he replied; “and when is the marriage to take place?”

“On August the 22d.”

“On August the 22d! Are you mad?” cried he, with terror painted in his countenance.

He stopped abruptly; I looked at him with astonishment. After a short pause he clasped my hand: “Brother,” said he, “I owe you so much that I must give you a warning. Trust to me; take up your residence in Cap, and get married before the 22d.”

In vain I entreated him to explain his mysterious words.

“Farewell,” said he, in solemn tones; “I have perhaps said too much, but I hate ingratitude even more than perjury.”

I left the prison a prey to feelings of great uneasiness, but all these were soon effaced by the thoughts of my approaching happiness.

That very day my uncle withdrew his charge, and I returned to the fort to release Pierrot. Thaddeus, on hearing the noise, accompanied me to the prisoner’s cell; but he was gone! Rask alone remained, and came up to me wagging his tail. To his neck was fastened a palm-leaf, upon which were written these words: “Thanks; for the third time you have saved my life. Do not forget your promise, friend;” while underneath, in lieu of signature, were the words: “Yo que soy contrabandista.”

Thaddeus was even more astonished than I was, for he was ignorant of the enlargement of the loophole, and firmly believed that the negro had changed himself into a dog. I allowed him to remain in this belief, contenting myself with making him promise to say nothing of what he had seen. I wished to take Rask home with me, but on leaving the fort he plunged into a thicket and disappeared.

CHAPTER TWELVE

MY uncle was furiously enraged at the escape of the negro. He ordered a diligent search to be made for him, and wrote to the governor placing Pierrot entirely at his disposal should he be retaken.

The 22d of August arrived. My union with Marie was celebrated with every species of rejoicing at the parish church of Acul. How happily did that day commence from which all our misfortunes were to date! I was intoxicated with my happiness, and Pierrot and his mysterious warning were entirely banished from my thoughts.

At last the day came to a close, and my wife had retired to her apartments, but for a time duty forbade me joining her there. My position as a captain of militia required me that evening to make the round of the guards posted about Acul. This nightly precaution was absolutely necessary owing to the disturbed state of the colony, caused by occasional outbreaks among the negroes, which, however, had been promptly repressed. My uncle was the first to recall me to the recollection of my duty. I had no option but to yield, and, putting on my uniform, I went out. I visited the first few guards without discovering any cause of alarm; but toward midnight, as half buried in my own thoughts I was patroling the shores of the bay, I perceived upon the horizon a ruddy light in the direction of Limonade and St. Louis du Morin. At first my escort attributed it to some accidental conflagration; but in a few moments the flames became so vivid, and the smoke rising before the wind grew so thick, that I ordered an immediate return to the fort to give the alarm, and to request that help might be sent in the direction of the fire.

In passing through the quarters of the negroes who belonged to our estate, I was surprised at the extreme disorder that reigned there. The majority of the slaves were afoot, and were talking together with great earnestness. One strange word was pronounced with the greatest respect: It was Bug-Jargal, which occurred continually in the almost unintelligible dialect that they used. From a word or two which I gathered here and there, I learned that the negroes of the northern districts were in open revolt, and had set fire to the dwelling-houses and the plantations on the other side of Cap. Passing through a marshy spot, I discovered a quantity of axes and other tools, which would serve as weapons, hidden among the reeds.

My suspicions were now thoroughly aroused, and I ordered the whole of the Acul militia to get under arms, and gave the command to my lieutenant; and while my poor Marie was expecting me, I, obeying my uncle’s orders (who, as I have mentioned, was a member of the Provincial Assembly), took the road to Cap, with such soldiers as I had been able to muster.

I shall never forget the appearance of the town as we approached. The flames from the plantations which were burning all around it threw a lurid light upon the scene, which was only partially obscured by the clouds of smoke which the wind drove into the narrow streets. Immense masses of sparks rose from the burning heaps of sugar-cane, and fell like fiery snow on the roofs of the houses, and on the rigging of the vessels at anchor in the roadsteads, at every moment threatening the town of Cap with as serious a conflagration as was already raging in its immediate neighborhood. It was a terrible sight to witness the terror-stricken inhabitants exposing their lives to preserve from so destructive a visitant their habitations, which perhaps was the last portion of property left to them; while, on the other hand, the vessels, taking advantage of a fair wind, and fearing the same fate, had already set sail, and were gliding over an ocean reddened by the flames of the conflagration.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

STUNNED by the noise of the minute-guns from the fort, by the cries of the fugitives and the distant crash of falling buildings, I did not know in what direction to lead my men; but meeting in the main square the captain of the Yellow Dragoons, he advised me to proceed direct to the governor.

Other hands have painted the disasters of Cap, and I must pass quickly over my recollections of them, written as they are in fire and blood. I will content myself with saying that the insurgent slaves were already masters of Dondon, of Terrier Rouge, of the town of Ouanaminte, and of the plantation of Limbe. This last news filled me with uneasiness, owing to the proximity of Limbe to Acul. I made all speed to the Government House. All was in confusion there. I asked for orders, and begged that instant measures might be taken for the security of Acul, which I feared the insurgents were already threatening. "With the governor (Monsieur de Blanchelande) were M. de Rouvray, the brigadier and one of the largest landholders in Cap; M. de Touzard, the lieutenant-colonel of the Regiment of Cap; a great many members of the Colonial and the Provincial Assemblies, and numbers of the leading colonists. As I entered, all were engaged in a confused argument.

"Your Excellency," said a member of the Provincial Assembly, "it is only too true — it is the negroes, and not the free mulattoes. It has often been pointed out that there was danger in that direction."

"You make that statement without believing in its truth," answered a member of the Colonial Assembly, bitterly; "and you only say it to gain credit at our expense. So far from expecting a rising of the slaves, .you got up a sham one in 1789 — a ridiculous farce, in which with a supposed insurgent force of three thousand slaves one national volunteer only was killed, and that most likely by his own comrades."

"I repeat," replied the Provincial, "that we can see further than you. It is only natural. We remain upon the spot and study the minutest details of the colony, while you and your Assembly hurry off to France to make some absurd proposals, which are often met with a national reprimand Ridiculus mus."

The member of the Colonial Assembly answered with a sneer: "Our fellow-citizens reelected us all without hesitation."

"It was your Assembly," retorted the other, "that caused the execution of that poor devil who neglected to wear a tricolored cockade in a cafe, and who commenced a petition for capital punishment to be inflicted on the mulatto Lacombe with that worn-out phrase, 'In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.'"

"It is false!" exclaimed the other; "there has always been a struggle of principles against privileges between our Assemblies."

"Ha, monsieur! I see now you are an Independent."

"That is tantamount to allowing that you are in favor of the White Cockade: I leave you to get out of that confession as best you may."

More might have passed, but the governor interposed: "Gentlemen, gentlemen, what has this to do with the present state of affairs, and the pressing danger that threatens us? Listen to the reports that I have received. The revolt began this night at ten o'clock among the slaves in the Turpin Plantation. The negroes, headed by an English slave named Bouckmann, were joined by the blacks from Clement, Tremes, Flaville, and Nôe. They set fire to all the plantations, and massacred the colonists with the most unheard-of barbarities. By one single detail I can make you comprehend all the horrors accompanying this insurrection. The standard of the insurgents is the body of a white child on the point of a pike."

A general cry of horror interrupted the governor's statement.

"So much," continued he, "for what has passed outside the town. Within its limits all is confusion. Pear has rendered many of the inhabitants forgetful of the duties of humanity, and they have murdered their slaves. Nearly all have confined their negroes behind bolts and bars. The white artisans accuse the free mulattoes of being participators in the revolt, and many have had great difficulty in escaping from the fury of the populace. I have had to grant them a place of refuge in a church, guarded by a regiment of soldiers; and now, to prove that they have nothing in common with the insurgents, they ask that they may be armed and led against the rebels."

"Do nothing of the kind, your Excellency!" cried a voice which I recognized as that of the planter with whom I had had a duel— "do nothing of the kind! give no arms to the mulattoes!"

"What! do you not want to fight?" asked a planter, with a sneer.

The other did not appear to hear him, and continued: "These men of mixed blood are our worst enemies, and we must take every precaution against them. It is from that quarter that the insurgents are recruited; the negroes have but little to do with the rising." The poor wretch hoped by his abuse of the mulattoes to prove that he had nothing in common with them, and to clear himself from the imputation of having black blood in his veins; but the attempt was too barefaced, and a murmur of disgust rose up on all sides.

"Yes," said M. de Rouvray, "the slaves have something to do with it, for they are forty to one; and we should be in a serious plight if we could only oppose the negroes and the mulattoes with whites like you."

The planter bit his lips.

"General," said the governor, "what answer shall be given to the petition? Shall the mulattoes have the arms?"

"Give them weapons, your Excellency; let us make use of every willing hand. And you, sir," he added, turning to the colonist of doubtful color, "go arm yourself, and join your comrades."

The humiliated planter slunk away, filled with concentrated rage.

But the cries of distress which rang through the town reached even to the chamber in which the council was being held. M. de Blanchelande hastily penciled a few words upon a slip of paper and handed it to one of his aides-de-camp, who at once left the room.

"Gentlemen," he said, "the mulattoes will receive arms; but there are many more questions to be settled."

"The Provincial Assembly should at once be convoked," said the planter who had been speaking when first I entered.

"The Provincial Assembly!" retorted his antagonist; "what is the Provincial Assembly?"

"You do not know because you are a member of the Colonial Assembly," replied the favorer of the White Cockade.

The Independent interrupted him. "I know no more of the Colonial than the Provincial; I only recognize the General Assembly."

"Gentlemen," exclaimed a planter, "while we are losing time with this nonsense, tell me what is to become of my cotton and my cochineal."

"And my indigo at Lumbe?"

"And my negroes, for whom I paid twenty dollars a-head all round?" said the captain of a slave-ship.

"Each minute that you waste," continued another colonist, "costs me ten quintals of sugar, which at seventeen piastres the quintal makes one hundred and thirty livres, ten sous, in French money, by the—"

Here the rival upholders of the two Assemblies again sought to renew their argument.

“Morbleu,” said M. de Rouvray in a voice of thunder, striking the table violently, “what eternal talkers you are! What do we care about your two Assemblies? Summon both of them, your Excellency, and I will form them into two regiments; and when they march against the negroes we shall see whether their tongues or their muskets make the most noise.”

Then turning toward me he whispered: “Between the two Assemblies and the governor nothing can be done. These fine talkers spoil all, as they do in Paris. If I was seated in his Excellency’s chair, I would throw all these fellows out of the window, and with my soldiers and a dozen crosses of St. Louis to promise, I would sweep away all the rebels in the island. These fictitious ideas of liberty, which they have all run mad after in France, do not do out here. Negroes should be treated so as not to upset them entirely by sudden liberation; all the terrible events of to-day are merely the result of this utterly mistaken policy, and this rising of the slaves is the natural result of the taking of the Bastile.”

While the old soldier thus explained to me his views — a little narrow-minded perhaps, but full of the frankness of conviction — the stormy argument was at its height. A certain planter, one among the few who were bitten with the rabid mania of the revolution, and who called himself Citizen General C — , because he had assisted at a few sanguinary executions, exclaimed:

“We must have punishments rather than battles. Every nation must exist by terrible examples: let us terrify the negroes. It was I who quieted the slaves during the risings of June and July by lining the approach to my house with a double row of negro heads. Let each one join me in this, and let us defend the entrances to Cap with the slaves who are still in our hands.”

“How?”

“What do you mean?”

“Folly!”

“The height of imprudence!” was heard on all sides.

“You do not understand me, gentlemen. Let us make a ring of negro heads, from Fort Picolet to Point Caracole. The rebels, their comrades, will not then dare to approach us. I have five hundred slaves who have remained faithful: I offer them at once.”

This abominable proposal was received with a cry of horror. “It is infamous! It is too disgusting!” was repeated by at least a dozen voices.

“Extreme steps of this sort have brought us to the verge of destruction,” said a planter. “If the execution of the insurgents of June and July had not been so hurried on, we should have held in our hands the clew to the conspiracy, which the ax of the executioner divided forever.”

Citizen C — was silenced for a moment by this outburst; then in an injured tone he muttered: “I did not think that 1 above all others should have been suspected of cruelty. “Why, all my life I have been mixed up with the lovers of the negro race. I am in correspondence with Briscot and Pruneau de Pomme Gouge, in France; with Hans Sloane, in England; with Magaw, in America; with Pezll, in Germany; with Olivarius, in Denmark; with Wadstiôrn, in Sweden; with Peter Paulus, in Holland; with Avendano, in Spain; and with the Abbe Pierre Tamburini, in Italy!”

His voice rose as he ran through the names of his correspondents among the lovers of the African race, and he terminated his speech with the contemptuous remark, “But after all, there are no true philosophers here.”

For the third time M. de Blanchelande asked if any one had anything further to propose.

“Your Excellency,” cried one, “let us embark on board the ‘Leopard,’ which lies at anchor off the quay.”

“Let us put a price on the head of Bouckmann,” exclaimed another.

“Send a report of what has taken place to the Governor of Jamaica,” suggested a third.

“A good idea, so that he may again send us the ironical help of five hundred muskets!” sneered a member of the Provincial Assembly. “Your Excellency, let us send the news to France, and wait for a reply.”

“Wait! a likely thing indeed,” exclaimed M. de Rouvray; “and do you think that the blacks will wait, eh? And the flames that encircle our town, do you think that they will wait?

Your Excellency, let the tocsin be sounded, and send dragoons and grenadiers in search of the main body of the rebels. Form a camp in the eastern division of the island; plant military posts at Trou and at Vallieres. I will take charge of the plain of Dauphin; but let us lose no more time, for the moment for action has arrived.”

The bold and energetic speech of the veteran soldier, hushed all differences of opinion. The general had acted wisely. That secret knowledge which every one possesses, most conducive to his own interests, caused all to support the proposal of General de Rouvray; and while the governor with a warm clasp of the hand showed his old friend that his counsels had been appreciated, though they had been given in rather a dictatorial manner, the colonists urged for the immediate carrying out of the proposals.

I seized the opportunity to obtain from M. de Blanchelande the permission that I so ardently desired, and leaving the room, mustered my company in order to return to Acul — though, with the exception of myself, all were worn out with the fatigue of their late march.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

DAY began to break as I entered the marketplace of the town and began to rouse up the soldiers, who were lying about in all directions wrapped in their cloaks, and mingled pell-mell with the Red and Yellow Dragoons, fugitives from the country, cattle bellowing, and property of every description sent in for security by the planters. In the midst of all this confusion I began to pick out my men, when I saw a private in the Yellow Dragoons, covered with dust and perspiration, ride up at full speed. I hastened to meet him; and in a few broken words he informed me that my fears were realized — that the insurrection had spread to Acul, and that the negroes were besieging Fort Galifet, in which the planters and the militia had taken refuge. I must tell you that this fort was by no means a strong one, for in St. Domingo they dignify the slightest earthwork with the name of fort.

There was not a moment to be lost I mounted as many of my soldiers as I could procure horses for, and taking the dragoon as a guide, I reached my uncle’s plantation about ten o’clock. I scarcely cast a glance at the enormous estate, which was nothing but a sea of flame, over which hovered huge clouds of smoke, through which every now and then the wind bore trunks of trees covered with sparks. A terrible rustling and crackling sound seemed to reply to the distant yells of the negroes which we now began to hear, though we could not as yet see them. The destruction of all this wealth, which would eventually have become mine, did not cause me a moment’s regret. All 1 thought of was the safety of Marie: what mattered anything else in the world to me?

I knew that she had taken refuge in the fort, and I prayed to God that I might arrive in time to rescue her. This hope sustained me through all the anxiety I felt, and gave me the strength and courage of a lion.

At length a turn in the road permitted us to see the fort. The tricolor yet floated on its walls, and a well-sustained fire was kept up by the garrison. I uttered a shout of joy. “Gallop, spur on!” said I to my men, and redoubling our pace we dashed across the fields in the direction of the scene of action. Near the fort I could see my uncle’s house; the doors and windows were dashed in, but the walls still stood, and shone red with the reflected glare of the flames, which, owing to the wind being in a contrary direction, had not yet reached the building. A crowd of the insurgents had taken possession of the house, and showed themselves at the windows and on the roof. I could see the glare of torches and the gleam of pikes and axes, while a brisk fire of musketry was kept up on the fort. Another strong body of negroes had placed ladders against the walls of the fort and strove to take it by assault, though many fell under the well-directed fire of the defenders. These black men, always returning to the charge after each repulse, looked like a swarm of ants endeavoring to scale the shell of a tortoise, and shaken off by each movement of the sluggish reptile.

We reached the outworks of the fort, our eyes fixed upon the banner which still floated above it. I called upon my men to remember that their wives and children were shut up within those walls, and urged them to fly to their rescue. A general cheer was the reply, and forming column I was on the point of giving the order to charge, when a loud yell was heard; a cloud of smoke enveloped the fort and for a time concealed it from our sight; a roar was heard like that of a furnace in full blast, and as the smoke cleared away we saw a red flag floating proudly above the dismantled walls. All was over. Fort Galifet was in the hands of the insurgents.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

I CANNOT tell you what my feelings were at this terrible spectacle. The fort was taken, its defenders slain, and twenty families massacred; but I confess, to my shame, that I thought not of this. Marie was lost to me — lost, after having been made mine but a few brief hours before; lost, perhaps, through my fault, for had I not obeyed the orders of my uncle in going to Cap I should have been by her side to defend her, or at least to die with her. These thoughts raised my grief to madness, for my despair was born of remorse.

However, my men were maddened at the sight. With a shout of "Revenge!" with sabers between their teeth and pistols in either hand, they burst into the ranks of the victorious insurgents. Although far superior in numbers, the negroes fled at their approach; but we could see them on our right and left, before and behind us, slaughtering the colonists, and casting fuel on the flames. Our rage was increased by their cowardly conduct.

Thaddeus, covered with wounds, made his escape through a postern gate. "Captain," said he, "your Pierrot is a sorcerer — an obi as these infernal negroes call him; a devil, I say. We were holding our position, you were coming up fast; all seemed saved — when by some means, which I do not know, he penetrated into the fort, and there was an end of us. As for your uncle and Madame—"

"Marie!" interrupted I, "where is Marie?"

At this instant a tall black burst through a blazing fence, carrying in his arms a young woman who shrieked and struggled: it was Marie, and the negro was Pierrot!

"Traitor!" cried I, and fired my pistol at him; one of the rebels threw himself in the way, and fell dead.

Pierrot turned, and addressed a few words to me which I did not catch; and then grasping his prey tighter, he dashed into a mass of burning sugar-canes. A moment afterward a huge dog passed me, carrying in his mouth a cradle in which lay my uncle's youngest child. Transported with rage, I fired my second pistol at him; but it missed fire.

Like a madman I followed on their tracks; but my night march, the hours that I had spent without taking rest or food, my fears for Marie, and the sudden fall from the height of happiness to the depth of misery, had worn me out. After a few steps I staggered, a cloud seemed to come over me, and I fell senseless.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

WHEN I recovered my senses I found myself in my uncle’s ruined house, supported in the arms of my faithful Thaddeus, who gazed upon me with an expression of the deepest anxiety. “Victory!” exclaimed he, as he felt my pulse begin to beat; “victory! the negroes are in full retreat and my captain has come to life again!”

I interrupted his exclamations of joy by putting the only question in which I had any interest: “Where is Marie?” I had not yet collected my scattered ideas: I felt my misfortune without the recollection of it.

At my question Thaddeus hung his head. Then my memory returned to me, and like a hideous dream I recalled once more the terrible nuptial day, and the tall negro bearing away Marie through the flames. The rebellion which had broken out in the colony caused the whites to look on the blacks as their mortal enemies, and made me see in Pierrot — the good, the generous, and the devoted, who owed his life three times to me — a monster of ingratitude and a rival. The carrying off my wife on the very night of our nuptials proved too plainly to me what I had at first only suspected; and I now knew that the singer of the wood was the wretch who had torn my wife from me. In a few hours how great a change had taken place!

Thaddeus told me that he had vainly pursued Pierrot and his dog when the negroes, in spite of their numbers, retired; and that the destruction of my uncle’s property still continued, without the possibility of its being arrested. I asked what had become of my uncle. He took my hand in silence and led me to a bed, the curtains of which he drew. My unhappy uncle was there, stretched upon his blood-stained couch, with a dagger driven deeply into his heart. By the tranquil expression of his face it was easy to see that the blow had been struck during his sleep.

The bed of the dwarf Habibrah, who always slept at the foot of his master’s couch, was also profusely stained with gore, and the same crimson traces could be seen upon the laced coat of the poor fool, cast upon the floor a few paces from the bed. I did not hesitate for a moment in believing that the dwarf had died a victim to his affection for my uncle, and that he had been murdered by his comrades, perhaps in the effort to defend his master. I reproached myself bitterly for the prejudice which had caused me to form so erroneous an estimate of the characters of Pierrot and Habibrah; and of the tears I shed at the tragic fate of my uncle, some were dedicated to the end of the faithful fool. By my orders his body was carefully searched for, but ail in vain; and I imagined that the negroes had cast the body into the flames. I gave instructions that in the funeral service over my uncle's remains prayers should be said for the repose of the soul of the devoted Habibrah.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

FORT GALIFET had been destroyed, our house was in ruins; it was useless to linger there any longer, so that evening I returned to Cap. On my arrival there I was seized with a severe fever. The effort that I had made to overcome my despair had been too violent; the spring had been bent too far and had snapped. Delirium came on. My broken hopes, my profound love, my lost future, and, above all, the torments of jealousy made my brain reel. It seemed as if fire flowed in my veins; my head seemed ready to burst, and my bosom was filled with rage. I pictured to myself Marie in the arms of another lover, subject to the power of a master, of a slave, of Pierrot! They told me afterward that I sprang from my bed, and that it took six men to prevent me from dashing out my brains against the wall. Why did I not die then?

The crisis, however, passed. The doctors, the care and attention of Thaddeus, and the latent powers of youth conquered the malady: would that it had not done so! At the end of ten days I was sufficiently recovered to lay aside grief, and to live for vengeance.

Hardly arrived at a state of convalescence, I went to M. de Blanchelande, and asked for employment. At first he wished to give me the command of some fortified post, but I begged him to attach me to one of the flying columns, which from time to time were sent out to sweep those districts in which the insurgents had congregated. Cap had been hastily put in a position of defense, for the revolt had made terrible progress, and the negroes of Port au Prince had begun to show symptoms of disaffection. Biassou was in command of the insurgents at Lumbe, Dondon, and Acul; Jean François had proclaimed himself generalissimo of the rebels of Maribarou; Bouckmann, whose tragic fate afterward gave him a certain celebrity, with his brigands ravaged the plains of Limonade; and lastly, the bands of Morne-Rouge had elected for their chief a negro called Bug-Jargal.

If report was to be believed, the disposition of this man contrasted very favorably with the ferocity of the other chiefs. “While Bouckmann and Biassou invented a thousand different methods of death for such prisoners as fell into their hands, Bug-Jargal was always ready to supply them with the means of quitting the island. M. Colas de Marjue and eight other distinguished colonists were by his orders released from the terrible death of the wheel to which Bouckmann had condemned them; and many other instances of his humanity were cited which I have not time to repeat.

My hoped-for vengeance, however, still appeared to be far removed. I could hear nothing of Pierrot, The insurgents commanded by Biassou continued to give us trouble at Cap; they had once even endeavored to take position on a hill that commanded the town, and had only been dislodged by the battery from the citadel being directed upon them. The governor had therefore determined to drive them into the interior of the island. The militia of Acul, of Lumbe, of Ouanaminte, and of Maribarou, joined with the regiment of Cap and the Red and Yellow Dragoons, formed one army of attack; while the corps of volunteers under the command of the merchant Poncignon, with the militia of Dondon and Quartier-Dauphin, composed the garrison of the town.

The governor desired first to free himself from Bug-Jargal, whose incursions kept the garrison constantly on the alert; and he sent against him the militia of Ouanaminte and a battalion of the regiment of Cap. Two days afterward the expedition returned, having sustained a severe defeat at the hands of Bug-Jargal. The governor, however, determined to persevere, and a fresh column was sent out with fifty of the Yellow Dragoons and four hundred of the militia of Maribarou. This second expedition met with even less success than the first. Thaddeus, who had taken part in it, was in a violent fury, and upon his return vowed vengeance against the rebel chief Bug-Jargal.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

THE news had reached us that Bug-Jargal had left Morne-Rouge, and was moving through the mountains to effect a junction with the troops of Biassou. The governor could not conceal his delight. “We have them!” cried he, rubbing his hands. “They are in our power!’

By the next morning the colonial forces had marched some four miles to the front of Cap. At our approach the insurgents hastily retired from the positions which they had occupied at Port-Mayat and Fort Galifet, and in which they had planted siege guns that they had captured in one of the batteries on the coast. The governor was triumphant, and by his orders we continued our advance. As we passed through the arid plains and the ruined plantations, many a one cast an eager glance in search of the spot which was once his home; but in too many cases the foot of the destroyer had left no traces behind. Sometimes our march was interrupted, by the conflagration having spread from the lands under cultivation to the virgin forests.

In these regions, where the land is untilled and the vegetation abundant, the burning of a forest is accompanied with many strange phenomena. Far off, long before the eye can detect the cause, a sound is heard like the rush of a cataract over opposing rocks; the trunks of the trees flame out with a sudden crash, the branches crackle, and the roots beneath the soil all contribute to the extraordinary uproar. The lakes and the marshes in the interior of the forests boil with the heat. The hoarse roar of the, coming flame stills the air, causing a dull sound, sometimes increasing and sometimes diminishing in intensity as the conflagration sweeps on or recedes. Occasionally a glimpse can be caught of a clump of trees surrounded by a belt of fire, but as yet untouched by the flames; then a narrow streak of fire curls round the stems, and in another instant the whole becomes one mass of gold-colored fire. Then uprises a column of smoke, driven here and there by the breeze; it takes a thousand fantastic forms — spreads itself out, diminishes in an instant; at one moment it is gone, in another it returns with greater density; then all becomes a thick black cloud, with a fringe of sparks; a terrible sound is heard, the sparks disappear, and the smoke ascends, disappearing at last in a mass of red ashes, which sink down slowly upon the blackened ground.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

ON the evening of the third day of our march we entered the ravines of Grande-Riviere; we calculated that the negro army was some twenty leagues off in the mountains.

We pitched our camp on a low hill, which appeared to have been used for the same purpose before, as the grass had been trodden down and the brushwood cut away. It was not a judicious position in a strategical point of view, but we deemed ourselves perfectly secure from attack. The hill was commanded on all sides by steep mountains clothed with thick forests — their precipitous sides having given these mountains the name of the Dompte-Mulâtre. The Grande-Riviere flowed behind our camp, which being confined within steep banks was just about here very deep and rapid. Both sides of the river were hidden with thickets, through which nothing could be seen. The waters of the stream itself were frequently concealed by masses of creeping plants, hanging from the branches of the flowering maples which had sprung up at intervals in the jungle, crossing and recrossing the stream, and forming a tangled net-work of living verdure. From the heights of the adjacent hills this mass of verdure appeared like a meadow still fresh with dew, while every now and then a dull splash could be heard as a teal plunged through the flower-decked curtain, and showed in which direction the river lay. By degrees the sun ceased to gild the crested peaks of the distant mountains of Dondon; little by little darkness spread its mantle over the camp, and the silence was only broken by the cry of the nightbird, or by the measured tread of the sentinels.

Suddenly the dreaded war songs of “Oua-Nasse” and of “The Camp of the Great Meadow” were heard above our heads; the palms, the acomas, and the cedars, which crowned the summits of the rocks, burst into flames, and the lurid light of the conflagration showed us numerous bands of negroes and mulattoes, whose copper-hued skins glowed red in the firelight upon the neighboring hills. It was the army of Biassou.

.The danger was imminent. The officers, aroused from their sleep, endeavored to rally their men. The drum beat the “Assembly,” while the bugles sounded the “Alarm.” Our men fell in hurriedly and in confusion;

but the insurgents, instead of taking advantage of our disorder, remained motionless, gazing upon us, and continuing their song of “Oua-Nasse.”

A gigantic negro appeared alone on one of the peaks that overhung the Grande-Riviere; a flame-colored plume floated on his head, and he held an ax in his right hand and a blood-red banner in his left. I recognized Pierrot. Had a carbine been within my reach I should have fired at him, cowardly although the act might have been. The negro repeated the chorus of “Oua-Nasse,” planted his standard on the highest portion of the rock, hurled his ax into the midst of our ranks, and plunged into the stream. A feeling of regret seized me; I had hoped to have slain him with my own hand.

Then the negroes began to hurl huge masses of rocks upon us, while showers of bullets and flights of arrows were poured upon our camp.

Our soldiers, maddened at being unable to reach their adversaries, fell on all sides, crushed by the rocks, riddled with bullets, and transfixed by arrows. The army was rapidly falling into disorder. Suddenly a terrible noise came from the center of the stream.

The Yellow Dragoons, who had suffered most from the shower of rocks, had conceived the idea of taking refuge under the thick roof of creepers which grew over the river. It was Thaddeus who had at first discovered this—

Here the narrative was suddenly interrupted.

CHAPTER TWENTY

MORE than a quarter of an hour had elapsed since Thaddeus, his arm in a sling, had glided into the tent without any of the listeners noticing his arrival, and taking up his position in a remote corner had by occasional gestures expressed the interest that he took in his captain's narrative; but at last, considering that this direct allusion to himself ought not to be permitted to pass without some acknowledgment on his part, he stammered out —

"You are too good, Captain!"

A general burst of laughter followed this speech, and D'Auverney, turning toward him, exclaimed severely: "What, Thaddeus, you here? And your arm?"

On being addressed in so unaccustomed a tone, the features of the old soldier grew dark; he quivered, and threw back his head, as though to restrain the tears which seemed to struggle to his eyes. "I never thought," said he, in a low voice, "that you, Captain, could have omitted to say thou when speaking to your old sergeant."

"Pardon me, old friend," answered the captain, quickly; "I hardly knew what I said. Thou wilt pardon me, wilt thou not?"

The tears sprang to the sergeant's eyes in spite of his efforts to repress them. "It is the third time," remarked he— "but these are tears of joy."

Peace was made, and a short silence ensued.

"But tell me, Thaddeus, why hast thou quitted the hospital to come here?" asked D'Auverney, gently.

"It was — with your permission, Captain — to ask if I should put the laced saddle cloth on the charger for to-morrow."

Henri laughed. "You would have been wiser, Thaddeus, to have asked the surgeon-major if you should put two more pieces of lint on your arm," said he.

"Or to ask," continued Paschal, "if you might take a glass of wine to refresh yourself. At any rate, here is some brandy; taste it — it will do you good, my brave sergeant."

Thaddeus advanced, saluted, and apologizing for taking the glass with his left hand, emptied it to the health of the assembled company: "You had got, Captain, to the moment when —

yes, I remember, it was I who proposed to take shelter under the creepers, to prevent our men being smashed by the rocks. Our officer, who did not know how to swim, was afraid of being drowned, and, as was natural, was dead against it until he saw — with your permission, gentlemen — a great rock fall on the creepers without being able to get through them. 'It is better to die like Pharaoh than like Saint Stephen,' said he; 'for we are not saints, and Pharaoh was a soldier like ourselves. ' The officer was a learned man, you see. And so he agreed to my proposal, on the condition that I should first try the experiment myself. Off I went; I slid down the bank and caught hold of the roof of the creepers, when all of a sudden some one took a pull at my legs. I struggled, I shouted for help, and in a minute I received half a dozen saber-cuts. Down came the dragoons to help me, and there was a nice little skirmish under the creepers. The blacks of Morne-Rouge had hidden themselves there, never for a moment thinking that we should fall right on the top of them. This was not the right time for fishing, I can tell you. We fought, we swore, we shouted. They had nothing particular on, and were able to move about in the water more easily than we were; but, on the other hand, our sabers had less to cut through. We swam with one hand and fought with the other. Those who could not swim, like my captain, hung on to the creepers, while the negroes pulled them by the legs.

"In the midst of the hullabaloo I saw a big negro fighting like Beelzebub against five or six others. I swam up to him, and recognized Pierrot, otherwise called Bug — But I mustn't tell that yet, must I, Captain? Since the capture of the fort I owed him a grudge, so I took him hard and fast by the throat; he was going to rid himself of me by a thrust of his dagger, when he recognized me and gave himself up at once. That was very unfortunate, was it not, Captain? For if he had not surrendered, ' he would not — But you will know that later on, eh? "When the blacks saw that he was taken they made a rush at me to get him off; when Pierrot, seeing no doubt that they would all lose their lives, said some gibberish or other, and in the twinkling of an eye they plunged into the water, and were out of sight in a moment. This fight in the water would have been pleasant enough if I had not lost a finger and wetted ten cartridges, and if the poor man — but it was to be, was it not, Captain?"

And the sergeant respectfully placed the back of his hand to his forage-cap, and then raised it to heaven with the air of an inspired prophet.

D’Auverney was violently agitated. “Yes,” cried he, “thou art right, my old Thaddeus; that night was a fatal night for me!”

He would have fallen into one of his usual reveries had they not urgently pressed him to conclude his story. After a while he continued.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

WHILE the scene which Thaddeus has just described was passing behind the camp, I had succeeded, by aid of the brushwood, with some of my men in climbing the opposite hills until we had reached a point called Peacock Peak, from the brilliant tints of the mica which coated the surface of the rock.

From this position, which was opposite a rock covered with negroes, we opened a withering fire. The insurgents, who were not so well armed as we were, could not reply warmly to our volleys, and in a short time began to grow discouraged. We redoubled our efforts, and our enemies soon evacuated the neighboring rocks, first hurling the dead bodies of their comrades upon our army, the greater proportion of which was still drawn up on the hill. Then we cut down several trees, and binding the trunks together with fibers of the palm, we improvised a bridge, and by it crossed over to the deserted positions of the enemy, and thus managed to secure a good post of vantage. This operation completely quenched the courage of the rebels. Our fire continued. Shouts of grief arose from them, in which the name of Bug-Jargal was frequently repeated. Many negroes of the army of Morne-Rouge appeared on the rock upon which the blood-red banner still floated; they prostrated themselves before it, tore it from its resting-place, and then precipitated it and themselves into the depths of the Grande-Riviere. This seemed to signify that their chief was either killed or a prisoner.

Our confidence had now risen to such a pitch that I resolved to drive them from their last position at the point of the bayonet, and at the head of my men I dashed into the midst of the negroes. The soldiers were about to follow me across the temporary bridge that I had caused to be thrown from peak to peak, when one of the rebels with a blow of his ax broke the bridge to atoms, and the ruins fell into the abyss with a terrible noise.

I turned my head: in a moment I was surrounded, and seized by six or seven negroes, who disarmed me in a moment. I struggled like a lion, but they bound me with cords made of bark, heedless of the hail of bullets that my soldiers poured upon them. My despair was somewhat soothed by the cries of victory which I heard from our men, and I soon saw the negroes and mulattoes ascending the steep sides of the rocks with all the precipitation of fear, uttering cries of terror.

My captors followed their example. The strongest among them placed me on their shoulders, and carried me in the direction of the forest, leaping from rock to rock with the agility of wild goats. The flames soon ceased to light the scene, and it was by the pale rays of the moon that we pursued our course.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

AFTER passing through jungles and crossing” many a torrent, we arrived in a valley situated in the higher part of the hills, of a singularly wild and savage appearance. The spot was absolutely unknown to me. The valley was situated in the heart of the hills, in what is called the “double mountains.” It was a large green plain, imprisoned by walls of bare rock, and dotted with clumps of pines and palm-trees. The cold, which at this height is very severe, was increased by the morning air, the day having just commenced to break; but the valley was still plunged in darkness, and was only lighted by flashes from the negroes’ fires. Evidently this spot was their headquarters; the shattered remains of their army had begun to reassemble, and every now and then bands of negroes and mulattoes arrived, uttering groans of distress and cries of rage. New fires were speedily lighted, and the camp began to increase in size.

The negro whose prisoner I was had placed me at the foot of an oak, whence I surveyed this strange spectacle with entire carelessness. The black had bound me with his belt to the trunk of the tree, against which I was leaning, and carefully tightening the knots in the cords which impeded my movements, he placed on my head his own red woolen cap, as if to indicate that I was his property; and after making sure that I could not escape or be carried off by others, he was preparing to leave me, when I determined to address him; and speaking in the Creole dialect, I asked him if he belonged to the band of Dondon, or of Morne-Rouge. He stopped at once, and in a tone of pride replied, “Morne-Rouge.” Then an idea entered my head. I had often heard of the generosity of the chief Bug-Jargal; and though I had made up my mind that death would soon end all my troubles, the thought of the tortures that would inevitably precede it should I fall into the hands of Biassou filled me with horror. All I wanted was to be put to death without torment. It was perhaps a weakness, but I believe that the mind of man ever revolts at such a death. I thought then that if I could be taken from Biassou, Bug-Jargal might give me what I desired — a soldier’s death. I therefore asked the negro of Morne-Rouge to lead me to Bug-Jargal.

He started: “Bug-Jargal!” he repeated, striking on his forehead in anguish; then, as if rage had suddenly overtaken him, he shook his fist, and shouting, “Biassou, Biassou!” he left me hastily.

The mingled rage and grief of the negro re called to my mind the events of the day, and the certainty we had acquired of either the death or capture of the chief of the baud of Morne-Rouge. I felt that all hope was over, and resigned myself to the threatened vengeance of Biassou.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

A GROUP of negresses came near the tree to which I was fastened, and. lighted a fire. By the numerous bracelets of blue, red, and violet glass which ornamented their arms and ankles; by the rings which weighed down their ears and adorned their toes and fingers; by the amulets on their bosoms and the collar of charms suspended round their necks; by the aprons of variegated feathers which were their sole coverings — I at once recognized them as griotes. You are perhaps ignorant that among the African blacks there exists a certain class with a rude talent for poetry and improvisation, which approaches closely to madness. These unhappy creatures, wandering from one African kingdom to another, are in these barbarian countries looked upon in the same light as the minstrels of England,. the minnesingers of Germany, and the troubadours of France. They are called “griots,” and their wives “griotes.” The griotes accompany the barbaric songs of their husbands with lascivious dances, and form a grotesque parody on the nautch girls of India and the almes of Egypt.

It was a group of these women who came and sat down near me, with their legs crossed under them according to their custom, and their hideous faces lighted up by the red light of a fire of withered branches. When they had formed a complete circle they all joined hands, and the eldest, who had a heron’s plume stuck in her hair, began to exclaim, “Ouanga!” I at once understood that they were going through one of their performances of pretended witchcraft. Then the leader of the band, after a moment’s silence, plucked a lock of hair from her head and threw it into the fire, crying out these words, “Male o guiab,” which in the jargon of the Creoles means, “I shall go to the devil.” All the griotes imitated their leader, and throwing locks of their hair in the fire, repeated gravely, “Male o guiab.” This strange invocation, and the extraordinary grimaces that accompanied it, caused me to burst into one of those hysterical fits of laughter which so often seize on one even at the most serious moments. It was in vain that I endeavored to restrain it — it ‘would have vent; and this laugh, which escaped from so sad a heart, brought about a gloomy and terrifying scene.

Disturbed in their incantations, the negresses sprang to their feet, Until then they had not noticed me, but now they rushed close up to me, screaming “Blanco, Blanco!” I have never seen so hideous a collection of faces, distorted as they were with passion, their white teeth gleaming, and their eyes almost starting from their heads. They were, I believe, about to tear me in pieces, when the old woman with the heron's plume on her head stopped them with a sign of her hand, and exclaimed seven times, "Zote corde?" ("Do you agree?") The wretched creatures stopped at once, and to my surprise tore off their feather aprons, which they flung upon the ground, and commenced the lascivious dance which the negroes call "La chica."

This dance, which should only consist of attitudes and movements expressive of gayety and pleasure, assumed a very different complexion when performed by these naked sorceresses. In turn, each of them would place her face close to mine, and with a frightful expression of countenance would detail the horrible punishment that awaited the white man who had profaned the mysteries of their Ouanga. I recollected that savage nations had a custom of dancing round the victims that they were about to sacrifice, and I patiently awaited the conclusion of the performance which I knew would be sealed with my blood; and yet I could not repress a shudder as I perceived each griote, in strict unison with the time, thrust into the fire the point of a saber, the blade of an ax, a long sail-maker's needle, a pair of pincers, and the teeth of a saw.

The dance was approaching its conclusion, and the instruments of torture were glowing red with heat. At a signal from the old woman, each negress in turn withdrew an implement from the fire, while those who had none furnished themselves with a blazing stick. Then I understood clearly what my punishment was to be, and that in each of the dancers I should find an executioner. Again the word of command was given, and the last figure of the dance was commenced. I closed my eyes that I might not see the frantic evolutions of these female demons, who in measured cadence clashed the red-hot weapons over their heads. A dull, clinking sound followed, while the sparks flew out in myriads. I waited, nerving myself for the moment when I should feel my flesh quiver in agony, my bones calcine, and my muscles writhe under the burning tortures of the nippers and the saws. It was an awful moment. Fortunately it did not last long.

In the distance I heard the voice of the negro whose prisoner I was, shouting, "Que haceis, mujeres, ne demonio, que haceis alii, devais mi prisonero?" I opened my eyes again; it was already broad daylight. The negro hurried toward me, gesticulating angrily. The griotes paused, but they seemed less influenced by the threats of my captor than by the presence of a strange-looking person by whom the negro was accompanied.

It was a very stout and very short man — a species of dwarf — whose face was entirely concealed by a white veil, pierced with three holes for the eyes and mouth. The veil hung down to his shoulders, and displayed a hairy, copper-hued breast, upon which was hung by a golden chain the mutilated sun of a monstrance. The cross-hilt of a heavy dagger peeped from a scarlet belt, which also supported a kind of petticoat striped with green, yellow, and black, the hem of which hung down to his large and ill-shaped feet. His arms, like his breast, were bare; he carried a white staff, and a rosary of amber beads was suspended from his belt, in close proximity to the handle of his dagger. His head was surmounted with a pointed cap adorned with bells; and when he came close I was not surprised in recognizing in it the gorra of Habibrah, and among the hieroglyphics with which it was covered I could see many spots of gore: without doubt, it was the blood of the faithful fool. These blood-stains gave me fresh proofs of his death, and awakened in me once again a fresh feeling of regret for his loss.

Directly the griotes recognized the wearer of Habibrah’s cap, they cried out all at once, “The Obi!” and prostrated themselves before him. I guessed at once that this was a sorcerer attached to Biassou’s force.

“Basta, basta” (“enough”), said he, in a grave and solemn voice, as he came close up to them. “Devais el prisonero de Biassou.” (“Let the prisoner be taken to Biassou.”)

All the negresses leaped to their feet and cast their implements of torture on one side, put on their aprons, and at a gesture of the Obi fled like a cloud of grasshoppers.

At this instant the glance of the Obi fell upon me. He started back a pace, and half waved his white staff in the direction of the retiring griotes, as if he wished to recall them; then muttering between his teeth the word “Maldicho” (“accursed”), he whispered a few words in the ear of the negro, and crossing his arms retired slowly, apparently buried in deep thought.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

MY captor informed me that Biassou had asked to see me, and that in an hour I should be brought before him. This, I calculated, gave me another hour in which to live. Until that time had elapsed, I allowed my glances to wander over the rebel camp, the singular appearance of which the daylight permitted me to observe.

Had I been in any other position, I should have laughed heartily at the ostentatious vanity of the negroes, who were nearly all decked out in fragments of clerical and military dress, the spoils of their victims. The greater portion of these ornaments were not new, consisting of torn and blood-stained rags. A gorget could often be seen shining over a stole, while an epaulet looked strange when contrasted with a chasuble. To make amends for former years of toil, the negroes now maintained a state of utter inaction: some of them slept exposed to the rays of the sun, their heads close to a burning fire; others, with eyes that were sometimes full of listlessness, and at others blazed with fury, sat chanting a monotonous air at the doors of their ajoupas — a species of hut with conical roofs somewhat resembling our artillery tents, but thatched with palm or banana leaves. Their black or copper-colored wives, aided by the negro children, prepared the food for the fighting-men. I could see them stirring up with long forks, ignames, bananas, yams, peas, cocus and maize, and other vegetables indigenous to the country, which were boiling with joints of pork, turtle, and dog in the great boilers stolen from the dwellings of the planters. In the distance, on the outskirts of the camp, the griots and griotes formed large circles round the fires, and the wind every now and then brought to my ears strange fragments of their barbaric songs, mingled with notes from their tambourines and guitars. A few videttes posted on the high ground watched over the headquarters of General Biassou — the only defense of which in case of attack was a circle of wagons filled with plunder and ammunition. These black sentries posted on the summits of the granite pyramids, with which the valley bristled, turned about like the weathercocks in Gothic spires, and with all the strength of their lungs shouted one to the other the cry of “Nada, nada!” (“Nothing, nothing!”) which showed that the camp was in full security. Every now and then groups of negroes, inspired by curiosity, collected round me, but all looked upon me with a threatening expression of countenance.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

AT length an escort of negro soldiers, very fairly equipped, arrived. The negro whose property I appeared to be unfastened me from the oak to which I was bound, and handed me over to the escort, receiving in exchange a bagful of piastres. As he lay upon the grass counting them with every appearance of delight, I was led away by the soldiers. My escort wore a uniform of coarse cloth, of a reddish-brown color, with yellow facings; their head-dress was a .Spanish cap called a montera, ornamented with a large red cockade. Instead of a cartouche case, they had a species of game-bag slung at their sides. Their arms were a heavy musket, a saber, and a dagger. I afterward learned that these men formed the body-guard of Biassou.

After a circuitous route through the rows of ajoupas which were scattered all over the place, I came to a cave which Nature had hollowed out in one of those masses of rock with which the meadow was full. A large curtain of some material from the looms of Thibet, which the negroes called katchmir, and which is remarkable less for the brilliancy of its coloring than for the softness of its material, concealed the interior of the cavern from the vulgar gaze. The entrance was guarded by a double line of negroes, dressed like those who had escorted me thither.

After the countersign had been Exchanged with the sentries who marched backward and forward before the cave, the commander of the escort raised the curtain sufficiently for me to enter, and then let it drop behind me. A copper lamp with six lights, hung by a chain from the roof of the grotto, cast a flickering light upon the damp walls. Between the ranks of mulatto soldiers I perceived a colored man sitting upon a large block of mahogany, which was partially covered with a carpet made of parrots' feathers. His dress was of the most absurd kind. A splendid silk girdle, from which hung a cross of Saint Louis, held up a pair of common blue trousers, while a waistcoat of white linen which did not meet the waistband of the trousers completed the strange costume. He wore high boots, and a round hat with a red cockade, and epaulets — one of gold with silver stars, like those worn by brigadiers; while the other was of red worsted, with two copper stars (which seemed to have been taken from a pair of spurs) fixed upon it, evidently to render it more worthy of its resplendent neighbor. A saber and a pair of richly chased pistols lay by his side. Behind him were two white children dressed in the costume of slaves, bearing large fans of peacock feathers.

Two squares of crimson velvet, which seemed to have been stolen from some church, were placed on either side of the mahogany block.

One of these was occupied by the Obi who had rescued me from the frenzy of the griotes. He was seated with his legs crossed under him, holding in his hand his white wand, and not moving a muscle: he looked like a porcelain idol in a Chinese pagoda, but through the holes in his veil I could see his flashing eyes fixed steadfastly upon mine.

Upon each side of the general were trophies of flags, banners, and pennons of all kinds. Among them I noticed the white flag with the lilies, the tricolor, and the banner of Spain; the others were covered with fancy devices. I also perceived a large standard entirely black. At the end of the grotto, I saw a portrait of the mulatto Oge who, together with his lieutenant Jean Charanne, had been broken on the wheel the year previous for the crime of rebellion. Twenty of his accomplices, blacks and mulattoes, suffered with him. In this painting Oge, the son of a butcher at Cap, was represented in the uniform of a lieutenant-colonel, and decorated with the star of Saint Louis and the Order of Merit of the Lion, which last he had purchased from the Prince of Limburg.

The negro general into whose presence I had been introduced was short and of vulgar aspect, while his face showed a strange mixture of cunning and cruelty. After looking at me for some time in silence, with a bitter omen on his face, he said —

“I am Biassou.”

I expected this, but I could not hear it from his mouth, distorted as it was by a cruel smile, without an inward trembling; yet my face remained unchanged, and I made no reply.

“Well,” continued he, in his bad French, “have they already empaled you, that you are unable to bend before Biassou, generalissimo of this conquered land, and brigadier of his Most Catholic Majesty?” (The rebel chiefs sometimes affected to be acting for the King of France, sometimes for the Republic, and at others for the King of Spain.)

I crossed my arms upon my chest, and looked him firmly in the face.

He again sneered. “Ho, ho!” said he; “me pareces hombre de buen corazon (“you seem a courageous man”); well, listen to my questions. Were you born in the island?”

"No, I am a Frenchman."

My calmness irritated him. "All the better; I see by your uniform that you are an officer. How old are you?"

"Twenty."

"When were you twenty?"

To this question, which aroused in me all the recollection of my misery, I could not at first find words to reply. He repeated it imperiously.

"The day upon which Leogri was hanged," answered I.

An expression of rage passed over his face as he answered, "It is twenty-three days since Leogri was executed. Frenchman, when you meet him this evening you may tell him from me that you lived twenty-four days longer than he did. I will spare you for to-day; I wish you to tell him of the liberty that his brethren have gained, and what you have seen at the headquarters of General Jean Biassou."

Then he ordered me to sit down in one corner between two of his guards, and with a motion of his hand to some of his men, who wore the uniform of aides-de-camp, he said, "Let the Assembly be sounded, that we may inspect the whole of our troops; and you, your reverence," he added, ttirning to the Obi, "put on your priestly vestments, and perform for our army the holy sacrament of the Mass."

The Obi rose, bowed profoundly, and whispered a word or two in the general's ear.

"What," cried the latter, "no altar! but never mind, the good Giu has no need of a magnificent temple for His worship. Gideon and Joshua adored Him before masses of rock; let us do as they did. All that is required is that the hearts should be true. No altar, you say! why not make one of that great chest of sugar which we took yesterday from Dubussion's house?"

This suggestion of Biassou was promptly carried into execution. In an instant the interior of the cave was arranged for a burlesque of the divine ceremony. A pyx and a monstrance stolen from the parish church of Acul were promptly produced (the very church in which my nuptials with Marie had been celebrated, and where we had received Heaven's blessing, which had so soon changed to a curse). The stolen chest of sugar was speedily made into an altar and covered with a white cloth, through which, however, the words "Dubussion and Company for Nantes" could be plainly perceived.

When the sacred vessels had been placed on the altar, the Obi perceived that the crucifix was wanting. He drew his dagger, which had a cross handle, and stuck it into the wood of the case in front of the pyx. Then without removing his cap or veil, he threw the cope which had been stolen from the priest of Acul over his shoulders and bare chest, opened the silver clasps of the missal from which the prayers had been read on my ill-fated marriage day, and turning toward Biassou, whose seat was a few paces from the altar, announced to him that all was ready.

On a sign from the general the katchmir curtains were drawn aside, and the insurgent army was seen drawn up in close column before the entrance to the grotto. Biassou removed his hat and knelt before the altar.

"On your knees!" he cried, in a loud voice.

"On your knees!" repeated the commander of the battalions.

The drums were beaten and all the insurgents fell upon their knees. I alone refused to move, disgusted at this vile profanation about to be enacted under my very eyes; but the two powerful mulattoes who guarded me pulled my seat from under me, and pressed heavily upon my shoulders, so that I fell on my knees, compelled to pay a semblance of respect to this parody of a religious ceremony. The Obi performed his duties with affected solemnity, while the two white pages of Biassou officiated as deacon and sub-deacon. The insurgents, prostrated before the altar, assisted at the ceremony with the greatest enthusiasm, the general setting the example.

At the moment of the exaltation of the host, the Obi raising in his hands the consecrated vessel exclaimed in his Creole jargon, "Zote cone bon Giu; ce li mo fe zote voer. Blan touye li: touye blan yo toute!" ("You see your good God; I am showing Him to you. The white men killed him: kill all the whites!")

At these words, pronounced in a loud voice, the tones of which had something in them familiar to my ear, all the rebels uttered a loud shout and clashed their weapons together. Had it not been for Biassou's influence, that hour would have been my last. To such atrocities may men be driven who use the dagger for a cross, and upon whose mind the most trivial event makes a deep and profound impression.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

AT the termination of the ceremony the Obi bowed respectfully to Biassou; then the general rose and, addressing me in French, said:

"We are accused of having no religion. You see it is a falsehood, and that we are good Catholics."

I do not know whether he spoke ironically or in good faith. A few moments later he called for a glass bowl filled with grains of black maize; on the top he threw some white maize, then he raised it high in his hand so that all the army might see it.

"Brothers," cried he, "you are the black maize; your enemies are the white maize."

With these words he shook the bowl, and in an instant the white grains had disappeared beneath the black; and, as though inspired, he cried out, "Where are the white now?"

The mountains re-echoed with the shouts with which the illustration of the general was received; and Biassou continuing his harangue, mixed up French, Creole dialect, and Spanish alternately:

"The season for temporizing has passed; for a long time we have been as patient as the sheep to whose wool the whites compare our hair; let us now be as implacable as the panthers or the tigers of the countries from which they have torn us. Force alone can obtain for us our rights; and everything can be obtained by those who use their force without pity. Saint Loup [Wolf] has two days in the year consecrated to him in the Gregorian calendar, while the Paschal Lamb has but one. Am not I correct, your reverence?"

The Obi bowed in sign of corroboration.

"They have come," continued Biassou— "these enemies of ours have come as enemies of the regeneration of humanity; these whites, these planters, these men of business, veritable devils vomited from the mouth of hell. They came in the insolence of their pride, in their fine dresses, their uniforms, their feathers, their magnificent arms; they despised us because we were black and naked, in their overbearing haughtiness; they thought they could drive us before them as easily as these peacock feathers disperse the swarms of sandflies and mosquitoes."

As he uttered these concluding words, he snatched from the hands of his white slaves one of the large fans, and waved it over his head with a thousand eccentric gesticulations. Then he continued:

"But, my brethren, we burst upon them like flies upon a carcass; they have fallen in their fine uniforms beneath the strokes of our naked arms, which they believed to be without power, ignorant that good wood is the stronger when the bark is stripped off; and now these accursed tyrants tremble, and are filled with fear."

A triumphant yell rose in answer to the general's speech, and all the army repeated, "They are filled with fear!"

"Blacks, Creoles and Congos," added Biassou, "vengeance and liberty! Mulattoes, do not be led away by the temptations of the white men! Your fathers serve in their ranks, but your mothers are with us; besides, 'O bermanos de mi alma' ('O brethren of my soul') have they ever acted as fathers to you? Have they not rather been cruel masters, and treated you as slaves, because you had the blood of your mothers in your veins? While a miserable cotton garment covered your bodies scorched by the sun, your cruel fathers went about in straw hats and nankeen clothes on work-days, and in cloth and velvet on holidays and feasts. Curses be on their unnatural hearts! But as the holy commandments forbid you to strike your father, abstain from doing so; but in the day of battle what hinders you from turning to your comrade and saying, 'Touye papa moe, ma touye quena toue!' ('Kill my father, and I will kill yours!') Vengeance then, my brethren, and liberty for all men! This cry has found an echo in every part of the island; it has roused Tobago and Cuba. It was Bouckmann, a negro from Jamaica, the leader of the twenty-five fugitive slaves of the Blue Mountain, who raised the standard of revolt among us. A glorious victory was the first proof that he gave of his brotherhood with the negroes of St. Domingo. Let us follow his noble example, with an ax in one hand and a torch in the other. No mercy for the whites, no mercy for the planters! let us massacre their families, and destroy their, plantations! Do not allow a tree to remain standing on their estates; let us upturn the very earth itself that it may swallow up our white oppressors! Courage then, friends and brethren! we will fight them and sweep them from the face of the earth. We will conquer or die. As victors, we shall enjoy all the pleasures of life; and if we fall, the saints are ready to receive us in heaven, where each warrior will receive a double ration of brandy and a silver piastre each day!"

This warlike discourse, which to you appears perfectly ridiculous, had a tremendous effect on the insurgents. It is true that Biassou’s wild gesticulations, the manner in which his voice rose and fell, and the strange sneer which every now and then appeared on his lips, imparted to his speech a strange amount of power and fascination. The skill with which he alluded to those points that would have the greatest weight with the negroes added a degree of force which told well with his audience.

I will not attempt to describe to you the outburst of determined enthusiasm which the harangue of Biassou roused among the rebels. There arose at once a discordant chorus of howls, yells and shouts. Some beat their naked breasts, others dashed their clubs and sabers together. Many threw themselves on their knees, and remained in that position as though in rapt ecstasy. The negresses tore their breasts and arms with their fish-bone combs. The sounds of drums, tomtoms, guitars, and tambourines were mingled with the discharge of firearms. It was a veritable witches’ Sabbath.

Biassou raised his hand, and as if by enchantment the tumult was stilled, and each negro returned to his place in the ranks in silence. The discipline which Biassou had imposed upon his equals by the exercise of his power of will struck me, I may say, with admiration. All the soldiers of the force seemed to exist only to obey the wishes of their chief, as the notes of the harpsichord under the fingers of the musician.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN

THE spectacle of another example of the powers of fascination and deception now attracted my attention. This was the healing of the wounded.

The Obi, who in the army performed the double function of healer of souls and bodies, began his inspection of his patients. He had taken off his sacerdotal robes, and was seated before a large box in which he kept his drugs and instruments. He used the latter very rarely, but occasionally drew blood skillfully enough with a lancet made of fish-bone; but he appeared to me to use the knife, which in his hands replaced the scalpel, rather clumsily. In most cases he contented himself with prescribing orange-flower water, or sarsaparilla, and a mouthful of old rum. His favorite remedy, however, and one which he said was an infallible panacea for all ills, was composed of three glasses of red wine, in which was some grated nutmeg and the yolk of an egg boiled hard; he employed this specific for almost every malady. You will understand that his knowledge of medicine was as great a farce as his pretended religion; and it is probable that the small number of cures that he effected would not have secured the confidence of the negroes had he not had recourse to all sorts of mummeries and incantations, and acted as much upon their imaginations as upon their bodies. Thus, he never examined their wounds without performing some mysterious signs; while at other times he skillfully mingled together religion and negro superstition, and would put into their wounds a little fetish stone wrapped in a morsel of lint, and the patient would credit the stone with the healing effects of the lint. If any one came to announce to him the death of a patient, he would answer solemnly: “I foresaw it; he was a traitor: in the burning of such and such a house he spared a white man’s life; his death was a judgment” — and the wondering crowd of rebels applauded him as he thus increased their deadly hatred for their adversaries.

This impostor, among other methods, employed one which amused me by its singularity. One of the negro chiefs had been badly wounded in the last action. The Obi examined the wound attentively, dressed it as well as he was able, then, mounting the altar, exclaimed, “All this is nothing.” He then tore two or three leaves from the missal, burned them to ashes, and mingling them with some wine in the sacramental cup, cried to the wounded man “Drink! this is the true remedy.” The patient, stupidly fixing his eyes on the impostor, drank, while the Obi with raised hands seemed to call down blessings on his head; and it may be the conviction that he was healed which brought about his cure.

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

ANOTHER scene in which the Obi also played the principal part succeeded to this. The physician had taken the place of the priest, and the sorcerer now replaced the physician.

"Listen, men!" cried the Obi, leaping with incredible agility upon the improvised altar, and sinking down with his legs crossed under his striped petticoat— "listen. Who will dive into the book of fate? I can foretell the future. 'He estudiado la cienca de los Gitanos' ('I have studied the sciences of the gypsies'). A crowd of mulattoes and negroes hurriedly crowded up to him. "One by one," said the Obi, in that voice which called to my mind some remembrances that I could not quite collect. "If you come altogether, altogether you will enter the tomb."

They stopped. Just then a colored man dressed in a white jacket and trousers, with a bandana handkerchief tied round his head, entered the cave. Consternation was depicted on his countenance.

"Well, Rigaud," said the general, "what is it?"

Rigaud, sometimes called General Rigaud, was at the head of the mulatto insurgents at Lagu — a man who concealed much cunning under an appearance of candor, and cruelty beneath the mask of humanity. I looked upon him with much attention.

"General," whispered Rigaud, but as I was close to them I could catch every word, "on the outskirts of the camp there is a messenger from Jean François who has brought the news that Bouckmann has been killed in a battle with the whites under M. de Touzard, and that his head has been set upon the gates of the town as a trophy."

"Is that all?" asked Biassou, his eyes sparkling with delight at learning the diminution of the number of chiefs and the consequent increase of his own importance.

"The emissary of Jean François has in addition a message for you."

"That is all right," replied the general; "but get rid of this air of alarm, my good Rigaud."

"But," said Rigaud, "do you not fear the effect that the death of Bouckmann will have on the army?"

"You wish to appear more simple than you are; but you shall see what Biassou will do. Keep the messenger back for a quarter of an hour, and all will go well.”

Then he approached the Obi, who during this conversation had been exercising his functions as fortune-teller, questioning the wondering negroes, examining the lines on their hands and foreheads, and distributing more or less good luck according to the size and color of the piece of money thrown by each negro into a silver-gilt basin which stood on one side. Biassou whispered a few words in his ear, and without making any reply the Obi continued his prophetic observations.

“He,” cried the Obi, “who has in the middle of his forehead a little square or triangular figure will make a large fortune without work or toil. The figure of three interlaced S’s on the forehead is a fatal sign; he who has it will certainly be drowned if he does not carefully avoid water. Four lines from the top of the nose, and turning round two by two toward the eyes, announces ‘ that you will be taken prisoner, and for a long time languish in a foreign prison.”

Here the Obi paused. “Friends,” continued he, “I have observed this sign in the forehead of Bug-Jargal, the brave chief of Morne-Rouge.”

These words, which convinced me that Bug-Jargal had been made prisoner, were followed by a cry of grief from a band of negroes who wore short scarlet breeches. They belonged to the band of Morne-Rouge.

Then the Obi began again: “If you have on the right side of the forehead in the line of the moon a mark resembling a fork, do not remain idle, and avoid dissipation of all kinds. A small mark like the Arabic cipher 3 in the line of the sun betokens blows with a stick.”

An old negro here interrupted the magician, and dragging himself to his feet begged him to dress his wound. He had been wounded in the face, and one of his eyes almost torn from the socket hung upon his cheek.

The Obi had forgotten him when going through his patients. Directly, however, he saw him he cried out: “Round marks on the right side of the forehead in the line of the moon foretell misfortunes to the sight. My man, let me see your hand.”

“Alas, excellent sir,” answered the other, “it is my eye that I want you to look at.”’

“Old man,” replied the Obi, crossly, “it is not necessary to see your eye; give me your hand, I say.”

The miserable wretch obeyed, moaning, “My eye! my eye!”

“Good,” cried the Obi; “if you see on the line of life a spot surrounded by a circle you will lose an eye. There is the mark. You will become blind of an eye.”

“I am so already,” answered the negro, piteously.

But the Obi had merged the physician in the sorcerer, and thrusting him roughly on one side continued: “Listen, my men. If the seven lines on the forehead are slight, twisted, and lightly marked, they announce a short life. He who has between his eyebrows on the line of the moon the figure of two crossed arrows will be killed in battle. If the line of life which intersects the hand has a cross at its junction it foretells death on the scaffold; and here I must tell you, my brethren,” said the Obi, interrupting himself, “that one of the bravest defenders of our liberties, Bouckmann, has all these fatal marks.”

At these words all the negroes held their breath, and gazed on the impostor with glances of stupid admiration.

“Only,” continued the Obi, “I cannot reconcile the two opposing signs, death on the battlefield and also on the scaffold; and yet my science is infallible.”

He stopped, and cast a meaning glance at Biassou, who whispered something to an officer, who at once quitted the cavern.

Biassou gave a sneer of delight; at that moment the aid-de-camp returned, bringing with him a negro covered with mud and dust, whose feet, wounded by the roots and flints, showed that he had just come off a long journey. This was the messenger whose arrival Rigaud had announced. He held in one hand a letter, and in the other a document sealed with the design of a flaming heart; round it was a monogram, composed of the letters M and N interlaced, no doubt intended as an emblem of the union of the free mulattoes and the negro slaves. Underneath I could read this motto, “Prejudice conquered; the rod of iron broken; long live the king!” This document was a safe-conduct given by Jean François.

The messenger handed his letter to Biassou, who hastily tore it open, and perused the contents, then with an appearance of deep grief he exclaimed, “My brothers!” All bowed respectfully.

A gloomy silence succeeded the reading of this dispatch; but the Obi leaped on his altar, and waving his white wand, exclaimed in accents of triumph —

“Solomon, Zerobabel, Eleazar Thaleb, Cardau, Judas Bowtharicht, Avenoes, Albert the Great, Bohabdil, Jean de Hagul, Anna Baratio, Daniel Ogromof, Rachel Flintz, Allornino — I give you thanks! The science of the spirits has not deceived me. Sons, friends, brothers, boys, children, mothers, all of you listen to me. What was it that I predicted? The marks on the forehead of Bouckmann announced that his life would be a short one, that he would die in battle, and that he would appear on the scaffold. The revelations of my art have turned out true to the letter, and those points which seemed the most obscure are now the most plain. Brethren, wonder and admire!”

The panic of the negroes changed during this discourse to a sort of admiring terror. They listened to the Obi with a species of confidence mingled with fear, while the latter, carried away by his own enthusiasm, walked up and down the sugar-case, which presented plenty of space for his short steps.

A sneer passed over Biassou’s face as he addressed the Obi: “Your reverence, since you know what is to come, will you be good enough to tell me the future of Jean Biassou, Brigadier-General?”

The Obi halted on the top of his strange altar, which the credulity of the negroes looked upon as something divine, and answered, “Venga vuestra merced” (“Come, your Excellency”). At this moment the Obi was the most important man in the army; the military power bowed to the spiritual.

“Your hand, General,” said the Obi, stooping to grasp it. “Empezo” (“I begin”). “The line of junction equally marked in its full length promises you riches and happiness; the line of life strongly developed announces a life exempt from ills, and a happy old age. Its narrowness shows your wisdom and your superior talents, as well as the generosity of your heart; and lastly, I see what chiromancers call the luckiest of all signs — a number of little wrinkles in the shape of a tree with its branches extending upward; this promises health and wealth; it also prognosticates courage. General, it curves in the direction of the little finger; this is the sign of wholesome severity.”

As he said this, the eyes of the Obi glanced at me through the apertures of his veil, and I fancied that I could catch a well-known voice under the habitual gravity of his intonation, as he continued —

“The line of health, marked with a number of small circles, announces that you will have, for the sake of the cause, to order a number of executions;, divided here by a half-moon, it shows that you will be exposed to great danger from ferocious beasts, that is to say from the whites, if you do not exterminate them. The line of fortune surrounded, like the line of life, by little branches rising toward the upper part of the hand, confirms the position of power and supremacy to which you have been called; turning to the right, it is a symbol of your administrative capacity. The fifth line, that of the triangle prolonged to the root of the middle finger, promises you success in all your undertakings. Let me see your fingers: the thumb marked with little lines from the point to the nail shows that you will receive a noble heritage — that of the glory of the unfortunate Bouckmann, no doubt,” added the Obi, in a loud voice. “The slight swelling at the root of the forefinger, lightly marked with lines, promises honors and dignities. The middle finger shows nothing.

Your little finger is covered with lines crossing one another; you will vanquish all your enemies, and rise high above your rivals. These lines form the cross of Saint Andrew, a mark of genius and foresight. I also notice the figure of a circle, another token of your arrival at the highest power and dignity. ‘Happy the man,’ says Eleazar Thaleb, ‘who possesses all these signs. Destiny has its choicest gifts in store for him, and his fortunate star announces the talent which will bring him glory.’ And now, General, let me look at your forehead. ‘He,’ says Rachel Flintz, of Bohemia, ‘who bears on his forehead, on the line of the sun, a square or a triangular mark, will make a great fortune.’ Here is another prediction: ‘If the mark is on the right, it refers to an important succession;’ that of Bouckmann is, of course, again referred to. The mark in the shape of a horseshoe between the eyebrows, on the line of the moon, means that prompt vengeance will be taken for insult and tyranny. I have this mark as well as you.”

The curious manner in which the Obi uttered these words, “I have this mark,” attracted my attention.

“The mark of a lion’s claw which you have on your left eyelid is only noticeable among men of undoubted courage. But to close this, General Jean Biassou, your forehead shows every sign of the most unexampled success, and on it is a combination of lines which form the letter M, the commencement of the name of the Blessed Virgin. In whatever part of the forehead, and in whatever line of the face, such a sign appears, the signification is the same — genius, glory, and power. He who bears it will always bring success to whatever cause he embraces, and those under his command will never have to regret any loss. He alone is worth all the soldiers of his army. You, General, are the elect of Fate.”

“Thanks, your reverence,” said Biassou, preparing to return to his mahogany throne.

“Stay a moment, General,” said the Obi, “I forgot one last sign: The line of the sun, which is so strongly marked on your forehead, proves that you understand the way of the world; that you possess the wish to make others happy; that you have much liberality, and like to do things in a magnificent manner.”

Biassou at once recognized his forgetfulness, and drawing from his pocket a heavy purse, he threw it into the plate, so as to prove that the line of the sun never lies.

But this miraculous horoscope of the general had produced its effect upon the army. All the insurgents, who since the news of the death of Bouckmann attached greater weight than ever to the words of the Obi, lost their feelings of uneasiness and became violently enthusiastic; and trusting blindly in their infallible sorcerer and their predestined chief, they began to shout, “Long live our Obi! long live our general!”

The Obi and Biassou glanced at each other; and I almost thought I could hear the stifled laugh of the one replied to by the sardonic chuckle of the other. I do not know how it was, but this Obi tormented me dreadfully; I had a feeling that I had seen or heard him before, and I made up my mind to speak to him.

"Ho, Obi, your reverence, doctor, here!" cried I to him. He turned sharply round. "There is some one here whose lot you have not yet cast — it is mine."

He crossed his arms over the silver sun that covered his hairy breast, but he made no reply.

I continued: "I would gladly know what you prophesy with regard to my future, but your worthy comrades have taken my watch and my purse, and I suppose you will not give me a specimen of your skill for nothing."

He advanced quickly to me, and muttered hoarsely in my ear: "You deceive yourself; let me see your hand."

I gave it, looking fixedly at him; his eyes sparkled as he bent over my hand.

"If the line of life," said he, "is cut by two transverse lines, it is the sign of immediate death: your life will be a short one. If the line of health is not in the center of the hand, and if the line of life and the line of fortune are united so as to form an angle, a natural death cannot be looked for; do not, therefore, look for a natural death! If the bottom of the forefinger has a long line cutting it, a violent death will be the result": prepare yourself for a violent death!"

There was a ring of pleasure in his sepulchral voice as he thus announced my death, but I listened to him with contempt and indifference.

"Sorcerer," said I, with a disdainful smile, "you are skillful, for you are speaking of a certainty."

Once more he came close to me. "You doubt my science," cried he; "listen, then, once more. The severance of the line of the sun on your forehead shows me that you take an enemy for a friend, and a friend for an enemy."

These words seemed to refer to the treacherous Pierrot whom I loved, but who had betrayed me, and to the faithful Habibrah whom I had hated, and whose blood-stained garments attested his fidelity and his devotion.

"What do you say?" exclaimed I.

"Listen until the end," continued the Obi. "I spoke of the future; listen to the past. The line of the moon on your forehead is slightly curved; that signifies that your wife has been carried off."

I trembled, and endeavored to spring from my seat, but my guards held me back.

"You have but little patience," continued the sorcerer; "listen to the end. The little cross that cuts the extremity of that curve shows me all: your wife was carried off on the very night of your nuptials."

"Wretch!" cried I, "you know where she is! Who are you?"

I strove again to free myself, and to tear away his veil; but I had to yield to numbers and to force, and had the mortification of seeing the mysterious Obi move away repeating, "Do you believe me now? Prepare for immediate death."

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

As if to draw my attention from the perplexity into which I had been thrown by the strange scene that had just passed, a new and more terrible drama succeeded to the farce that had been played between Biassou and the Obi. Biassou had again taken his place upon his mahogany throne, while Rigaud and the Obi were seated on his right and left; the latter, with his arms crossed on his breast, seemed to have given himself up to deep thought. Biassou and Rigaud were chewing tobacco, and an aid-de-camp had just asked if he should order a general march past of the forces, when a tumultuous crowd of negroes, with hideous shouts, arrived at the entrance of the grotto. They had brought with them three white prisoners to be judged by Biassou, but what they desired was easily shown by the cries of "Muerte! Muerte!" ("Death, death!") the latter, no doubt, emanating from the English negroes of Bouckmann's band, many of whom had by this time arrived to join the French and Spanish negroes of Biassou.

The general with a gesture of his hand commanded silence, and ordered the three captives to be brought to the entrance of the grotto. I recognized two of them with considerable surprise; one was the Citizen General C — , that" philanthropist who was in correspondence with all the lovers of the negro race in different parts of the globe, and who had proposed so cruel a mode of suppressing the insurrection to the governor. The other was the planter of doubtful origin, who manifested so great a dislike to the mulattoes, among whom the whites insisted on classing him. The third appeared to belong to a section called "poor whites" — that is to say, white men who had to work for their living; he wore a leathern apron, and his sleeves were turned up to his elbows. All the prisoners had been taken at different times, endeavoring to hide themselves in the mountains.

The "poor white" was the first one that was questioned.

"Who are you?" asked Biassou.

"I am Jacques Belin, carpenter to the Hospital of the Fathers, at Cap."

Surprise and shame struggled for the mastery in the features of the general. "Jacques Belin!" repeated he, biting his lips.

"Yes," replied the carpenter; "do you not recognize me?"

“Begin,” retorted the general, furiously, “by recognizing me and saluting me.”

“I do not salute my slave” replied the carpenter, sturdily.

“Your slave, wretch!” cried the general.

“Yes,” replied the carpenter; “yes, I was your first master. You pretend not to recognize me, but remember, Jean Biassou, that I sold you for thirty piastres in the St. Domingo slave market.”

An expression of concentrated rage passed over Biassou’s face.

“Well,” continued the carpenter, “you appear ashamed of having worked for me; ought not Jean Biassou to feel proud of having belonged to Jacques Belin? Your mother, the old idiot, has often swept out my shop; but at last I sold her to the major-domo of the Hospital of the Fathers, and she was so old and decrepit that he would give me only thirty-two livres and six sous for her. There is my history and yours; but it seems as if the negroes and the mulattoes are growing proud, and that you have forgotten the time when you served Master Jacques Belin, the carpenter of Cap, on your knees.”

Biassou listened to him with that sardonic smile which gave him the appearance of a tiger.

“Good!” said he. Then turning to the negroes who had captured Belin, “Get two trestles, two planks, and a saw, and take this man away. Jacques Belin, carpenter of Cap, thank me, for you shall have a true carpenter’s death.”

His sardonic laugh too fully explained the horrible punishment that he destined for the pride of his former master; but Jacques Belin did not blench, and turning proudly to Biassou, cried —

“Yes, I ought to thank you, for I bought you for thirty piastres, and I got work out of you to a much greater amount.”

They dragged him away.

CHAPTER THIRTY

MORE dead than alive, the other two prisoners had witnessed this frightful prologue to their own fate. Their timid and terrified appearance contrasted with the courageous audacity of the carpenter; every limb quivered with affright.

Biassou looked at them one after the other with his fox-like glance, and, as if he took a pleasure in prolonging their agony, began a discussion with Rigaud upon the different kinds of tobacco — asserting that that of Havana was only good for manufacturing cigars, while for snuff he knew nothing better than the Spanish tobacco, two barrels of which Bouckmann had sent him, being a portion of the plunder of M. Lebattres' stores in the island of Tortue. Then, turning sharply upon the Citizen General C — , he asked him —

"What do you think?"

This sudden address utterly confounded the timid citizen, and he stammered out, "General, I am entirely of your Excellency's opinion."

"You flatter me," replied Biassou; "I want your opinion, not mine. Do you know any tobacco that makes better snuff than that of M. Lebattres?"

"No, my lord," answered C — , whose evident terror greatly amused Biassou.

"'General,' 'your Excellency,' 'my lord!' you are an aristocrat."

"Oh, no, certainly not," exclaimed the citizen general. "I am a good patriot of '91, and an ardent negrophile."

"'Negrophile'!" interrupted the general; "pray, what is a 'negrophile'?"

"It is a friend of the blacks," stammered the citizen.

"It is not enough to be a friend of the blacks; you must also be a friend of the men of color."

"Men of color is what I should have said," replied the lover of the blacks, humbly. "I am mixed up with all the most famous partisans of the negroes and the mulattoes—"

Delighted at the opportunity of humiliating a white man, Biassou again interrupted him: "'Negroes and mulattoes'! What do you mean, pray? Do you wish to insult me by making use of those terms of contempt invented by the whites? There are only men of color and blacks here — do you understand that, Mr. Planter?"

“It was a slip, a bad habit that I picked up in childhood,” answered C — . “Pardon me, my lord, I had no wish to offend you.”

“Leave off this my lording business! I have already told you that I don’t like these aristocratic ways.”

C — again endeavored to excuse himself, and began to stammer out a fresh explanation. “If you knew, citizen—”

“Citizen, indeed!” cried Biassou, in affected anger; “I detest all this Jacobin jargon. Are you by chance a Jacobin? Remember that you are speaking to the generalissimo of the king’s troops.”

The unhappy partisan of the negro race was dumfounded, and did not know in what terms to address this man, who equally disdained the titles of “my lord” or “citizen” — the aristocratic or republican modes of salutation. Biassou, whose anger was only assumed, cruelly enjoyed the predicament in which he had placed C — .

“Alas,” at last said the citizen general, “you do not do me justice, noble defender of the unwritten rights of the larger portion of the human race!”

In his perplexity to hit upon an acceptable mode of address to a man who appeared to disdain all titles, he had recourse to one of those sonorous periphrases which the republicans occasionally substituted for the name and title of the persons with whom they were in conversation.

Biassou looked at him steadily and said, “You love the blacks and the men of color?”

“Do I love them?” exclaimed the citizen C — . “Why, I correspond with Brissot and—”

Biassou interrupted him with a sardonic laugh. “Ha, ha! I am glad to find in you so trusty a friend to our cause; you must, of course, thoroughly detest those wretched colonists who punished our insurrection by a series of the most cruel executions; and you, of course, think with us that it is not the blacks, but the whites, who are the true rebels, since they are in arms against the laws of nature and humanity? You must execrate such monsters!”

“I do execrate them,” answered C — .

“Well,” continued Biassou, “what do you think of a man who, in his endeavors to crush the last efforts of the slaves to regain their liberty, placed the heads of fifty black men on each side of the avenue that led to his house?”

C — grew fearfully pale.

“What do you think of a white man who would propose to surround the town of Cap with a circle of negro heads?”

“Mercy, mercy!” cried the terrified citizen general.

“Am I threatening you?” replied Biassou, coldly. “Let me finish — a circle of heads that would reach from Fort Picolet to Cape Caracol. What do you think of that? Answer me!”

The words of Biassou, “Do I threaten you,” had given a faint ray of hope to C — , for he fancied that the general might have heard of this terrible proposition without knowing the author of it; he therefore replied with all the firmness that he could muster, in order to remove any impression that the idea was his own:

“I consider such a suggestion an atrocious crime.”

Biassou chuckled. “Good! And what punishment should be inflicted on the man who proposed it?”

The unfortunate C — hesitated.

“What!” cried Biassou, “you hesitate! Are you, or are you not, the friend of the blacks?”

Of the two alternatives the wretched man chose the least threatening one, and seeing no hostile light in Biassou’s eyes, he answered in a low voice: “The guilty person deserves death.”

“Well answered,” replied Biassou, calmly, throwing aside the tobacco that he had been chewing. His assumed air of indifference had completely deceived the unfortunate lover of the negro race, and he made another effort to dissipate any suspicions which might have been engendered against him.

“No one,” cried C — , “has a more ardent desire for your success than I. I correspond with Brissot and Pruneau de Pomme-Gogue in France, with Magaw in America, with Peter Paulus in Holland, with the Abbe Tamburini in Italy—” and he was continuing to unfold the same string of names which he had formerly repeated, but with a different motive, at the council held at M. de Blanchelande’s, when Biassou interrupted him.

“What do I care with whom you correspond? Tell me rather where are your granaries and storehouses, for my army has need of supplies. Your plantation is doubtless a rich one, and your business must be lucrative since you correspond with so many merchants.”

C — ventured timidly to remark: “Hero of humanity, they are not merchants, but philosophers, philanthropists, lovers of the race of blacks.”

“Then,” said Biassou, with a shake of his head, “if you have nothing that can be plundered, what good are you?”

This question afforded a chance of safety of which C — eagerly availed himself. “Illustrious warrior,” exclaimed he, “have you an economist in your army?”

“What is that?” asked the general.

“It is,” replied the prisoner, with as much calmness as his fears would permit him to assume, “a most necessary man — one whom all appreciate, one who follows out and classes in their proper order the respective material resources of an empire, and gives to each its real value, increasing and improving them by combining their sources and results, and pouring them like fertilizing streams into the main river of general utility, which in its turn swells the great sea of public prosperity.”

“Caramba!” observed Biassou, leaning over toward the Obi. “What the deuce does he mean by all these words strung together like the beads on your rosary?”

The Obi shrugged his shoulders in sign of ignorance and disdain, as citizen C — continued:

“If you will permit me to observe, valiant chief of the regenerators of St. Domingo, I have carefully studied the works of the greatest economists of the world — Turgot, Raynal, and Mirabeau the friend of man. I have put their theories into practice; I thoroughly understand the science indispensable for the government of kingdoms and states—”

“The economist is not economical of his words,” observed Rigaud, with his bland and cunning smile.

“But you, eternal talker,” cried Biassou, “tell me, have I any kingdoms or states to govern?”

“Not yet perhaps, great man, but they will come; and besides, my knowledge descends to all the useful details which are comprised in the interior economy of an army.”

The general again interrupted him: “I have nothing to do with the interior economy of the army; I command it.”

“Good!” replied the citizen; “you shall be the commander, I will be the commissary. I have much special knowledge as to the increase of cattle—”

“Do you think we are going to breed cattle?” cried Biassou, with his sardonic laugh. “No, my good fellow, we are content with eating them. When cattle become scarce in the French colony I shall cross the line of mountains on the frontier and take the Spanish sheep and oxen from the plains of Cotury, of La Vega, of St. Jago, and from the banks of the Yuna; if necessary I will go as far as the Island of Jamaica, and to the back of the mountain of Cibos, and from the mouths of the Neybe to those of Santo Domingo; besides, I should be glad to punish those infernal Spanish planters for giving up Oge to the French. You see I am not uneasy as regards provisions, and so have no need of your knowledge."

This open declaration rather disconcerted the poor economist; he made, however, one more effort for safety. "My studies," said he, "have not been limited to the reproduction of cattle; I am acquainted with other special branches of knowledge that may be very useful to you. I can show you the method of manufacturing pitch and working coal mines."

"What do I care for that?" exclaimed Biassou., "When I want charcoal I burn a few leagues of forest."

"I can tell you the proper kinds of wood to use for shipbuilding — the chicarm and the sabieca for the keels; the yabas for the knees, the medlars for the framework, the hacomas, the gaïacs, the cedars, the acomas—"

"Que te lleven todos los demonios de los diez-y-siete infernos!" ("May the devils of the thirty-seven hells fly away with you!") cried Biassou, boiling over with impatience.

"I beg your pardon, my gracious patron," said the trembling economist, who did not understand Spanish.

"Listen," said Biassou. "I don't want to build vessels; there is only one vacancy that I can offer you, and that is not a very important one. I want a man to wait upon me; and now, Mr. Philosopher, tell me if that will suit you. You will have to serve me on your bended knees; you will prepare my pipe, cook my calalou and turtle soup, and you will stand behind me with a fan of peacock or parrot feathers like those two pages. Now, will the situation suit you?"

Citizen C — , whose only desire was to save his life, beat the earth with a thousand expressions of joy and gratitude.

"You accept my offer, then?" asked Biassou.

"Can you ask such a question, generous master? Do you think that I should hesitate for a moment in accepting so distinguished a post as that of being in constant attendance on you?"

At this reply the diabolical sneer of Biassou became more pronounced. He rose up with an air of triumph, crossed his arms on his chest, and thrusting aside with his foot the white man’s head who was prostrate on the ground before him, he cried in a loud voice:

“I am delighted at being able to fathom how far the cowardice of the white man could go; I had already measured the extent of his cruelty. Citizen: C — , it is to you that I owe this double experience. I knew all; how could you have been sufficiently besotted to think that I did not? It was you who presided at the executions of June, July and August; it was you who placed fifty negro’ heads on each side of your avenue; it was you who proposed to slaughter the five hundred negroes who were confined in irons after the revolt, and to encircle the town of Cap with their heads from Fort Picolet to Cape Caracol. If you could have done it, you would have placed my head among them; and now you think yourself lucky if I will take you as my body-servant. No, no, I have more regard for your honor than you yourself have, and I will not inflict this affront on you; prepare to die!”

At a gesture of Biassou’s hand the negroes removed the unhappy lover of the blacks to a position near me, where, overwhelmed by the honor of his position, he fell to the ground without being able to articulate a word.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

“IT is your turn now,” said the general, turning to the last of the prisoners — the planter who was accused by the white men of having black blood in his veins, and who had on that account sent me a challenge.

A general clamor drowned the reply of the planter. “Muerte! Mort! Touye!” cried the negroes, grinding their teeth and shaking their fists at the unhappy captive.

“General,” said a mulatto, making himself heard above the uproar, “he is a white man, and he must die.”

The miserable planter, by cries and gesticulations, managed to edge in some words. “No, general! no, my brothers! it is an infamous calumny. I am a mulatto, like yourselves, of mixed blood; my mother was a negress, like your mothers and sisters.”

“He lies!” cried the infuriated negroes; “he is a white man; he has always detested the colored people.”

“Never!” retorted the prisoner; “it is the whites that I detest. I have always said with you, ‘Negre ce blan; blan ce negre’ (‘The negroes are the masters; the whites are the slaves’).”

“Not at all!” cried the crowd, “not at all! Kill the white man, kill him!”

Still the unhappy wretch kept repeating in heart-rending accents, “I am a mulatto, I am one of yourselves.”

“Give me a proof,” was Biassou’s sole reply.

“A proof?” answered the prisoner, wildly; “the proof is that the whites have always despised me.”

“That may be true,” returned Biassou, “but you are an insolent hound to tell us so.”

A young mulatto stepped to the front and addressed the planter in an excited manner. “That the whites despised you is a fact; but, on the other hand, you affected to look down upon the mulattoes among whom they classed you. It has even been reported that you once challenged a white man who called you a half-caste.”

A howl of execration arose from the crowd, and the cry of “Death” was repeated more loudly than ever; while the planter, casting an appealing glance at me, continued, with tears in his eyes:

"It is a calumny; my greatest glory and happiness is in belonging to the blacks. I am a mulatto."

"If you really were a mulatto," observed Rigaud, quietly, "you would not make use of such an expression."

"How do I know what I am saying?" asked the panic stricken wretch. "General, the proof that I am of mixed blood is in the black circle that you see round the bottom of my nails."

Biassou thrust aside the suppliant hand. "I do not possess the knowledge of our chaplain, who can tell what a man is by looking at his hand. But listen to me: my soldiers accuse' you — some, of being a white man; others, of being a false brother. If this is the case you ought to die. You, on the other hand, assert that you belong to our race, and that you have never denied it. There is one method by which you can prove your assertion. Take this dagger and stab these two white prisoners!"

As he spoke, with a wave of his hand, Biassou designated the citizen C — and myself.

The planter drew back from the dagger which, with a devilish smile on his face, Biassou presented to him.

"What!" said the general, "do you hesitate? It is your only chance of proving your assertion to the army that you are not a white, and are one of ourselves. Come, decide at once, for we have no time to lose."

The prisoner's eyes glared wildly; he stretched out his hand toward the dagger, then let his arm fall again, turning away his head, while every limb quivered with emotion.

"Come, come!" cried Biassou, in tones of impatience and anger, "I am in a hurry. Choose: either kill them, or die with them!"

The planter remained motionless, as if he had been turned to stone.

"Good!" said Biassou, turning toward the negroes; "he does not wish to be the executioneer, let him be the victim. I can see that he is nothing but a white man; away with him!"

The negroes advanced to seize him. This movement impelled him to immediate choice between giving or receiving death. Extreme cowardice produces a bastard species of courage. Stepping forward, he snatched the dagger that Biassou still held out to him, and without giving himself time to reflect upon what he was about to do, he precipitated himself like a tiger upon the citizen C — , who was lying on the ground near me. Then a terrible struggle commenced; The lover of the negro race, who had at the conclusion of his interview with Biassou remained plunged in a state of despair and stupor, had hardly noticed the scene between the general and the planter, so absorbed was he in the thought of his approaching death; but when he saw the man rush upon him, and the steel gleam above his head, the imminence of his danger aroused him at once. He started to his feet, grasped the arm of his would-be murderer, and exclaimed in a voice ,of terror:

"Pardon, pardon! What are you doing? What have I done?"

"You must die, sir," said the half-caste, fixing his frenzied eyes upon his victim, and endeavoring to disengage his arm. "Let me do it; I will not hurt you."

"Die by your hand," cried the economist; "but why? Spare me! you wish perhaps to kill me because I used to say that you were a mulatto. But spare my life, and I vow that I will always declare that you are a white man. Yes, you are white; I will say so everywhere, but spare me!"

The unfortunate man had taken the wrong method of suing for mercy.

"Silence, silence!" cried the half-caste, furious at the idea of the danger he was incurring, and fearing that the negroes would hear the assertion.

But the other cried louder than ever that he knew that he was a white man, and of good family. The half-caste made a last effort to impose silence on him; then finding his efforts vain, he thrust aside his arms, and pressed the dagger upon C— 's breast. The unhappy man felt the point of the weapon, and in his despair bit the arm that was driving the dagger home.

"Monster! wretch!" exclaimed he, "you are murdering me!" Then casting a glance of supplication toward Biassou, he cried, "Defend me, avenger of humanity!"

Then the murderer pressed more heavily on the dagger; a gush of blood bubbled over his fingers and spattered his face. The knees of the unhappy lover of the negro race bent beneath him, his arms fell by his side, his eyes closed, he uttered a stifled groan and fell dead.

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

I WAS paralyzed with horror at this scene, in which I every moment expected to play an important part.

The "avenger of humanity" had gazed on the struggle without a lineament of his features changing. When all was over, he turned to his terrified pages. "More tobacco," said he, and began to chew calmly. The Obi and Rigaud were equally impassible, but the negroes appeared terrified at the horrible drama that their general had caused to be enacted before them.

One white man, however, yet remained to be slaughtered; my turn had come. I cast a glance upon the murderer who was about to become my executioner, and a feeling of pity came over me. His hps were violet, his teeth chattered, a convulsive tremor caused every limb to quiver. By a mechanical movement his hand was continually passed over his forehead, as if to obliterate he traces of the blood which had so liberally sprinkled it; he looked with an air of terrified wonder at the bleeding body which lay at his feet, as though he were unable to detach his strained eyeballs from the spectacle of his victim. I waited for the moment when he would resume his task of blood. The position was a strange one: he had already tried to kill me and failed, to prove that he was white; and now he was going to murder me to show that he was black.

"Come," said Biassou, addressing him, "this is good; I am pleased with you, my friend." Then glancing at me, he added, "You need not finish the other one; and now I declare you one of us, and name you executioner to the army."

At these words a negro stepped out of the ranks, and bowing three times to the general, cried out in his jargon, which I will spare you:

"And I, General?"

"Well, what do you want?" asked Biassou.

"Are you going to do nothing for me, General?" asked the negro. "Here you give an important post to this dog of a white, who murders to save his own skin, and to prove that he is one of ourselves. Have you no post to give me, who am a true black?"

This unexpected request seemed to embarrass Biassou, and Rigaud whispered to him in French:

"You can't satisfy him; try to elude his request."

"You wish for promotion, then?" asked Biassou of the true black. "Well, I am willing enough to grant it to you. What grade do you wish for?"

"I wish to be an officer."

"An officer, eh? And what are your claims to the epaulet founded on?"

"It was I," answered the negro, emphatically, "who set fire to the house of Lagoscelte in the first days of August last. It was I who murdered M. Clement the planter, and carried the head of his sugar refiner on my pike. I killed ten white women and seven small children, one of whom on the point of a spear served as a standard for Bouckmann's brave blacks. Later on I burned alive the families of four colonists, whom I had locked up in the strong room of Fort Galifet. My father was broken on the wheel at Cap, my brother was hung at Rocrow, and I narrowly escaped being shot. I have burned three coffee plantations, six indigo estates, and two hundred acres of sugar-cane; I murdered my master, M. Noe, and his mother—"

"Spare us the recital of your services," said Rigaud, whose feigned benevolence was the mask for real cruelty, but who was ferocious with decency, and could not listen to this cynical confession of deeds of violence.

"I could quote many others," continued the negro, proudly, "but you will no doubt consider that these are sufficient to insure my promotion, and to entitle me to wear a gold epaulet like my comrades there," pointing to the staff of Biassou.

The general affected to reflect for a few minutes, and then gravely addressed the negro. "I am satisfied with your services, and should be pleased to promote you; but you must satisfy me on one point. Do you understand Latin?"

The astonished negro opened his eyes widely. "Eh, General?" said he.

"Yes," repeated Biassou, quickly; "do you understand Latin?"

"La — Latin?" stammered the astonished negro.

"Yes, yes, yes, Latin; do you understand Latin?" said the cunning chief, and unfolding a banner upon which was embroidered the verse from the Psalms, "In exitu Israël de Egypto," he added, "Explain the meaning of these words."

The negro, in complete ignorance of what was meant, remained silent and motionless, fumbling with the waistband of his trousers, while his astonished eyes wandered from the banner to the general, and from the general back again to the banner.

"Come, go on!" exclaimed Biassou, impatiently.

The negro opened and shut his mouth several times, scratched his head, and at last said slowly: “I don’t understand it, General.”

“How, scoundrel!” cried Biassou; “you wish to become an officer, and you do not understand Latin!”

“But, General—” stammered the puzzled negro.

“Silence!” roared Biassou, whose anger appeared to increase; “I do not know what prevents me from having you shot at once. Did you ever hear such a thing, Rigaud? He wants to be an officer, and does not understand Latin. Well, then, idiot, as you do not understand, I will explain what is written on this banner: In exitu— ‘Every soldier’ — Israël— ‘who does not understand Latin’ — de Eyypto— ‘cannot be made an officer.’ Is not that the translation, reverend sir?”

“This brother of whom you are jealous, and whom I have appointed executioner, understands Latin!” He turned to the new executioner: “You know Latin, do you not? Prove it to this blockhead. What is the meaning of Dominus vobiscum?”

The unhappy half-caste, roused from his gloomy reverie by the dreaded voice, raised his head; and though his brain was still troubled by the cowardly murder that he had just committed, terror compelled him to be obedient. There was something pitiable in his manner, as his mind went back to his schooldays, and in the midst of his terrible feelings and remorse he repeated, in the tone of a child saying its lesson, “Dominus vobiscum — that means, ‘May the Lord be with you.’”

“Et cum spirito tuo,” added the mysterious Obi, solemnly.

“Amen,” repeated Biassou; then, resuming his angry manner, and mingling with his reproaches some Latin phrases to impress the negroes with the superior attainments of their chief, he cried: “Go to the rear rank, sursum corda! Never attempt to enter the places of those who know Latin, orate fratres, or I will have you hung. Bonus, bona, bonuml”

The astonished and terrified negro slunk away, greeted by the hoots and hisses of his comrades, who were indignant at his presumption, and impressed with the deep learning of their general.

Burlesque though this scene was, it inspired me with a very high idea of Biassou’s administrative capabilities. He had made ridicule the means of repressing ambitious aspirations, which are always so dangerous to authority in undisciplined bodies, and his cunning gave me a fuller idea of his mental powers, as well as of the crass ignorance of the negroes under his command.

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

THE breakfast hour had now arrived. The shell of a turtle was placed before Biassou, in which smoked a species of olla-podrida seasoned with bacon, in which turtle-flesh took the place of lamb; an enormous carib cabbage floated on the surface of the stew, and, in addition, on strips of bark, were dried raisins and water melons, a loaf of maize bread; a bottle of wine, bound round with tarred string, completed the feast. Biassou took from his pocket a few heads of garlic and rubbed his bread with them; then, without even ordering the bleeding form to be carried away, he began to eat, inviting Rigaud to do the same. There was something terrible in Biassou's appetite.

The Obi did not join their repast; like others in his profession, I could easily understand that he never took anything in public, to induce a belief among the negroes that he lived entirely without food.

During breakfast, Biassou ordered one of his aides-de-camp to direct the review of the army to commence, and the different corps began to defile past in fairly good order. The negroes of Morne-Rouge were the first; there were about four thousand of them, divided into companies commanded by chiefs, who were distinguished by their scarlet breeches and sashes. This force was composed of tall and powerful negroes; some of them carried guns, axes, and sabers, but many had no other arms than bows and arrows, and javelins rudely fashioned by themselves. They carried no standard, and moved past in mournful silence. As they marched on, Biassou whispered to Rigaud:

"When will Blanchelande's and Rouvray's shot and shell free me from these" bandits of Morne-Rouge? I hate them; they are nearly all of them Congos, and they only believe in killing in open battle — following the example of their chief Bug-Jargal, a young fool, who plays at being generous and magnanimous. You do not know him, Rigaud, and I hope you never will; for the whites have taken him prisoner, and they may perhaps rid me of him, as they did of Bouckmann."

"Speaking of Bouckmann," answered Rigaud, "there are the negroes of Macaya just passing, and I see in their ranks the negro whom Jean François sent to you with the news of Bouckmann's death. Do you know that that man might upset all the prophecies of the Obi, if he were to say that he had been kept for more than half an hour at the outposts, and that he had told me the news before you sent for him?"

"Diabolo!" answered Biassou, "you. are in the right, my friend; this man's mouth must be shut. Wait a bit."

Then raising his voice he called out "Macaya!" The leader of the division left the ranks, and approached the general with the stock of his firelock reversed, in token of respect.

"Make that man who does not belong to your division leave his rank and come forward."

Macaya speedily brought the messenger of Jean François before the general, who at once assumed that appearance of anger which he knew so well how to simulate.

"Who are you?" cried he.

"General, I am a black."

"Carramba! I can see that well enough; but what is your name?"

"My name is Vavelan; my patron saint is Sabas, deacon and martyr, whose feast is on the twentieth day before the nativity of our Lord."

Biassou interrupted him: "How dare you present yourself on parade, amid shining muskets and white cross-belts, with your sword without a sheath, your breeches torn, and your feet muddy?"

"General," answered the negro, "it is not my fault. I was dispatched by the Grand Admiral, Jean François, to bring you the news of the death of the chief of the English negroes; and if my clothes are torn and my feet bemired, it is because I have run, without stopping to take breath, to bring you the news as soon as possible; but they detained me at—"

Biassou frowned. "I did not ask you about that, but how you dared to enter the ranks in so unbecoming a dress. Commend your soul to Saint Sabas, your patron, the deacon and martyr, and go and get yourself shot."

And here I had another proof of the ascendency that Biassou exercised over the insurgents. The unfortunate man who was ordered to go and get himself executed did not utter a protest; he bowed his head, crossed his arms on his breast, saluted his pitiless judge three times, and after having knelt to the Obi, who gave him plenary absolution, he left the cavern. A few minutes afterward a volley of musketry told us that Biassou's commands had been obeyed, and that the negro was no more.

Freed from all sources of uneasiness, the general turned to Rigaud, a gleam of pleasure in his eye, and gave a triumphant chuckle which seemed to say, “Admire me!”

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

BUT the review still continued. This army, which had presented so curious a spectacle in camp, had a no less extraordinary appearance under arms. Sometimes a horde of almost naked negroes would come along armed with clubs and tomahawks, marching to the notes of a goat’s horn like mere savages; then would come regiments of mulattoes, dressed in the English or Spanish manner, well armed and equipped, regulating their pace by the roll of the drum; then a band of negresses and their children carrying forks and spits; then some tag-rag, bent under the weight of an old musket without lock or barrel; then griotes with their feathered aprons, griots dancing with hideous contortions, and singing incoherent airs to the accompaniment of guitars, tomtoms, and balafos; then would be a procession of priests, or Obi men, of half-castes, quarter-castes, free mulattoes, or wandering hordes of escaped slaves with a proud look of liberty on their faces and shining muskets on their shoulders, dragging in their ranks well-filled wagons, or some artillery taken from the whites, which were looked on more as trophies than as military engines, and yelling out at the top of their voices the songs of “Grand-Pre” and “Oua-Nasse.” Above the heads of all floated flags, banners, and standards of every form, color, and device — white, red, tricolor, with the lilies, with tlie cap of liberty, bearing inscriptions: “Death to Priests and Nobles!”
“Long live Religion!”
“Liberty and Equality!”
“Long live the King!”
“ Viva Espana!”
“No more Tyrants!” etc. — a confusion of sentiments which showed that the insurgents were a mere crowd collected together, with ideas as different as were the men who composed it. On passing in their turn before the cave the companies drooped their banners, and Biassou returned the salute. He addressed every band either in praise or censure, and each word that dropped from his mouth was received by his men with fanatical respect or superstitious dread.

The wave of savage soldiery passed away at last. I confess that the sight that had at first afforded some distraction to my feelings finished by wearying me. The sun went down as the last ranks filed away, and his last rays cast a copper-colored hue upon the granite portals of the cave.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

BIASSOU seemed to be dreaming. When the review was concluded, his last orders had been given, and the insurgents had retired to the huts, he condescended to address me again.

“Young man,” said he, “you have now had the means of judging of my power and genius; the time has now arrived for you to bear the report to Leogri.”

“It is not my fault that he has not had it earlier,” answered I, coldly.

“You are right,” replied Biassou. He then paused, as if to note what the effect would be upon me of what he was going to say, and then added: “But it will depend upon yourself whether you ever carry the message or not.”

“What do you mean?” exclaimed I, in astonishment.

“Why,” replied he, “that your life depends upon yourself, and that you can save it if you will.”

This sudden paroxysm of pity — the first, and no doubt the last, which had ever possessed Biassou — surprised me much, and astonished the Obi so greatly that he leaped from the position which he had so long maintained, and placing himself face to face with the general addressed him in angry tones:

“What are you saying? Have you forgotten your promise? Neither God nor you can dispose of this life, for it belongs to me.”

At that instant I thought that I recognized the voice; but it was only a fleeting recollection, and in a moment had passed away.

Biassou got up from his seat without betraying any anger, spoke for a few moments in whispers to the Obi, and pointed to the black flag which I had already remarked; and after a little more conversation the Obi nodded in sign of assent. Both of them then reverted to their former positions.

“Listen to me,” said the general, drawing from his pocket the dispatch which Jean Francois had sent to him. “Things are going ill. Bouckmann has been killed. The whites have slaughtered more than two thousand of our men in the district of Cul-de Sac. The colonists are continuing to establish and to fortify military posts. By our own folly we have lost the chance of taking Cap, and it will be long before another occasion will present itself. On the eastern side our line of march has been cut by a river, and the whites have defended the passage by a pontoon battery and a fortified camp. On the south side they have planted artillery on the mountainous road called the Haut-du-Cap. The position is, in addition, defended by a strong stockade, at which all the inhabitants have labored, and in front of it there is a strong chevaux-de-frise. Cap, therefore, is beyond our reach. Our ambush in the ravines of Dompte-Mulatre was a failure; and, to add to all these misfortunes, the Siamese fever has devastated our camps. In consequence, the Grand Admiral (and I agree with him) has decided to treat with the Governor Blanchelande and the Colonial Assembly. Here is the letter that we have addressed to the Assembly on this matter. Listen!"

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF DEPUTIES — In the great misfortunes which have afflicted this great and important colony we have also been enveloped, and there remains nothing for us to say in justification of our conduct. One day you will render us the justice that our conduct merits.

According to us, the King of Spain is a good king, who treats us well, and has testified it to us by rewards; so we shall continue to serve him with zeal and devotion.

We see by the law of Sept. 28, 1791, that the National Assembly and the King have agreed to settle definitely the status of slaves, and the political situation of people of color. We will defend the decrees of the National Assembly with the last drop of our blood.

It would be most interesting to us if you would declare, by an order sanctioned by your general, as to your intentions regarding the position of the slaves. Knowing that they are the objects of your solicitude through their chiefs, who send you this, they will be satisfied if the relations now broken are once again resumed.

Do not count, gentlemen Deputies, upon our consenting to take up arms for the revolutionary Assemblies. We are the subjects of three kings — the King of Congo, the born master of all the blacks; the King of France, who represents our fathers; and the King of Spain, who is the representative of our mothers. These three kings are the descendants of those who, conducted by a star, worshiped the Man God. If we were to consent to serve the Assemblies, we might be forced to take up arms and to make war against our brothers, the subjects of those three kings to whom we have sworn fidelity. And, besides, we do not know what is meant by the will of the Nation, seeing that since the world has been in existence we have always executed that of the King. The Prince of France loves us; the King of.Spain never ceases to help us. We aid them — they aid us; it is the cause of humanity; and, besides, if these kings should fail us we could soon enthrone a king of our own.

Such are our intentions, although we now consent to make peace.

“You see,” said Biassou, after he had read this piece of negro diplomacy, every word of which has remained imprinted on my memory, “that our intentions are peaceable; but this is what we want you to do: Neither Jean Francois nor I have been brought up in the schools of the whites, or learned the niceties of their language; we know how to fight, but not how to write. Now, we do not wish that there should be anything in our letter at which our former masters can laugh. You seem to have learned those frivolous accomplishments in which we are lacking. Correct any faults you may find in this dispatch, so that it may excite no derision among the whites, and — I will give you your life!”

This proposition of becoming the corrector of Biassou’s faults of spelling and composition was too repugnant to my pride for me to hesitate for a moment; and besides, what did I care for life? I declined his offer. He appeared surprised.

“What!” exclaimed he, “you prefer death to scrawling a few marks with a pen on a piece of paper?”

“Yes,” replied I.

My determination seemed to embarrass him. After a few moments of thought he again addressed me: “Listen, young fool! I am less obstinate than you are. I give you until tomorrow evening, up to the setting of the sun, when you shall again be brought before me. Think well, then, before you refuse to obey my wishes. Adieu. Let night bring reflection to you; and remember that with us death is not simply death — much comes before you reach it.”

The frightful sardonic grin with which he concluded his last speech too plainly brought to my recollection the awful tortures which “it was Biassou’s greatest pleasure to inflict upon his prisoners.

“Candi,” continued Biassou, “remove the prisoner, and give him in charge to the men of Morne-Rouge. I wish him to live for another day, and perhaps my other soldiers would not have the patience to let him do so.”

The mulatto Candi, who commanded the guard, caused my arms to be bound behind my back; a soldier took hold of the end of the cord, and we left the grotto.

CHAPTER THTRTY-SIX

WHEN any extraordinary events, unexpected anxieties or catastrophes, intrude themselves suddenly into a life up to that period peaceful and happy, these unexpected emotions interrupt the repose of the soul which lay dreaming in the monotony of prosperity. Misfortune which comes on you in this manner does not seem like an awakening from bliss, but rather like a dream of evil. With the man who has been invariably happy, despair begins with stupor. Unexpected misery is like cramp — it clasps, and deadens everything. Men, acts, and things at that time pass before us like a fantastic apparition, and move along as if in a dream. Everything in the horizon of our life is changed, both the atmosphere and the perspective; but it still goes on for a long time before our eyes have lost that sort of luminous image of past happiness which follows in its train, and interposes without cessation between it and the somber present. Then everything that is appears to be unreal and ridiculous, and we can scarcely believe in our own existence, because we find nothing around us that formerly used to compose our life, and we cannot understand how all can have gone away without taking us with it, and why nothing of our life remains to us.

“Were this strained position of the soul to continue long, it would disturb the equilibrium of the brain and become madness — a state happier perhaps than that which remains, for life then is nothing but a vision of past misfortune, acting like a ghost.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

GENTLEMEN, I hardly know why I lay before you my ideas upon such a subject; they are not those which you understand, or can be made to understand. To comprehend them thoroughly, you must have gone through what I have. But such was the state of my mind when the guards of Biassou handed me over to the negroes of Morne-Rouge. I was still in a dream — it appeared as if one body of phantoms passed me over to another; and without opposing any resistance I permitted them to bind me by the middle to a tree. They then gave me some boiled potatoes, which I ate with the mechanical instinct that God grants to man even in the midst of overwhelming thought.

The darkness had now come on, and my guards took refuge in their huts — with the exception of half-a-dozen who remained with me, lying before a large fire that they had lighted to preserve themselves from the cold night-air. In a few moments they were all” buried in profound sleep.

The state of physical weakness into which I had fallen caused my thoughts to wander in a strange manner. I thought of those calm and peaceful days which but a few weeks ago I had passed with Marie, without being able to foresee any future but one of continued happiness. I compared them with the day that had just expired — a day in which so many strange events had occurred as almost to make me wonder whether I was not laboring under some delusion.

I had been three times condemned to death, and still remained under sentence. I thought of my future, bounded only by the morrow, and which offered nothing but misfortune and a death happily near at hand. I seemed to be the victim of some terrible nightmare. Again and again I asked myself if all that had happened was real: was I really in the power of the sanguinary Biassou, and was my Marie lost to me forever? Could this prisoner, guarded by six savages, bound to a tree, and condemned to certain death, really be I? In spite of all my efforts to repel them, the thoughts of Marie would force themselves upon me. In anguish I thought of her fate; I strained my bonds in my efforts to break them, and to fly to her succor, ever hoping that the terrible dream would pass away, and that Heaven would not permit all the horrors that I dreaded to fall upon the head of her who had been united to mo in a sacred bond. In my sad preoccupation the thought of Pierrot returned to me, and rage nearly took away my senses; the pulses of my temples throbbed nearly to bursting. I hated him, I cursed him; I despised myself for having ever had friendship for Pierrot at the same time I had felt love for Marie; and without caring to seek for the motive which had urged him to cast himself into the waters of Grande-Riviera, I wept because he had escaped me. He was dead, and I was about to die, and all that I regretted was that I had been unable to wreak my vengeance upon him.

During the state of semi-somnolency into which my weakness had plunged me, these thoughts passed through my brain. I do not know how long it lasted, but I was aroused by a man's voice singing distinctly, but at some distance, the old Spanish song, "Yo que soy contrabandista. " Quivering with emotion I opened my eyes; all was dark around me, the negroes slept, the fire was dying down. I could hear nothing more. I fancied that the voice must have been a dream, and my sleep-laden eyelids closed again. In a second I opened them; for again I heard the voice singing sadly, but much nearer, the same song —

This time it was not a charm — it was Pierrot's voice. A few moments elapsed; then it rose again through the silence and the gloom, and once more I heard the well-known air of "Yo que soy contrabandista. " A dog ran eagerly to greet me, and rolled at my feet in token of welcome; it was Rask! A tall negro stood facing me, and the glimmer of the fire threw his shadow, swelled to colossal proportions, upon the sward. It was Pierrot!

The thirst for vengeance fired my brain; surprise rendered me motionless and dumb. I was . not asleep. Could the dead return? If not a dream, it must be an apparition. I turned from him with horror.

When he saw me do this, his head sank upon his breast. "Brother," murmured he, "you promised that you would never doubt me when you heard me sing that song. My brother, have you forgotten your promise?"

Rage restored the power of speech to me. "Monster!" exclaimed I, "do I see you at last? Butcher, murderer of my uncle, ravisher of Marie, dare you call me your brother? Do not venture to approach me!"

I forgot that I was too securely tied to make the slightest movement, and glanced to my left side as though to seek my sword.

My intention did not escape him, and he continued in a sorrowful tone of voice: "No, I will not come near you; you are unhappy and I pity you — while you have no pity for me, though I am much more wretched than you are.”

I shrugged my shoulders; he understood my feelings, and in a half dreamy manner continued:

“Yes, you have lost much; but, believe me, I have lost more than you have.”

But the sound of our conversation had aroused the negro guard. Perceiving a stranger, they leaped to their feet and seized their weapons; but as soon as they recognized the intruder they uttered a cry of surprise and joy, and cast themselves at his feet, striking the ground with their foreheads.

But neither the homage that the negroes rendered to Pierrot, nor the fondlings of Rask, made any impression upon me at the moment. I was boiling over with passion, and maddened at the bonds that restrained me, and at length my fury found words. “Oh, how unhappy I am!” I exclaimed, shedding tears of rage. “I was grieving because I thought that this wretch had committed suicide, and robbed me of my just revenge; and now he is here to mock me, living and breathing under my very eyes, and I am powerless to stab him to the heart! Is there no one to free me from these accursed cords?”

Pierrot turned to the negroes, who were still prostrate before him. “Comrades,” said he, “release the prisoner!”

CHAPTER THIRTY-EIGHT

HE was promptly obeyed. With the greatest eagerness, my guards cut asunder the ropes that confined me. I rose up free; but I remained motionless, for surprise rooted me to the spot.

"That is not all," said Pierrot; and snatching a dagger from one of the negroes, he handed it tome. "You can now have your wish. Heaven would not be pleased should I dispute your right to dispose of my life. Three times you have preserved it. Strike! it is yours, I say; and if you wish, strike!"

There was no sign of anger or of bitterness in his face; he appeared resigned and mournful. The very vengeance offered to me by the man with whom I had so much longed to stand face to face, prevented my seizing the opportunity. I felt that all my hatred for Pierrot, all my love for Marie, could not induce me to commit a cowardly murder; besides, however damning appearances might be, a voice from the depths of my heart warned me that no criminal, no guilty man, would thus dare to stand before me and brave my vengeance. Shall I confess it to you — there was a certain imperious fascination about this extraordinary being which conquered me in spite of myself. I pushed aside the dagger he offered to me.

"Wretch!" cried I, "I wish to kill you in fair fight; but I am no assassin. Defend yourself!"

"Defend myself!" replied he, in tones of astonishment, "and against whom?"

"Against me!"

He started back. "Against you! That is the only thing in which I cannot obey you. Look at Rask there: I could easily kill him, for he would let me do it; but as for making him fight me, the thing would be impossible — he would not understand me if I told him to do so. I do not understand you; in your case I am Rask."

After a short silence, he added: "I see the gleam of hate in your eyes, as you once saw it in mine. I know that you have suffered much; that your uncle has been murdered, your plantations burned, your friends slaughtered. Yes, they have plundered your house, and devastated your inheritance; but it was not I that did these things, it was my people. Listen to me. I one day told you that your people had done me much injury; you said that you must not be blamed for the acts of others. What was my reply?"

His face grew brighter as he awaited my reply, evidently expecting that I would embrace him; but fixing an angry gaze upon him, I answered —

“You disdain all responsibility as to the acts of your people, but you say nothing about what you have yourself done.”

“What have I done?” asked he.

I stepped up close to him, and in a voice of thunder I demanded, “Where is Marie? What have you done with Marie?”

At this question a cloud passed over his face; he seemed momentarily embarrassed. At last he spoke. “Marie!” said he; “yes, you are right. But too many ears listen to us here.”

His embarrassment, and the words “You are right,” raised the hell of jealousy in my heart; yet still he gazed upon me with a perfectly open countenance, and in a voice trembling with emotion, said —

“Do not suspect me, I implore you! Besides, I will tell you everything; love me, as I love you, with perfect trust.” He paused to mark the effect of his words, and then added tenderly, “May I not again call you brother?”

But I was a prey to my jealous feelings, and his friendly words seemed to me but the deep machinations of a hypocrite, and only served to exasperate me more. “Dare you recall the time when you did so, you monster of ingratitude?” I exclaimed.

He interrupted me, a tear shining in his eye: “It is not I who am ungrateful.”

“Well, then,” I continued, “tell me what you have done with .Marie!”

“Not here, not here!” answered he— “other ears than ours listen to our words; besides, you would not believe me, and time presses. The day has come, and you must be removed from this. All is at an end. Since you doubt me, far better would it have been for you to take the dagger and finish all; but wait a little before you take what you call your vengeance — I must first free you. Come with me to Biassou.”

His manner, both in speaking and acting, concealed a mystery which I could not understand. In spite of all my prejudices against the man, his voice always made my heart vibrate. In listening to him, a certain hidden power that he possessed subjugated me. I found myself hesitating between vengeance and pity, between the bitterest distrust and the blindest confidence. I followed him.

CHAPTER THIRTY-NINE

WE left the camp of the negroes of Morne-Rouge. I could not help thinking it strange to find myself at perfect liberty among a horde of savages, in a spot where the evening before each man had seemed only too ready to shed my blood. Far from seeking to bar our progress, both the negroes and the mulattoes prostrated themselves on all sides, with exclamations of surprise, joy, and respect. I was ignorant what rank Pierrot held in the army of the insurgents; but I remembered the influence that he used to exercise over his companions in slavery, and this appeared to me to account for the respect with which he was now treated.

On our arrival at the guard before the grotto, the mulatto Candi advanced before us with threatening gestures, demanding how we dared approach so near the general's quarters; but when he came close enough to recognize my conductor, he hurriedly removed his gold-laced cap, as though terrified at his own audacity, bowed to the ground, and at once introduced us into Biassou's presence with a thousand apologies, of which Pierrot took no heed.

The respect with which the simple negro soldiers had treated Pierrot excited my surprise very little; but seeing Candi, one of the principal officers of the army, humiliate himself thus before my uncle's slave, made me ask myself who this man could be whose power was illimitable. How much more astonished was I then, when, upon being introduced into the presence of Biassou — who was alone when we entered, and was quietly enjoying his calalou — he started to his feet, concealing disappointment and surprise under the appearance of profound respect, bowed humbly to my companion, and offered him his mahogany throne.

Pierrot declined it. "No, Jean Biassou," said he. "I have not come to take your place, but simply to ask a favor at your hands."

"Your Highness," answered Biassou, redoubling his obeisances, "you know well that all Jean Biassou has is yours, and that you can dispose as freely of all as you can of Jean Biassou himself."

"I do not ask for so much," replied Pierrot, quickly; "all I ask is the life and liberty of this prisoner," and he pointed to me.

For a moment Biassou appeared embarrassed, but he speedily recovered himself. "Your servant is in despair, your Highness; for you ask of him, to his great regret, more than he can grant. He is not Jean Biassou’s prisoner, does not belong to Jean Biassou, and has nothing to do with Jean Biassou.”

“What do you mean?” asked Pierrot, in severe tones, “by saying that he does not belong to you? Does ‘ any one else hold authority here except you?”

“Alas, yes, your Highness.”

“Who is it?”

“My army.”

The sly and obsequious manner in which Biassou eluded the frank and haughty questions of Pierrot showed, had it depended solely upon himself, that he would gladly have treated his visitor with far less respect than he felt himself now compelled to do.

“What!” exclaimed Pierrot, “your army! And do not you command it?”

Biassou, with every appearance of sincerity, replied, “Does your Highness really think that we can command men who are in insurrection because they will not obey?”

I cared too little for my life to break the silence which I had imposed upon myself, else, having seen the day before the despotic authority that Biassou exercised over his men, I might have contradicted his assertions, and laid bare his duplicity to Pierrot.

“Well, if you have no authority over your men, and if they are your masters, what reason can they have for hating your prisoner?” , “Bouckmann has been killed by the white troops,” answered Biassou, endeavoring to conceal his sardonic smile under a mask of sorrow, “and my men are determined to avenge upon this white man the death of the chief of the Jamaica negroes. They wish to show trophy against trophy, and desire that the head of this young officer should serve as a counterpoise to the head of Bouckmann in the scales in which the good Giu weighs both parties.”

“Do you still continue to carry on this horrible system of reprisals? Listen to me, Jean Biassou! it is these cruelties that are the ruin of our just cause. Prisoner as I was in the camp of the whites (from which I have managed to escape), I had not heard of the death of Bouckmann until you told me. It is the just punishment of Heaven for his crimes. I will tell you another piece of news: Jeannot, the negro chief who served as a guide to draw the white troops into the ambush of Dompte-Mulâtre — Jeannot also is dead. You know — do not interrupt me, Biassou! — you know that he rivaled you and Bouckmann in his atrocities; and pay attention to this — it was not the thunderbolt of Heaven, nor the bullets of the whites, that struck him; it was Jean Francois himself who ordered this act of justice to be performed.”

Biassou, who had listened with an air of gloomy respect, uttered an exclamation of surprise. At this moment Rigaud entered, bowed respectfully to Pierrot, and whispered in Biassou’s ear. The murmur of many voices was heard in the camp.

“Yes,” continued Pierrot, “Jean Francois, who has no fault except a preposterous love of luxury and show; whose carriage with its six horses takes him every day to hear Mass at the Grande-Riviere — Jean Francois himself has put a stop to the crimes of Jeannot. In spite of the cowardly entreaties of the brigand, who clung in despair to the knees of the priest of Marmalade who attended him in his last moments, he was shot beneath the very tree upon which he used to hang his living victims upon iron hooks. Think upon this, Biassou. Why these massacres which provoke the whites to reprisals? Why all these juggleries which only tend to excite the passions of our unhappy comrades, already too much exasperated? There is at Trou-Cofii a mulatto impostor, called Romaine the Prophet, who is in command of a fanatical band of negroes; he profanes the holy sacrament of the Mass, he pretends that he is in direct communication with the Virgin, and he urges on his men to murder and pillage in the name of Marie.”

There was a more tender inflection in the voice of Pierrot as he uttered this name than even religious respect would have warranted, and I felt annoyed and irritated at it.

“And you,” continued he, “you have in your camp some Obi, I hear — some impostor like this Romaine the Prophet. I well know that having to lead an army composed of so many heterogeneous materials, a common bond is necessary; but can it be found no where save in ferocious fanaticism and ridiculous superstition? Believe me, Biassou, the white men are not so cruel as we are. I have seen many planters protect the lives of their slaves. I am not ignorant that in some cases it was not the life of a man, but a sum of money that they desired to save; but at any rate their interest gave them the appearance of a virtue. Do not let us be less merciful than they “ are, for it is not our interest to be so. “Will our cause be more holy and more just because we exterminate the women, slaughter the children, and burn the colonists in their own houses? These, however, are every-day occurrences.

Answer me, Biassou! must the traces of our progress be always marked by a line of blood and fire?”

He ceased. The fire of his glance, the accent of his voice, gave to his words a force of conviction and authority which it is impossible for me to imitate. Like a fox in the clutches of a lion, Biassou seemed to seek for some means of escape from the power that constrained him.

While Biassou vainly sought for a pretext, the chief of the negroes of Cayèr, Rigaud, who the evening before had calmly watched the horrors that had been perpetrated in his presence, seemed to be shocked at the picture that Pierrot had drawn, and exclaimed with a hypocritical affectation of grief, “Great heavens! how terrible is a nation when roused to fury!”

CHAPTER FORTY

THE confusion in the camp appeared to increase, to the great uneasiness of Biassou. I heard afterward that it was caused by the negroes of Morne-Rouge, who hurried from one end of the camp to the other, announcing the return of my liberator, and declaring their intention of supporting him in whatever object he had come to Biassou's camp for. Rigaud had informed the generalissimo of this, and it was the fear of a fatal division in the camp that prompted Biassou to make some sort of concession to the wishes of Pierrot.

"Your Highness," remarked he, with an air of injured innocence, "if we are hard on the whites, you are equally severe upon us. You are wrong in accusing us of being the cause of the torrent, for it is the torrent that drags us away with it. But what can I do at present that will please you?"

"I have already told you, Senor Biassou," answered Pierrot; "let me take this prisoner away with me."

Biassou remained for a few moments silent, as though in deep thought; then putting on an expression of as great frankness as he was able, he answered, "Your Highness, I wish to prove to you that I have every desire to please you. Permit me to have two words in private with the prisoner, and he shall be free to follow you."

"If that is all you ask, I agree," replied Pierrot.

His eyes, which up to that moment had wandered about in a distrustful manner, glistened with delight, and he moved away a few paces to leave us to our conversation.

Biassou drew me on one side into a retired part of the cavern, and said in a low voice, "I can only spare your life upon the condition that I proposed; are you ready to fulfill it?"

He showed me the dispatch of Jean Francois; to consent appeared to me too humiliating.

"Never!" answered I, firmly.

"Aha! " repeated he, with his sardonic chuckle, "are you always as firm? You have great confidence, then, in your protector. Do you know who he is?"

"I do," answered I, quickly. "He is a monster, as you are; only he is a greater hypocrite."

He started back in astonishment, seeking to read in my glance if I spoke seriously.

"What!" exclaimed he, "do you not know him then?"

With a disdainful look, I replied: "I only know him as my uncle's slave; and his name is Pierrot."

Again Biassou smiled bitterly. "Aha, that indeed is strange: he asks for your life and liberty, and you say that you only know him for a monster like myself."

"What matters that?" I answered; "if I do gain a little liberty, it is not to save my own life, but to take his."

"What is that you are saying?" asked Biassou. "And yet you seem to speak as you believe; I cannot think that you would trifle with your life. There is something beneath all this that I do not understand. You are protected by a man that you hate; he insists upon your life being spared, and you are longing to take his! But it matters little to me; you desire a short spell of freedom — it is all that I can give you. I will leave you free to follow him; but swear to me, by your honor, that you will return to me and reconstitute yourself my prisoner two hours before the sun sets. You are a Frenchman, and I will trust you."

What shall I say, gentlemen? Life was a burden to me, and I hated the idea of owing it to Pierrot, for every circumstance pointed him out as a just object of my hatred. I could not think for a moment that Biassou (who did not easily permit his prey to escape him) would allow me to go free except upon his own conditions. All I desired was a few hours' liberty which I could devote to discovering the fate of my beloved before my death. Biassou, relying upon my honor as a Frenchman, would grant me these, and without hesitation I pledged it.

"Your Highness," said Biassou, in obsequious tones, "the white prisoner is at your disposal; you can take him with you, for he is free to accompany you wherever you wish."

"Thanks, Biassou," cried Pierrot, extending his hand. "You have rendered me a service which places me entirely at your disposal. Remain in command of our brethren of Morne-Rouge until my return."

Then he turned toward me; I never saw so much happiness in his eyes before. "Since you are free," cried he, "come with me." And with a strange earnestness he drew me away with him.

Biassou looked after us with blank astonishment, which was even perceptible through the respectful leave that he took of my companion.

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE

I WAS longing to be alone with Pierrot. His embarrassment when I had questioned him as to the fate of Marie, the ill-concealed tenderness with which he had dared to pronounce her name, had made those feelings of hatred and jealousy which had sprung up in my heart take far deeper root than at the time I saw him bearing away through the flames of Fort Galifet her whom I could scarcely call my wife. What did I care for the generous indignation with which he had reproved the cruelties of Biassou, the trouble which he had taken to preserve my life, and the curious manner which marked all his words and actions? What cared I for the mystery that appeared to envelop him, which brought him living before my eyes when I thought to have witnessed his death? He proved to be a prisoner of the white troops when I believed that he lay buried in the depths of Grande-Riviere — the slave become a king, the prisoner a liberator. Of all these incomprehensible things one was clear — Marie had been carried off by him; and I had this crime to punish, this outrage to avenge. However strange were the events that had passed under my eyes, they were not sufficient to shake my determination, and I had waited with impatience for the moment when I could compel my rival to explain all. That moment had at last arrived.

We had passed through crowds of negroes, who cast themselves on the ground as we pursued our way, exclaiming in tones of surprise, “Miraculo! yano esta prisonero!” (“A miracle! he is no longer a prisoner!”); but whether they referred to Pierrot or to myself I neither knew nor cared. We had gained the outskirts of the camp, and rocks and trees concealed from our view the outposts of Biassou; Rask in high good humor was running in front of us, and’ Pierrot was following him with rapid strides, when I stopped him.

“Listen to me!” cried I; “it is useless to go any further: the ears that you dreaded can no longer listen to us. What have you done with Marie? Tell me that!”

Concentrated emotion made my voice tremble. He gazed upon me kindly.

“Always the same question?” said he.

“Yes, always,” returned I, furiously; “always! I will put that question to you as you draw your last breath, or as I utter my last sigh. Where is Marie?”

“Can nothing, then, drive away your doubts of my loyalty? But you shall know all soon.”

“Soon, monster!” repeated I, “soon! it is now, at this instant, that I want to know all. Where is Marie? Where is Marie? Answer, or stake your life against mine. Defend yourself!”

“I have already told you,” answered he, sadly, “that that is impossible; the stream will not struggle against its source — and my life, which you have three times saved, cannot contend against yours. Besides, even if I wished it, the thing is impossible; we have but one dagger between us.”

As he spoke, he drew the weapon from his girdle and offered it to me. “Take it,” said he.

I was beside myself with passion. I seized the dagger and placed the point on his breast; he never attempted to move.

“Wretch!” cried I, “do not force me to murder you. I will plunge this blade into your heart if you do not at once tell me where my wife is!”

He replied in his calm way: “You are the master to do as you like; but with clasped hands I implore you to grant me one hour of life, and to follow me. Can you doubt him who thrice has owed his life to you, and whom you once called brother? Listen: if in one hour from this time you still doubt. me, you shall be at perfect liberty to kill me. That will be time enough; you see that I do not attempt to resist you. I conjure you in the name of Marie — of your wife,” he added slowly, as though the victim of some painful recollection— “give me but another hour, I beg of you, not for my sake, but for yours.”

There was so much pathos in his entreaties that an inner feeling warned me to grant his request, and I yielded to that secret ascendency which he exercised over me, but which at that time I should have blushed to confess.

“Well,” said I, slowly, “I will grant you one hour, and I am ready to follow you;” and as I spoke I handed him his dagger.

“No,” answered he, “keep it; you still distrust me, but let us lose no time.”

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO

AGAIN we started. Rask, who during our conversation had shown frequent signs of impatience to renew his journey, bounded joyously before us. We plunged into a virgin forest, and after half an hour's walking came out on a grassy opening in the wood. On one side was a waterfall dashing over rugged rocks, while the primeval trees of the forest surrounded it on all sides. Among the rocks was a cave, the gray face of which was shrouded by a mass of climbing plants. Rask ran toward it barking; but at a sign from Pierrot he became silent, and the latter, taking me by the hand, led me without a word to the entrance of the cave.

A woman with her back toward the light was seated on a mat; at the sound of our steps she turned. My friends, it was Marie! She wore . the same white dress which she had worn on the day of our marriage, and the wreath of orange blossoms was still on her head. She recognized me in a moment, and with a cry of joy threw herself into my arms. I was speechless with surprise and emotion. At her cry an old woman carrying a child in her arms hurried from an inner chamber formed in the depth of the cave; she was Marie's nurse, and she carried my uncle's youngest child.

Pierrot hastened to bring some water from a neighboring spring, and threw a few drops in Marie's face, who was overcome by emotion; she speedily recovered, and opening her eyes exclaimed —

"Leopold! my Leopold!"

"Marie!" cried I, and my words were stifled in a kiss.

"Not before me, for pity's sake!" cried a voice, in accents of agony.

We looked round, it came from Pierrot. The sight of our endearments appeared to inflict terrible torture on him; his bosom heaved, a cold perspiration bedewed his forehead, and every limb quivered. Suddenly he hid his face in his hands and fled from the grotto, repeating in tones of anguish —

"Not before me! not before me!"

Marie half raised herself in my arms, and following his retreating form with her eyes, exclaimed, "Leopold, our happiness seems to trouble him; can it be that he loves me?"

The exclamation of the slave had shown that he was my rival, but Marie's speech proved that he was my trusty friend.

"Marie," answered I, as the wildest happiness mingled with the deepest regret filled my heart, "Marie, were you ignorant of it?"

"Until this moment I was," answered she, a blush overspreading her beautiful features. "Does he really love me, for he never let me know it?"

I clasped her to my bosom, in all the madness of happiness. "I have recovered both wife and friend! How happy am I, but how guilty, for I doubted him!"

"What!" cried Marie, in surprise, "had you doubts of Pierrot? Oh, you have indeed been in fault. Twice has he saved my life, and perhaps more than life," she added, casting down her eyes. "Without him the alligator would have devoured me; without him the negroes — It was Pierrot who rescued me from their hands when they were about to send me to rejoin my unhappy father."

She broke off her speech with a flood of tears.

"And why," asked I, "did not Pierrot send you to Cap, to your husband?"

"He tried to do so," replied she, "but it was impossible. Compelled as he was to conceal me both from the whites and the blacks, his position was a most difficult one; and then, too, he was ignorant where you were. Some said that they had seen you killed, but Pierrot assured me that this was not the case; and a something convinced me that he spoke the truth, for I felt that had you been dead I should have died at the same time."

"Then, Pierrot brought you here?" asked I.

"Yes, my Leopold; this solitary cave is known only to him. At the same time that he rescued me, he saved all that remained alive of our family, my little brother and my old nurse — and hid us here. The place is very nice, and now that the war has destroyed our house and ruined us, I should like to live here with you. Pierrot supplied all our wants. He used to come very often; he wore a plume of red feathers on his head. He used to console me by talking of you, and always assured me that we should meet again; but for the past three days I have not seen him, and I was beginning to be uneasy, when to-day he came back with you. He had been seeking for you, had he not?"

"Yes," replied I.

"But if so, how can he be in love with me? Are you sure of it?"

"Quite," answered I. "It was he who was about to stab me beneath your window, and spared me lest it should afflict you; it was he who sang the love songs at the pavilion by the river."

“Then he is your rival,” exclaimed Marie, with naive surprise; “and the wicked man with the wild marigolds is Pierrot! I can hardly believe that: he was so respectful and humble to me, much more so than when he was our slave. It is true that sometimes he looked at me in a strange manner, but I attributed his sadness to our misfortunes. If you could only know with what tenderness he spoke of you, my Leopold! His friendship made him speak of you as much as my love did.”

These explanations of Marie enchanted and yet grieved me. I felt how cruelly I had treated the noble-hearted Pierrot, and I felt all the force of his gentle reproach, “It is not I who am ungrateful.”

At this instant Pierrot returned. His face was dark and gloomy, and he looked like a martyr returning from the place of torture, but yet retaining an air of triumph. He came toward me, and pointing to the dagger in my belt said. “The hour has passed!”

“Hour! what hour?” asked I.

“The one you granted me; it was necessary for me to have so much time allowed me in which to bring you here. Then I conjured you to spare my life; now I supplicate you to take it away.”

The most tender feelings of the heart — love, gratitude and friendship — united themselves together to torture me. Unable to say a word, but sobbing bitterly, I cast myself at the feet of the slave. He raised me up in haste.

“What are you doing?” cried he.

“I pay you the homage that is your due; but I am no longer worthy of friendship such as yours. Can your friendship be pushed so far as to forgive me my ingratitude?”

For a time his expression remained stern; he appeared to be undergoing a violent mental contest. He took a step toward me, then drew back, and seemed on the point of speaking; but no words passed his lips. The struggle was a short one, he opened his arms to embrace me, saying:

“May I now call you brother?”

My only reply was to cast myself on his breast.

After a short pause he added:

“You were always kind, but misfortune had rendered you unjust.”

“I have found my brother once again,” said I. “I am unfortunate no longer, but I have been very guilty.”

“Guilty, brother? I also have been guilty, and more so than you; you are no longer unhappy, but I shall be so forever!”

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE

THE expression of pleasure which the renewal of our friendship had traced on his features faded away, and an appearance of deep grief once more pervaded them.

“Listen,” said he coldly. “My father was the King of Kakongo. Each day he sat at the door of his hut and dispensed justice among his subjects. After every judgment, according to the custom of the kings his ancestors, he drank a full goblet of palm wine. “We were happy and powerful. But the Europeans came to our country; it was from them that I learned the accomplishments which you appeared to be surprised at my possessing. Our principal acquaintance among the Europeans was a Spanish captain; he promised my father territories far greater than those he now ruled over, treasure, and white women. My father believed him, and gathering his family together, followed him. Brother, he sold us as slaves!”

The breast of the negro rose and fell, as he strove to restrain himself; his eyes shot forth sparks of fire; and without seeming to know what he did, he broke in his powerful grasp a fancy medlar-tree that stood beside him.

“The master of Kakongo in his turn had a master, and his son toiled as a slave in the furrows of St. Domingo. They tore the young lion from his father that they might the more easily tame him; they separated the wife from the husband, and the little children from the mother who nursed them, and from the father who used to bathe them in the torrents of their native land. In their place they found cruel masters and a sleeping place shared with the dogs!”

He was silent, though his lips moved as though he were still continuing his narrative; after a moment’s pause he seized me roughly by the arm, and continued: “Brother, do you understand? I have been sold to different masters like a beast of burden. Do you remember the punishment of Oge? It was on that day that I saw my father after a long separation: he was on the wheel!”

I shuddered; he went on:

“My wife was outraged by white men, and she died calling for revenge. I must tell you I was guilty toward her, for I loved another; but let that pass by. All my people urged me to deliver and avenge them; Rask brought me their messages. I could do nothing for them, I was fast in your uncle’s prison. The day upon which you obtained my release, I hurried off to save my children from the power of a cruel master. Upon the very day that I arrived, the last of the grand-children of the King of Kakongo had expired under the blows of the white man; he had followed the others!”

He interrupted his recital, and coldly asked me: “Brother, what would you have done?”

This frightful tale froze me with horror. I replied by a threatening gesture. He understood me, and with a bitter smile he continued:

“The slaves rose against their master, and punished the murder of my children. They chose me for their chief. You know the frightful excesses that were perpetrated by the insurgents. I heard that your uncle’s slaves were on the point of rising. I arrived at Acul on the night upon which the insurrection broke out. You were away. Your uncle had been murdered in his bed, and the negroes had already set fire to the plantation. Not being able to restrain them (for in destroying your uncle’s property they thought that they were avenging my injuries), I determined to save the survivors of his family. I entered the fort by the breach that I had made. I intrusted your wife’s nurse to a faithful negro. I had more trouble in saving your Marie; she had hurried to the burning portion of the fort to save the youngest of her brothers, the sole survivor of the massacre. The insurgents surrounded her, and were about to kill her. I burst upon them, and ordered them to leave her to my vengeance; they obeyed me, and retired. I took your wife in my arms; I intrusted the child to Rask — and I bore them both away to this cavern, of which I alone knew the existence and the access. Brother, such was my crime!”

More than ever overwhelmed with gratitude and remorse, I would again have thrown myself at his feet, but he stopped me.

“Come,” said he, “take your wife and let us leave this, all of us.”

In wonder I asked him whither he wished to conduct us.

“To the camp of the whites,” answered he. “This retreat is no longer safe. To-morrow at break of day the camp of Biassou will be attacked, and the forest will assuredly be set on fire. Besides, I have no time to lose. Ten lives are in jeopardy until my return. We can hasten because you are free; we must hasten because I am not.”

These words increased my surprise, and I pressed him for an explanation.

“Have you not heard that Bug-Jargal is a prisoner? “ replied he, impatiently.

“Yes; but what has Bug-Jar gal to do with you? “ In his turn he seemed astonished, and then in a grave voice he answered: “I am Bug-Jargal”

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR

1HAD thought that nothing that related to this extraordinary man could have surprised me. I had experienced some feelings of astonishment in finding the slave Pierrot transformed into an African king; but my admiration reached its height when from his own confession I learned that he was the courageous and magnanimous Bug-Jargal, the chief of the insurgents of Morne-Rouge; and I now understood the respectful demeanour shown by all the rebels, even by Biassou, to Bug-Jargal, the King of Kakongo. He did not notice the impression that his last words had made upon me.

"They told me," continued he, "that you were a prisoner in Biassou's camp, and someone would need to deliver you."

but I heard a report that Biassou had announced his intention of executing, before sunset to-day, a young prisoner named Leopold d'Auverney. They doubled my guards, and I was informed that my execution would immediately follow yours, and that in the event of escape ten of my comrades would suffer in my stead. So you see that I have no time to lose."

I still detained him. "You made your escape then?" asked I.

"How else could I have been here? It was necessary to save you. Did I not owe you my life? Come, let us set out; we are an hour's march from the camp of the whites, and about the same distance from that of Biassou. See, the shadows of the cocoanut-trees are lengthening, and their round tops look on the pass like the egg of the giant condor. In three hours the sun will have set. Come, brother, time waits for no man."

In three hours the sun will have set! These words froze my blood, like an apparition from the tomb. They recalled to my mind the fatal promise which bound me to Biassou. Alas! in the rapture of seeing Marie again, I had not thought of our approaching eternal separation. I had been overwhelmed with my happiness; a flood of joyful emotions had swept away my memory, and in the midst of my delight I had forgotten that the inexorable finger of death was beckoning to me. But the words of my friend recalled everything to my mind. In three hours the sun will have set! It would take an hour to reach Biassou's camp. There could be no faltering with my duty. The villain had my word, and it would never do to give him the chance of despising what he seemed still to put trust in — the word of a Frenchman; better far to die. The alternative was a terrible one, and I confess that I hesitated for a moment before I chose the right course. Can you blame me, gentlemen?

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE

WITH a deep sigh, I placed one hand in that of Bug-Jargal, and the other in that of Marie, who gazed with anxiety on the sadness that had overspread my features.

“Bug-Jargal,” said I, struggling with emotion, “I intrust to you the only being in the world that I love more than you — my Marie. Return to the camp without me, for I may not follow you.”

“Great heavens!” exclaimed Marie, hardly able to breathe from her terror and anxiety, “what new misfortune is this?”

Bug Jargal trembled, and a look of mingled sorrow and surprise passed over his face. “Brother, what is this that you say?”

The terror that had seized upon Marie at the thought of the coming misfortune, which her love for me had almost caused her to divine, made me determine to spare her the dreadful truth for the moment. I placed my mouth to Bug-Jargal’s ear, and whispered in hurried accents: “I am a prisoner. I swore to Biassou that two hours before sunset I would once more place myself in his hands; in fact, I have sworn to return to my death!”

Filled with rage, in a loud voice he exclaimed: “The monster! This then was his motive for a secret interview with you: it was to bind you with this fatal promise. I ought to have distrusted the wretch. “Why did I not foresee that there must be some treachery lurking in the request, for he is a mulatto, not a black?”

“What is this — what treachery — what promise?” said Marie, in an agony of terror. “And who is Biassou?”

“Silence, silence,” repeated I, in a low voice to Bug-Jargal; “do not let us alarm Marie.”

“Good,” answered he; “but why did you give such a pledge — how could you consent?”

“I thought that you had deceived me, and that Marie was lost to me forever. What was life to me then?”

“But a simple promise cannot bind you to a brigand like that.”

“I gave my word of honor.”

He did not seem to understand me. “Your word of honor,” repeated he; “but what is that? You did not drink out of the same cup; you have not broken a ring together, or a branch of the red blossomed maple?”

“No, we have done none of these things.”

“Well, then, what binds you to him?”

“My honor!”

“I cannot understand you; nothing pledges you to Biassou; come with us!”

“I cannot, my brother, for I am bound by my promise.”

“No, you are not bound,” cried he, angrily. “Sister, add your prayers to mine, and entreat your husband not to leave you. He wishes to return to the negro camp from which I rescued him, on the plea that he has promised to place his life in Biassou’s hands.”

“What have you done?” cried I.

It was too late to stay the effects of the generous impulse that had prompted him to endeavor to save the life of his rival by the help of her he loved. Marie cast herself into my arms with a cry of anguish, her hands clasped my neck, and she hung upon my breast speechless and breathless.

“Oh, my Leopold, what does he say?” murmured she, at last. “Is he not deceiving me? It is not immediately after our reunion that you must quit me again. Answer me quickly, or I shall die. You have no right to throw away your life, for you have given it to me. You would not leave me, never to see me again?”

“Marie,” answered I, “we shall meet again, but it will be in another place.”

“In another place! Where?” she asked, in faltering accents.

“In heaven,” I answered; for to this angel I could not lie.

Again she fainted, but this time it was from grief. I raised her up, and placed her in the arms of Bug-Jargal, whose eyes were full of tears.

“Nothing can keep you back, then,” said he. “I will add nothing to my entreaties; this sight ought to be enough. How can you resist Marie? For one word such as she has spoken to you I would have sacrificed the world; and you cannot even give up death for her!”

“Honor binds me,” answered I, sadly. “Farewell, Bug-Jargal! farewell, brother! I leave her to you.”

He grasped my hand, overwhelmed with grief, and appeared hardly to understand me. “Brother,” said he, “in the camp of the whites there are some of your relatives; I will give her over to them. For my part, I cannot accept your legacy.”

He pointed to a rocky crag which towered high above the adjacent country. “Do you see that rock?” asked he; “when the signal of your death shall float from it, it will promptly be answered by the volley that announces mine.”

Hardly understanding his last words, I embraced him, pressed a kiss upon the pale lips of Marie, who was slowly recovering under the attentions of her nurse, and fled precipitately, fearing that another look or word would shake my resolution.

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX

I RUSHED headlong, and plunged into the depths of the forest, following the tracks that we had left but a short time before, not daring to cast a last glance behind me. To stifle the grief which oppressed my heart, I dashed, without a moment's pause, through the thickets, past hill and plain, until I reached the crest of a rock from which I could see the camp of Biassou, with its lines of wagons and huts swarming with life, and looking in the distance like a vast ant-hill. Then I halted, for I felt that I had reached the end of my journey and my life at the same time. Fatigue and emotion had weakened my physical powers, and I leaned against a tree to save myself from falling, and allowed my eyes to wander over the plain, which was to be my place of execution.

Up to this moment I had imagined that I had drained the cup of bitterness and gall to the dregs; but I had not until then tasted the most cruel of all misfortunes — that of being constrained by powerful moral force to voluntarily renounce life when it appeared most sweet. Some hours before, 1 cared not for the world; extreme despair is a simulation of death which makes the reality more earnestly desired. Marie had been restored to me, my dead happiness had been resuscitated, my past had become my future, and all my overshadowed hopes had beamed forth more gloriously than ever; and again had a new life — a life of youth and love and enchantment — shone gloriously upon the horizon. I was ready to enter upon this life; everything invited me to it; no material obstacle, no hinderance, was apparent. I was free, I was happy, and yet — I was about to die. I had made but one step into paradise, and a hidden duty compelled me to retrace it, and to enter upon a path the goal of which was death!

Death has but few terrors for the crushed and broken spirit; but how heavy and icy is his hand when it grasps the heart which has just begun to live and revel in the joys of life! I felt that I had emerged from the tomb, and had for a moment enjoyed the greatest delights of life, love, friendship, and liberty; and now the door of the sepulcher was again opened, and an unseen force compelled me once more to enter it forever.

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN

WHEN the first bitter pang of grief had passed, a kind of fury took possession of me; and I entered the valley with a rapid step, for I felt the necessity of shortening the period of suspense. When I presented myself at the negro outpost, the sergeant in command at first refused to permit me to pass. It seemed strange that I should be obliged to have recourse to entreaties to enable me to effect my object. At last two of them seized me by the arms and led me into Biassou's presence.

As I entered the grotto he was engaged in examining the springs of various instruments of torture with which he was surrounded. At the noise my guard made in introducing me he turned his head, but my presence did not seem to surprise him.

"Do you see these?" asked he, displaying the horrible engines which lay before him.

I remained calm and impassive, for I knew the cruel nature of the "hero of humanity," and I was determined to endure to the end without blenching.

"Leogri was lucky in being only hanged, was he not?" asked he, with his sardonic sneer.

I gazed upon him with cold disdain, but I made no reply.

"Tell his reverence the chaplain that the prisoner has returned," said he to an aid-decamp.

During the absence of the negro, we both remained silent, but I could see that he watched me narrowly. Just then Rigaud entered; he seemed agitated, and whispered a few words to the general.

"Summon the chiefs of the different bands," said Biassou, calmly.

A quarter of an hour afterward, the different chiefs in their strange equipments were assembled in the grotto. Biassou rose.

"Listen to me, friends and comrades! The whites will attack us here at daybreak; our position is a bad one, and we must quit it. At sunset we will march to the Spanish frontier. Macaya, you and your negroes will form the advanced guards. Padrejan, see that the guns taken at Pralato are spiked; we cannot take them into the mountains. The brave men of Croix-des-Bouquets will follow Macaya; Toussaint will come next with the blacks from Leogane and Trose. If the griots or the griotes make any disturbance, I will hand them over to the executioner of the army. Lieutenant-Colonel Cloud will distribute the English muskets that were disembarked at Cape Cabron, and will lead the half-breeds through the by-ways of the Vista. Slaughter any prisoners that may remain, notch the bullets, and poison the arrows. Let three tons of arsenic be thrown into the wells; the colonists will take it for sugar, and drink without distrust. Block “up the roads to the plain with rocks, line the hedges with marksmen, and set fire to the forest. Rigaud, you will remain with me; Candi, summon my body-guard. The negroes of Morne-Rouge will form the rearguard, and will not evacuate the camp until sunrise.”

He leaned over to Rigaud, and whispered hoarsely: “They are Bug-Jargal’s men; if they are killed, all the better. ‘Muerta la tropa, murte el gefe!’ (‘If the men die, the chief will die.’)

“Go, my brethren,” he added, rising, “you will receive instructions from Candi.”

The chiefs left the grotto.

“General,” remarked Rigaud, “we ought to send that dispatch of Jean Francois; affairs are going badly, and it would stop the advance of the whites.”

Biassou drew it hastily from his pocket. “I agree with you; but there are so many faults, both in grammar and spelling, that they will laugh at it.”

He presented the paper to me. “For the last time, will you save your life? My kindness gives you a last chance. Help me to correct this letter, and to re-write it in proper official style.”

I shook my head.

“Do you mean no?” asked he.

“I do,” I replied.

“Reflect,” he answered, with a sinister glance at the instruments of torture.

“It is because I have reflected that I refuse,” replied I. “You are alarmed for the safety of yourself and your men, and you count upon this letter to delay the just vengeance of the whites. I do not desire to retain a life which may perhaps have saved yours. Let my execution commence.”

“Ha, boy!” exclaimed Biassou, touching the instruments of torture with his foot, “you are growing familiar with these, are you? I am sorry, but I have not the time to try them on you; our position is a dangerous one, and we must get out of it as soon as we can. And so you refuse to act as my secretary? Well, you are right; for it would not after all have saved your miserable life, which, by the way, I have promised to his reverence my chaplain. Do you think that I would permit any one to live who holds the secrets of Biassou?”

He turned to the Obi, who just then entered. “Good father, is your guard ready?”

The latter made a sign in the affirmative.

“Have you taken it from among the negroes of Morne-Rouge, for they are the only ones who are not occupied in preparations for departure?”

Again the Obi bowed his head.

Then Biassou pointed out to me the black flag which I had before remarked in a corner of the grotto. “That will show your friends when the time comes to give your place to your lieutenant. But I have no more time to lose; I must be off. By the way, you have been for a little excursion; how did you like the neighborhood?”

“I noticed that there were enough trees upon which to hang you and all your band.”

“Ah,” retorted he, with his hideous laugh, “there is one place that you have not seen, but with which the good father will make you acquainted. Adieu, my young captain, and give my compliments to Leogri.”

He bade me farewell with a chuckle that reminded me of the hiss of the rattlesnake, and turned his back as the negroes dragged me away. The veiled Obi followed us, his rosary in his hand.

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT

I WALKED between my guards without offering any resistance, which would indeed have been hopeless. We ascended the shoulder of a hill on the western side of the plain, and then my escort sat down for a brief period of repose. As we did so, I cast a last lingering look at the setting sun, which would never rise again for me on this earth.

When my guards rose to their feet, I followed their example, and we descended into a little dell, the beauty of which under any other circumstances would have filled me with admiration. A mountain stream ran through the bottom of the dell, which by its refreshing coolness produced a thick and luxuriant growth of vegetation, and fell into one of those dark-blue lakes with which the hills of St. Domingo abound. How often in happier days have I sat and dreamed on the borders of these beautiful lakes, in the twilight hour, when beneath the influence of the moon their deep azure changed into a sheet of silver, or when the reflections of the stars sowed the surface with a thousand golden spangles! How lovely this valley appeared to me! There were magnificent plane-trees of gigantic growth, closely grown thickets of mauritias, a kind of palm, which allows no other vegetation to flourish beneath its shade; date-trees and magnolias with the goblet-shaped flowers. The tall catalpa, with its polished and exquisitely chiseled blossoms, stood out in relief against the golden buds of the ebony-trees; the Canadian maple mingled its yellow flowers with the blue aureolas of that species of the wild honeysuckle which the negroes call “coali”; thick curtains of luxurious creepers concealed the bare sides of the rocks, while from the virgin soil rose a soft perfume, such as the first man may have inhaled amid Eden’s groves.

We continued our way along a footpath traced on the brink of the torrent. I was surprised to notice that this path closed abruptly at the foot of a tall peak, in which was a natural archway, from which flowed a rapid torrent. A dull roar of falling waters and an impetuous wind issued from this natural tunnel. The negroes who escorted me took a path to the left which led into a cavern, and seemed to be the bed of a torrent that had long been dried up. Overhead I could see the rugged roof, half hidden, by masses of vegetation, and the same sound of falling waters filled the whole of the vault.

As I took the first step into the cavern, the Obi came to my side, and whispered in a hoarse voice, “Listen to what I have to predict: only one of us two shall leave by this path and issue again from the entrance of the cave.”

I disdained to make any reply, and we advanced further into the gloom. The noise became louder, and drowned the sound of our footfalls. I fancied that there must be a waterfall near, and I was not deceived. After moving through the darkness for nearly ten minutes, we found ourselves on a kind of internal platform caused by the central formation of the mountain. The larger portion of this platform, which was of a semicircular shape, was inundated by a torrent which burst from the interior of the mountain with a terrible din. Above this subterranean hall the roof rose into the shape of a dome, covered with moss of a yellowish hue. A large opening was formed in the dome, through which the daylight penetrated; and the sides of the crevice were fringed with green trees, gilded just now by the last rays of the setting sun. At the northern extremity of the platform the torrent fell with a frightful noise into a deep abyss, over which appeared to float, without being able to illuminate its depths, a feeble portion of the light which came through the aperture in the roof.

Over this terrible precipice hung the trunk of an old tree, whose topmost branches were filled with the foam of the waterfall, and whose knotty roots pierced through the rock two or three feet below the brink. This tree, whose top and roots were both swept by the torrent, hung over the abyss like a skeleton arm, and was so destitute of foliage that I could not distinguish its species. It had a strange and weird appearance; the humidity which saturated its roots prevented it from dying, while the force of the cataract tore off its new shoots, and only left it with the branches that had strength to resist the force of the water.

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE

IN this terrible spot the negroes came to a halt, and I knew that my hour had come. It was in this abyss, then, that was to be sunk all my hopes in this world. The image of the happiness which but a few hours before I had voluntarily renounced brought to my heart a feeling of regret, almost one of remorse. To pray for mercy was unworthy of me, but I could not refrain from giving utterance to my regrets.

“Friends,” said I to the negroes who surrounded me, “it is a sad thing to die at twenty years of age, full of life and strength, when one is loved by one whom in your turn you adore, and when you leave behind you eyes that will ever weep for your untimely end.”

A mocking burst of laughter hailed my expression of regret. It came from the little Obi. This species of evil spirit, this living mystery, approached me roughly.

“Ha, ha, ha! you regret life then, Labadosea Dios! My only fear was that death would have no terrors for you.”

It was the same voice, the same laugh that had so often before baffled my conjectures. “Wretch!” exclaimed I, “who are you?”

“You are going to learn,” replied he, in a voice of concentrated passion; and thrusting aside the silver sun that half concealed his brown chest, he exclaimed, “Look!”

I bent forward. Two names were written in white letters on the hairy chest of the Obi, showing but too clearly the hideous and ineffaceable brand of the heated iron. One of these names was Effingham; the other was that of my uncle and myself, D’Auverney! I was struck dumb with surprise.

“Well, Leopold d’Auverney,” asked the Obi, “does not your name tell you mine?”

“No,” answered I, astonished to hear the man name me, and seeking to re-collect my thoughts. “These two names were only to be found thus united upon the chest of my uncle’s fool. But the poor dwarf is dead; and besides that, he was devotedly attached to us. You cannot be Habibrah.”

“No other!” shrieked he; and casting aside the blood-stained cap, he raised his veil and showed me the hideous features of the household fool. But a threatening and sinister expression had usurped the half-imbecile smile which was formerly eternally imprinted on his features.

“Great God!” exclaimed I, overwhelmed with surprise, “do all the dead, then, come back to life? It is Habibrah, my uncle’s fool!”

“His fool, and also his murderer.”

I recoiled from him in horror. “His murderer, wretch! Was it thus that you repaid his kindness—”

He interrupted me. “His kindness! rather say his insults.”

“What!” I again cried, “was it you, villain, who struck the fatal blow?”

“It was,” he replied, with a terrible expression upon his face. “I plunged my knife so deeply into his heart that he had hardly time to cast aside sleep before death claimed him. He cried out feebly, ‘Habibrah, come to me!’ but I was with him already!”

The cold-blooded manner in which he narrated the murder disgusted me. “Wretch! cowardly assassin! You forgot, then, all his kindness; that you ate at his table, and slept at the foot of his bed—”

“Like a dog!” interrupted Habibrah, roughly, “como un perro. I thought too much of what you call his kindness, but which I looked upon as insults. I took vengeance upon him, and I will do the same upon you. Listen: do you think that because I am a mulatto and a deformed dwarf that I am not a man? Ah, I have a soul stronger, deeper, and bolder than the one that I am about to set free from your girlish frame. I was given to your uncle as if I had been a pet monkey. I was his butt; I amused him, while he despised me. He loved me, do you say? Yes, forsooth; I had a place in his heart between his dog and his parrot; but I found a better place there with my dagger.”

I shuddered.

“Yes,” continued the dwarf, “it was I, I that did it all. Look me well in the face, Leopold d’Auverney: you have often laughed at me, now you shall tremble before me. And you dare to speak of your uncle’s liking for me — a liking that carried degradation with it. If I entered the room, a shout of contemptuous laughter was my greeting; my appearance, my deformities, my features, my costume — all furnished food for laughter to your accursed uncle and his accursed friends, while I was not allowed even to remain silent; it was necessary for me to join in the very laughter that was’ leveled at me! I foam with rage while I think of it. Answer me: do you think that after such humiliations I could feel anything but the deadliest hatred for the creature that inflicted them upon me? Do you not think that they were a thousand times harder to endure than the toil in the burning sun, the fetters, and the whip of the driver, which were the lot of the other slaves? Do you not think that they would cause ardent, implacable, and eternal hatred to spring up in the heart of man as lasting as the accursed brand which degrades my chest? Has not the vengeance that I have taken for my sufferings been short and insufficient? “Why could I not make my tyrant suffer something of what I endured for so many years? Why could he not before his death know the bitterness of wounded pride, and feel what burning traces the tears of shame leave upon a face condemned to wear a perpetual smile? Alas! it is too hard to have waited so long for the hour of vengeance, and then only to find it in a dagger thrust! Had he but known the hand that struck him, it would have been something; but I was too eager to hear his dying groan, and I drove the knife too quickly home: he died without having recognized me, and my eagerness balked my vengeance. This time, however, it shall be more complete. You see me, do you not? Though in point of fact you may be unable to recognize me in my new character. You have always been in the habit of seeing me laughing and joyous; but now nothing prevents me from letting my true nature appear on my face, and I do not greatly resemble my former self. You only knew my mask; look now upon my real face!”

At that moment his appearance was truly terrible. “Monster!” exclaimed I, “you deceive yourself; there is more of buffoonery than heroism in your face even now, and nothing in your heart but cruelty.”

“Do not speak of cruelty,” retorted he, “think of your uncle—”

“Wretch!” returned I, “if he were cruel, it was at your instigation. You, to pretend to pity the position of the poor slaves! Why, then, did you not exert all your influence to make their master treat them less harshly? Why did you never intercede in their favor?”

“I would not have done so for the world. Would I ever attempt to hinder a white man from blackening his soul by an act of cruelty? No, no! I urged him to inflict more and more punishment upon his slaves, so as to hurry on the revolt, and thus draw down a surer vengeance upon the heads of our oppressors. In seeming to injure my brethren I was serving them.”

I was thunderstruck at such a cunning act of diplomacy carried out by such a man.

“Well,” continued the dwarf, “do you believe now that I had the brain to conceive and the hand to execute? What do you think of Habibrah the buffoon? What do you think of your uncle’s ‘fool’?”

“Finish what you have begun so well,” replied I. “Let me die, but let there be no more delay.”

“And suppose I wish for delay? Suppose that it does my heart good to watch you in the agonies of suspense? You see Biassou owed me my share in the last plunder. When I saw you in our camp I asked for your life as my share, and he granted it willingly; and now you are mine, I am amusing myself with you. Soon you will follow the stream of the cataract into the abyss beneath; but before doing so, let me tell you that I have discovered the spot where your wife is concealed, and it was I that advised Biassou to set the forest on fire: the work, I imagine, is already begun. Thus your family will be swept from the face of the earth. Your uncle fell by steel, you will perish by water, and your Marie by fire!”

“Villain! villain!” I exclaimed, and I made an effort to seize him by the throat, but. a wave of his hand summoned my guards.

“Bind him!” cried he; “he precipitates his hour of doom!”

In dead silence the negroes began to bind me with the cords that they had carried with them. Suddenly I fancied that I heard the distant barking of a dog, but this sound might be only an illusion caused by the noise of the cascade.

The negroes had finished binding me, and placed me on the brink of the abyss into which I was so soon to be hurled. The dwarf, with folded arms, gazed upon the scene with a sinister expression of joy. I lifted my eyes to the opening in the roof so as to avoid the triumphant expression of malice painted on his countenance, and to take one last look at the blue sky.

At that instant the barking was more distinctly heard, and the enormous head of Rask appeared at the opening. I trembled.

The dwarf exclaimed, “Finish with him!” and the negroes, who had not noticed the dog, raised me in their arms to hurl me into the hell of waters which roared and foamed beneath me.

CHAPTER FIFTY

“COMRADES!” cried a voice of thunder.

All looked at the spot from whence the sound proceeded. Bug-Jargal was standing on the edge of the opening, a crimson plume floating on his head.

“Comrades,” repeated he, “stay your hands!”

The negroes prostrated themselves upon the earth in token of submission.

“I am Bug-Jargal!” continued he.

The negroes struck the earth with their heads, uttering cries the meaning of which I could not comprehend.

“Unbind the prisoner!? commanded the chief.

But now the dwarf appeared to recover from the stupor into which the sudden appearance of Bug-Jargal had thrown him, and he seized by the arm the negro who was preparing to cut the cords that bound me. “What is the meaning of this? What are you doing?” cried he.

Then, raising his voice, he addressed Bug-Jargal: “Chief of Morne-Rouge,” cried he, “what are you doing here?”

“I have come to command my own men,” was the reply.

“Yes,” answered the dwarf, in tones of concentrated passion, “these negroes do certainly belong to your band; but,” added he, raising his voice again, “by what right do you interfere with my prisoner?”

The chief answered, “I am Bug-Jargal!” and again the negroes struck the ground with their foreheads.

“Bug-Jargal,” continued Habibrah, “cannot contravene the orders of Biassou. This white man was given to me by Biassou; I desire his death, and die he shall. Obey me,” he added, turning to the negroes, “and hurl him into the abyss!”

At the well-known voice of the Obi the negroes rose to their feet and took a step toward me. I thought all was lost.

“Unbind the prisoner!” cried Bug-Jargal again.

In an instant I was free. My surprise was equaled by the fury of the Obi. He attempted to throw himself upon me. The negroes interfered; then he burst out into imprecations and threats.

“Demonios! rabia! inferno de mi alma! How, wretches, you refuse to obey me? Do you not recognize my voice? “Why did I lose time in talking to this accursed one? I ought to have had him hurled without delay to the fishes of the gulf. By wishing to make my vengeance more complete I have lost it altogether. Orabia de Satan. Listen to me: if you do not obey me, and hurl him into the abyss, I will curse you; your hair shall grow white, the mosquitoes and sandflies shall eat you up alive; your legs and your arms shall bend like reeds; your breath shall burn your throat like red-hot sand; you shall die young, and after your death your spirit shall be compelled to "turn a millstone as big as a mountain, in the moon where it is always cold!"

The scene was a strange one. I was the only one of my color in a damp and gloomy cavern surrounded by negroes with the aspect of demons, balanced as it were upon the edge of a bottomless gulf, and every now and then threatened by a deformed dwarf, by a hideous sorcerer upon whose striped garments and pointed cap the fading light shone faintly, yet protected by a tall negro who was standing at the only point from which daylight could be seen. It appeared to me almost that I was at the gates of hell, awaiting the conflict between my good and evil angels, to result in the salvation or the destruction of my soul. The negroes appeared to be terrified at the threats of the Obi, and he endeavored to profit by their indecision.

"I desire the death of the white man, and he shall die; obey me!"

Bug-Jargal replied solemnly: "He shall live! I am Bug-Jargal; my father was the King of Kakongo who dispensed justice at the gate of his palace."

Again the negroes cast themselves upon the ground.

The chief continued: "Brethren, go and tell Biassou not to unfurl the black banner upon the mountain-top which should announce to the whites the signal of this man's death, for. he was the savior of Bug-Jargal's life, and Bug-Jargal wills that he should live."

They rose up. Bug-Jargal threw his red plume on the ground before them. The chief of the guard picked it up with every show of respect, and they left the cavern without a word. The Obi, with a glance of rage, followed them down the subterranean avenue.

I will not attempt to describe my feelings at that moment. I fixed my eyes, wet with tears, upon Pierrot, who gazed upon me with a singular expression of love and tenderness.

"God be praised," said he, "you are saved! Brother, go back by the road by which you entered; you will meet me again in the valley."

He waved his hand to me and disappeared from my sight.

CHAPTER FIFTY-ONE

EAGER to arrive at the appointed meeting-place, and to learn by what fortunate means my savior had been enabled to make his appearance at so opportune a moment, I prepared to leave the cavern in which my nerves had been so severely tried; but as I prepared to enter the subterranean passage an unexpected obstacle presented itself in my path. It was Habibrah!

The revengeful Obi had not in reality followed the negroes as I had believed, but had concealed himself behind a rocky projection of the cave, waiting for a propitious moment for his vengeance; and this moment had come. He laughed bitterly as he showed himself. A dagger, the same that he was in the habit of using for a crucifix, shone in his right hand. At the sight of it I recoiled a step.

"Ha, accursed one! did you think to escape me? But the fool is not such a fool after all! I have you, and this time there shall be no delay. Your friend Bug-Jargal shall not wait for you long — you shall soon be at the meeting-place; but it will be the wave of the cataract that shall bear you there."

As he spoke he dashed at me with uplifted weapon.

"Monster!" cried I, retreating to the platform, "just now you were only an executioner; now you are a murderer."

"I am an avenger!" returned he, grinding his teeth.

I was on the edge of the precipice; he endeavored to hurl me over with a blow of his dagger. I avoided it. His foot slipped on the treacherous moss which covered the rocks, and he rolled into the slope polished and rounded by the constant flow of water.

"A thousand devils!" roared he.

He had fallen into the abyss. I have already mentioned that the roots of the old tree projected through the crevices of the rocks, a little below the edge of the precipice. In his fall the dwarf struck against these, and his striped petticoat caught in them; he grasped at them as a last hope of safety, and clung to them with all the energy of despair. His pointed bonnet fell from his head; to maintain his position he had to let go his dagger, and the two together disappeared in the depths of the abyss.

Habibrah, suspended over the terrible gulf, strove vainly to regain the platform, but his short arms could not reach the rocky edge, and he broke his nails in useless efforts to obtain a hold on the muddy surface of the rocks which sloped down into the terrible abyss. He howled with rage. The slightest push on my part would have been sufficient to hurl him to destruction; but such an act would have been one of cowardice, and I made no movement. This moderation on my part seemed to surprise him. Thanking Heaven for its mercies, I determined to abandon him to his fate, and was about to leave the cave, when, in a voice broken with fear, and which appeared to come from the depths of the abyss, be addressed me.

"Master," cried he, "master, do not go, for pity's sake! Do not, in the name of Heaven, leave a guilty creature to perish whom it is in your power to save! Alas! my strength is failing me; the roots bend and slip through my fingers; the weight of my body drags me down: I must let go, or my arms will break! Alas! master, the fearful gulf boils and seethes beneath me! Nombre santo de Dios! Have you no pity for the poor fool? He has been very guilty, but prove that the white men are better than the mulattoes, the masters than the slaves, by saving him!"

I approached the brink of the precipice, and the feeble light that broke through the aperture in the roof showed me on the repulsive features of the dwarf an expression which I had never noticed before — that of prayer and supplication.

"Senor Leopold," continued he, encouraged by the movement of pity that I showed, "can you see a fellow-creature in so terrible a position of peril, without stretching out a hand to save him? Give me your hand, master; with very slight assistance from you I can save myself: I only ask for a little help. Help me then, and my gratitude shall be as great as my crimes!"

I interrupted him. "Unhappy wretch, do not recall them to my memory."

"It is because I repent of them that I do so. Oh, be generous to me! Oh, heavens, my hand relaxes its grasp, and I fall! Ay desdichado! Your hand, your hand! in the name of the mother who bore you, give me your hand!"

I cannot describe the tone of agony in which he pleaded for help. In this moment of peril I forgot all; he was no longer an enemy, a traitor, and an assassin, but an unhappy fellow-creature, whom a slight exertion upon my part could rescue from a frightful death. He implored me in heart-rending accents. Reproaches would have been fruitless and out of place. The necessity for help was urgent and immediate. I stooped, knelt down on the brink of the precipice, and grasping the trunk of the tree with one hand, I extended the other to Habibrah.

As soon as it was within his reach, he grasped it with both his hands, and hung on to it with all his strength. Far from attempting to aid “ me in my efforts to draw him up, I felt that he was exerting all his powers to draw me down with him into the abyss. If it had not been for the assistance afforded to me by the trunk of the tree, I must infallibly have been “dragged over by the violent and unexpected jerk that the wretched man gave me.

“Villain!” cried I, “what are you doing?”

“Avenging myself!” answered he, with a peal of devilish laughter. “Aha, madman! have I got you in my clutches once more? You have of your own free-will placed yourself again in my power, and I hold you tight. You were saved and I was lost; and yet you of your own accord place your head between the jaws of the alligator, because it wept after having roared. I can bear death, since it will give me revenge. You are caught in the trap, amigo, and I shall take a companion with me to feed the fishes of the lake.”

“Ah, traitor!” cried I, struggling with all my strength, “is it thus that you serve me when I was trying to save you?”

“Yes,” hissed he. “I know that we could have saved ourselves together, but I would rather that we should die at the same moment.

I had rather compass your death than save my life. Come down!”

As he spoke, his brown muscular hands renewed their grasp upon mine with unexpected strength; his eyes blazed, his mouth foamed. The strength, the departure of which he had before so piteously bewailed, had returned to him, increased a thousand-fold by the hope of revenge. His feet were planted like two perpendicular levers on a ledge of rock, and he struggled like a tiger against the root which, entangled in his clothes, supported him in spite of himself; for he was endeavoring with all his might to shake himself free, so as to bring all his weight to bear on me, and to drag me more quickly into the yawning gulf below. In his rage he endeavored to bite me, while his hideous features were rendered more terrible by their expression of satanic frenzy. He looked like the demon of the cave seeking to drag down his victim to his abode of gloom and darkness.

One of my knees, by good fortune, was planted in a groove of the rock, and my arm was wound round the trunk of the tree, and I strove against the efforts of the dwarf with all the strength that the feeling of self-preservation could give me at such a moment. Every now and then I drew a long breath, and shouted “Bug-Jargal!” with all the force of my lungs. But the roar of the cascade and the distance that he must be off gave me but faint hopes of my voice reaching him.

The dwarf, who had not anticipated so vigorous a resistance on my part, redoubled his efforts. I began to grow weak, though in reality the struggle had not taken so long as the narration of it. A violent pain paralyzed my arm, my sight grew dim, bright sparks flashed before my eyes, and a buzzing sound filled my ears. I heard the creaking of the root as it bent, mingled with the laugh of the monster, and the abyss seemed to rise up toward me as though eager to engulf its prey. But before I gave up all hope I made a last effort, and collecting together my exhausted forces, I once again shouted, “Bug-Jargal!”

A loud bark replied to me; it was Rask who thus answered my appeal for help. I glanced upward: Bug-Jargal and his dog were gazing at me from the orifice in the roof. He saw my danger at once. “Hold on!” cried he.

Habibrah, fearing that I might yet be saved, foamed with rage; and crying, “Come down there! come down!” he renewed the attack with almost supernatural vigor.

At this moment, weakened by the long struggle, my arm lost its hold of the tree. All seemed over with me, when I felt myself seized from behind. It was Rask! At a sign from his master he had leaped down on the platform, and seized me by the skirts of my uniform with his powerful teeth.

This unlooked-for aid saved me. Habibrah had exhausted all his strength in a last convulsive effort; while I put forth all mine, and succeeded in withdrawing my hand from his cramped and swollen fingers. The root, which had been for some time yielding, now parted suddenly; Rask gave me a violent pull backward, and the wretched dwarf disappeared in the foam of the cascade, hurling a curse at me which was swallowed up with him in the whirl of waters.

Such was the terrible end of my uncle’s fool.

CHAPTER FIFTY-TWO

THE excitement of the last few hours, the terrible struggle and its awful conclusion, had utterly exhausted me; and I lay where I had fallen, almost deprived of sense or power of motion. The voice of Bug-Jargal restored me to myself.

“Brother,” cried he, “hasten to leave this place. In half an hour the sun will have set; I will meet you in the valley. Follow Rask.”

The words of my friend restored hope, strength, and courage to me. I rose to my feet. The great dog ran rapidly down the subterranean passage; 1 followed him, his bark guiding me through the darkness. After a time I saw a streak of light, and in a few minutes I gained the entrance, and breathed more freely as I passed through the archway. As I left the damp and gloomy vault behind me, I recalled to my mind the prediction of the dwarf, and its fatal fulfillment, “One only of us shall return by this road!” His attempt had failed, but the prophecy had been carried out.

CHAPTER FIFTY-THREE

BUG-JARGAL was waiting for me in the valley. I threw myself into his arms; but I had so many questions to put to him that I could not find words in which to express them.

"Listen to me," said he. "Your wife, my sister, is in safety in the camp of the white men; I handed her over to a relative of yours who was in command of the outposts, and I wished again to constitute myself a prisoner, lest they should execute the ten prisoners whose lives were security for my reappearance. But your relative told me to return, and, if possible, to prevent your execution; and that the ten negroes should not be executed until Biassou should announce the fact by displaying a black flag on one of the highest peaks of the mountains. Then I returned to do my best. Rask led me to where you were; thanks be to Heaven, I arrived in time! You will live, and so shall I."

He extended his hand to me, adding, "Brother, are you satisfied?"

I again clasped him to my breast; I entreated him not to leave me again, but to remain with the white troops, and I promised him to exert all my influence to procure him a commission in the colonial army.

But he interrupted me with an angry air. "Brother," asked he, "do I propose to you to join my army?"

I kept silence, for I felt that I had been guilty of a folly; then he added in a tone of affected gayety:

"Come, let us hurry to the camp to reassure your wife."

This proposal was what I most ardently desired; we started at once. The negro knew the way, and took the lead; Rask followed us.

Here D'Auverney stopped suddenly, and cast a gloomy look around him; perspiration in large beads covered his forehead; he concealed his face with his hands. Rask looked at him with an air of uneasiness.

"Yes, you may well look at me like that," murmured he.

An instant afterward he rose from his seat in a state of violent agitation, and followed by the sergeant and the dog, rushed hurriedly from the tent.

CHAPTER FIFTY-FOUR

"I WILL lay a bet," said Henri, "that we are nearing the end of the drama; and I should really feel sorry if anything happened to Bug-Jargal, for he was truly a famous fellow."

Paschal removed from his lips the mouth of his wicker-covered flask, and said, " I would give twelve dozen of port to have seen the cocoanut cup that he emptied at a draught."

Alfred, who was gently humming the air of a love-song, interrupted himself by asking Henri to tie his aguilettes; then he added: "The negro interests me very much, but I have not dared to ask D'Auverney if he knew the air of 'Beautiful Padilla.'"

"What a villain that Biassou was!" continued Paschal; "but for all that he knew the value of a Frenchman's word! There are, however, people more pitiless than Biassou — my creditors, for instance."

"But what do you think of D'Auverney's story?" asked Henri.

"Ma foi," answered Alfred, "I have not paid much attention to it; but I certainly had expected something more interesting from D'Auverney's lips; and then I want to know the air to which Bug-Jargal sang his songs. In fact, I must admit that the story has bored me a little."

"You are right," returned Paschal, the aid-de-camp. "Had I not had my pipe and my bottle, I should have passed but a dreary evening. Besides, there were a lot of absurdities in it: how can we believe, for instance, that that little thief of a sorcerer (I forget his name) would have drowned himself for the sake of destroying his enemy?"

Henri interrupted him with a smile. "You cannot understand any one taking to water, can you, Captain Paschal? But what struck me more than anything was, that every time D'Auverney mentioned the name of Bug-Jargal, his lame dog lifted up his head."

The sound of the sentry carrying arms warned them of D'Auverney's return. All remained silent. He walked up and down the tent for a few moments with folded arms, without a word.

Old Sergeant Thaddeus, who had returned with his captain, bent over Rask and furtively caressed him, hoping by that means to conceal his countenance, which was full of anxiety, from the eyes of his officer. At length, after making a strong effort, D'Auverney continued his narrative.

CHAPTER FIFTY-FIVE

RASK followed us. The highest rock in the valley was not yet lighted by the rays of the sun; a glimmer of light touched it for an instant, and then passed away.

The negro trembled, and grasped my hand firmly. “Listen,” said he.

A dull sound like the discharge of a piece of artillery was heard, and was repeated by the echoes of the valleys.

“It is the signal,” said the negro in a gloomy voice. “It was a cannon shot, was it not?”

I nodded in sign of the affirmative.

In two bounds he sprang to the top of a lofty rock; I followed him. He crossed his arms and smiled sadly. “Do you see that?” asked he.

I looked in the direction to which he pointed; and on the lofty peak to which he had drawn my attention during our last interview with Marie, and which was now glowing in the rays of the setting sun, I saw a huge black flag, its folds flapping idly in the breeze.

[At this point of his recital D’Auverney again paused.]

I learned afterward that Biassou, in a hurry to leave his ground, had ordered the flag to be hoisted without waiting for the return of the negroes who had been dispatched to assist at my execution.

Bug-Jargal was still in the same position, his arms folded, and his eyes eagerly fixed upon the fatal signal. Suddenly he started, and seemed about to descend from his post of observation. “Great heavens! my unfortunate comrades!” cried he. “Did you hear that gun?”

I made no reply.

“It was the signal, my brother. They are leading them now to the place of execution.”

His head fell upon his breast; after a short pause, he said: “Go, brother, and rejoin your wife; Rask will guide you to her;” and he whistled an African air, which Rask appeared to recognize, for he wagged his tail and seemed ready to set, out.

Bug-Jargal grasped my hand, and strove to smile; but his features were contracted, and his look was ghastly. “Farewell forever!” cried he, and dashed into the thicket by which we were surrounded.

I remained motionless; the little that I understood of the position made me fear the worst.

Rask, on seeing his master disappear, advanced to the edge of the rock, and raising his head uttered a plaintive howl. Then he turned to me; his tail was between his legs and his eyes were moist. He looked at me with an air of inquietude, and turned to the spot from which his master had disappeared, and barked several times. I understood him, and shared his fears. Suddenly he dashed off in pursuit of his master, and I should soon have lost sight of him had he not every now and then halted to give me time to come up to him. In this manner we passed through many a valley and leafy glade; we climbed hills and crossed streams. At last —

D'Auverney's voice failed him, an expression of despair covered his face, and he could not find words to continue his narrative. "Continue it, Thaddeus," said he, "for I can go on no further."

The old sergeant was not less distressed than his captain, but he made an effort to obey him.

"With your permission, gentlemen," said he, "and since it is your wish, Captain, I must tell you, gentlemen, that Bug-Jargal (otherwise called Pierrot) was a tall negro, very strong, very gentle, and the bravest man in the world — except you, Captain, if you please. But I was terribly prejudiced against him — for which I will never pardon myself, though you, Captain, have forgiven me — so much so, that when we heard that your execution had been fixed for the evening of the second day I flew into a furious rage with the poor fellow, and felt a fiendish pleasure in informing him that his death would pay for yours, or that if he escaped ten of his men would be shot by way of reprisal. He said nothing upon hearing this, but an hour afterward he made his escape through a great hole which he pierced in the wall of his prison."

"Well, when we, saw the great black flag hoisted on the mountain, and as the negro had not returned — a fact which surprised none of us — our officers ordered the signal gun to be fired, and I was directed to conduct the ten negroes to the place of execution, which was a spot we call the Devil’s Mouth, about — but it does not matter how far it was from the camp. Well, as you can imagine, we did not take them there to set them at liberty. I had them bound, as is the custom, and paraded my firing party, when who should burst upon us but the tall negro. He was out of breath with the speed that he had made.

“‘Good-evening, Thaddeus,’ said he. ‘I am in time.’

“No, gentlemen, he did not utter another word, but hastened to unbind his comrades. I stood there in stupefaction. Then (with your permission, Captain) there was a good deal of generous argument between the other negroes and himself, which might have lasted longer, but — well, it is no good hiding the fact, it was I that stopped it. At any rate he took their place. Then the great dog came, poor Rask! He leaped at my throat: he ought to have held me longer, but Pierrot made a sign to him, and the poor brute released me; but he could not be prevented from taking his place at his master’s feet. Then, believing that you were dead, Captain — well, I was in a fine rage. I gave the word; Bug-Jargal fell, and a bullet broke the dog’s foot.

“Since that time, gentlemen,” continued the sergeant, sadly, “Rask has been lame. Then I heard groans in the adjacent wood; I reached it, and found you: a stray bullet had hit you as you were running forward to save the tall negro. Yes, Captain, you were wounded, but Bug-Jargal was dead!

“We carried you back to the camp; you were not dangerously wounded, and the doctors soon cured you; but I believe Madame Marie’s nursing had a good deal to do with it.”

The sergeant stopped in his story, and D’Auverney, in a solemn voice, added: “Bug-Jargal was dead!”

Thaddeus bowed his head. “Yes,” said he, “he spared my life, and I — I killed him.”

EPILOGUE

THE reader, in general, is seldom satisfied with the conclusion of a narrative unless it enters into every detail in winding up the story. For this reason the minutest researches have been made into the facts having reference to the concluding details of the last scenes of Leopold D'Auverney's life, as well as those of his sergeant and the dog Rask.

The reader is already aware that the captain's feelings of melancholy arose partly from the death of Bug-Jargal, otherwise called Pierrot; but he is not acquainted with the fact that those feelings were terribly increased by the loss of his beloved Marie — who, after having been preserved from the horrors that attended the taking of Fort Galifet, perished in the burning of Cap, which took place some weeks later.

The fate of Leopold d'Auverney may be briefly recapitulated. A great victory had been won by the Republican forces against one of those united European armies which so often struggled vainly against our soldiers; and the General of Division, who was in command of the entire force, was seated in his tent drawing up, from the reports of his staff, the bulletin which was to be sent to the National Convention concerning the victory of the day before. As he was thus occupied, an aid-de-camp announced to him the arrival of a Representative of the People, who demanded an audience. The general loathed these embassadors of the guillotine, who were sent by the party of the Mountain to humiliate the military officers, and too often to demand the heads of the most gallant of the men who had fought bravely for the Republic — looking upon them as chartered informers charged with the hateful mission of spying upon glory. But it would have been dangerous for him to refuse to admit him, especially after such a victory as had resulted to the arms of the Republic. The gory" idol which France had then set up almost invariably demanded victims of the highest lineage; and the executioners of the Place de la Revolution were delighted if they could at the same time cause a head and a coronet to fall — were it one of thorns, like that of Louis XVI.; of flowers, like those of the girls of Verdun; or of laurels, like those of Custine or of Andre Chenier. The general, therefore, gave immediate orders that the Representative of the People should be introduced to his presence.

After a few clumsy congratulations regarding the recent victory, the Representative of the People came up close to the general, and muttered in a suppressed voice; “But this is not all, Citizen General; it is not enough to destroy the foreign enemy — those nearer home must be also crushed.”

“What do you mean, Citizen Representative?” asked the astonished general.

“There is in your division,” answered the emissary of the Convention, in an unpleasant manner, “à captain named Leopold d’Auverney, who is serving in the Thirty-second Brigade; do you know him, General?”

“Know him! certainly I do,” replied the general; “only as you came in I was reading the report of the adjutant-general which refers to him. The Thirty-second Brigade had in him an excellent officer, and I was about to recommend him for promotion.”

“What, Citizen General!” interposed the representative, harshly, “were you thinking of promoting him?”

“Such was most certainly my intention, citizen.”

“Victory has blinded you, General,” cried the representative, imperiously; “take care what you say or do. If you cherish serpents who are the enemies of the people, take care that the people do not crush you and the serpents at the same moment. This Leopold d’Auverney is an aristocrat, a hater of the revolution, a royalist, a Girondin! Public justice demands his head, and he must be given up to me on the spot.”

“I cannot do so,” replied the general, coldly.

“How! you cannot do so?” shouted the representative, whose rage was redoubled at this opposition. “Are you ignorant, General, of the extent of my power? I, in the name of the Republic, command you, and you have no option but to obey. Listen to me: in consideration of your recent success, I will read you the report which has been handed in regarding this D’Auverney, and which I shall send with him to the Public Prosecutor: ‘Leopold Auverney (formerly known as D’Auverney), captain in the Thirty-second Brigade, is convicted of having, at a meeting of conspirators, narrated an anti-revolutionary tale, conducing to the ridicule of the true principles of Equality and Liberty, and exalting the worn-out superstitions known under the names of royalty and religion; convicted, secondly, of having used expressions deservedly forbidden by all good republicans, to describe certain recent events, notably those referring to the negroes of St. Domingo; convicted, thirdly, of having made use of the expression Monsieur instead of Citizen during the whole of his narrative; and, by the said narrative, of having endeavored to bring into contempt the Republic one and indivisible, and also to propagate the infamous doctrines of the Girondins.’ Death is the punishment for these crimes, and I demand his body. Do you hesitate, General, to hand this traitor over to me, to meet the well-merited punishment of his crimes?”

“Citizen,” answered the general, with dignity, “this enemy of his country has given his life for her. As a contrast to your report, listen to an extract from mine: ‘Leopold d’Auverney, captain in the Thirty-second Brigade, has contributed largely to the success that our arms have obtained. A formidable earthwork had been erected by the allies; it was the key to their position, and it was absolutely necessary to carry it at the point of the bayonet. It was an almost impregnable position, and the death of the stormers who led the attack was almost inevitable. Captain d’Auverney volunteered to lead the forlorn hope; he carried the earthwork, but was shot down at the moment of victory. Sergeant Thaddeus of the Thirty-second, and a large dog were found dead within a few paces of him.’ It was my intention to propose that the National Convention should pass a vote that Captain Leopold d’Auverney had merited the thanks of his country. You see, Citizen Representative,” continued the general, calmly, “that our duties differ slightly. We both send a report to the Convention. The same name appears in each list: you denounce him as a traitor, I hold him up to posterity as a hero; you devote him to ignominy, I to glory; you would erect a scaffold for him, while I propose a statue in his honor. He is fortunate in having, by death in action, escaped the infamy you proposed for him. He whose death you desired is dead; he has not waited for you.”

Furious at seeing his conspiracy disappear with the conspirator, the Representative muttered, “Dead, is he? More’s the pity!”

The general caught his words, and in indignant tones exclaimed: “There is still something left for you, Citizen Representative. Go seek for the body of Captain d’Auverney among the ruins of the redoubt. Who can tell if the bullets of the enemy may not have spared his head for his country’s guillotine?”

PREFACE DE L’EDITION ORIGINALE

L’épisode qu’on va lire, et dont le fond est emprunté à la révolte des esclaves de Saint-Domingue en 1791, a un air de circonstance qui eût suffi pour empêcher l’auteur de le publier. Cependant une ébauche de cet opuscule ayant été déjà imprimée et distribuée à un nombre restreint d’exemplaires, en 1820, à une époque où la politique du jour s’occupait fort peu d’Haïti, il est évident que si le sujet qu’il traite a pris depuis un nouveau degré d’intérêt, ce n’est pas la faute de l’auteur. Ce sont les événements qui se sont arrangés pour le livre, et non le livre pour les événements.

Quoi qu’il en soit, l’auteur ne songeait pas à tirer cet ouvrage de l’espèce de demi-jour où il était comme enseveli; mais, averti qu’un libraire de la capitale se proposait de réimprimer son esquisse anonyme, il a cru devoir prévenir cette réimpression en mettant lui-même au jour son travail revu et en quelque sorte refait, précaution qui épargne un ennui à son amour-propre d’auteur, et au libraire susdit une mauvaise spéculation.

Plusieurs personnes distinguées qui, soit comme colons, soit comme fonctionnaires, ont été mêlées aux troubles de Saint-Domingue, ayant appris la prochaine publication de cet épisode. ont bien voulu communiquer spontanément à l’auteur des matériaux d’autant plus précieux qu’ils sont presque tous inédits, l’auteur leur en témoigne ici sa vive reconnaissance. Ces documents lui ont été singulièrement utiles pour rectifier ce que le récit du capitaine d’Auverney présentait d’incomplet sous le rapport de la couleur locale, et d’incertain relativement à la vérité historique.

Enfin, il doit encore prévenir les lecteurs que l’histoire de Bug-Jargal n’est qu’un fragment d’un ouvrage plus étendu, qui devait être composé avec le titre de Contes sous la tente. L’auteur suppose que, pendant les guerres de la révolution, plusieurs officiers français conviennent entre eux d’occuper chacun à leur tour la longueur des nuits du bivouac par le récit de quelqu’une de leurs aventures. L’épisode que l’on publie ici faisait partie de cette série de narrations; il peut en être détaché sans inconvénient; et d’ailleurs l’ouvrage dont il devrait faire partie n’est point fini, ne le sera jamais, et ne vaut pas la peine de l’être.

PRÉFACE DE 1832.

En 1818, l'auteur de ce livre avait seize ans; il paria qu'il écrirait un volume en quinze jours. Il fit Bug-Jargal. Seize ans, c'est l'âge où l'on parie pour tout et où l'on improvise sur tout.

Ce livre a donc été écrit deux ans avant Han d'Islande. Et quoique, sept ans plus tard, en 1825, l'auteur l'ait remanié et récrit en grande partie, il n'en est pas moins, et par le fond et par beaucoup de détails, le premier ouvrage de l'auteur.

Il demande pardon à ses lecteurs de les entretenir de détails si peu importants; mais il a cru que le petit nombre de personnes qui aiment à classer par rang de taille et par ordre de naissance les œuvres d'un poëte, si obscur qu'il soit, ne lui sauraient pas mauvais gré de leur donner l'âge de Bug-Jargal; et, quant à lui, comme ces voyageurs qui se retournent au milieu de leur chemin et cherchent à découvrir encore dans les plis brumeux de l'horizon le lieu d'où ils sont partis, il a voulu donner ici un souvenir à cette époque de sérénité, d'audace et de confiance, où il abordait de front un si immense sujet, la révolte des noirs de Saint-Domingue en 1791, lutte de géants, trois mondes intéressés dans la question, l'Europe et l'Afrique pour combattants, l'Amérique pour champ de bataille.

I

Quand vint le tour du capitaine Léopold d’Auverney, il ouvrit de grands yeux et avoua à ces messieurs qu’il ne connaissait réellement aucun événement de sa vie qui méritât de fixer leur attention.

Mais, capitaine, lui dit le lieutenant Henri, vous avez pourtant, dit-on, voyagé et vu le monde. N’avez-vous pas visité les Antilles. l’Afrique et l’Italie, l’Espagne? Ah! capitaine, votre chien boiteux!

D’Auverney tressaillit, laissa tomber son cigare, et se retourna brusquement vers l’entrée de la tente, au moment ou un chien énorme accourait en boitant vers lui.

Le chien écrasa en passant le cigare du capitaine; le capitaine n’y fit nulle attention.

Le chien lui lécha les pieds, le flatta avec sa queue, jappa, gambada de son mieux, puis vint se coucher devant lui. Le capitaine, ému, oppressé, le caressait machinalement de la main gauche, en détachant de l’autre la mentonnière de son casque, et répétait de temps en temps: — Te voilà. Rask! te voilà! — Enfin il s’écria: — Mais qui donc t’a ramené?

— Avec votre permission, mon capitaine…

Depuis quelques minutes, le sergent Thadée avait soulevé le rideau de la tente, et se tenait debout, le bras droit enveloppé dans sa redingote, les larmes aux yeux, et contemplant en silence le dénouement de l’odyssée. Il hasarda à la fin ces paroles: Avec votre permission. mon capitaine… D’Auverney leva les yeux.

— C’est toi, Thad; et comment diable as-tu pu?… Pauvre chien! je le croyais dans le camp anglais. Où donc l’as-tu trouvé?

— Dieu merci! vous m’en voyez, mon capitaine, aussi joyeux que monsieur votre neveu. quand vous lui faisiez décliner cornu, la corne; cornu, de la corne…

— Mais dis-moi donc où tu l’as trouvé?

— Je ne l’ai pas trouvé, mon capitaine, j’ai bien été le chercher.

Le capitaine se leva, et tendit la main au sergent; mais la main du sergent resta enveloppée dans sa redingote. Le capitaine n’y prit point garde.

— C’est que, voyez-vous, mon capitaine, depuis que ce pauvre Rask s’est perdu, je me suis bien aperçu, avec votre permission, s’il vous plaît, qu’il vous manquait quelque chose. Pour tout vous dire, je crois que le soir où il ne vint pas, comme à l'ordinaire, partager mon pain de munition, peu s'en fallut que le deux Thad ne se prît à pleurer comme un enfant. Mais non, Dieu merci, je n'ai pleuré que deux fois dans ma vie: la première, quand… le jour où… — Et le sergent regardait son maître avec inquiétude. — La seconde, lorsqu'il prit l'idée à ce drôle de Balthazar, caporal dans la septième demi-brigade, de me faire éplucher une botte d'oignons.

— Il me semble, Thadée, s'écria en riant Henri, que vous ne dites pas à quelle occasion vous pleurâtes pour la première fois.

— C'est sans doute, mon vieux, quand tu reçus l'accolade de La Tour d'Auvergne, premier grenadier de France? demanda avec affection le capitaine, continuant à caresser le chien.

— Non, mon capitaine; si le sergent Thadée a pu pleurer, ce n'a pu être, et vous en conviendrez, que le jour où il a crié feu sur Bug-Jargal, autrement dit Pierrot.

Un nuage se répandit sur tous les traits de d'Auverney. Il s'approcha vivement du sergent, et voulut lui serrer la main; mais malgré un tel excès d'honneur, le vieux Thadée la retint sous sa capote.

— Oui, mon capitaine, continua Thadée, en reculant de quelques pas, tandis que d'Auverney fixait sur lui des regards plans d'une expression pénible; oui. j'ai pleuré cette fois-là; aussi, vraiment, il le méritait bien! Il était noir, cela est vrai mais la poudre à canon est noire aussi, et.., et…

Le bon sergent aurait bien voulu achever honorablement sa bizarre comparaison. Il y avait peut-être quelque chose dans ce rapprochement qui plaisait à sa pensée; mais il essaya inutilement de l'exprimer; et après avoir plusieurs fois attaqué, pour ainsi dire, son idée dans tous les sens, comme un général d'armée qui échoue contre une place forte, il en leva brusquement le siège, et poursuivit sans prendre garde au sourire des jeunes officiers qui l'écoutaient:

— Dites, mon capitaine, vous souvient-il de ce pauvre nègre; quand il arriva tout essoufflé, à l'instant même où ses dix camarades étaient là? Vraiment, il avait bien fallu les lier. — C'était moi qui commandais. Et quand il les détacha lui — même pour reprendre leur place, quoiqu'ils ne le voulussent pas. Mais il fut inflexible. Oh! quel homme! c'était un vrai Gibraltar. Et puis, dites, mon capitaine? quand il se tenait là, droit comme s'il allait entrer en danse, et son chien, le même Rask qui est ici, qui comprit ce qu'on allait lui faire, et qui me sauta à la gorge…

— Ordinairement. Thad, interrompit le capitaine, tu ne laissais point passer cet endroit de ton récit sans faire quelques caresses à Rask; vois comme il te regarde.

— Vous avez raison, dit Thadée avec embarras; il me regarde, ce pauvre Rask; mais… la vieille Malagrida m'a dit que caresser de la main gauche porte malheur.

— Et pourquoi pas la main droite?, demanda d'Auverney avec surprise, et remarquant pour la première fois la main enveloppée dans la redingote, et la pâleur répandue sur le visage de Thad.

Le trouble du sergent parut redoubler.

— Avec votre permission, mon capitaine, c'est que… vous avez déjà un chien boiteux, je crains que vous ne finissiez par avoir aussi un sergent manchot.

Le capitaine s'élança de son siège.

— Comment? quoi? que dis-tu, mon vieux Thadée? manchot! — Voyons ton bras. Manchot, grand Dieu!

D'Auverney tremblait; le sergent déroula lentement son manteau, et offrit aux yeux de son chef son bras enveloppé d'un mouchoir ensanglanté.

— Hé! mon Dieu! murmura le capitaine en soulevant le linge avec précaution. Mais dis-moi donc, mon ancien?…

— Oh! la chose est toute simple. Je vous ai dit que j'avais remarqué votre chagrin depuis que ces maudits Anglais nous avaient enlevé votre beau chien, ce pauvre Rask, le dogue de Bug… Il suffit. Je résolus aujourd'hui de le ramener, dût-il m'en coûter la vie, afin de souper ce soir de bon appétit. C'est pourquoi. après avoir recommandé à Mathelet, votre soldat, de bien brosser votre grand uniforme, parce que c'est demain jour de bataille. Je me suis esquivé tout doucement du camp, armé seulement de mon sabre; et j'ai pris à travers les haies pour être plus tôt au camp des Anglais. Je n'étais pas encore aux premiers retranchements quand, avec votre permission, mon capitaine, dans un petit bois sur la gauche, j'ai vu un grand attroupement de soldats rouges. Je me suis avancé pour flairer ce que c'était, et, comme ils ne prenaient pas garde à moi, j'ai aperçu au milieu d'eux Rask attaché à un arbre, tandis que deux milords, nus jusqu'ici comme des païens, ce donnaient sur les os de grands coups de poing qui faisaient autant de bruit que la grosse caisse d'une demi-brigade. C'étaient deux particuliers anglais, s'il vous plaît, qui se battaient en duel pour votre chien. Mais voilà Rask qui me voit, et qui donne un tel coup de collier que la corde casse, et que le drôle est en un clin d'oeil sur mes trousses. Vous pensez bien que toute l'autre bande ne reste pas en arrière. Je m'enfonce dans le bois. Rask me suit. Plusieurs balles sifflent à mes oreilles. Rask aboyait: mais heureusement ils ne pouvaient l'entendre à cause de leurs cris de French dog! French dog! comme si votre chien n'était pas un beau et bon chien de Saint — Domingue. N'importe, je traverse le hallier, et j'étais près d'en sortir quand deux rouges se présentent devant moi. Mon sabre me débarrasse de l'un, et m'aurait sans doute délivré de l'autre, si son pistolet n'eût été chargé à balle. Vous voyez mon bras droit. — N'importe! french dog lui a sauté au cou, comme une ancienne connaissance, et je vous réponds que l'embrassement a été rude… l'anglais est tombé étranglé. — Aussi pourquoi ce diable d'homme s'acharnait — il après moi, comme un pauvre après un séminariste! Enfin, Thad est de retour au camp, et Rask aussi. Mon seul regret, c'est que le Bon Dieu n'ait pas voulu m'envoyer plutôt cela à la bataille de demain. — Voilà!

Les traits du vieux sergent s'étaient rembrunis à l'idée de n'avoir point eu sa blessure dans une bataille.

— Thadée!… cria le capitaine d'un ton irrité. Puis il ajouta plus doucement: — Comment es-tu fou à ce point de t'exposer ainsi, — pour un chien?

— Ce n'était pas pour un chien, mon capitaine, c'était pour Rask.

Le visage de d'Auverney se radoucit tout à fait. Le sergent continua:

— Pour Rask, le dogue de Bug…

— Assez! assez! mon vieux Thad, cria le capitaine en mettant la main sur ses yeux. — Allons, ajouta-t-il après un court silence, appuie-toi sur moi, et viens à l'ambulance.

Thadée obéit après une résistance respectueuse. Le chien, qui, pendant cette scène, avait à moitié rongé de joie la belle peau d'ours de son maître, se leva et les suivit tous deux.

II

Cet épisode avait vivement excité l’attention et la curiosité des joyeux conteurs. Le capitaine Léopold d’Auverney était un de ces hommes qui, sur quelque échelon que le hasard de la nature et le mouvement de la société les aient placés, inspirent toujours un certain respect mêlé d’intérêt Il n’avait cependant peut-être rien de frappant au premier abord; ses manières étaient froides, son regard indifférent. Le soleil des tropiques, en brunissant son visage, ne lui avait point donné cette vivacité de geste et de parole qui s’unit chez les créoles à une nonchalance souvent pleine de grâce. D’Auverney parlait peu, écoutait rarement, et se montrait sans cesse prêt à agir. Toujours le premier à cheval et le dernier sous la tente, il semblait chercher dans les fatigues corporelles une distraction à ses pensées. Ces pensées, qui avaient gravé leur triste sévérité dans les rides précoces de son front, n’étaient pas de celles dont on se débarrasse en les communiquant, ni de celles qui, dans une conversation frivole, se mêlent volontiers aux idées d’autrui. Léopold d’Auverney, dont les travaux de la guerre ne pouvaient rompre le corps, paraissait éprouver une fatigue insupportable dans ce que nous appelons les luttes d’esprit. Il fuyait les discussions comme il cherchait les batailles. Si quelquefois il se laissait entraîner à un débat de paroles, il prononçait trois ou quatre mots pleins de sens et de haute raison, puis, au moment de convaincre son adversaire, il s’arrêtait tout court, en disant: A quoi bon? et sortait pour demander au commandant ce qu’on pourrait faire en attendant l’heure de la charge ou de l’assaut.

Ses camarades excusaient ses habitudes froides, réservées et taciturnes, parce qu’en toute occasion ils le trouvaient brave, bon et bienveillant. Il avait sauvé la vie de plusieurs d’entre eux au risque de la sienne, et l’on savait que s’il ouvrait rarement la bouche, sa bourse du moins n’était jamais fermée. On l’aimait dans l’armée, et on lui pardonnait même de se faire en quelque sorte vénérer.

Cependant il était jeune. On lui eût donné trente ans, et il était loin encore de les avoir. Quoiqu’il combattit déjà depuis un certain temps dans les rangs républicains, on ignorait ses aventures. Le seul être qui, avec Rask, pût lui arracher quelque vive démonstration d’attachement, le bon vieux sergent Thadée, qui était entré avec lui au corps, et ne le quittait pas, contait parfois vaguement quelques circonstances de sa vie. On savait que d’Auverney avait éprouvé de grands malheurs en Amérique; que, s’étant marié à Saint-Domingue, il avait perdu sa femme et toute sa famille au milieu des massacres qui avaient marqué l’invasion de la révolution dans cette magnifique colonie. A cette époque de notre histoire, les infortunes de ce genre étaient si communes, qu’il s’était formé pour elles une espèce de pitié générale dans laquelle chacun prenait et apportait sa part. On plaignait donc le capitaine d’Auverney, moins pour les pertes qu’il avait souffertes que pour sa manière de les souffrir. C’est qu’en effet, à travers son indifférence glaciale, on voyait quelquefois les tressaillements d’une plaie incurable et intérieure.

Dès qu’une bataille commençait, son front redevenait serein. Il se montrait intrépide dans l’action comme s’il eût cherché à devenir général, et modeste après la victoire comme s’il n’eût voulu être que simple soldat. Ses camarades, en lui voyant ce dédain des honneurs et des grades ne comprenaient pas pourquoi, avant le combat il paraissait espérer quelque chose, et ne devinaient point que d’Auverney, de toutes les chances de la guerre, ne désirait que la mort.

Les représentants du peuple en mission à l’armée le nommèrent un jour chef de brigade sur le champ de bataille; il refusa, parce qu’en ce séparant de la compagnie il aurait fallu quitter le sergent Thadée. Quelques jours après, il s’offrit pour conduire une expédition hasardeuse, et en revint, contre l’attente générale et contre son espérance. On l’entendit alors regretter le grade qu’il avait refusé: - Car, disait-il, puisque le canon ennemi m’épargne toujours, la guillotine, qui frappe tous ceux qui s’élèvent aurait peut-être voulu de moi.

III

Tel était l’homme sur le compte duquel s’engagea la conversation suivante quand il fut sorti de la tente.

— Je parierais, s’écria le lieutenant Henri en essuyant sa botte rouge, sur laquelle le chien avait laissé en passant une large tache de boue, je parierais que le capitaine ne donnerait pas la patte cassée de son chien pour ces dix paniers de madère que nous entrevîmes l’autre jour dans le grand fourgon du général.

— Chut! chut! dit gaiement l’aide de camp Paschal, ce serait un mauvais marché. Les paniers sont à présent vides, j’en sais quelque chose; et, ajouta-t-il d’un air sérieux, trente bouteilles décachetées ne valent certainement pas, vous en conviendrez, lieutenant, la patte de ce pauvre chien, patte dont on pourrait, après tout, faire une poignée de sonnette.

L’assemblée se mit à rire du ton grave dont l’aide de camp prononçait ces dernières paroles. Le jeune officier des hussards basques, Alfred, qui seul n’avait pas ri, prit un air mécontent.

— Je ne vois pas, messieurs, ce qui peut prêter à la raillerie dans ce qui vient de se passer. Ce chien et ce sergent, que j’ai toujours vus auprès de d’Auverney depuis que je le connais, me semblent plutôt susceptibles de faire naître quelque intérêt. Enfin, cette scène...

Paschal, piqué et du mécontentement d’Alfred et de la bonne humeur des autres, l’interrompit.

— Cette scène est très sentimentale. Comment donc! un chien retrouvé et un bras cassé!

— Capitaine Paschal, vous avez tort, dit Henri en jetant hors de la tente la bouteille qu’il venait de vider, ce Bug, autrement dit Pierrot. pique singulièrement ma curiosité.

Paschal, prêt à se fâcher, s’apaisa en remarquant que son verre, qu’il croyait vide, était plein. D’Auverney rentra; il alla se rasseoir à sa place sans prononcer une parole. Son air était pensif, mais son visage était plus calme. Il paraissait si préoccupé, qu’il n’entendait rien de ce qui se disait autour de lui. Rask, qui l’avait suivi, se coucha à ses pieds en le regardant d’un air inquiet.

— Votre verre, capitaine d’Auverney. Goûtez de celui-ci.

— Oh! grâce à Dieu, dit le capitaine, croyant répondre à la question de Paschal, la blessure n'est pas dangereuse, le bras n'est pas cassé.

Le respect involontaire que le capitaine inspirait à tous ses compagnons d'armes contint seul l'éclat de rire prêt à éclore sur les lèvres de Henri.

— Puisque vous n'êtes plus aussi inquiet de Thadée, dit-il, et que nous sommes convenus de raconter chacun une de nos aventures pour abréger cette nuit de bivouac, j'espère, mon cher ami, que vous voudrez bien remplir votre engagement, en nous disant l'histoire de votre chien boiteux et de Bug... je ne sais comment, autrement dit Pierrot, ce vrai Gibraltar!

A cette question, faite d'un ton moitié sérieux, moitié plaisant, d'Auverney n'aurait rien répondu, si tous n'eussent joint leurs instances à celles du lieutenant.

Il céda enfin à leurs prières.

— Je vais vous satisfaire, messieurs; mais n'attendez que le récit d'une anecdote toute simple, dans laquelle je ne joue qu'un rôle très secondaire. Si l'attachement qui existe entre Thadée, Rask et moi vous a fait espérer quelque chose d'extraordinaire, je vous préviens que vous vous trompez. Je commence.

Alors il se fit un grand silence. Paschal vida d'un trait sa gourde d'eau-de-vie, et Henri s'enveloppa de la peau d'ours à demi rongée, pour se garantir du frais de la nuit, tandis qu'Alfred achevait de fredonner l'air galicien de mata-perros.

D'Auverney resta un moment rêveur, comme pour rappeler à son souvenir des événements depuis longtemps remplacés par d'autres; enfin il prit la parole, lentement, presque à voix basse et avec des pauses fréquentes.

IV

Quoique né en France, j’ai été envoyé de bonne heure à Saint-Domingue, chez un de mes oncles, colon très riche, dont je devais épouser la fille.
Les habitations de mon oncle étaient voisines du fort Galifet, et ses plantations occupaient la majeure partie des plaines de l’Acul.

Cette malheureuse position, dont le détail vous semble sans doute offrir peu d’intérêt, a été l’une des premières causes des désastres et de la ruine totale de ma famille.

Huit cents nègres cultivaient les immenses domaines de mon oncle. Je vous avouerai que la triste condition des esclaves était encore aggravée par l’insensibilité de leur maître. Mon oncle était du nombre, heureusement assez restreint, de ces planteurs dont une longue habitude de despotisme absolu avait endurci le cœur. Accoutumé à se voir obéi au premier coup d’oeil, la moindre hésitation de la part d’un esclave était punie des plus mauvais traitements, et souvent l’intercession de ses enfants ne servait qu’à accroître sa colère. Nous étions donc le plus souvent obligés de nous borner à soulager en secret des maux que nous ne pouvions prévenir.

— Comment! mais voilà des phrases! dit Henri à demi-voix, en se penchant vers son voisin. Allons, j’espère que le capitaine ne laissera point passer les malheurs des ci-devant noirs sans quelque petite dissertation sur les devoirs qu’impose l’humanité, et caetera. On n’en eût pas été quitte à moins au club Massiac.

[Nos lecteurs ont sans doute oublié que le club Massiac, dont parle le lieutenant Henri, était une association de négrophiles. Ce club, formé à Paris au commencement de la révolution, avait provoqué la plupart des insurrections qui éclatèrent alors dans les colonies.

On pourra s’étonner aussi de la légèreté un peu hardie avec laquelle le jeune lieutenant raille des philanthropes qui régnaient encore à cette époque par la grâce du bourreau. Mais, il faut se rappeler qu’avant, pendant et après la Terreur, la liberté de penser et de parler s’était réfugiée dans les camps. Ce noble privilège coûtait de temps en temps la tête à un général; mais il absout de tout reproche la gloire si éclatante de ces soldats que les dénonciateurs de la Convention appelaient « les messieurs de l’armée du Rhin”.]

— Je vous remercie, Henri, de m'épargner un ridicule, dit froidement d'Auverney, qui l'avait entendu.

Il poursuivit.

— Entre tous ces esclaves, un seul avait trouvé grâce devant mon oncle. C'était un nain espagnol, griffe [Une explication précise sera peut-être nécessaire à l'intelligence de ce mot.

M. Moreau de Saint-Méry, en développant le système de Franklin, a classé dans des espèces génériques les différentes teintes que présentent les mélanges de la population de couleur.

Il suppose que l'homme forme un tout de cent vingt-huit parties, blanches chez les blancs, et noires chez les noirs. Partant de ce principe. il établit que l'on est d'autant plus près ou plus loin de l'une ou de l'autre couleur, qu'on se rapproche ou qu'on s'éloigne davantage du terme soixante-quatre, qui leur sert de moyenne proportionnelle.

D'après ce système, tout homme qui n'a point huit parties de blanc est réputé noir.

Marchant de cette couleur vers le blanc, on distingue neuf souches principales, qui ont encore entre elles des variétés d'après le plus ou le moins de parties qu'elles retiennent de l'une ou de l'autre couleur. Ces neuf espèces sont le sacatra, le griffe, le marabout, le mulâtre, le quarteron, le métis, le mameluco, le quarteronné, le sang-mêlé.

Le sang-mêlé, en continuant son union avec le blanc, finit en quelque sorte par se confondre avec cette couleur. On assure pourtant qu'il conserve toujours sur une certaine partie du corps la trace ineffaçable de son origine.

Le griffe est le résultat de cinq combinaisons, et peut avoir depuis vingt-quatre jusqu'à trente-deux parties blanches et quatre-vingt-seize ou cent quatre noires.]

de couleur, qui lui avait été donné comme un sapajou par lord Effingham, gouverneur de la Jamaïque. Mon oncle, qui, ayant longtemps résidé au Brésil, y avait contracté les habitudes du faste portugais, aimait à s'environner chez lui d'un appareil qui répondît à sa richesse. De nombreux esclaves, dressés au service comme des domestiques européens, donnaient à sa maison un éclat en quelque sorte seigneurial. Pour que rien n'y manquât, il avait fait de l'esclave de lord Effingham son fou, à l'imitation de ces anciens princes féodaux qui avaient des bouffons dans leurs cours. Il faut dire que le choix était singulièrement heureux, le griffe Habibrah (c’était son nom) était un de ces êtres dont la conformation physique est si étrange qu’ils paraîtraient des monstres, s’ils ne faisaient rire. Ce nain hideux était gros, court, ventru, et se mouvait avec une rapidité singulière sur deux jambes grêles et fluettes, qui, lorsqu’il s’asseyait, se repliaient sous lui comme les bras d’une araignée. Sa tête énorme. lourdement enfoncée entre ses épaules, hérissée d’une laine rousse et crépue, était accompagnée de deux oreilles si larges, que ses camarades avaient coutume de dire qu’Habibrah s’en servait pour essuyer ses yeux quand il pleurait. Son visage était toujours une grimace, et n’était jamais la même; bizarre mobilité des traits, qui du moins donnait à sa laideur l’avantage de la variété. Mon oncle l’aimait à cause de sa difformité rare et de sa gaieté inaltérable. Habibrah était son favori. Tandis que les autres esclaves étaient rudement accablés de travail, Habibrah n’avait d’autre soin que de porter derrière le maître un large éventail de plumes d’oiseaux de paradis, pour chasser les moustiques et les bigailles. Mon oncle le faisait manger à ses pieds sur une natte de jonc, et lui donnait toujours sur sa propre assiette quelque reste de son mets de prédilection. Aussi Habibrah se montrait-il reconnaissant de tant de bontés; il n’usait de ses privilèges de bouffon, de son droit de tout faire et de tout dire, que pour divertir son maître par mille folles paroles entremêlées de contorsions, et au moindre signe de mon oncle il accourait avec l’agilité d’un singe et la soumission d’un chien.

Je n’aimais pas cet esclave. Il y avait quelque chose de trop rampant dans sa servilité; et si l’esclavage ne déshonore pas, la domesticité avilit. J’éprouvais un sentiment de pitié bienveillante pour ces malheureux nègres que je voyais travailler tout le jour sans que presque aucun vêtement cachât leur chaîne; mais ce baladin difforme, cet esclave fainéant, avec ses ridicules habits bariolés de galons et semés de grelots, ne m’inspirait que du mépris. D’ailleurs le nain n’usait pas en bon frère du crédit que ses bassesses lui avaient donné sur le patron commun. Jamais il n’avait demandé une grâce à un maître qui infligeait si souvent des châtiments; et on l’entendit même un jour, se croyant seul avec mon oncle, l’exhorter à redoubler de sévérité envers ces infortunés camarades. Les autres esclaves cependant, qui auraient dû le voir avec défiance et jalousie, ne paraissaient pas le haïr. Il leur inspirait une sorte de crainte respectueuse qui ne ressemblait point à de l’amitié; et quand ils le voyaient passer au milieu de leurs cases avec son grand bonnet pointu orné de sonnettes, sur lequel il avait tracé des figures bizarres en encre rouge, ils se disaient entre eux à voix basse: C’est un obi [un sorcier]!

Ces détails, sur lesquels j’arrête en ce moment votre attention, messieurs, m’occupaient fort peu alors. Tout entier aux pures émotions d’un amour que rien ne semblait devoir traverser, d’un amour éprouvé et partagé depuis l’enfance par la femme qui m’était destinée, je n’accordais que des regards fort distraits à tout ce qui n’était pas Marie. Accoutumé dès l’âge le plus tendre à considérer comme ma future épouse celle qui était déjà en quelque sorte ma sœur, il s’était formé entre nous une tendresse dont on ne comprendrait pas encore la nature, si je disais que notre amour était un mélange de dévouement fraternel, d’exaltation passionnée et de confiance conjugale. Peu d’hommes ont coulé plus heureusement que moi leurs premières années; peu d’hommes ont senti leur âme s’épanouir à la vie sous un plus beau ciel, dans un accord plus délicieux de bonheur pour le présent et d’espérance pour l’avenir. Entouré presque en naissant de tous les contentements de la richesse, de tous les privilèges du rang dans un pays où la couleur suffisait pour le donner, passant mes journées près de l’être qui avait tout mon amour, voyant cet amour favorisé de nos parents, qui seuls auraient pu l’entraver, et tout cela dans l’âge où le sang bouillonne, dans une contrée où l’été est éternel, où la nature est admirable; en fallait-il plus pour me donner une foi aveugle dans mon heureuse étoile? En faut-il plus pour me donner le droit de dire que peu d’hommes ont coulé plus heureusement que moi leurs premières années?

Le capitaine s’arrêta un moment, comme si la voix lui eût manqué pour ces souvenirs de bonheur. Puis il poursuivit avec un accent profondément triste:

— Il est vrai que j’ai maintenant de plus le droit d’ajouter que nul ne coulera plus déplorablement ses derniers jours.

Et comme s’il eût repris de la force dans le sentiment de son malheur, il continua d’une voix assurée.

V

C’est au milieu de ces illusions et de ces espérances aveugles que j’atteignais ma vingtième année. Elle devait être accomplie au mois d’août 1791, et mon oncle avait fixé cette époque pour mon union avec Marie. Vous comprenez aisément que la pensée d’un honneur si prochain absorbait toutes mes facultés, et combien doit être vague le souvenir qui me reste des débats politiques dont à cette époque la colonie était déjà agitée depuis deux ans. Je ne vous entretiendrai donc ni du comte de Peinier, ni de M. de Blanchelande, ni de ce malheureux colonel de Mauduit dont la fin fut si tragique.

Je ne vous peindrai point les rivalités de l’assemblée provinciale du nord, et de cette assemblée coloniale qui prit le titre d’assemblée générale, trouvant que le mot coloniale sentait l’esclavage. Ces misères, qui ont bouleversé alors tous les esprits, n’offrent plus maintenant d’intérêt que par les désastres qu’elles ont produits. Pour moi, dans cette jalousie mutuelle qui divisait le Cap et le Port-au-Prince, si j’avais une opinion, ce devait être nécessairement en faveur du Cap, dont nous habitions le territoire, et de l’assemblée provinciale, dont mon oncle était membre.

Il m’arriva une seule fois de prendre une part un peu vive à un débat sur les affaires du jour. C’était à l’occasion de ce désastreux décret du 15 mai 1791, par lequel l’Assemblée nationale de France admettait les hommes de couleur libres à l’égal partage des droits politiques avec les blancs. Dans un bal donné à la ville du Cap par le gouverneur, plusieurs jeunes colons parlaient avec véhémence sur cette loi, qui blessait si cruellement l’amour-propre, peut-être fondé, des blancs. Je ne m’étais point encore mêlé à la conversation, lorsque je vis s’approcher du groupe un riche planteur que les blancs admettaient difficilement parmi eux, et dont la couleur équivoque faisait suspecter l’origine. Je m’avançai brusquement vers cet homme en lui disant à voix haute: - Passez outre, monsieur; il se dit ici des choses désagréables pour vous, qui avez du sang mêlé dans les veines. - Cette imputation l’irrita au point qu’il m’appela en duel. Nous fûmes tous deux blessés. J’avais eu tort, je l’avoue, de le provoquer; mais il est probable que ce qu’on appelle le préjugé de la couleur n’eût pas suffi seul pour m’y pousser; cet homme avait depuis quelque temps l’audace de lever les yeux jusqu'à ma cousine, et au moment où je l'humiliai d'une manière si inattendue, il venait de danser avec elle.

Quoi qu'il en fût, je voyais s'avancer avec ivresse le moment où je posséderais Marie, et je demeurais étranger à l'effervescence toujours croissante qui faisait bouillonner toutes les têtes autour de moi.

Les yeux fixés sur mon bonheur qui s'approchait, je n'apercevais pas le nuage effrayant qui déjà couvrait presque tous les points de notre horizon politique, et qui devait, en éclatant, déraciner toutes les existences. Ce n'est pas que les esprits même les plus prompts à s'alarmer, s'attendissent sérieusement dès lors à la révolte des esclaves, on méprisait trop cette classe pour la craindre; mais il existait seulement entre les blancs et les mulâtres libres assez de haine pour que ce volcan si longtemps comprimé bouleversât toute la colonie au moment redouté où il se déchirerait.

Dans les premiers jours de ce mois d'août, si ardemment appelé de tous mes vœux, un incident étrange vint mêler une inquiétude imprévue à mes tranquilles espérances.

VI

Mon oncle avait fait construire, sur les bords d’une jolie rivière qui baignait ses plantations, un petit pavillon de branchages, entouré d’un massif d’arbres épais, où Marie venait tous les jours respirer la douceur de ces brises de mer qui, pendant les mois les plus brûlants de l’année, soufflent régulièrement à Saint-Domingue, depuis le matin jusqu’au soir, et dont la fraîcheur augmente ou diminue avec la chaleur même du jour.

J’avais soin d’orner moi-même tous les matins cette retraite des plus belles fleurs que je pouvais cueillir.

Un jour Marie accourt à moi tout effrayée. Elle était entrée comme de coutume dans son cabinet de verdure, et là elle avait vu, avec une surprise mêlée de terreur, toutes les fleurs dont je l’avais tapissé le matin arrachées et foulées aux pieds; un bouquet de soucis sauvages fraîchement cueillis était déposé à la place où elle avait coutume de s’asseoir. Elle n’était pas encore revenue de sa stupeur, qu’elle avait entendu les sons d’une guitare sortir du milieu du taillis même qui environnait le pavillon; puis une voix, qui n’était pas la mienne, avait commencé à chanter doucement une chanson qui lui avait paru espagnole, et dans laquelle son trouble, et sans doute aussi quelque pudeur de vierge, l’avaient empêchée de comprendre autre chose que son nom, fréquemment répété. Alors elle avait eu recours à une fuite précipitée, à laquelle heureusement il n’avait point été mis d’obstacle.

Ce récit me transporta d’indignation et de jalousie. Mes premières conjectures s’arrêtèrent sur le sang-mêlé libre avec qui j’avais eu récemment une altercation; mais, dans la perplexité où j’étais jeté, je résolus de ne rien faire légèrement. Je rassurai la pauvre Marie, et je me promis de veiller sans relâche sur elle, jusqu’au moment prochain où il me serait permis de la protéger encore de plus près.

Présumant bien que l’audacieux dont l’insolence avait si fort épouvanté Marie ne se bornerait pas à cette première tentative pour lui faire connaître ce que je devinais être son amour, je me mis dès le même soir en embuscade autour du corps de bâtiment où reposait ma fiancée, après que tout le monde fut endormi dans la plantation. Caché dans l’épaisseur des hautes cannes à sucre, armé de mon poignard, j’attendais. Je n’attendis pas en vain. Vers le milieu de la nuit, un prélude mélancolique et grave, s’élevant dans le silence à quelques pas de moi, éveilla brusquement mon attention. Ce bruit fut pour moi comme une secousse; c’était une guitare; c’était sous la fenêtre même de Marie! Furieux, brandissant mon poignard, je m’élançais vers le point d’où ces sons partaient, brisant sous mes pas les tiges cassantes des cannes à sucre. Tout à coup je me sentis saisir et renverser avec une force qui me parut prodigieuse; mon poignard me fut violemment arraché, et je le vis briller au-dessus de ma tête. En même temps, deux yeux ardents étincelaient dans l’ombre tout près des miens, et une double rangée de dents blanches, que j’entrevoyais dans les ténèbres, s’ouvrait pour laisser passer ces mots, prononcés avec l’accent de la rage: Te tengo! te tengo! [Je te tiens! je te tiens!]

Plus étonné encore qu’effrayé, je me débattais vainement contre mon formidable adversaire, et déjà la pointe de l’acier se faisait jour à travers mes vêtements, lorsque Marie, que la guitare et ce tumulte de pas et de paroles avaient réveillée, parut subitement à sa fenêtre. Elle reconnut ma voix, vit briller un poignard, et poussa un cri d’angoisse et de terreur. Ce cri déchirant paralysa en quelque sorte la main de mon antagoniste victorieux; il s’arrêta, comme pétrifié par un enchantement; promena encore quelques instants avec indécision le poignard sur ma poitrine, puis le jetant tout à coup: - Non! dit-il, cette fois en français, non! elle pleurerait trop! - En achevant ces paroles bizarres, il disparut dans les touffes de roseaux; et avant que je me fusse relevé, meurtri par cette lutte inégale et singulière, nul bruit, nul vestige ne restait de sa présence et de son passage.

Il me serait fort difficile de dire ce qui se passa en moi au moment où je revins de ma première stupeur entre les bras de ma douce Marie, à laquelle j’étais si étrangement conservé par celui-là même qui paraissait prétendre à me la disputer. J’étais plus que jamais indigné contre ce rival inattendu, et honteux de lui devoir la vie. - Au fond, me disait mon amour-propre, c’est à Marie que je la dois, puisque c’est le son de sa voix qui a fait seul tomber le poignard. - Cependant je ne pouvais me dissimuler qu’il y avait bien quelque générosité dans le sentiment qui avait décidé mon rival inconnu à m’épargner. Mais ce rival, quel était-il donc? Je me confondais en soupçons, qui tous se détruisaient les uns les autres. Ce ne pouvait être le planteur sang-mêlé, que ma jalousie s’était d’abord désigné. Il était loin d’avoir cette force extraordinaire, et d’ailleurs ce n’était point sa voix. L’individu avec qui j’avais lutté m’avait paru nu jusqu’à la ceinture. Les esclaves seuls dans la colonie étaient ainsi à demi vêtus. Mais ce ne pouvait être un esclave; des sentiments comme celui qui lui avait fait jeter le poignard ne me semblaient pas pouvoir appartenir à un esclave; et d’ailleurs tout en moi se refusait à la révoltante supposition d’avoir un esclave pour rival. Quel était-il donc? Je résolus d’attendre et d’épier.

Marie avait éveillé la vieille nourrice qui lui tenait lieu de la mère qu'elle avait perdue au berceau. Je passai le reste de la nuit auprès d'elle, et, dès que le jour fut venu, nous informâmes mon oncle de ces inexplicables événements. Sa surprise en fut extrême; mais son orgueil, comme le mien, ne s'arrêta pas à l'idée que l'amoureux inconnu de sa fille pouvait être un esclave. La nourrice reçut ordre de ne plus quitter Marie; et comme les séances de l'assemblée provinciale, les soins que donnait aux principaux colons l'attitude de plus en plus menaçante des affaires coloniales, et les travaux des plantations, ne laissaient à mon oncle aucun loisir, il m'autorisa à accompagner sa fille dans toutes ses promenades jusqu'au jour de mon mariage, qui était fixé au 22 août. En même temps, présumant que le nouveau soupirant n'avait pu venir que du dehors, il ordonna que l'enceinte de ses domaines fût désormais gardée nuit et jour plus sévèrement que jamais.

Ces précautions prises, de concert avec mon oncle, je voulus tenter une épreuve. J'allai au pavillon de la rivière, et, réparant le désordre de la veille, je lui rendis la parure de fleurs dont j'avais coutume de l'embellir pour Marie.

Quand l'heure où elle s'y retirait habituellement fut venue. je m'armai de ma carabine, chargée à balle, et je proposai à ma cousine de l'accompagner à son pavillon. La vieille nourrice nous suivit.

Marie, à qui je n'avais point dit que j'avais fait disparaître les traces qui l'avaient effrayée la veille, entra la première dans le cabinet de feuillage.

— Vois, Léopold, me dit-elle, mon berceau est bien dans le même état de désordre où je l'ai laissé hier; voilà bien ton ouvrage gâté, tes fleurs arrachées, flétries; ce qui m'étonne, ajouta-t-elle en prenant un bouquet de soucis sauvages, déposé sur le banc de gazon, ce qui m'étonne, c'est que ce vilain bouquet ne se soit pas fané depuis hier. Vois, cher ami, il a l'air d'être tout fraîchement cueilli.

J'étais immobile d'étonnement et de colère. En effet, mon ouvrage du matin même était déjà détruit, et ces tristes fleurs, dont la fraîcheur étonnait ma pauvre Marie, avaient repris insolemment la place des roses que j'avais semées.

— Calme-toi, me dit Marie, qui vit mon agitation, calme-toi; c’est une chose passée, cet insolent n’y reviendra sans doute plus; mettons tout cela sous nos pieds, comme cet odieux bouquet.

Je me gardai bien de la détromper, de peur de l’alarmer; et sans lui dire que celui qui devait, selon elle, n’y plus revenir, était déjà revenu, je la laissai fouler les soucis aux pieds, pleine d’une innocente indignation. Puis, espérant que l’heure était venue de connaître mon mystérieux rival, je la fis asseoir en silence entre sa nourrice et moi.

A peine avions-nous pris place, que Marie mit son doigt sur ma bouche; quelques sons. affaiblis par le vent et par le bruissement de l’eau, venaient de frapper son oreille. J’écoutai; c’était le même prélude triste et lent qui la nuit précédente avait éveillé ma fureur. Je voulus m’élancer de mon siège, un geste de Marie me retint.

— Léopold, me dit-elle à voix basse, contiens-toi, il va peut-être chanter, et sans doute ce qu’il dira nous apprendra qui il est.

En effet, une voix dont l’harmonie avait quelque chose de mâle et de plaintif à la fois sortit un moment après du fond du bois, et mêla aux notes graves de la guitare une romance espagnole, dont chaque parole retentit assez profondément dans mon oreille pour que ma mémoire puisse encore aujourd’hui en retrouver presque toutes les expressions.

«Pourquoi me fuis-tu, Maria? [On a jugé inutile de reproduire ici en entier les paroles du chant espagnol: Porque me huyes, Maria? etc] pourquoi me fuis-tu, jeune fille? pourquoi cette terreur qui glace ton âme quand tu m’entends? Je suis en effet bien formidable! je ne sais qu’aimer, souffrir et chanter!

«Lorsque, à travers les tiges élancées des cocotiers de la rivière, je vois glisser ta forme légère et pure, un éblouissement trouble ma vue, ô Maria! et je crois voir passer un esprit!

«Et si j’entends, ô Maria! les accents enchantés qui s’échappent de ta bouche comme une mélodie, il me semble que mon cœur vient palpiter dans mon oreille et mêle un bourdonnement plaintif à ta voix harmonieuse.

«Hélas! ta voix est plus douce pour moi que le chant même des jeunes oiseaux qui battent de l’aile dans le ciel, et qui viennent du côté de ma patrie;

«De ma patrie où j’étais roi, de ma patrie où j’étais libre!

«Libre et toi, jeune fille! j’oublierais tout cela pour toi; j’oublierais tout, royaume, famille, devoirs, vengeance, oui, jusqu’à la vengeance! quoique le moment soit bientôt venu de cueillir ce fruit amer et délicieux, qui mûrit si tard!”

La voix avait chanté les stances précédentes avec des pauses fréquentes et douloureuses; mais en achevant ces derniers mots, elle avait pris un accent terrible.

«O Maria! tu ressembles au beau palmier, svelte et doucement balancé sur sa tige, et tu te mires dans l’oeil de ton jeune amant, comme le palmier dans l’eau transparente de la fontaine.

«Mais, ne le sais-tu pas? il y a quelquefois au fond du désert un ouragan jaloux du bonheur de la fontaine aimée; il accourt, et l’air et le sable se mêlent sous le vol de ses lourdes ailes; il enveloppe l’arbre et la source d’un tourbillon de feu; et la fontaine se dessèche, et le palmier sent se crisper sous l’haleine de mort le cercle vert de ses feuilles qui avait la majesté d’une couronne et la grâce d’une chevelure.

«Et pourquoi repousserais-tu mon amour, Maria? Je suis roi, et mon front s’élève au-dessus de tous les fronts humains. Tu es blanche, et je suis noir; mais le jour a besoin de s’unir à la nuit pour enfanter l’aurore et le couchant qui sont plus beaux que lui!”

VIII

Un long soupir, prolongé sur les cordes frémissantes de la guitare, accompagna ces dernières paroles. J’étais hors de moi. « Roi! noir! esclave!” Mille idées incohérentes, éveillées par l’inexplicable chant que je venais d’entendre, tourbillonnaient dans mon cerveau. Un violent besoin d’en finir avec l’être inconnu qui osait ainsi associer le nom de Marie à des chants d’amour et de menace s’empara de moi. Je saisis convulsivement ma carabine, et me précipitai hors du pavillon. Marie, effrayée, tendait encore les bras pour me retenir, que déjà je m’étais enfoncé dans le taillis du côté d’où la voix était venue. Je fouillai le bois dans tous les sens, je plongeai le canon de mon mousqueton dans l’épaisseur de toutes les broussailles, je fis le tour de tous les gros arbres, je remuai toutes les hautes herbes. Rien! rien, et toujours rien! Cette recherche inutile, jointe à d’inutiles réflexions sur la romance que je venais d’entendre, mêla de la confusion à ma colère. Cet insolent rival échapperait donc toujours à mon bras comme à mon esprit! Je ne pourrais donc ni le deviner, ni le rencontrer!

En ce moment, un bruit de sonnettes vint me distraire de ma rêverie. Je me retournai. Le nain Habibrah était à côté de moi.

— Bonjour, maître, me dit-il, et il s’inclina avec respect; mais son louche regard, obliquement relevé vers moi, paraissait remarquer avec une expression indéfinissable de malice et de triomphe l’anxiété peinte sur mon front.

— Parle! lui criai-je brusquement, as-tu vu quelqu’un dans ce bois?

— Nul autre que vous, señor mio, me répondit-il avec tranquillité.

— Est-ce que tu n’as pas entendu une voix? repris-je.

L’esclave resta un moment comme cherchant ce qu’il pouvait me répondre. Je bouillais.

— Vite, lui dis-je, réponds vite, malheureux! as-tu entendu ici une voix?

Il fixa hardiment sur mes yeux ses deux yeux ronds comme ceux d’un chat-tigre.

— Que querre decir usted?[Que voulez-vous dire?] par une voix, maître? Il y a des voix partout et pour tout; il y a la voix des oiseaux, il y a la voix de l’eau, il y a la voix du vent dans les feuilles...

Je l’interrompis en le secouant rudement.

— Misérable bouffon! cesse de me prendre pour ton jouet, ou je te fais écouter de près la voix qui sort d'un canon de carabine. Réponds en quatre mots. As-tu entendu dans ce bois un homme qui chantait un air espagnol?

— Oui, señor, me répliqua-t-il sans paraître ému, et des paroles sur l'air... Tenez, maître, je vais vous conter la chose. Je me promenais sur la lisière de ce bosquet, en écoutant ce que les grelots d'argent de ma gorra [Le petit griffe espagnol désigne par ce mot son bonnet] me disaient à l'oreille. Tout à coup, le vent est venu joindre à ce concert quelque mots d'une langue que vous appelez l'espagnol, la première que j'aie bégayée, lorsque mon âge se comptait par mois et non par années, et que ma mère me suspendait sur son dos à des bandelettes de laine rouge et jaune. J'aime cette langue; elle me rappelle le temps où je n'étais que petit et pas encore nain, qu'un enfant et pas encore un fou; je me suis rapproché de la voix, et j'ai entendu la fin de la chanson.

— Eh bien, est-ce là tout? repris-je impatienté.

— Oui, maître hermoso, mais, si vous voulez, je vous dirai ce que c'est que l'homme qui chantait.

Je crus que j'aillais embrasser le pauvre bouffon.

— Oh! parle, m'écriai-je, parle, voici ma bourse, Habibrah! et dix bourses meilleures sont à toi si tu me dit quel est cet homme.

Il prit la bourse, l'ouvrit, et sourit.

— Diez bolsas meilleures que celle-ci! mais demonio! cela ferait une pleine fanega de bons écus à l'image del rey Luis quince, autant qu'il en aurait fallu pour ensemencer le champ du magicien grenadin Altornino, lequel savait l'art d'y faire pousser de buenos doblones; mais, ne vous fâchez pas, jeune maître, je viens au fait. Rappelez-vous, señor, les derniers mots de la chanson: « Tu es blanche, et je suis noir; mais le jour a besoin de s'unir à la nuit pour enfanter l'aurore et le couchant, qui sont plus beaux que lui.” Or, si cette chanson dit vrai, le griffe Habibrah, votre humble esclave, né d'une négresse et d'un blanc, est plus beau que vous, si señorito de amor, je suis le produit de l'union du jour et de la nuit, je suis l'aurore ou le couchant dont parle la chanson espagnole, et vous n'êtes que le jour. Donc je suis plus beau que vous, si usted quiere, plus beau qu'un blanc.

Le nain entremêlait cette divagation bizarre de longs éclats de rire. Je l'interrompis encore.

— Où donc en veux-tu venir avec tes extravagances? Tout cela me dira-t-il ce que c'est que l'homme qui chantait dans ce bois?

— Précisément, maître, repartit le bouffon avec un regard malicieux. Il est évident que el hombre qui a pu chanter de telles extravagances, comme vous les appelez, ne peut être et n'est qu'un fou pareil à moi! J'ai gagné las diez bolsas!

Ma main se levait pour châtier l'insolente plaisanterie de l'esclave émancipé, lorsqu'un cri affreux retentit tout à coup dans le bosquet, du côté du pavillon de la rivière. C'était la voix de Marie. - Je m'élance, je cours, je vole, m'interrogeant d'avance avec terreur sur le nouveau malheur que je pouvais avoir à redouter. J'arrive haletant au cabinet de verdure. Un spectacle effrayant m'y attendait. Un crocodile monstrueux, dont le corps était à demi caché sous les roseaux et les mangles de la rivière, avait passé sa tête énorme à travers l'une des arcades de verdure qui soutenaient le toit du pavillon. Sa gueule entrouverte et hideuse menaçait un jeune noir, d'une stature colossale, qui d'un bras soutenait la jeune fille épouvantée, de l'autre plongeait hardiment le fer d'une bisaiguë entre les mâchoires acérées du monstre. Le crocodile luttait furieusement contre cette main audacieuse et puissante qui le tenait en respect. Au moment où je me présentai devant le seuil du cabinet, Marie poussa un cri de joie, s'arracha des bras du nègre, et vint tomber dans les miens en s'écriant:

— Je suis sauvée!

A ce mouvement, à cette parole de Marie, le nègre se retourne brusquement, croise ses bras sur sa poitrine gonflée, et, attachant sur ma fiancée un regard douloureux, demeure immobile, sans paraître s'apercevoir que le crocodile est là, près de lui, qu'il s'est débarrassé de la bisaiguë, et qu'il va le dévorer. C'en était fait du courageux noir, si, déposant rapidement Marie sur les genoux de sa nourrice, toujours assise sur un banc et plus morte que vive, je ne me fusse approché du monstre, et je n'eusse déchargé à bout portant dans sa gueule la charge de ma carabine. L'animal, foudroyé, ouvrit et ferma encore deux ou trois fois sa gueule sanglante et ses yeux éteints, mais ce n'était plus qu'un mouvement convulsif, et tout à coup il se renversa à grand bruit sur le dos en roidissant ses deux pattes larges et écaillées. Il était mort.

Le nègre que je venais de sauver si heureusement détourna la tête, et vit les derniers tressaillements du monstre; alors il fixa ses yeux sur la terre, et les relevant lentement vers Marie, qui était revenue achever de se rassurer sur mon cœur, il me dit, et l'accent de sa voix exprimait plus que le désespoir, il me dit:

— Porque le has matado? [Pourquoi l’as-tu tué?]

Puis il s’éloigna à grands pas sans attendre ma réponse, et rentra dans le bosquet, où il disparut.

IX

Cette scène terrible, ce dénouement singulier, les émotions de tout genre qui avaient précédé, accompagné et suivi mes vaines recherches dans le bois, jetèrent un chaos dans ma tête. Marie était encore toute pensive de sa terreur, et il s'écoula un temps assez long avant que nous puissions nous communiquer nos pensées incohérentes autrement que par des regards et des serrements de main. Enfin je rompis le silence.

— Viens, dis-je à Marie, sortons d'ici! ce lieu a quelque chose de funeste!

Elle se leva avec empressement, comme si elle n'eût attendu que ma permission, appuya son bras sur le mien, et nous sortîmes.

Je lui demandai alors comment lui était advenu le secours miraculeux de ce noir au moment du danger horrible qu'elle venait de courir, et si elle savait qui était cet esclave, car le grossier caleçon qui voilait à peine sa nudité montrait assez qu'il appartenait à la dernière classe des habitants de l'île.

— Cet homme, me dit Marie, est sans doute un des nègres de mon père, qui était à travailler aux environs de la rivière à l'instant où l'apparition du crocodile m'a fait pousser le cri qui t'a averti de mon péril. Tout ce que je puis te dire, c'est qu'au moment même il s'est élancé hors du bois pour voler à mon secours.

— De quel côté est-il venu? lui demandai-je.

— Du côté opposé à celui d'où partait la voix l'instant d'auparavant, et par lequel tu venais de pénétrer dans le bosquet.

Cet incident dérangea le rapprochement que mon esprit n'avait pu s'empêcher de faire entre les mots espagnols que m'avait adressés le nègre en se retirant, et la romance qu'avait chantée dans la même langue mon rival inconnu. D'autres rapports d'ailleurs s'étaient déjà présentés à moi. Ce nègre, d'une taille presque gigantesque, d'une force prodigieuse, pouvait bien être le rude adversaire contre lequel j'avais lutté la nuit précédente. La circonstance de la nudité devenait d'ailleurs un indice frappant. Le chanteur du bosquet avait dit: - Je suis noir. - Similitude de plus. Il s'était déclaré roi, et celui-ci n'était qu'un esclave, mais je me rappelais, non sans étonnement, l'air de rudesse et de majesté empreint sur son visage au milieu des signes caractéristiques de la race africaine, l'éclat de ses yeux, la blancheur de ses dents sur le noir éclatant de sa peau, la largeur de son front, surprenante surtout chez un nègre, le gonflement dédaigneux qui donnait à l’épaisseur de ses lèvres et de ses narines quelque chose de si fier et de si puissant, la noblesse de son port, la beauté de ses formes, qui, quoique maigries et dégradées par la fatigue d’un travail journalier, avaient encore un développement pour ainsi dire herculéen; je me représentais dans son ensemble l’aspect imposant de cet esclave, et je me disais qu’il aurait bien pu convenir à un roi. Alors, calculant une foule d’autres incidents, mes conjectures s’arrêtaient avec un frémissement de colère sur ce nègre insolent; je voulais le faire rechercher et châtier... Et puis toutes mes indécisions me revenaient. En réalité, où était le fondement de tant de soupçons? L’île de Saint-Domingue étant en grande partie possédée par l’Espagne, il résultait de là que beaucoup de nègres, soit qu’ils eussent primitivement appartenu à des colons de Santo-Domingo, soit qu’ils y fussent nés, mêlaient la langue espagnole à leur jargon. Et parce que cet esclave m’avait adressé quelques mots en espagnol, était-ce une raison pour le supposer auteur d’une romance en cette langue, qui annonçait nécessairement un degré de culture d’esprit selon mes idées tout à fait inconnu aux nègres? Quant à ce reproche singulier qu’il m’avait adressé d’avoir tué le crocodile, il annonçait chez l’esclave un dégoût de la vie que sa position expliquait d’elle-même, sans qu’il fût besoin, certes, d’avoir recours à l’hypothèse d’un amour impossible pour la fille de son maître. Sa présence dans le bosquet du pavillon pouvait bien n’être que fortuite; sa force et sa taille étaient loin de suffire pour constater son identité avec mon antagoniste nocturne. Etait-ce sur d’aussi frêles indices que je pouvais charger d’une accusation terrible devant mon oncle et livrer à la vengeance implacable de son orgueil un pauvre esclave qui avait montré tant de courage pour secourir Marie?

Au moment où ces idées se soulevaient contre ma colère, Marie la dissipa entièrement en me disant avec sa douce voix:

— Mon Léopold, nous devons de la reconnaissance à ce brave nègre; sans lui, j’étais perdue! Tu serais arrivé trop tard.

Ce peu de mots eut un effet décisif. Il ne changea pas mon intention de faire rechercher l’esclave qui avait sauvé Marie, mais il changea le but de cette recherche. C’était pour une punition; ce fut pour une récompense.

Mon oncle apprit de moi qu’il devait la vie de sa fille à l’un de ses esclaves, et me promit sa liberté; si je pouvais le retrouver dans la foule de ces infortunés.

X

Jusqu’à ce jour, la disposition naturelle de mon esprit m’avait tenu éloigné des plantations où les noirs travaillaient. Il m’était trop pénible de voir souffrir des êtres que je ne pouvais soulager. Mais, dès le lendemain, mon oncle m’ayant proposé de l’accompagner dans sa ronde de surveillance, j’acceptai avec empressement, espérant rencontrer parmi les travailleurs le sauveur de ma bien-aimée Marie.

J’eus lieu de voir dans cette promenade combien le regard d’un maître est puissant sur des esclaves, mais en même temps combien cette puissance s’achète cher. Les nègres, tremblants en présence de mon oncle, redoublaient, sur son passage, d’efforts et d’activité; mais qu’il y avait de haine dans cette terreur! Irascible par habitude, mon oncle était prêt à se fâcher de n’en avoir pas sujet, quand son bouffon Habibrah, qui le suivait toujours, lui fit remarquer tout à coup un noir qui, accablé de lassitude, s’était endormi sous un bosquet de dattiers. Mon oncle court à ce malheureux, le réveille rudement, et lui ordonne de se remettre à l’ouvrage. Le nègre, effrayé, se lève, et découvre en se levant un jeune rosier du Bengale sur lequel il s’était couché par mégarde, et que mon oncle se plaisait à élever. L’arbuste était perdu. Le maître, déjà irrité de ce qu’il appelait la paresse de l’esclave, devient furieux a cette vue. Hors de lui, il détache de sa ceinture le fouet armé de lanières ferrées qu’il portait dans ses promenades, et lève le bras pour en frapper le nègre tombé à genoux. Le fouet ne retomba pas. Je n’oublierai jamais ce moment. Une main puissante arrêta subitement la main du colon. Un noir (c’était celui-là même que je cherchais!) lui cria en français:

— Punis-moi, car je viens de t’offenser; mais ne fais rien à mon frère, qui n’a touché qu’à ton rosier!

Cette intervention inattendue de l’homme à qui je devais le salut de Marie, son geste, son regard, l’accent impérieux de sa voix, me frappèrent de stupeur. Mais sa généreuse imprudence, loin de faire rougir mon oncle, n’avait fait que redoubler la rage du maître et la détourner du patient à son défenseur. Mon oncle, exaspéré, se dégagea des bras du grand nègre, en l’accablant de menaces, et leva de nouveau son fouet pour l’en frapper à son tour. Cette fois le fouet lui fut arraché de la main. Le noir en brisa le manche garni de clous comme on brise une paille, et foula sous ses pieds ce honteux instrument de vengeance. J’étais immobile de surprise, mon oncle de fureur; c’était une chose inouïe pour lui que de voir son autorité ainsi outragée. Ses yeux s’agitaient comme prêts à sortir de leur orbite; ses lèvres bleues tremblaient. L’esclave le considéra un instant d’un air calme; puis tout à coup, lui présentant avec dignité une cognée qu’il tenait à la main:

— Blanc, dit-il, si tu veux me frapper, prends au moins cette hache.

Mon oncle, qui ne se connaissait plus, aurait certainement exaucé son vœu, et se précipitait sur la hache, quand j’intervins à mon tour. Je m’emparai lestement de la cognée et je la jetai dans le puits d’une noria, qui était voisine.

— Que fais-tu? me dit mon oncle avec emportement.

— Je vous sauve, lui répondis-je, du malheur de frapper le défenseur de votre fille. C’est à cet esclave que vous devez Marie; c’est le nègre dont vous m’avez promis la liberté.

Le moment était mal choisi pour invoquer cette promesse. Mes paroles effleurèrent à peine l’esprit ulcéré du colon.

— Sa liberté! me répliqua-t-il d’un air sombre. Oui, il a mérité la fin de son esclavage. Sa liberté! nous verrons de quelle nature sera celle que lui donneront les juges de la cour martiale.

Ces paroles sinistres me glacèrent. Marie et moi le suppliâmes inutilement. Le nègre dont la négligence avait causé cette scène fut puni de la bastonnade, et l’on plongea son défenseur dans les cachots du fort Galifet, comme coupable d’avoir porté la main sur un blanc. De l’esclave au maître, c’était un crime capital.

XI

Vous jugez, messieurs, à quel point toutes ces circonstances avaient dû éveiller mon intérêt et ma curiosité. Je pris des renseignements sur le compte du prisonnier. On me révéla des particularités singulières. On m'apprit que ses compagnons semblaient avoir le plus profond respect pour ce jeune nègre. Esclave comme eux, il lui suffisait d'un signe pour s'en faire obéir. Il n'était point né dans les cases; on ne lui connaissait ni père ni mère; il y avait même peu d'années, disait-on, qu'un vaisseau négrier l'avait jeté à Saint-Domingue. Cette circonstance rendait plus remarquable encore l'empire qu'il exerçait sur tous ses compagnons, sans même en excepter les noirs créoles, qui, vous ne l'ignorez sans doute pas, messieurs, professaient ordinairement le plus profond mépris pour les nègres congos; expression impropre, et trop générale, par laquelle on désignait dans la colonie tous les esclaves amenés d'Afrique.

Quoiqu'il parut absorbé dans une noire mélancolie, sa force extraordinaire, jointe à une adresse merveilleuse, en faisait on sujet du plus grand prix pour la culture des plantations. Il tournait plus vite et plus longtemps que ne l'aurait fait le meilleur cheval les roues des norias. Il lui arrivait souvent de faire en un jour l'ouvrage de dix de ses camarades pour les soustraire aux châtiments réservés à la négligence ou à la fatigue. Aussi était-il adoré des esclaves; mais la vénération qu'ils lui portaient, toute différente de la terreur superstitieuse dont ils environnaient le fou Habibrah, semblait avoir aussi quelque cause cachée; c'était une espèce de culte.

Ce qu'il y avait d'étrange, reprenait-on, c'était de le voir aussi doux, aussi simple avec ses égaux, qui se faisaient gloire de lui obéir, que fier et hautain vis-à-vis de nos commandeurs. Il est juste de dire que ces esclaves privilégiés, anneaux intermédiaires qui liaient en quelque sorte la chaîne de la servitude à celle du despotisme, joignant à la bassesse de leur condition l'insolence de leur autorité, trouvaient un malin plaisir à l'accabler de travail et de vexations.

Il parait néanmoins qu'ils ne pouvaient s'empêcher de respecter le sentiment de fierté qui l'avait porté à outrager mon oncle. Aucun d'eux n'avait jamais osé lui infliger de punitions humiliantes. S'il leur arrivait de l'y condamner, vingt nègres se levaient pour les subir à sa place; et lui, immobile, assistait gravement à leur exécution, comme s'ils n'eussent fait que remplir un devoir. Cet homme bizarre était connu dans les cases sous le nom de Pierrot.

XII

Tous ces détails exaltèrent ma jeune imagination. Marie, pleine de reconnaissance et de compassion, applaudit à mon enthousiasme, et Pierrot s’empara si vivement de notre intérêt, que je résolus de le voir et de le servir. Je rêvais aux moyens de lui parler.

Quoique fort jeune, comme neveu de l’un des plus riches colons du Cap, j’étais capitaine des milices de la paroisse de l’Acul. Le fort Galifet était confié à leur garde, et à un détachement des dragons jaunes, dont le chef, qui était pour l’ordinaire un sous-officier de cette compagnie, avait le commandement du fort. Il se trouvait justement à cette époque que ce commandant était le frère d’un pauvre colon auquel j’avais eu le bonheur de rendre de très grands services, et qui m’était entièrement dévoué...

Ici tout l’auditoire interrompit d’Auverney en nommant Thadée.

— Vous l’avez deviné, messieurs, reprit le capitaine. Vous comprenez sans peine qu’il ne me fut pas difficile d’obtenir de lui l’entrée du cachot du nègre. J’avais le droit de visiter le fort, comme capitaine des milices. Cependant, pour ne pas inspirer de soupçons à mon oncle, dont la colère était encore toute flagrante, j’eus soin de ne m’y rendre qu’à l’heure où il faisait sa méridienne. Tous les soldats, excepté ceux de garde, étaient endormis. Guidé par Thadée, j’arrivai à la porte du cachot; Thadée l’ouvrit et se retira. J’entrai.

Le noir était assis, car il ne pouvait se tenir debout à cause de sa haute taille. Il n’était pas seul; un dogue énorme se leva en grondant et s’avança vers moi. - Rask! cria le noir. Le jeune dogue se tut, et revint se coucher aux pieds de son maître, où il acheva de dévorer quelques misérables aliments.

J’étais en uniforme; la lumière que répandait le soupirail dans cet étroit cachot était si faible que Pierrot ne pouvait distinguer qui j’étais.

— Je suis prêt, me dit-il d’un ton calme.

En achevant ces paroles, il se leva à demi.

— Je suis prêt, répéta-t-il encore.

— Je croyais, lui dis-je, surpris de la liberté de ses mouvements, je croyais que vous aviez des fers.

L’émotion faisait trembler ma voix. Le prisonnier ne parut pas la reconnaître.

Il poussa du pied quelques débris qui retentirent.

— Des fers! je les ai brisés.

Il y avait dans l’accent dont il prononça ces dernières paroles quelque chose qui semblait dire: Je ne suis pas fait pour porter des fers. Je repris:

— L’on ne m’avait pas dit qu’on vous eût laissé un chien.

— C’est moi qui l’ai fait entrer.

J’étais de plus en plus étonné. La porte du cachot était fermée en dehors d’un triple verrou. Le soupirail avait à peine six pouces de largeur, et était garni de deux barreaux de fer. Il paraît qu’il comprit le sens de mes réflexions; il se leva autant que la voûte trop basse le lui permettait, détacha sans effort une pierre énorme placée au-dessous du soupirail, enleva les deux barreaux scellés en dehors de cette pierre, et pratiqua ainsi une ouverture où deux hommes auraient pu facilement passer. Cette ouverture donnait de plain-pied sur le bois de bananiers et de cocotiers qui couvre le morne auquel le fort était adossé.

Le chien, voyant l’issue ouverte, crut que son maître voulait qu’il sortit. Il se dressa prêt à partir; un geste du noir le renvoya à sa place.

La surprise me rendait muet; tout à coup un rayon du jour éclaira vivement mon visage. Le prisonnier se redressa comme s’il eût mis par mégarde le pied sur un serpent, et son front heurta les pierres de la voûte. Un mélange indéfinissable de mille sentiments opposés, une étrange expression de haine, de bienveillance et d’étonnement douloureux, passa rapidement dans ses yeux. Mais, reprenant un subit empire sur ses pensées, sa physionomie en moins d’un instant redevint calme et froide; et il fixa avec indifférence son regard sur le mien. Il me regardait en face comme un inconnu.

— Je puis encore vivre deux jours sans manger, dit-il.

Je fis un geste d’horreur; je remarquai alors la maigreur de l’infortuné.

Il ajouta:

— Mon chien ne peut manger que de ma main; si je n’avais pu élargir le soupirail, le pauvre Rask serait mort de faim. Il vaut mieux que ce soit moi que lui, puisqu’il faut toujours que je meure.

— Non, m’écriai-je, non, vous ne mourrez pas de faim!

Il ne me comprit pas.

— Sans doute, reprit-il en souriant amèrement, j’aurais pu vivre encore deux jours sans manger; mais je suis prêt, monsieur l’officier; aujourd’hui vaut encore mieux que demain; ne faites pas de mal à Rask.

Je sentis alors ce que voulait dire son je suis prêt. Accusé d’un crime qui était puni de mort, il croyait que je venais pour le mener au supplice; et cet homme doué de forces colossales, quand tous les moyens de fuir lui étaient ouverts, doux et tranquille, répétait à un enfant: Je suis prêt!

— Ne faites pas de mal à Rask, répéta-t-il encore.

Je ne pus me contenir.

— Quoi! lui dis-je, non seulement vous me prenez pour votre bourreau, mais encore vous doutez de mon humanité envers ce pauvre chien qui ne m’a rien fait!

Il s’attendrit, sa voix s’altéra.

— Blanc, dit-il en me tendant la main, blanc, pardonne, j’aime mon chien; et, ajouta-t-il après un court silence, les tiens m’ont fait bien du mal.

Je l’embrassai, je lui serrai la main, je le détrompai.

— Ne me connaissiez-vous pas? lui dis-je.

— Je savais que tu étais un blanc, et pour les blancs, quelque bons qu’ils soient, un noir est si peu de chose! D’ailleurs, j’ai aussi à me plaindre de toi.

— Et de quoi? repris-je étonné.

— Ne m’as-tu pas conservé deux fois la vie?

Cette inculpation étrange me fit sourire. Il s’en aperçut, et poursuivit avec amertume:

— Oui, je devrais t’en vouloir. Tu m’as sauvé d’un crocodile et d’un colon; et, ce qui est pis encore, tu m’as enlevé le droit de te haïr. Je suis bien malheureux!

La singularité de son langage et de ses idées ne me surprenait presque plus. Elle était en harmonie avec lui-même.

— Je vous dois bien plus que vous ne me devez, lui dis-je. Je vous dois la vie de ma fiancée, de Marie.

Il éprouva comme une commotion électrique.

— Maria! dit-il d’une voix étouffée; et sa tête tomba sur ses mains, qui se crispaient violemment, tandis que de pénibles soupirs soulevaient les larges parois de sa poitrine.

J’avoue que mes soupçons assoupis se réveillèrent, mais sans colère et sans jalousie. J’étais trop près du bonheur, et lui trop près de la mort, pour qu’un pareil rival, s’il l’était en effet, pût exciter en moi d’autres sentiments que la bienveillance et la pitié.

Il releva enfin sa tête.

— Va! me dit-il, ne me remercie pas!

Il ajouta, après une pause:

— Je ne suis pourtant pas d’un rang inférieur au tien!

Cette parole paraissait révéler un ordre d’idées qui piquait vivement ma curiosité; je le pressai de me dire qui il était et ce qu’il avait souffert. Il garda un sombre silence.

Ma démarche l’avait touché; mes offres de service, mes prières parurent vaincre son dégoût de la vie. Il sortit, et rapporta quelques bananes et une énorme noix de coco. Puis il referma l’ouverture et se mit à manger. En causant avec lui, je remarquai qu’il parlait avec facilité le français et l’espagnol, et que son esprit ne paraissait pas dénué de culture; il savait des romances espagnoles qu’il chantait avec expression. Cet homme était si inexplicable, sous tant d’autres rapports, que jusqu’alors la pureté de son langage ne m’avait pas frappé. J’essayai de nouveau d’en savoir la cause; il se tut. Enfin je le quittai, ordonnant à mon fidèle Thadée d’avoir pour lui tous les égards et tous les soins possibles.

XIII

Je le voyais tous les jours à la même heure. Son affaire m’inquiétait; malgré mes prières, mon oncle s’obstinait à le poursuivre. Je ne cachais pas mes craintes à Pierrot; il m’écoutait avec indifférence.

Souvent Rask arrivait tandis que nous étions ensemble, portant une large feuille de palmier autour de son cou. Le noir la détachait, lisait des caractères inconnus qui y étaient tracés, puis la déchirait. J’étais habitué à ne pas lui faire de questions.

Un jour j’entrai sans qu’il parût prendre garde à moi. Il tournait le dos à la porte de son cachot, et chantait d’un ton mélancolique l’air espagnol: Yo que soy contrabandista [Moi qui suis contrebandier.]. Quand il eut fini, il se tourna brusquement vers moi, et me cria:

— Frère, promets, si jamais tu doutes de moi, d’écarter tous tes soupçons quand tu m’entendras chanter cet air.

Son regard était imposant; je lui promis ce qu’il désirait, sans trop savoir ce qu’il entendait par ces mots: Si jamais tu doutes de moi... Il prit l’écorce profonde de la noix qu’il avait cueillie le jour de ma première visite, et conservée depuis, la remplit de vin de palmier, m’engagea à y porter les lèvres, et la vida d’un trait. A compter de ce jour, il ne m’appela plus que son frère.

Cependant je commençais à concevoir quelque espérance. Mon oncle n’était plus aussi irrité. Les réjouissances de mon prochain mariage avec sa fille avaient tourné son esprit vers de plus douces idées. Marie suppliait avec moi. Je lui représentais chaque jour que Pierrot n’avait point voulu l’offenser, mais seulement l’empêcher de commettre un acte de sévérité peut-être excessive; que ce noir avait, par son audacieuse lutte avec le crocodile, préservé Marie d’une mort certaine; que nous lui devions, lui sa fille, moi ma fiancée; que, d’ailleurs, Pierrot était le plus vigoureux de ses esclaves (car je ne songeais plus à obtenir sa liberté, il ne s’agissait que de sa vie); qu’il faisait à lui seul l’ouvrage de dix autres, et qu’il suffisait de son bras pour mettre en mouvement les cylindres d’un moulin à sucre. Il m’écoutait, et me faisait entendre qu’il ne donnerait peut-être pas suite à l’accusation. Je ne disais rien au noir du changement de mon oncle, voulant jouir du plaisir de lui annoncer sa liberté tout entière, si je l’obtenais. Ce qui m’étonnait, c’était de voir que, se croyant voué à la mort, il ne profitait d’aucun des moyens de fuir qui étaient en son pouvoir. Je lui en parlai.

— Je dois rester, me répondit-il froidement; on penserait que j’ai eu peur.

XIV

Un matin, Marie vint à moi. Elle était rayonnante, et il y avait sur sa douce figure quelque chose de plus angélique encore que la joie d'un pur amour. C'était la pensée d'une bonne action.

— Ecoute, me dit-elle, c'est dans trois jours le 22 août, et notre noce. Nous allons bientôt...

Je l'interrompis.

— Marie, ne dis pas bientôt, puisqu'il y a encore trois jours!

Elle sourit et rougit.

— Ne me trouble pas, Léopold, reprit-elle; il m'est venu une idée qui te rendra content. Tu sais que je suis allée hier à la ville avec mon père pour acheter les parures de notre mariage. Ce n'est pas que je tienne à ces bijoux, à ces diamants, qui ne me rendront pas plus belle à tes yeux. Je donnerais toutes les perles du monde pour l'une de ces fleurs que m'a fanées le vilain homme au bouquet de soucis; mais n'importe. Mon père veut me combler de toutes ces choses-là, et j'ai l'air d'en avoir envie pour lui faire plaisir. Il y avait hier une basquina de satin chinois à grandes fleurs, qui était enfermée dans un coffre de bois de senteur, et que j'ai beaucoup regardée. Cela est bien cher, mais cela est bien singulier. Mon père a remarqué que cette robe frappait mon attention. En rentrant, je l'ai prié de me promettre l'octroi d'un don à la manière des anciens chevaliers; tu sais qu'il aime qu'on le compare aux anciens chevaliers. Il m'a juré sur son honneur qu'il m'accorderait la chose que je lui demanderais quelle qu'elle fût. Il croit que c'est la basquina de satin chinois; point du tout, c'est la vie de Pierrot. Ce sera mon cadeau de noces.

Je ne pus m'empêcher de serrer cet ange dans mes bras. La parole de mon oncle était sacrée; et tandis que Marie allait près de lui en réclamer l'exécution, je courus au fort Galifet annoncer a Pierrot son salut, désormais certain.

— Frère! lui criai-je en entrant, frère! réjouis toi! ta vie est sauvée, Marie l'a demandée à son père pour son présent de noces!

L'esclave tressaillit. .

— Marie! noces! ma vie! Comment tout cela peut-il aller ensemble?

— Cela est tout simple, repris-je. Marie, à qui tu as sauvé la vie, se marie.

— Avec qui? s'écria l'esclave; et son regard était égaré et terrible.

— Ne le sais-tu pas? répondis-je doucement; avec moi.

Son visage formidable redevint bienveillant et résigné.

— Ah! c'est vrai, me dit-il, c'est avec toi! Et quel est le jour?

— C'est le 22 août.

— Le 22 août! es-tu fou? reprit-il avec une expression d'angoisse et d'effroi.

Il s'arrêta. Je le regardais, étonné. Après un silence, il me serra vivement la main.

— Frère, je te dois tant qu'il faut que ma bouche te donne un avis. Crois-moi, va au Cap, et marie-toi avant le 22 août.

Je voulus en vain connaître le sens de ces paroles énigmatiques.

— Adieu, me dit-il avec solennité. J'en ai peut-être déjà trop dit; mais je hais encore plus l'ingratitude que le parjure.

Je le quittai, plein d'indécisions et d'inquiétudes qui s'effacèrent cependant bientôt dans mes pensées de bonheur.

Mon oncle retira sa plainte le jour même. Je retournai au fort pour en faire sortir Pierrot. Thadée, le sachant libre, entra avec moi dans la prison. Il n'y était plus. Rask, qui s'y trouvait seul, vint à moi d'un air caressant; à son cou était attachée une feuille de palmier; je la pris et j'y lus ces mots: Merci, tu m'as sauvé la vie une troisième fois. Frère, n'oublie pas ta promesse. Au-dessous étaient écrits, comme signature, les mots: Yo que soy contrabandista.

Thadée était encore plus étonné que moi; il ignorait le secret du soupirail, et s'imaginait que le nègre s'était changé en chien. Je lui laissai croire ce qu'il voulut, me contentant d'exiger de lui le silence sur ce qu'il avait vu.

Je voulus emmener Rask. En sortant du fort, il s'enfonça dans des haies voisines et disparut.

XV

Mon oncle fut outré de l’évasion de l’esclave. Il ordonna des recherches, et écrivit au gouverneur pour mettre Pierrot à son entière disposition si on le retrouvait.

Le 22 août arriva. Mon union avec Marie fut célébrée avec pompe à la paroisse de l’Acul. Qu’elle fut heureuse cette journée de laquelle allaient dater tous mes malheurs! J’étais enivré d’une joie qu’on ne saurait faire comprendre à qui ne l’a point éprouvée. J’avais complètement oublié Pierrot et ses sinistres avis. Le soir, bien impatiemment attendu, vint enfin. Ma jeune épouse se retira dans la chambre nuptiale, où je ne pus la suivre aussi vite que je l’aurais voulu. Un devoir fastidieux, mais indispensable, me réclamait auparavant. Mon office de capitaine des milices exigeait de moi ce soir-là une ronde aux postes de l’Acul; cette précaution était alors impérieusement commandée par les troubles de la colonie, par les révoltes partielles de noirs, qui, bien que promptement étouffées, avaient eu lieu aux mois précédents de juin et de juillet, même aux premiers jours d’août, dans les habitations Thibaud et Lagoscette, et surtout par les mauvaises dispositions des mulâtres libres, que le supplice récent du rebelle Ogé n’avait fait qu’aigrir. Mon oncle fut le premier à me rappeler mon devoir; il fallut me résigner, j’endossai mon uniforme, et je partis. Je visitai les premières stations sans rencontrer de sujet d’inquiétude; mais. vers minuit, je me promenais en rêvant près des batteries de la baie, quand j’aperçus à l’horizon une lueur rougeâtre s’élever et s’étendre du côté de Limonade et de Saint-Louis du Morin. Les soldats et moi l’attribuâmes d’abord à quelque incendie accidentel; mais, un moment après, les flammes devinrent si apparentes, la fumée, poussée par le vent, grossit et s’épaissit à un tel point, que je repris promptement le chemin du fort pour donner l’alarme et envoyer des secours. En passant près des cases de nos noirs, je fus surpris de l’agitation extraordinaire qui y régnait. La plupart étaient encore éveillés et parlaient avec la plus grande vivacité. Un nom bizarre, Bug-Jargal, prononcé avec respect, revenait souvent au milieu de leur jargon inintelligible. Je saisis pourtant quelques paroles, dont le sens me parut être que les noirs de la plaine du nord étaient en pleine révolte, et livraient aux flammes les habitations et les plantations situées de l’autre côté du Cap. En traversant un fond marécageux, je heurtai du pied un amas de haches et de pioches cachées dans les joncs et les mangliers. Justement inquiet, je fis sur-le-champ mettre sous les armes les milices de l’Acul, et j’ordonnai de surveiller les esclaves; tout rentra dans le calme.

Cependant les ravages semblaient croître à chaque instant et s’approcher du Limbé. On croyait même distinguer le bruit lointain de l’artillerie et des fusillades. Vers les deux heures du matin, mon oncle, que j’avais éveillé, ne pouvant contenir son inquiétude, m’ordonna de laisser dans l’Acul une partie des milices sous les ordres du lieutenant; et, pendant que ma pauvre Marie dormait ou m’attendait, obéissant à mon oncle, qui était, comme je l’ai déjà dit, membre de l’assemblée provinciale, je pris avec le reste des soldats le chemin du Cap.

Je n’oublierai jamais l’aspect de cette ville, quand j’en approchai. Les flammes, qui dévoraient les plantations autour d’elle, y répandaient une sombre lumière, obscurcie par les torrents de fumée que le vent chassait dans les rues. Des tourbillons d’étincelles, formés par les menus débris embrasés des cannes à sucre, et emportés avec violence comme une neige abondante sur les toits des maisons et sur les agrès des vaisseaux mouillés dans la rade, menaçaient à chaque instant la ville du Cap d’un incendie non moins déplorable que celui dont ses environs étaient la proie. C’était un spectacle affreux et imposant que de voir d’un côté les pâles habitants exposant encore leur vie pour disputer au fléau terrible l’unique toit qui allait leur rester de tant de richesses; tandis que, de l’autre, les navires, redoutant le même sort, et favorisés du moins par ce vent si funeste aux malheureux colons, s’éloignaient à pleines voiles sur une mer teinte des feux sanglants de l’incendie.

XVI

Etourdi par le canon des forts, les clameurs des fuyards et le fracas lointain des écroulements, je ne savais de quel côté diriger mes soldats, quand je rencontrai sur la place d'armes le capitaine des dragons jaunes, qui nous servit de guide. Je ne m'arrêterai pas, messieurs, à vous décrire le tableau que nous offrit la plaine incendiée. Assez d'autres ont dépeint ces premiers désastres du Cap, et j'ai besoin de passer vite sur ces souvenirs où il y a du sang et du feu. Je me bornerai à vous dire que les esclaves rebelles étaient, disait-on, déjà maîtres du Dondon, du Terrier-Rouge, du bourg d'Ouanaminte, et même des malheureuses plantations du Limbé, ce qui me remplissait d'inquiétudes à cause du voisinage de l'Acul.

Je me rendis en hâte à l'hôtel du gouverneur, M. de Blanchelande. Tout y était dans la confusion, jusqu'à la tête du maître. Je lui demandai des ordres, en le priant de songer le plus vite possible à la sûreté de l'Acul, que l'on croyait déjà menacée. Il avait auprès de lui M. de Rouvray, maréchal de camp et l'un des principaux propriétaires de l'île, M. de Touzard, lieutenant-colonel du régiment du Cap, quelques membres des assemblées coloniale et provinciale, et plusieurs des colons les plus notables. Au moment où je me présentai, cette espèce de conseil délibérait tumultueusement.

— Monsieur le gouverneur, disait un membre de l'assemblée provinciale, cela n'est que trop vrai; ce sont les esclaves, et non les sang-mêlés libres; il y a longtemps que nous l'avions annoncé et prédit.

— Vous le disiez sans y croire, répartit aigrement un membre de l'assemblée coloniale appelée générale. Vous le disiez pour vous donner crédit à nos dépens; et vous étiez si loin de vous attendre à une rébellion réelle des esclaves, que ce sont les intrigues de votre assemblée qui ont stimulé, dès 1789, cette fameuse et ridicule révolte des trois mille noirs sur le morne du Cap; révolte où il n'y a eu qu'un volontaire national de tué, encore l'a-t-il été par ses propres camarades!

— Je vous répète, reprit le provincial, que nous voyons plus clair que vous. Cela est simple. Nous restions ici pour observer les affaires de la colonie, tandis que votre assemblée en masse allait en France se faire décerner cette ovation risible, qui s'est terminée par les réprimandes de la représentation nationale: ridiculus mus!

Le membre de l’assemblée coloniale répondit avec un dédain amer:

— Nos concitoyens nous ont réélus à l’unanimité!

— C’est vous, répliqua l’autre, ce sont vos exagérations qui ont fait promener la tête de ce malheureux qui s’était montré sans cocarde tricolore dans un café, et qui ont fait pendre le mulâtre Lacombe pour une pétition qui commençait par ces mots inusités: - Au nom du Père, du Fils et du Saint-Esprit!

— Cela est faux, s’écria le membre de l’assemblée générale. C’est la lutte des principes et celle des privilèges, des bossus et des crochus!

— Je l’ai toujours pensé, monsieur, vous êtes un indépendant!

A ce reproche du membre de l’assemblée provinciale, son adversaire répondit d’un air de triomphe:

— C’est confesser que vous êtes un pompon blanc! Je vous laisse sous le poids d’un pareil aveu!

La querelle eût peut-être été poussée plus loin, si le gouverneur ne fût intervenu.

— Eh, messieurs! en quoi cela a-t-il trait au danger imminent qui nous menace? Conseillez-moi, et ne vous injuriez pas. Voici les rapports qui me sont parvenus. La révolte a commencé cette nuit à dix heures du soir parmi les nègres de l’habitation Turpin. Les esclaves commandés par un nègre anglais nommé Boukmann, ont entraîné les ateliers des habitations Clément, Trémès, Flaville et Noé. Ils ont incendié toutes les plantations et massacré les colons avec des cruautés inouïes. Je vous en ferai comprendre toute l’horreur par un seul détail. Leur étendard est le corps d’un enfant porté au bout d’une pique.

Un frémissement interrompit M. de Blanchelande.

— Voilà ce qui se passe au-dehors, poursuivit-il. Au-dedans, tout est bouleversé. Plusieurs habitants du Cap ont tué leurs esclaves; la peur les a rendus cruels. Les plus doux ou les plus braves se sont bornés à les enfermer sous bonne clef. Les petits blancs [Blancs non propriétaires exerçant dans la colonie une industrie quelconque.] accusent de ces désastres les sang-mêlés libres. Plusieurs mulâtres ont failli être victimes de la fureur populaire. Je leur ai fait donner pour asile une église gardée par un bataillon. Maintenant, pour prouver qu’ils ne sont point d’intelligence avec les noirs révoltés, les sang-mêlés me font demander un poste à défendre et des armes.

— N’en faites rien! cria une voix que je reconnus: c’était celle du planteur soupçonné d’être sang-mêlé, avec qui j’avais eu un duel. N’en faites rien, monsieur le gouverneur, ne donnez point d’armes aux mulâtres.

— Vous ne voulez donc point vous battre? dit brusquement un colon.

L’autre ne parut point entendre, et continua:

— Les sang-mêlés sont nos pires ennemis. Eux seuls sont à craindre pour nous. Je conviens qu’on ne pouvait s’attendre qu’à une révolte de leur part et non de celle des esclaves. Est-ce que les esclaves sont quelque chose?

Le pauvre homme espérait par ces invectives contre les mulâtres s’en séparer tout à fait, et détruire dans l’esprit des blancs qui l’écoutaient l’opinion qui le rejetait dans cette caste méprisée. Il y avait trop de lâcheté dans cette combinaison pour qu’elle réussît. Un murmure de désapprobation le lui fit sentir.

— Oui. monsieur, dit le vieux maréchal de camp de Rouvray, oui, les esclaves sont quelque chose; ils sont quarante contre trois; et nous serions à plaindre si nous n’avions à opposer aux nègres et aux mulâtres que des blancs comme vous.

Le colon se mordit les lèvres.

— Monsieur le général, reprit le gouverneur, que pensez-vous donc de la pétition des mulâtres?

— Donnez-leur des armes, monsieur le gouverneur! répondit M. de Rouvray; faisons voile de toute étoffe! Et, se tournant vers le colon suspect: - Entendez-vous, monsieur? allez vous armer.

Le colon humilié sortit avec tous les signes d’une rage concentrée.

Cependant la clameur d’angoisse qui éclatait dans toute la ville se faisait entendre de moments en moments jusque chez le gouverneur, et rappelait aux membres de cette conférence le sujet qui les rassemblait. M. de Blanchelande remit à un aide de camp un ordre au crayon écrit à la hâte, et rompit le silence sombre avec lequel l’assemblée écoutait cette effrayante rumeur.

— Les sang-mêlés vont être armés, messieurs, mais il reste bien d’autres mesures à prendre.

— Il faut convoquer l’assemblée provinciale, dit le membre de cette assemblée qui avait parlé au moment ou j’étais entré.

— L’assemblée provinciale! reprit son antagoniste de l’assemblée coloniale. Qu’est-ce que c’est que l’assemblée provinciale?

— Parce que vous êtes membre de l’assemblée coloniale! répliqua le pompon blanc.

L’indépendant l’interrompit.

— Je ne connais pas plus la coloniale que la provinciale. Il n’y a que l’assemblée générale, entendez-vous, monsieur?

— Eh bien, repartit le pompon blanc, je vous dirai, moi, qu’il n’y a que l’assemblée nationale de Paris.

— Convoquer l’assemblée provinciale! répétait l’indépendant en riant; comme si elle n’était pas dissoute au moment où la générale a décidé qu’elle tiendrait ses séances ici.

Une réclamation universelle éclatait dans l’auditoire, ennuyé de cette discussion oiseuse.

— Messieurs nos députés, criait un entrepreneur de cultures, pendant que vous vous occupez de ces balivernes, que deviennent mes cotonniers et ma cochenille?

— Et mes quatre cent mille plants d’indigo au Limbé! ajoutait un planteur.

— Et mes nègres, payés trente dollars par tête l’un dans l’autre! disait un capitaine de négriers.

— Chaque minute que vous perdez, poursuivait un autre colon, me coûte, montre et tarif en main, dix quintaux de sucre, ce qui, à dix-sept piastres fortes le quintal, fait cent soixante-dix piastres, ou neuf cent trente livres dix sous, monnaie de France!

— La coloniale, que vous appelez générale, usurpe! reprenait l’autre disputeur, dominant le tumulte à force de voix; qu’elle reste au Port-au-Prince à fabriquer des décrets pour deux lieues de terrain et deux jours de durée, mais qu’elle nous laisse tranquilles ici. Le Cap appartient au congrès provincial du nord, à lui seul!

— Je prétends, reprenait l’indépendant, que son excellence monsieur le gouverneur n’a pas droit de convoquer une autre assemblée que l’assemblée générale des représentants de la colonie, présidée par M. de Cadusch!

— Mais où est-il, votre président M. de Cadusch? demanda le pompon blanc; où est votre assemblée? il n’y en a pas encore quatre membres d’arrivés, tandis que la provinciale est toute ici. Est-ce que vous voudriez par hasard représenter à vous seul une assemblée, toute une colonie?

Cette rivalité des deux députés, fidèles échos de leurs assemblées respectives, exigea encore une fois l’intervention du gouverneur.

— Messieurs, où voulez-vous donc enfin en venir avec vos éternelles assemblées provinciale, générale, coloniale, nationale? Aiderez-vous aux décisions de cette assemblée en lui en faisant invoquer trois ou quatre autres?

— Morbleu! criait d’une voix de tonnerre le général de Rouvray en frappant violemment sur la table du conseil, quels maudits bavards! J’aimerais mieux lutter de poumons avec une pièce de vingt-quatre. Que nous font ces deux assemblées, qui se disputent le pas comme deux compagnies de grenadiers qui vont monter à l’assaut! Eh bien! convoquez-les toutes deux, monsieur le gouverneur, j’en ferai deux régiments pour marcher contre les noirs; et nous verrons si leurs fusils feront autant de bruit que leurs langues.

Après cette vigoureuse sortie, il se pencha vers son voisin (c’était moi), et dit à demi-voix: - Que voulez-vous que fasse entre les deux assemblées de Saint-Domingue, qui se prétendent souveraines, un gouverneur de par le roi de France? Ce sont les beaux parleurs et les avocats qui gâtent tout, ici comme dans la métropole. Si j’avais l’honneur d’être monsieur le lieutenant-général pour le roi, je jetterais toute cette canaille à la porte. Je dirais: Le roi règne, et moi je gouverne. J’enverrais la responsabilité par-devant les soi-disant représentants à tous les diables; et avec douze croix de Saint-Louis, promises au nom de sa majesté, je balaierais tous les rebelles dans l’île de la Tortue, qui a été habitée autrefois par des brigands comme eux, les boucaniers. Souvenez-vous de ce que je vous dis, jeune homme. Les philosophes ont enfanté les philanthropes, qui ont procréé les négrophiles, qui produisent les mangeurs de blancs, ainsi nommés en attendant qu’on leur trouve un nom grec ou latin. Ces prétendues idées libérales dont on s’enivre en France sont un poison sous les tropiques. Il fallait traiter les nègres avec douceur, non les appeler à un affranchissement subit. Toutes les horreurs que vous voyez aujourd’hui à Saint-Domingue sont nées au club Massiac, et l’insurrection des esclaves n’est qu’un contrecoup de la chute de la Bastille.

Pendant que le vieux soldat m’exposait ainsi sa politique étroite, mais pleine de franchise et de conviction, l’orageuse discussion continuait. Un colon, du petit nombre de ceux qui partageaient la frénésie révolutionnaire, qui se faisait appeler le citoyen-général C, pour avoir présidé à quelques sanglantes exécutions, s’était écrié:

— Il faut plutôt des supplices que des combats. Les nations veulent des exemples terribles: épouvantons les noirs! C’est moi qui ai apaisé les révoltes de juin et de juillet, en faisant planter cinquante têtes d’esclaves des deux côtés de l’avenue de mon habitation, en guise de palmiers. Que chacun se cotise pour la proposition que je vais faire. Défendons les approches du Cap avec les nègres qui nous restent encore.

— Comment! quelle imprudence! répondit-on de toutes parts.

— Vous ne me comprenez pas, messieurs, reprit le citoyen-général. Faisons un cordon de têtes de nègres qui entoure la ville, du fort Picolet à la pointe de Caracol; leurs camarades insurgés n’oseront approcher. Il faut se sacrifier pour la cause commune dans un semblable moment. Je me dévoue le premier. J’ai cinq cents esclaves non révoltés; je les offre.

Un mouvement d’horreur accueillit cette exécrable proposition.

— C’est abominable! c’est horrible! s’écrièrent toutes les voix.

— Ce sont des mesures de ce genre qui ont tout perdu, dit un colon. Si on ne s’était pas tant pressé d’exécuter les derniers révoltés de juin, de juillet et d’août, on aurait pu saisir le fil de leur conspiration, que la hache du bourreau a coupé.

Le citoyen C garda un moment le silence du dépit, puis il murmura entre ses dents:

— Je croyais pourtant ne pas être suspect. Je suis lié avec des négrophiles; je corresponds avec Brissot et Pruneau de Pomme-Gouge, en France; Hans-Sloane, en Angleterre; Magaw, en Amérique; Pezll, en Allemagne; Olivarius, en Danemark; Wadstrohm, en Suède; Peter Paulus, en Hollande; Avendano, en Espagne; et l’abbé Pierre Tamburini, en ltalie!

Sa voix s’élevait à mesure qu’il avançait dans sa nomenclature de négrophiles. Il termina enfin, en disant:

— Mais il n’y a point ici de philosophes!

M. de Blanchelande, pour la troisième fois, demanda à recueillir les conseils de chacun.

— Monsieur le gouverneur, dit une voix, voici mon avis. Embarquons-nous tous sur le Léopard, qui est mouillé dans la rade.

— Mettons à prix la tête de Boukmann, dit un autre.

— Informons de tout ceci le gouverneur de la Jamaïque, dit un troisième.

— Oui, pour qu’il nous envoie encore une fois le secours dérisoire de cinq cents fusils, reprit un député de l’assemblée provinciale. Monsieur le gouverneur, envoyez un aviso en France, et attendons!

— Attendre! attendre! interrompit M. de Rouvray avec force. Et les noirs attendront-ils? Et la flamme qui circonscrit déjà cette ville attendra-t-elle? Monsieur de Touzard, faites battre la générale, prenez du canon, et allez trouver le gros des rebelles avec vos grenadiers et vos chasseurs. Monsieur le gouverneur, faites faire des camps dans les paroisses de l’est; établissez des postes au Trou et à Vallières; je me charge, moi, des plaines du fort Dauphin. J’y dirigerai les travaux; mon grand-père, qui était mestre-de-camp du régiment de Normandie, a servi sous M. le maréchal de Vauban; j’ai étudié Folard et Bezout, et j’ai quelque pratique de la défense d’un pays. D’ailleurs les plaines du fort Dauphin, presque enveloppées par la mer et les frontières espagnoles, ont la forme d’une presqu’île, et se protégeront en quelque sorte d’elles-mêmes; la presqu’île du Mole offre un semblable avantage. Usons de tout cela, et agissons!

Le langage énergique et positif du vétéran fit taire subitement toutes les discordances de voix et d’opinions. Le général était dans le vrai. Cette conscience que chacun a de son intérêt véritable rallia tous les avis à celui de M. de Rouvray; et tandis que le gouverneur, par un serrement de main reconnaissant, témoignait au brave officier général qu’il sentait la valeur de ses conseils, bien qu’ils fussent énoncés comme des ordres, et l’importance de son secours, tous les colons réclamaient la prompte exécution des mesures indiquées.

Les deux députés des assemblées rivales, seuls, semblaient se séparer de l’adhésion générale, et murmuraient dans leur coin les mots d’empiétement du pouvoir exécutif, de décision hâtive et de responsabilité.

Je saisis ce moment pour obtenir de M. de Blanchelande les ordres que je sollicitais impatiemment; et je sortis afin de rallier ma troupe et de reprendre sur-le-champ le chemin de l’Acul, malgré la fatigue que tous sentaient, excepté moi.

XVII

Le jour commençait à poindre. J'étais sur la place d'armes, réveillant les miliciens couchés sur leurs manteaux, pêle- mêle avec les dragons jaunes et rouges, les fuyards de la plaine, les bestiaux bêlant et mugissant, et les bagages de tout genre apportés dans la ville par les planteurs des environs.

Je commençais à retrouver ma petite troupe dans ce désordre, quand je vis un dragon jaune, couvert de sueur et de poussière, accourir vers moi à toute bride. J'allais à sa rencontre, et, au peu de paroles entrecoupées qui lui échappèrent, j'appris avec consternation que mes craintes s'étaient réalisées; que la révolte avait gagné les plaines de l'Acul, et que les noirs assiégeaient le fort Galifet, où s'étaient enfermés les milices et les colons. Il faut vous dire que ce fort Galifet était fort peu de chose; on appelait fort à Saint-Domingue tout ouvrage en terre.

Il n'y avait donc pas un moment à perdre. Je fis prendre des chevaux à ceux de mes soldats pour qui je pus en trouver; et, guidé par le dragon, j'arrivai sur les domaines de mon oncle vers dix heures du matin.

Je donnai à peine un regard à ces immenses plantations qui n'étaient plus qu'une mer de flammes, bondissant sur la plaine avec de grosses vagues de fumée, à travers lesquelles le vent emportait de temps en temps, comme des étincelles, de grands troncs d'arbres hérissés de feux. Un pétillement effrayant, mêlé de craquements et de murmures, semblait répondre aux hurlements lointains des noirs, que nous entendions déjà sans les voir encore. Moi, je n'avais qu'une pensée, et l'évanouissement de tant de richesses qui m'étaient réservées ne pouvait m'en distraire, c'était le salut de Marie. Marie sauvée, que m'importait le reste! Je la savais renfermée dans le fort, et je ne demandais à Dieu que d'arriver à temps. Cette espérance seule me soutenait dans mes angoisses et me donnait un courage et des forces de lion.

Enfin un tournant de la route nous laissa voir le fort Galifet. Le drapeau tricolore flottait encore sur la plate-forme, et un feu bien nourri couronnait le contour de ses murs. Je poussai un cri de joie. - Au galop, piquez des deux! lâchez les brides! criai-je à mes camarades. Et, redoublant de vitesse, nous nous dirigeâmes vers le fort, au bas duquel on apercevait la maison de mon oncle, portes et fenêtres brisées, mais debout encore, et rouge des reflets de l’embrasement, qui ne l’avait pas atteinte, parce que le vent soufflait de la mer et qu’elle est isolée des plantations.

Une multitude de nègres, embusqués dans cette maison, se montraient à la fois à toutes les croisées et jusque sur le toit; et les torches, les piques, les haches, brillaient au milieu de coups de fusil qu’ils ne cessaient de tirer contre le fort, tandis qu’une autre foule de leurs camarades montait, tombait, et remontait sans cesse autour des murs assiégés qu’ils avaient chargés d’échelles. Ce flot de noirs, toujours repoussé et toujours renaissant sur ces murailles grises, ressemblait de loin à un essaim de fourmis essayant de gravir l’écaille d’une grande tortue, et dont le lent animal se débarrassait par une secousse d’intervalle en intervalle.

Nous touchions enfin aux premières circonvallations du fort. Les regards fixés sur le drapeau qui le dominait, j’encourageai mes soldats au nom de leurs familles renfermées comme la mienne dans ces murs que nous allions secourir. Une acclamation générale me répondit, et, formant mon petit escadron en colonne, je me préparai à donner le signal de charger le troupeau assiégeant.

En ce moment un grand cri s’éleva de l’enceinte du fort, un tourbillon de fumée enveloppa l’édifice tout entier, roula quelque temps ses plis autour des murs, d’où s’échappait une rumeur pareille au bruit d’une fournaise, et, en s’éclaircissant, nous laissa voir le fort Galifet surmonté d’un drapeau rouge. - Tout était fini!

XVIII

Je ne vous dirai pas ce qui se passa en moi à cet horrible spectacle. Le fort pris, ses défenseurs égorgés, vingt familles massacrées, tout ce désastre général, je l'avouerai à ma honte, ne m'occupa pas un instant. Marie perdue pour moi! perdue pour moi peu d'heures après celle qui me l'avait donnée pour jamais! perdue pour moi par ma faute, puisque, si je ne l'avais pas quittée la nuit précédente pour courir au Cap sur l'ordre de mon oncle, j'aurais pu du moins la défendre ou mourir près d'elle et avec elle, ce qui n'eût, en quelque sorte, pas été la perdre! Ces pensées de désolation égarèrent ma douleur jusqu'à la folie. Mon désespoir était du remords.

Cependant mes compagnons, exaspérés, avaient crié: vengeance! nous nous étions précipités le sabre aux dents, les pistolets aux deux poings, au milieu des insurgés vainqueurs. Quoique bien supérieurs en nombre, les noirs fuyaient à notre approche, mais nous les voyions distinctement à droite et à gauche, devant et derrière nous, massacrant les blancs et se hâtant d'incendier le fort.

Notre fureur s'accroissait de leur lâcheté.

A une poterne du fort, Thadée, couvert de blessures, se présenta devant moi.

— Mon capitaine, me dit-il, votre Pierrot est un sorcier, un obi, comme disent ces damnés nègres, ou au moins un diable. Nous tenions bon; vous arriviez, et tout était sauvé, quand il a pénétré dans le fort, je ne sais par où, et voyez! - Quant à monsieur votre oncle, à sa famille, à madame...

— Marie! interrompis- je, où est Marie?

En ce moment un grand noir sortit de derrière une palissade enflammée, emportant une jeune femme qui criait et se débattait dans ses bras. La jeune femme était Marie; le noir était Pierrot.

— Perfide! lui criai- je.

Je dirigeai un pistolet vers lui; un des esclaves révoltés se jeta au-devant de la balle, et tomba mort. Pierrot se retourna, et parut m'adresser quelques paroles; puis il s'enfonça avec sa proie au milieu des touffes de cannes embrasées. Un instant après, un chien énorme passa à sa suite, tenant dans sa gueule un berceau, dans lequel était le dernier enfant de mon oncle. Je reconnus aussi le chien; c'était Rask. Transporté de rage, je déchargeai sur lui mon second pistolet; mais je le manquai.

Je me mis à courir comme un insensé sur sa trace; mais ma double course nocturne, tant d’heures passées sans prendre de repos et de nourriture, mes craintes pour Marie, le passage subit du comble du bonheur au dernier terme du malheur, toutes ces violentes émotions de l’âme m’avaient épuisé plus encore que les fatigues du corps. Après quelques pas je chancelai; un nuage se répandit sur mes yeux, et je tombai évanoui.

XIX

Quand je me réveillai, j’étais dans la maison dévastée de mon oncle et dans les bras de Thadée. Cet excellent Thadée fixait sur moi des yeux pleins d’anxiété.

— Victoire! cria-t-il dès qu’il sentit mon pouls se ranimer sous sa main, victoire! les nègres sont en déroute, et le capitaine est ressuscité!

J’interrompis son cri de joie par mon éternelle question:

— Où est Marie?

Je n’avais point encore rallié mes idées; il ne me restait que le sentiment et non le souvenir de mon malheur. Thadée baissa la tête. Alors toute ma mémoire me revint; je me retraçai mon horrible nuit de noces, et le grand nègre emportant Marie dans ses bras à travers les flammes s’offrit à moi comme une infernale vision. L’affreuse lumière qui venait d’éclater dans la colonie, et de montrer à tous les blancs des ennemis dans leurs esclaves, me fit voir dans ce Pierrot, si bon, si généreux, si dévoué, qui me devait trois fois la vie, un ingrat, un monstre, un rival! L’enlèvement de ma femme, la nuit même de notre union, me prouvait ce que j’avais d’abord soupçonné, et je reconnus enfin clairement que le chanteur du pavillon n’était autre que l’exécrable ravisseur de Marie. Pour si peu d’heures, que de changements! Thadée me dit qu’il avait vainement poursuivi Pierrot et son chien; que les nègres s’étaient retirés, quoique leur nombre eût pu facilement écraser ma faible troupe, et que l’incendie des propriétés de ma famille continuait sans qu’il fût possible de l’arrêter.

Je lui demandai si l’on savait ce qu’était devenu mon oncle, dans la chambre duquel on m’avait apporté. Il me prit la main en silence, et, me conduisant vers l’alcôve, il en tira les rideaux.

Mon malheureux oncle était là, gisant sur son lit ensanglanté, un poignard profondément enfoncé dans le cœur. Au calme de sa figure, on voyait qu’il avait été frappé dans le sommeil. La couche du nain Habibrah, qui dormait habituellement à ses pieds, était aussi tachée de sang, et les mêmes souillures se faisaient remarquer sur la veste chamarrée du pauvre fou, jetée à terre à quelques pas du lit.

Je ne doutai pas que le bouffon ne fût mort victime de son attachement connu pour mon oncle, et n’eût été massacré par ses camarades, peut-être en défendant son maître. Je me reprochai amèrement ces préventions qui m’avaient fait porter de si faux jugements sur Habibrah et sur Pierrot; je mêlai aux larmes que m’arracha la fin prématurée de mon oncle quelques regrets pour son fou. D’après mes ordres, on rechercha son corps, mais en vain. Je supposai que les nègres avaient emporté et jeté le nain dans les flammes; et j’ordonnai que, dans le service funèbre de mon beau-père, des prières fussent dites pour le repos de l’âme du fidèle Habibrah.

XX

Le fort Galifet était détruit, nos habitations avaient disparu; un plus long séjour sur ces ruines était inutile et impossible. Dès le soir même, nous retournâmes au Cap.

Là, une fièvre ardente me saisit. L’effort que j’avais fait sur moi-même pour dompter mon désespoir était trop violent. Le ressort, trop tendu, se brisa. Je tombai dans le délire. Toutes mes espérances trompées, mon amour profané, mon amitié trahie, mon avenir perdu, et par-dessus tout l’implacable jalousie, égarèrent ma raison. Il me semblait que des flammes ruisselaient dans mes veines; ma tête se rompait; j’avais des furies dans le cœur. Je me représentais Marie au pouvoir d’un autre amant, au pouvoir d’un maître, d’un esclave, de Pierrot! On m’a dit qu’alors je m’élançais de mon lit, et qu’il fallait six hommes pour m’empêcher de me fracasser le crâne sur l’angle des murs.

Que ne suis-je mort alors! Cette crise passa. Les médecins, les soins de Thadée, et je ne sais quelle force de la vie dans la jeunesse, vainquirent le mal, ce mal qui aurait pu être un si grand bien. Je guéris au bout de dix jours, et je ne m’en affligeai pas. Je fus content de pouvoir vivre encore quelque temps, pour la vengeance.

A peine convalescent, j’allai chez M. de Blanchelande demander du service. Il voulait me donner un poste à défendre; je le conjurai de m’incorporer comme volontaire dans l’une des colonnes mobiles que l’on envoyait de temps en temps contre les noirs pour balayer le pays.

On avait fortifié le Cap à la hâte. L’insurrection faisait des progrès effrayants. Les nègres de Port-au-Prince commençaient à s’agiter; Biassou commandait ceux du Limbé, du Dondon et de l’Acul; Jean-François s’était fait proclamer généralissime des révoltés de la plaine de Maribarou; Boukmann, célèbre depuis par sa fin tragique, parcourait avec ses brigands les bords de la Limonade; et enfin les bandes du Morne-Rouge avaient reconnu pour chef un nègre nommé Bug-Jargal.

Le caractère de ce dernier, si l’on en croyait les relations, contrastait d’une manière singulière avec la férocité des autres. Tandis que Boukmann et Biassou inventaient mille genres de mort pour les prisonniers qui tombaient entre leurs mains, Bug-Jargal s’empressait de leur fournir les moyens de quitter l’île. Les premiers contractaient des marchés avec les lanches espagnoles qui croisaient autour des côtes, et leur vendaient d'avance les dépouilles des malheureux qu'ils forçaient à fuir; Bug-Jargal coula à fond plusieurs de ces corsaires. M. Colas de Maigné et huit autres colons distingués furent détachés par ses ordres de la roue où Boukmann les avait fait lier. On citait de lui mille autres traits de générosité qu'il serait trop long de vous rapporter.

Mon espoir de vengeance ne paraissait pas près de s'accomplir. Je n'entendais plus parler de Pierrot. Les rebelles commandés par Biassou continuaient d'inquiéter le Cap, ils avaient même une fois osé aborder le morne qui domine la ville, et le canon de la citadelle avait eu de la peine à les repousser. Le gouverneur résolut de les refouler dans l'intérieur de l'île. Les milices de l'Acul, du Limbé, d'Ouanaminte et de Maribarou, réunies au régiment du Cap et aux redoutables compagnies jaune et rouge, constituaient notre armée active. Les milices du Dondon et du Quartier-Dauphin, renforcées d'un corps de volontaires, sous les ordres du négociant Poncignon, formaient la garnison de la ville.

Le gouverneur voulut d'abord se délivrer de Bug-Jargal, dont la diversion l'alarmait. Il envoya contre lui les milices d'Ouanaminte et un bataillon du Cap. Ce corps rentra deux jours après complètement battu. Le gouverneur s'obstina à vouloir vaincre Bug-Jargal; il fit repartir le même corps avec un renfort de cinquante dragons jaunes et de quatre cents miliciens de Maribarou. Cette seconde armée fut encore plus maltraitée que la première.

Thadée, qui était de cette expédition, en conçut un violent dépit, et me jura à son retour qu'il s'en vengerait sur Bug- Jargal.

Une larme roula dans les yeux de d'Auverney; il croisa les bras sur sa poitrine, et parut quelques minutes plongé dans une rêverie douloureuse; enfin il reprit.

XXI

— La nouvelle arriva que Bug-Jargal avait quitté le Morne-Rouge, et dirigeait sa troupe par les montagnes pour se joindre à Biassou. Le gouverneur sauta de joie: - Nous les tenons, dit-il en se frottant les mains. Le lendemain l’armée coloniale était à une lieue en avant du Cap, Les insurgés, à notre approche, abandonnèrent précipitamment Port- Margot et le fort Galifet, où ils avaient établi un poste défendu par de grosses pièces d’artillerie de siège, enlevées à des batteries de la côte; toutes les bandes se replièrent vers les montagnes. Le gouverneur était triomphant. Nous poursuivîmes notre marche. Chacun de nous, en passant dans ces plaines arides et désolées, cherchait à saluer encore d’un triste regard le lieu où étaient ses champs, ses habitations, ses richesses; souvent il n’en pouvait reconnaître la place.

Quelquefois notre marche était arrêtée par des embrasements qui des champs cultivés s’étaient communiqués aux forêts et aux savanes. Dans ces climats, où la terre est encore vierge, où la végétation est surabondante, l’incendie d’une forêt est accompagné de phénomènes singuliers. On l’entend de loin, souvent même avant de le voir, sourdre et bruire avec le fracas d’une cataracte diluviale. Les troncs d’arbres qui éclatent, les branches qui pétillent, les racines qui craquent dans le sol, les grandes herbes qui frémissent, le bouillonnement des lacs et des marais enfermés dans la forêt, le sifflement de la flamme qui dévore l’air, jettent une rumeur qui tantôt s’apaise, tantôt redouble avec les progrès de l’embrasement. Parfois on voit une verte lisière d’arbres encore intacts entourer longtemps le foyer flamboyant. Tout à coup une langue de feu débouche par l’une des extrémités de cette fraîche ceinture, un serpent de flamme bleuâtre court rapidement le long des tiges, et en un clin d’oeil le front de la forêt disparaît sous un voile d’or mouvant; tout brûle à la fois. Alors un dais de fumée s’abaisse de temps à autre sous le souffle du vent, et enveloppe les flammes. Il se roule et se déroule, s’élève et s’affaisse, se dissipe et s’épaissit, devient tout à coup noir; puis une sorte de frange de feu en découpe vivement tous les bords, un grand bruit se fait entendre, la frange s’efface, la fumée remonte, et verse en s’envolant un flot de cendre rouge, qui pleut longtemps sur la terre.

Le soir du troisième jour, nous entrâmes dans les gorges de la Grande-Rivière. On estimait que les noirs étaient à vingt lieues dans la montagne.

Nous assîmes notre camp sur un mornet qui paraissait leur avoir servi au même usage, à la manière dont il était dépouillé. Cette position n'était pas heureuse; il est vrai que nous étions tranquilles. Le mornet était dominé de tous côtés par des rochers à pic, couverts d'épaisses forêts. L'aspérité de ces escarpements avait fait donner à ce lieu le nom de Dompte-Mulâtre. La Grande-Rivière coulait derrière le camp; resserrée entre deux côtes, elle était dans cet endroit étroite et profonde. Ses bords, brusquement inclinés, se hérissaient de touffes de buissons impénétrables à la vue. Souvent même ses eaux étaient cachées par des guirlandes de lianes, qui, s'accrochant aux branches des érables à fleurs rouges semés parmi les buissons, mariaient leurs jets d'une rive à l'autre, et, se croisant de mille manières, formaient sur le fleuve de larges tentes de verdure, l'oeil qui les contemplait du haut des roches voisines croyait voir des prairies humides encore de rosée. Un bruit sourd, ou quelquefois une sarcelle sauvage, perçant tout à coup ce rideau fleuri, décelaient seuls le cours de la rivière.

Le soleil cessa bientôt de dorer la cime aiguë des monts lointains du Dondon; peu à peu l'ombre s'étendit sur le camp, et le silence ne fut plus troublé que par les cris de la grue et les pas mesurés des sentinelles.

Tout à coup les redoutables chants d'Oua-Nassé et du Camp du Grand Pré se firent entendre sur nos têtes; les palmiers, les acomas et les cèdres qui couronnaient les rocs s'embrasèrent, et les clartés livides de l'incendie nous montrèrent sur les sommets voisins de nombreuses bandes de nègres et de mulâtres dont le teint cuivré paraissait rouge à la lueur des flammes. C'étaient ceux de Biassou.

Le danger était imminent. Les chefs s'éveillant en sursaut coururent rassembler leurs soldats; le tambour battit la générale; la trompette sonna l'alarme; nos lignes se formèrent en tumulte, et les révoltés, au lieu de profiter du désordre où nous étions, immobiles, nous regardaient en chantant Oua-Nassé.

Un noir gigantesque parut seul sur le plus élevé des pics secondaires qui encaissent la Grande-Rivière; une plume couleur de feu flottait sur son front; une hache était dans sa main droite, un drapeau rouge dans sa main gauche; je reconnus Pierrot! Si une carabine se fût trouvée à ma portée, la rage m’aurait peut-être fait commettre une lâcheté. Le noir répéta le refrain d’Oua-Nassé, planta son drapeau sur le pic, lança sa hache au milieu de nous, et s’engloutit dans les flots du fleuve. Un regret s’éleva en moi, car je crus qu’il ne mourrait plus de ma main.

Alors les noirs commencèrent à rouler sur nos colonnes d’énormes quartiers de rochers; une grêle de balles et de flèches tomba sur le mornet. Nos soldats, furieux de ne pouvoir atteindre les assaillants, expiraient en désespérés, écrasés par les rochers, criblés de balles ou percés de flèches. Une horrible confusion régnait dans l’armée. Soudain un bruit affreux parut sortir du milieu de la Grande-Rivière. Une scène extraordinaire s’y passait, les dragons jaunes, extrêmement maltraités par les masses que les rebelles poussaient du haut des montagnes, avaient conçu l’idée de se réfugier, pour y échapper, sous les voûtes flexibles de lianes dont le fleuve était couvert. Thadée avait le premier mis en avant ce moyen, d’ailleurs ingénieux...

Ici le narrateur fut soudainement interrompu.

XXIII

Il y avait plus d'un quart d'heure que le sergent Thadée, le bras droit en écharpe, s'était glissé, sans être vu de personne, dans un coin de la tente, où ses gestes avaient seuls exprimé la part qu'il prenait aux récits de son capitaine, jusqu'à ce moment où, ne croyant pas que le respect lui permit de laisser passer un éloge aussi direct sans en remercier d'Auverney, il se prit à balbutier d'un ton confus:

— Vous êtes bien bon, mon capitaine.

Un éclat de rire général s'éleva. D'Auverney se retourna, et lui cria d'un ton sévère:

— Comment: vous ici, Thadée! et votre bras?

A ce langage, si nouveau pour lui, les traits du vieux soldat se rembrunirent; il chancela et leva la tête en arrière, comme pour arrêter les larmes qui roulaient dans ses yeux.

— Je ne croyais pas, dit-il enfin à voix basse, je n'aurais jamais cru que mon capitaine pût manquer à son vieux sergent jusqu'à lui dire vous.

Le capitaine se leva précipitamment.

— Pardonne, mon vieil ami, pardonne, je ne sais ce que j'ai dit; tiens, Thad, me pardonnes-tu?

Les larmes jaillirent des yeux du sergent, malgré lui,

— Voilà la troisième fois, balbutia-t-il; mais celles-ci sont de joie.

La paix était faite, Un court silence s'ensuivit,

— Mais, dis-moi, Thad, demanda le capitaine doucement, pourquoi as-tu quitté l'ambulance pour venir ici?

— C'est que, avec votre permission, j'étais venu pour vous demander, mon capitaine, s'il faudrait faire mettre demain la housse galonnée à votre cheval de bataille.

Henri se mit à rire.

— Vous auriez mieux fait, Thadée, de demander au chirurgien-major s'il faudrait mettre demain deux onces de charpie sur votre bras malade.

— Ou de vous informer, reprit Paschal, si vous pourriez boire un peu de vin pour vous rafraîchir; en attendant, voici de l'eau-de-vie qui ne peut que vous faire du bien; goûtez-en, mon brave sergent.

Thadée s'avança, fit un salut respectueux, s'excusa de prendre le verre de la main gauche, et le vida à la santé de la compagnie. Il s'anima.

— Vous en étiez, mon capitaine, au moment, au moment où... Eh bien oui, ce fut moi qui proposai d'entrer sous les lianes pour empêcher des chrétiens d'être tués par des pierres. Notre officier, qui, ne sachant pas nager, craignait de se noyer, et cela était bien naturel, s'y opposait de toutes ses forces, jusqu'à ce qu'il vit, avec votre permission, messieurs, un gros caillou, qui manqua de l'écraser, tomber sur la rivière, sans pouvoir s'y enfoncer, à cause des herbes. - Il vaut encore mieux, dit-il alors, mourir comme Pharaon d'Egypte que comme saint Etienne. Nous ne sommes pas des saints, et Pharaon était un militaire comme nous. - Mon officier, un savant comme vous voyez, voulut donc bien se rendre à mon avis, à condition que j'essaierais le premier de l'exécuter. Je vais. Je descends le long du bord, je saute sous le berceau en me tenant aux branches d'en haut, et, dites, mon capitaine, je me sens tirer par la jambe; je me débats, je crie au secours, je reçois plusieurs coups de sabre; et voilà tous les dragons, qui étaient des diables, qui se précipitent pêle-mêle sous les lianes (C'étaient les noirs du Morne-Rouge qui s'étaient cachés là sans qu'on s'en doutât, probablement pour nous tomber sur le dos, comme un sac trop chargé, le moment d'après.) - Cela n'aurait pas été un bon moment pour pêcher! - On se battait, on jurait, on criait. Etant tout nus, ils étaient plus alertes que nous; mais nos coups portaient mieux que les leurs. Nous nagions d'un bras, et nous battions de l'autre, comme cela se pratique toujours dans ce cas-là. - Ceux qui ne savaient pas nager, dites, mon capitaine, se suspendaient d'une main aux lianes et les noirs les tiraient par les pieds. Au milieu de la bagarre, je vis un grand nègre qui se défendait comme un Belzébuth contre huit ou dix de mes camarades; je nageai là, et je reconnus Pierrot, autrement dit Bug... Mais cela ne doit se découvrir qu'après, n'est-ce pas, mon capitaine? Je reconnus Pierrot. Depuis la prise du fort, nous étions brouillés ensemble; je le saisis à la gorge; il allait se délivrer de moi d'un coup de poignard, quand il me regarda, et se rendit au lieu de me tuer; ce qui fut très malheureux, mon capitaine, car s'il ne s'était pas rendu... - Mais cela se saura plus tard. - Sitôt que les nègres le virent pris, ils sautèrent sur nous pour le délivrer; si bien que les milices allaient aussi entrer dans l'eau pour nous secourir, quand Pierrot, voyant sans doute que les nègres allaient tous être massacrés, dit quelques mots qui étaient un vrai grimoire, puisque cela les mit tous en fuite. Ils plongèrent, et disparurent en un clin d'oeil. - Cette bataille sous l'eau aurait eu quelque chose d'agréable, et m'aurait bien amusé, si je n’y avais pas perdu un doigt et mouillé dix cartouches, et si... pauvre homme! mais cela était écrit, mon capitaine.

Et le sergent, après avoir respectueusement appuyé le revers de sa main gauche sur la grenade de son bonnet de police, l’éleva vers le ciel d’un air inspiré.

D’Auverney paraissait violemment agité.

— Oui, dit-il, oui, tu as raison, mon vieux Thadée, cette nuit-là fut une nuit fatale.

Il serait tombé dans une de ces profondes rêveries qui lui étaient habituelles, si l’assemblée ne l’eût vivement pressé de continuer. Il poursuivit.

XXIV

— Tandis que la scène que Thadée vient de décrire... (Thadée, triomphant, vint se placer derrière le capitaine), tandis que la scène que Thadée vient de décrire se passait derrière le mornet, j'étais parvenu, avec quelques-uns des miens, à grimper de broussaille en broussaille sur un pic nommé le Pic du Paon, à cause des teintes irisées que le mica répandu à sa surface présentait aux rayons du soleil. Ce pic était de niveau avec les positions des noirs. Le chemin une fois frayé, le sommet fut bientôt couvert de milices; nous commençâmes une vive fusillade. Les nègres, moins bien armés que nous, ne purent nous riposter aussi chaudement; ils commencèrent à se décourager; nous redoublâmes d'acharnement, et bientôt les rocs les plus voisins furent évacués par les rebelles, qui cependant eurent d'abord soin de faire rouler les cadavres de leurs morts sur le reste de l'armée, encore rangée en bataille sur le mornet. Alors nous abattîmes et liâmes ensemble avec des feuilles de palmier et des cordes plusieurs troncs de ces énormes cotonniers sauvages dont les premiers habitants de l'île faisaient des pirogues de cent rameurs. A l'aide de ce pont improvisé, nous passâmes sur les pics abandonnés, et une partie de l'armée se trouva ainsi avantageusement postée. Cet aspect ébranla le courage des insurgés. Notre feu se soutenait. Des clameurs lamentables, auxquelles se mêlait le nom de Bug-Jargal, retentirent soudain dans l'armée de Biassou. Une grande épouvante s'y manifesta, plusieurs noirs du Morne-Rouge parurent sur le roc ou flottait le drapeau écarlate; ils se prosternèrent, enlevèrent l'étendard, et se précipitèrent avec lui dans les gouffres de la Grande-Rivière. Cela semblait signifier que leur chef était mort ou pris.

Notre audace s'en accrut à un tel point que je résolus de chasser à l'arme blanche les rebelles des rochers qu'ils occupaient encore. Je fis jeter un pont de troncs d'arbres entre notre pic et le roc le plus voisin; et je m'élançai le premier au milieu des nègres. Les miens allaient me suivre, quand un des rebelles, d'un coup de hache, fit voler le pont en éclats. Les débris tombèrent dans l'abîme, en battant les rocs avec un bruit épouvantable.

Je tournai la tête; en ce moment je me sentis saisir par six ou sept noirs qui me désarmèrent. Je me débattais comme un lion; ils me lièrent avec des cordes d'écorce, sans s'inquiéter des balles que mes gens faisaient pleuvoir autour d'eux.

Mon désespoir ne fut adouci que par les cris de victoire que j’entendis pousser autour de moi un instant après; je vis bientôt les noirs et les mulâtres gravir pêle-mêle les sommets les plus escarpés, en jetant des clameurs de détresse. Mes gardiens les imitèrent; le plus vigoureux d’entre eux me chargea sur ses épaules, et m’emporta vers les forêts, en sautant de roche en roche avec l’agilité d’un chamois. La lueur des flammes cessa bientôt de le guider; la faible lumière de la lune lui suffit; il se mit seulement à marcher avec moins de rapidité.

XXV

Après avoir traversé des halliers et franchi des torrents, nous arrivâmes dans une haute vallée d'un aspect singulièrement sauvage. Ce lieu m'était absolument inconnu.

Cette vallée était située dans le cœur même des mornes, dans ce qu'on appelle à Saint-Domingue les doubles montagnes. C'était une grande savane verte, emprisonnée dans des murailles de roches nues, parsemée de bouquets de pins, de gayacs et de palmistes. Le froid vif qui règne presque continuellement dans cette région de l'île, bien qu'il n'y gèle pas, était encore augmenté par la fraîcheur de la nuit, qui finissait à peine. L'aube commençait à faire revivre la blancheur des hauts sommets environnants, et la vallée, encore plongée dans une obscurité profonde, n'était éclairée que par une multitude de feux allumés par les nègres; car c'était là leur point de ralliement. Les membres disloqués de leur armée s'y rassemblaient en désordre, les noirs et les mulâtres arrivaient de moment en moment par troupes effarées, avec des cris de détresse ou des hurlements de rage, et de nouveaux feux, brillants comme des yeux de tigre dans la sombre savane, marquaient à chaque instant que le cercle du camp s'agrandissait.

Le nègre dont j'étais le prisonnier m'avait déposé au pied d'un chêne, d'où j'observais avec insouciance ce bizarre spectacle. Le noir m'attacha par la ceinture au tronc de l'arbre auquel j'étais adossé, resserra les nœuds redoublés qui comprimaient tous mes mouvements, mit sur ma tête son bonnet de laine rouge, sans doute pour indiquer que j'étais sa propriété, et après qu'il se fut ainsi assuré que je ne pourrais ni m'échapper, ni lui être enlevé par d'autres, il se disposa à s'éloigner. Je me décidai alors à lui adresser la parole, et je lui demandai en patois créole, s'il était de la bande du Dondon ou de celle du Morne-Rouge. Il s'arrêta et me répondit d'un air d'orgueil: Morne-Rouge! Une idée me vint. J'avais entendu parler de la générosité du chef de cette bande, Bug-Jargal, et, quoique résolu sans peine à une mort qui devait finir tous mes malheurs, l'idée des tourments qui m'attendaient si je la recevais de Biassou ne laissait pas que de m'inspirer quelque horreur. Je n'aurais pas mieux demandé que de mourir, sans ces tortures. C'était peut- être une faiblesse, mais je crois qu'en de pareils moments notre nature d'homme se révolte toujours. Je pensai donc que si je pouvais me soustraire à Biassou, j'obtiendrais peut-être de Bug-Jargal une mort sans supplices, une mort de soldat.

Je demandai à ce nègre du Morne-Rouge de me conduire à son chef, Bug-Jargal. Il tressaillit. Bug-Jargal! dit-il en se frappant le front avec désespoir; puis passant rapidement à l'expression de la fureur, il grinça des dents et me cria en me montrant le poing: - Biassou! Biassou! - Après ce nom menaçant, il me quitta.

La colère et la douleur du nègre me rappelèrent cette circonstance du combat de laquelle nous avions conclu la prise ou la mort du chef des bandes du Morne-Rouge. Je n'en doutai plus; et je me résignai à cette vengeance de Biassou dont le noir semblait me menacer.

XXVI

Cependant les ténèbres couvraient encore la vallée, où la foule des noirs et le nombre des feux s'accroissaient sans cesse. Un groupe de négresses vint allumer un foyer près de moi. Aux nombreux bracelets de verre bleu, rouge et violet qui brillaient échelonnés sur leurs bras et leurs jambes, aux anneaux qui chargeaient leurs oreilles, aux bagues qui ornaient tous les doigts de leurs mains et de leurs pieds, aux amulettes attachées sur leur sein, au collier de charmes suspendu à leur cou, au tablier de plumes bariolées, seul vêtement qui voilât leur nudité, et surtout à leurs clameurs cadencées, à leurs regards vagues et hagards, je reconnus des griotes. Vous ignorez peut-être qu'il existe parmi les noirs de diverses contrées de l'Afrique des nègres, doués de je ne sais quel grossier talent de poésie et d'improvisation qui ressemble à la folie. Ces nègres, errant de royaume en royaume, sont, dans ces pays barbares, ce qu'étaient les rhapsodes antiques, et, dans le moyen âge les minstrels d'Angleterre, les minsinger d'Allemagne, et les trouvères de France. On les appelle griots, leurs femmes, les griotes, possédées comme eux d'un démon insensé, accompagnent les chansons barbares de leurs maris par des danses lubriques, et présentent une parodie grotesque des bayadères de l'Hindoustan et des almées égyptiennes. C'étaient donc quelques-unes de ces femmes qui venaient de s'asseoir en rond, à quelques pas de moi, les jambes repliées à la mode africaine, autour d'un grand amas de branchages desséchés, qui brûlait en faisant trembler sur leurs visages hideux la lueur rouge de ses flammes.

Dès que leur cercle fut formé, elles se prirent toutes la main, et la plus vieille, qui portait une plume de héron plantée dans ses cheveux, se mit à crier: Ouanga! Je compris qu'elles allaient opérer un de ces sortilèges qu'elles désignent sous ce nom. Toutes répétèrent: Ouanga! La plus vieille, après un silence de recueillement, arracha une poignée de ses cheveux, et la jeta dans le feu en disant ces paroles sacramentelles: Malé o guiab! qui, dans le jargon des nègres créoles, signifient: - J'irai au diable. Toutes les griotes, imitant leur doyenne, livrèrent aux flammes une mèche de leurs cheveux, et redirent gravement: - Malé o guiab!

Cette invocation étrange, et les grimaces burlesques qui l'accompagnaient, m'arrachèrent cette espère de convulsion involontaire qui saisit souvent malgré lui l'homme le plus sérieux ou même le plus pénétré de douleur, et qu’on appelle le fou rire. Je voulus en vain le réprimer, il éclata. Ce rire, échappé à un cœur bien triste, fit naître une scène singulièrement sombre et effrayante.

Toutes les négresses, troublées dans leur mystère, se levèrent comme réveillées en sursaut. Elles ne s’étaient pas aperçues jusque-là de ma présence.

Elles coururent tumultueusement vers moi, en hurlant: Blanco! blanco! Je n’ai jamais vu une réunion de figures plus diversement horribles que ne l’étaient dans leur fureur tous ces visages noirs avec leurs dents blanches et leurs yeux blancs traversés de grosses veines sanglantes.

Elles m’allaient déchirer. La vieille à la plume de héron fit un signe, et cria à plusieurs reprises: Zoté cordé! zoté cordé! [Accordez-vous! Accordez-vous!] Ces forcenées s’arrêtèrent subitement, et je les vis, non sans surprise, détacher toutes ensemble leur tablier de plumes, les jeter sur l’herbe, et commencer autour de moi cette danse lascive que les noirs appellent la chica.

Cette danse, dont les attitudes grotesques et la vive allure n’expriment que le plaisir et la gaieté, empruntait ici de diverses circonstances accessoires un caractère sinistre. Les regards foudroyants que me lançaient les griotes au milieu de leurs folâtres évolutions, l’accent lugubre qu’elles donnaient à l’air joyeux de la chica, le gémissement aigu et prolongé que la vénérable présidente du sanhédrin noir arrachait de temps en temps à son balafo, espèce d’épinette qui murmure comme un petit orgue, et se compose d’une vingtaine de tuyaux de bois dur dont la grosseur et la longueur vont en diminuant graduellement, et surtout l’horrible rire que chaque sorcière nue, à certaines pauses de la danse, venait me présenter à son tour, en appuyant presque son visage sur le mien, ne m’annonçaient que trop à quels affreux châtiments devait s’attendre le blanco profanateur de leur Ouanga. Je me rappelai la coutume de ces peuplades sauvages qui dansent autour des prisonniers avant de les massacrer, et je laissai patiemment ces femmes exécuter le ballet du drame dont je devais ensanglanter le dénouement. Cependant je ne pus m’empêcher de frémir quand je vis, à un moment marqué par le balafo, chaque griote mettre dans le brasier la pointe d’une lame de sabre, ou le fer d’une hache, l’extrémité d’une longue aiguille à voiture, les pinces d’une tenaille, ou les dents d’une scie.

La danse touchait à sa fin; les instruments de torture étaient rouges. A un signal de la vieille, les négresses allèrent processionnellement chercher, l’une après l’autre, quelque arme horrible dans le feu.

Celles qui ne purent se munir d’un fer ardent prirent un tison enflammé. Alors je compris clairement quel supplice m’était réservé, et que j’aurais un bourreau dans chaque danseuse. A un autre commandement de leur coryphée, elles recommencèrent une dernière ronde, en se lamentant d’une manière effrayante. Je fermai les yeux pour ne plus voir du moins les ébats de ces démons femelles, qui, haletants de fatigue et de rage, entrechoquaient en cadence sur leurs têtes leurs ferrailles flamboyantes, d’où s’échappaient un bruit aigu et des myriades d’étincelles. J’attendis en me roidissant l’instant où je sentirais mes chairs se tourmenter, mes os se calciner, mes nerfs se tordre sous les morsures brûlantes des tenailles et des scies, et un frisson courut sur tous mes membres. Ce fut un moment affreux.

Il ne dura heureusement pas longtemps. La chica des griotes atteignait son dernier période, quand j’entendis de loin la voix du nègre qui m’avait fait prisonnier. Il accourait en criant: Que haceis, mujeres de demonio? Que haceis alli? Dexaïs mi prisonero! [Que faites-vous, femmes du démon? Que faites-vous là? laissez mon prisonnier!] Je rouvris les yeux. Il était déjà grand jour. Le nègre se hâtait avec mille gestes de colère. Les griotes s’étaient arrêtées; mais elles paraissaient moins émues de ses menaces qu’interdites par la présence d’un personnage assez bizarre dont le noir était accompagné.

C’était un homme très gros et très petit, une sorte de nain, dont le visage était caché par un voile blanc, percé de trois trous, pour la bouche et les yeux, à la manière des pénitents. Ce voile, qui tombait sur son cou et ses épaules, laissait nue sa poitrine velue, dont la couleur me parut être celle des griffes, et sur laquelle brillait, suspendu à une chaîne d’or, le soleil d’un ostensoir d’argent tronqué. On voyait le manche en croix d’un poignard grossier passer au-dessus de sa ceinture écarlate qui soutenait un jupon rayé de vert, de jaune et de noir, dont la frange descendait jusqu’à ses pieds larges et difformes. Ses bras, nus comme sa poitrine, agitaient un bâton blanc; un chapelet, dont les grains étaient d’adrézarach, pendait à sa ceinture, près du poignard; et son front était surmonté d’un bonnet pointu orné de sonnettes dans lequel, lorsqu’il s’approcha, je ne fus pas peu surpris de reconnaître la gorra d’Habibrah. Seulement, parmi les hiéroglyphes dont cette espèce de mitre était couverte, on remarquait des taches de sang. C’était sans doute le sang du fidèle bouffon. Ces traces de meurtre me parurent une nouvelle preuve de sa mort, et réveillèrent dans mon cœur un dernier regret.

Au moment où les griotes aperçurent cet héritier du bonnet d'Habibrah, elles s'écrièrent toutes ensemble: - L'obi! et tombèrent prosternées. Je devinai que c'était le sorcier de l'armée de Biassou. - Basta! Basta! dit-il en arrivant auprès d'elles, avec une voix sourde et grave, dexaïs el prisonero de Biassu [Il suffit! il suffit! Laissez le prisonnier de Biassou!]. Toutes les négresses, se relevant en tumulte, jetèrent les instruments de mort dont elles étaient chargées, reprirent leurs tabliers de plumes, et, à un geste de l'obi, elles se dispersèrent comme une nuée de sauterelles.

En ce moment le regard de l'obi parut se fixer sur moi; il tressaillit, recula d'un pas, et reporta son bâton blanc vers les griotes, comme s'il eût voulu les rappeler. Cependant, après avoir grommelé entre ses dents le mot maldicho [Maudit.], et dit quelques paroles à l'oreille du nègre, il se retira lentement, en croisant les bras, et dans l'attitude d'une profonde méditation.

XXVII

Mon gardien m’apprit alors que Biassou demandait à me voir, et qu’il fallait me préparer à soutenir dans une heure une entrevue avec ce chef.

C’était sans doute encore une heure de vie. En attendant qu’elle fût écoulée, mes regards erraient sur le camp des rebelles, dont le jour me laissait voir dans ses moindres détails la singulière physionomie. Dans une autre disposition d’esprit, je n’aurais pu m’empêcher de rire de l’inepte vanité des noirs, qui étaient presque tous chargés d’ornements militaires et sacerdotaux, dépouilles de leurs victimes. La plupart de ces parures n’étaient plus que des haillons déchiquetés et sanglants. Il n’était pas rare de voir briller un hausse-col sous un rabat, ou une épaulette sur une chasuble. Sans doute pour se délasser des travaux auxquels ils avaient été condamnés toute leur vie, les nègres restaient dans une inaction inconnue à nos soldats, même retirés sous la tente. Quelques-uns dormaient au grand soleil, la tête près d’un feu ardent; d’autres, l’oeil tour à tour terne et furieux, chantaient un air monotone, accroupis sur le seuil de leurs ajoupas, espèces de huttes couvertes de feuilles de bananier ou de palmier, dont la forme conique ressemble à nos tentes canonnières. Leurs femmes noires ou cuivrées, aidées des négrillons, préparaient la nourriture des combattants. Je les voyais remuer avec des fourches l’igname, les bananes, la patate, les pois, le coco, le maïs, le chou caraïbe qu’ils appellent tayo, et une foule d’autres fruits indigènes qui bouillonnaient autour des quartiers de porc, de tortue et de chien, dans de grandes chaudières volées aux cases des planteurs. Dans le lointain, aux limites du camp, les griots et les griotes formaient de grandes rondes autour des feux, et le vent m’apportait par lambeaux leurs chants barbares mêlés aux sons des guitares et des balafos. Quelques vedettes, placées aux sommets des rochers voisins, éclairaient les alentours du quartier général de Biassou, dont le seul retranchement, en cas d’attaque, était un cordon circulaire de cabrouets, chargés de butin et de munitions. Ces sentinelles noires, debout sur la pointe aiguë des pyramides de granit dont les mornes sont hérissés, tournaient fréquemment sur elles-mêmes, comme les girouettes sur les flèches gothiques, et se renvoyaient l’une à l’autre, de toute la force de leurs poumons, le cri qui maintenait la sécurité du camp: Nada! Nada! [Rien! Rien!]

De temps en temps, des attroupements de nègres curieux se formaient autour de moi. Tous me regardaient d'un air menaçant.

XXVIII

Enfin, un peloton de soldats de couleur, assez bien armés, arriva vers moi. Le noir à qui je semblais appartenir me détacha du chêne auquel j’étais lié, et me remit au chef de l’escouade, des mains duquel il reçut en échange un assez gros sac, qu’il ouvrit sur-le-champ. C’étaient des piastres. Pendant que le nègre, agenouillé sur l’herbe, les comptait avidement, les soldats m’entraînèrent. Je considérai avec curiosité leur équipement. Ils portaient un uniforme de gros drap, brun, rouge et jaune, coupé à l’espagnole; une espèce de montera castillane, ornée d’une large cocarde rouge [On sait que cette couleur est celle de la cocarde espagnole.], cachait leurs cheveux de laine. Ils avaient, au lieu de giberne, une façon de carnassière attachée sur le côté. Leurs armes étaient un lourd fusil, un sabre et un poignard. J’ai su depuis que cet uniforme était celui de la garde particulière de Biassou.

Après plusieurs circuits entre les rangées irrégulières d’ajoupas qui encombraient le camp, nous parvînmes à l’entrée d’une grotte, taillée par la nature au pied de l’un de ces immenses pans de roches dont la savane était murée. Un grand rideau d’une étoffe thibétaine qu’on appelle le katchmir, et qui se distingue moins par l’éclat de ses couleurs que par ses plis moelleux et ses dessins variés, fermait à l’oeil l’intérieur de cette caverne. Elle était entourée de plusieurs lignes redoublées de soldats, équipés comme ceux qui m’avaient amené.

Après l’échange du mot d’ordre avec les deux sentinelles qui se promenaient devant le seuil de la grotte, le chef de l’escouade souleva le rideau de katchmir, et m’introduisit, en le laissant retomber derrière moi.

Une lampe de cuivre à cinq becs, pendue par des chaînes à la voûte, jetait une lumière vacillante sur les parois humides de cette caverne fermée au jour. Entre deux haies de soldats mulâtres, j’aperçus un homme de couleur, assis sur un énorme tronc d’acajou, que recouvrait à demi un tapis de plumes de perroquet. Cet homme appartenait à l’espère des sacatras, qui n’est séparée des nègres que par une nuance souvent imperceptible. Son costume était ridicule. Une ceinture magnifique de tresse de soie, à laquelle pendait une croix de Saint-Louis, retenait à la hauteur du nombril un caleçon bleu, de toile grossière; une veste de basin blanc, trop courte pour descendre jusqu’à la ceinture, complétait son vêtement. Il portait des bottes grises, un chapeau rond, surmonté d’une cocarde rouge, et des épaulettes, dont l’une était d’or avec les deux étoiles d’argent des maréchaux de camp, l’autre de laine jaune. Deux étoiles de cuivre, qui paraissaient avoir été des molettes d’éperons, avaient été fixées sur la dernière, sans doute pour la rendre digne de figurer auprès de sa brillante compagne. Ces deux épaulettes, n’étant point bridées à leur place naturelle, par des ganses transversales, pendaient des deux côtés de la poitrine du chef. Un sabre et des pistolets richement damasquinés étaient posés sur le tapis de plumes auprès de lui.

Derrière son siège se tenaient, silencieux et immobiles, deux enfants revêtus du caleçon des esclaves, et portant chacun un large éventail de plumes de paon. Ces deux enfants esclaves étaient blancs.

Deux carreaux de velours cramoisi, qui paraissaient avoir appartenu à quelque prie-Dieu de presbytère, marquaient deux places à droite et à gauche du bloc d’acajou. L’une de ces places, celle de droite, était occupée par l’obi qui m’avait arraché à la fureur des griotes. Il était assis, les jambes repliées, tenant sa baguette droite, immobile comme une idole de porcelaine dans une pagode chinoise. Seulement, à travers les trous de son voile, je voyais briller ses yeux flamboyants, constamment attachés sur moi.

De chaque côté du chef étaient des faisceaux de drapeaux, de bannières et de guidons de toute espèce, parmi lesquels je remarquai le drapeau blanc fleurdelysé, le drapeau tricolore et le drapeau d’Espagne. Les autres étaient des enseignes de fantaisie. On y voyait un grand étendard noir.

Dans le fond de la salle, au-dessus de la tête du chef, un autre objet attira encore mon attention, C’était le portrait de ce mulâtre Ogé, qui avait été roué l’année précédente au Cap, pour crime de rébellion, avec son lieutenant Jean- Baptiste Chavanne, et vingt autres noirs ou sang-mêlés. Dans ce portrait, Ogé, fils d’un boucher du Cap, était représenté comme il avait coutume de se faire peindre, en uniforme de lieutenant-colonel, avec la croix de Saint-Louis, et l’ordre du mérite du Lion, qu’il avait acheté en Europe du prince de Limbourg.

Le chef sacatra devant lequel j’étais introduit était d’une taille moyenne. Sa figure ignoble offrait un rare mélange de finesse et de cruauté. Il me fit approcher, et me considéra quelque temps en silence; enfin il se mit à ricaner à la manière de l’hyène.

— Je suis Biassou, me dit-il.

Je m’attendais à ce nom, mais je ne pus l’entendre de cette bouche, au milieu de ce rire féroce, sans frémir intérieurement. Mon visage pourtant resta calme et fier. Je ne répondis rien.

— Eh bien! reprit-il en assez mauvais français, est-ce que tu viens déjà d'être empalé, pour ne pouvoir plier l'épine du dos en présence de Jean Biassou, généralissime des pays conquis et maréchal de camp des armées de su magestad catolica? (La tactique des principaux chefs rebelles était de faire croire qu'ils agissaient, tantôt pour le roi de France, tantôt pour la révolution, tantôt pour le roi d'Espagne.)

Je croisai les bras sur ma poitrine, et le regardai fixement. Il recommença à ricaner. Ce tic lui était familier.

— Oh! oh! me pareces hombre de buen corazon. [Tu me parais homme de bon courage.] Eh bien, écoute ce que je vais te dire. Es-tu créole?

— Non, répondis-je, je suis français.

Mon assurance lui fit froncer le sourcil. Il reprit en ricanant:

— Tant mieux! Je vois à ton uniforme que tu es officier. Quel âge as-tu?

— Vingt ans.

— Quand les as-tu atteints?

A cette question, qui réveillait en moi de bien douloureux souvenirs, je restai un moment absorbé dans mes pensées. Il la répéta vivement. Je lui répondis:

— Le jour où ton compagnon Léogri fut pendu.

La colère contracta ses traits; son ricanement se prolongea. Il se contint cependant.

— Il y a vingt-trois jours que Léogri fut pendu, me dit-il. Français, tu lui diras ce soir, de ma part, que tu as vécu vingt- quatre jours de plus que lui. Je veux te laisser au monde encore cette journée, afin que tu puisses lui conter où en est la liberté de ses frères, ce que tu as vu dans le quartier général de Jean Biassou, maréchal de camp, et quelle est l'autorité de ce généralissime sur les gens du roi.

C'était sous ce titre que Jean-François, qui se faisait appeler grand amiral de France, et son camarade Biassou, désignaient leurs hordes de nègres et de mulâtres révoltés.

Alors il ordonna que l'on me fit asseoir entre deux gardes dans un coin de la grotte, et, adressant un signe de la main à quelques nègres affublés de l'habit d'aide de camp:

— Qu'on batte le rappel, que toute l'armée se rassemble autour de notre quartier général, pour que nous la passions en revue. Et vous, monsieur le chapelain, dit-il en se tournant vers l'obi, couvrez-vous de vos vêtements sacerdotaux, et célébrez pour nous et nos soldats le saint sacrifice de la messe.

L’obi se leva, s’inclina profondément devant Biassou, et lui dit à l’oreille quelques paroles que le chef interrompit brusquement et à haute voix.

— Vous n’avez point d’autel, dites-vous, señor cura!cela est-il étonnant dans ces montagnes? Mais qu’importe! depuis quand le bon Giu [Patois créole. Le bon Dieu.] a-t-il besoin pour son culte d’un temple magnifique, d’un autel orné d’or et de dentelles? Gédéon et Josué l’ont adoré devant des monceaux de pierres; faisons comme eux, bon per [Patois créole. Bon père.]; il suffit au bon Giu que les cœurs soient fervents. Vous n’avez point d’autel! Eh bien, ne pouvez-vous pas vous en faire un de cette grande caisse de sucre, prise avant-hier par les gens du roi dans l’habitation Dubuisson?

L’intention de Biassou fut promptement exécutée. En un clin d’oeil l’intérieur de la grotte fut disposé pour cette parodie du divin mystère. On apporta un tabernacle et un saint ciboire enlevés à la paroisse de l’Acul, au même temple où mon union avec Marie avait reçu du ciel une bénédiction si promptement suivie de malheur. On érigea en autel la caisse de sucre volée, qui fut couverte d’un drap blanc, en guise de nappe, ce qui n’empêchait pas de lire encore sur les faces latérales de cet autel: Dubuisson et Cie. pour Nantes.

Quand les vases sacrés furent placés sur la nappe, l’obi s’aperçut qu’il manquait une croix; il tira son poignard, dont la garde horizontale présentait cette forme, et le planta debout entre le calice et l’ostensoir, devant le tabernacle. Alors, sans ôter son bonnet de sorcier et son voile de pénitent, il jeta promptement la chape volée au prieur de l’Acul sur son dos et sa poitrine nue, ouvrit auprès du tabernacle le missel à fermoir d’argent sur lequel avaient été lues les prières de mon fatal mariage, et, se tournant vers Biassou, dont le siège était à quelques pas de l’autel, annonça par une salutation profonde qu’il était prêt.

Sur-le-champ, à un signe du chef, les rideaux de katchmir furent tirés, et nous découvrirent toute l’armée noire rangée en carrés épais devant l’ouverture de la grotte. Biassou ôta son chapeau et s’agenouilla devant l’autel. - A genoux! cria-t-il d’une voix forte. - A genoux! répétèrent les chefs de chaque bataillon. Un roulement de tambours se fit entendre. Toutes les hordes étaient agenouillées.

Seul, j’étais resté immobile sur mon siège, révolté de l’horrible profanation qui allait se commettre sous mes yeux; mais les deux vigoureux mulâtres qui me gardaient dérobèrent mon siège sous moi, me poussèrent rudement par les épaules, et je tombai à genoux comme les autres, contraint de rendre un simulacre de respect à ce simulacre de culte.

L’obi officia gravement. Les deux petits pages blancs de Biassou faisaient les offices de diacre et de sous-diacre.

La foule des rebelles, toujours prosternée, assistait à la cérémonie avec un recueillement dont le généralissime donnait le premier l’exemple. Au moment de l’exaltation, l’obi, élevant entre ses mains l’hostie consacrée, se tourna vers l’armée, et cria en jargon créole: - Zoté coné bon Giu; ce li mo fe zoté voer. Blan touyé li, touyé blan yo toute. [Vous connaissez le bon Dieu; c’est lui que je vous fais voir. Les blancs l’ont tué; tuez tous les blancs. Depuis, Toussaint Louverture avait coutume d’adresser la même allocution aux nègres. après avoir communié.] A ces mots, prononcés d’une voix forte, mais qu’il me semblait avoir déjà entendue quelque part et en d’autres temps, toute la horde poussa un rugissement; ils entrechoquèrent longtemps leurs armes, et il ne fallut rien moins que la sauvegarde de Biassou pour empêcher que ce bruit sinistre ne sonnât ma dernière heure. Je compris à quels excès de courage et d’atrocité pouvaient se porter des hommes pour qui un poignard était une croix, et sur l’esprit desquels toute impression est prompte et profonde.

XXIX

La cérémonie terminée, l’obi se retourna vers Biassou avec une référence respectueuse. Alors le chef se leva, et, s’adressant à moi, me dit en français:

— On nous accuse de n’avoir pas de religion, tu vois que c’est une calomnie, et que nous sommes bons catholiques.

Je ne sais s’il parlait ironiquement ou de bonne foi. Un moment après, il se fit apporter un vase de verre plein de grains de maïs noir, il y jeta quelques grains de maïs blanc; puis, élevant le vase au-dessus de sa tête, pour qu’il fût mieux vu de toute son armée:

— Frères, vous êtes le maïs noir; les blancs vos ennemis sont le maïs blanc.

A ces paroles, il remua le vase, et quand presque tous les grains blancs eurent disparu sous les noirs, il s’écria d’un air d’inspiration et de triomphe: Guetté blan si la la [Voyez ce que sont les blancs relativement à vous.].

Une nouvelle acclamation, répétée par tous les échos des montagnes, accueillit la parabole du chef. Biassou continua, en mêlant fréquemment son méchant français de phrases créoles et espagnoles:

— El tiempo de la mansuetud es pasado. [Le temps de la mansuétude est passé.]. Nous avons été longtemps patients comme les moutons, dont les blancs comparent la laine à nos cheveux; soyons maintenant implacables comme les panthères et les jaguars des pays d’où ils nous ont arrachés. La force peut seule acquérir les droits; tout appartient à qui se montre fort et sans pitié. Saint-Loup a deux fêtes dans le calendrier grégorien, l’agneau pascal n’en a qu’une! - N’est-il pas vrai, monsieur le chapelain?

L’obi s’inclina en signe l’adhésion.

— ... Ils sont venus, poursuivit Biassou, ils sont venus les ennemis de la régénération de l’humanité, ces blancs, ces colons, ces planteurs, ces hommes de négoce, verdaderos demonios vomis de la bouche d’Alecto! Son venidos con insolencia [Ils sont venus avec insolence.]. Ils étaient couverts, les superbes, d’armes, de panaches et d’habits magnifiques à l’oeil, et ils nous méprisaient parce que nous sommes noirs et nus. Ils pensaient, dans leur orgueil, pouvoir nous disperser aussi aisément que ces plumes de paon chassent les noirs essaims des moustiques et des maringouins!

En achevant cette comparaison. il avait arraché des mains d’un esclave blanc un des éventails qu’il faisait porter derrière lui, et l’agitait sur sa tête avec mille gestes véhéments. Il reprit:

— ... Mais, ô mes frères, notre armée a fondu sur la leur comme les bigailles sur un cadavre; ils sont tombés avec leurs beaux uniformes sous les coups de ces bras nus qu’ils croyaient sans vigueur, ignorant que le bon bois est plus dur quand il est dépouillé d’écorce. Ils tremblent maintenant, ces tyrans exécrés! Yo gagné peur! [Jargon créole. Ils ont peur.]

Un hurlement de joie et de triomphe répondit à ce cri du chef, et toutes les hordes répétèrent longtemps:

— Yo gagné peur!

— ... Noirs créoles et congos, ajouta Biassou, vengeance et liberté! Sang-mêlés, ne vous laissez pas attiédir par les séductions de los diabolos blancos. Vos pères sont dans leurs rangs, mais vos mères sont dans les nôtres. Au reste, o hermanos de mi alma [O frères de mon âme.], ils ne vous ont jamais traités en pères, mais bien en maîtres; vous étiez esclaves comme les noirs. Pendant qu’un misérable pagne couvrait à peine vos flancs brûlés par le soleil, vos barbares pères se pavanaient sous de buenos sombreros, et portaient des vestes de nankin les jours de travail, et les jours de fête des habits de bouracan ou de velours, a diez y siete quartos la vara [A dix-sept quartos la vara (mesure espagnole qui équivaut à peu près à l’aune).]. Maudissez ces êtres dénaturés! Mais, comme les saints commandements du bon Giu le défendent, ne frappez pas vous-même votre propre père. Si vous le rencontrez dans les rangs ennemis, qui vous empêche, amigos, de vous dire l’un à l’autre: Touyé papa moé, ma touyé quena toué [Tue mon père, je tuerai le tien. On a entendu en effet les mulâtres, capitulant en quelque sorte avec le parricide, prononcer ces exécrables paroles.]! Vengeance, gens du roi! Liberté à tous les hommes! Ce cri a son écho dans toutes les îles; il est parti de Quisqueya [Ancien nom de Saint-Domingue, qui signifie Grande- Terre. Les indigènes l’appelaient aussi Aity.], il réveille Tabago à Cuba. C’est un chef des cent vingt-cinq nègres marrons de la montagne Bleue, c’est un noir de la Jamaïque, Boukmann, qui a levé l’étendard parmi nous. Une victoire a été son premier acte de fraternité avec les noirs de Saint-Domingue. Suivons son glorieux exemple, la torche d’une main, la hache de l’autre! Point de grâce pour les blancs, pour les planteurs! Massacrons leurs familles, dévastons leurs plantations; ne laissons point dans leurs domaines un arbre qui n'ait la racine en haut. Bouleversons la terre pour qu'elle engloutisse les blancs! Courage donc, amis et frères! nous irons bientôt combattre et exterminer. Nous triompherons ou nous mourrons. Vainqueurs, nous jouirons à notre tour de toutes les joies de la vie; morts, nous irons dans le ciel, où les saints nous attendent, dans le paradis, où chaque brave recevra une double mesure d'aguardiente [Eau-de-vie.] et une piastre-gourde par jour!

Cette sorte de sermon soldatesque, qui ne vous semble que ridicule, messieurs, produisit sur les rebelles un effet prodigieux. Il est vrai que la pantomime extraordinaire de Biassou, l'accent inspiré de sa voix, le ricanement étrange qui entrecoupait ses paroles, donnaient à sa harangue je ne sais quelle puissance de prestige et de fascination. L'art avec lequel il entremêlait sa déclamation de détails faits pour flatter la passion ou l'intérêt des révoltés ajoutait un degré de force à cette éloquence, appropriée à cet auditoire.

Je n'essaierai donc pas de vous décrire quel sombre enthousiasme se manifesta dans l'armée insurgée après l'allocution de Biassou. Ce fut un concert distordant de cris, de plaintes, de hurlements. Les uns se frappaient la poitrine, les autres heurtaient leurs massues et leurs sabres. Plusieurs, à genoux ou prosternés, conservaient l'attitude d'une immobile extase. Des négresses se déchiraient les seins et les bras avec les arêtes de poissons dont elles se servent en guise de peigne pour démêler leurs cheveux. Les guitares, les tamtams, les tambours, les balafos, mêlaient leurs bruits aux décharges de mousqueterie. C'était quelque chose d'un sabbat.

Biassou fit un signe de la main; le tumulte cessa tomme par un prodige; chaque nègre reprit son rang en silence. Cette discipline, à laquelle Biassou avait plié ses égaux par le simple ascendant de la pensée et de la volonté, me frappa, pour ainsi dire, d'admiration. Tous les soldats de cette armée de rebelles paraissaient parler et se mouvoir sous la main du chef, comme les touches du clavecin sous les doigts du musicien.

XXX

Un autre spectacle, un autre genre de charlatanisme et de fascination excita alors mon attention; c’était le pansement des blessés. L’obi, qui remplissait dans l’armée les doubles fonctions de médecin de l’âme et de médecin du corps, avait commencé l’inspection des malades. Il avait dépouillé ses ornements sacerdotaux, et avait fait apporter auprès de lui une grande caisse à compartiments dans laquelle étaient ses drogues et ses instruments. Il usait fort rarement de ses outils chirurgicaux, et, excepté une lancette en arête de poisson avec laquelle il pratiquait fort adroitement une saignée, il me paraissait assez gauche dans le maniement de la tenaille qui lui servait de pince, et du couteau qui lui tenait lieu de bistouri. Il se bornait, la plupart du temps, à prescrire des tisanes d’oranges des bois, des breuvages de squine, et de salsepareille, et quelques gorgées de vieux tafia, Son remède favori, et qu’il disait souverain, se composait de trois verres de vin rouge, où il mêlait la poudre d’une noix muscade et d’un jaune d’œuf bien cuit sous la cendre. Il employait ce spécifique pour guérir toute espèce de plaie ou de maladie. Vous concevez aisément que cette médecine était aussi dérisoire que le culte dont il se faisait le ministre; et il est probable que le petit nombre de cures qu’il opérait par hasard n’eût point suffi pour conserver à l’obi la confiance des noirs, s’il n’eût joint des jongleries à ses drogues, et s’il n’eût cherché à agir d’autant plus sur l’imagination des nègres qu’il agissait moins sur leurs maux. Ainsi, tantôt il se bornait à toucher leurs blessures en faisant quelques signes mystiques; d’autres fois, usant habilement de ce reste d’anciennes superstitions qu’ils mêlaient à leur catholicisme de fraîche date, il mettait dans les plaies une petite pierre fétiche enveloppée de charpie; et le malade attribuait à la pierre les bienfaisants effets de la charpie. Si l’on venait lui annoncer que tel blessé, soigné par lui, était mort de sa blessure, et peut-être de son pansement: - Je l’avais prévu, répondait-il d’une voix solennelle, c’était un traître; dans l’incendie de telle habitation il avait sauvé un blanc. Sa mort est un châtiment! - Et la foule des rebelles ébahis applaudissait, de plus en plus ulcérée dans ses sentiments de haine et de vengeance. Le charlatan employa, entre autres, un moyen de guérison dont la singularité me frappa. C’était pour un des chefs noirs, assez dangereusement blessé dans le dernier combat. Il examina longtemps la plaie, la pansa de son mieux, puis, montant à l’autel: - Tout cela n’est rien, dit-il. Alors il déchira trois ou quatre feuillets du missel, les brûla à la flamme des flambeaux dérobés à l’église de l’Acul, et, mêlant la cendre de ce papier consacré à quelques gouttes de vin versées dans le calice: - Buvez, dit-il au blessé; ceci est la guérison [Ce remède est encore assez fréquemment pratiqué en Afrique, notamment par les Maures de Tripoli, qui jettent souvent dans leurs breuvages la cendre d’une page du livre de Mahomet. Cela compose un philtre auquel ils attribuent des vertus souveraines. Un voyageur anglais, je ne sais plus lequel, appelle ce breuvage une infusion d’Alcoran.]. - L’autre but stupidement, fixant des yeux pleins de confiance sur le jongleur, qui avait les mains levées sur lui, comme pour appeler les bénédictions du ciel; et peut-être la conviction qu’il était guéri contribua-t-elle à le guérir.

XXXI

Une autre scène, dont l'obi voilé était encore le principal acteur, succéda à celle-ci; le médecin avait remplacé le prêtre, le sorcier remplaça le médecin.

— Hombres, escuchate! [Hommes, écoutez! - Le sens que les Espagnols attachent au mot hombre, dans ce cas, ne peut se traduire. C'est plus qu'homme, et moins qu'ami.] s'écria l'obi, sautant avec une incroyable agilité sur l'autel improvisé, où il tomba assis les jambes repliées dans son jupon bariolé, escuchate, hombres! Que ceux qui voudront lire au livre du destin le mot de leur vie s'approchent, je le leur dirai; hé estudiado la ciencia de las gitanos [J'ai étudié la science des Egyptiens.].

Une foule de noirs et de mulâtres s'avancèrent précipitamment.

— L'un après l'autre! dit l'obi, dont la voix sourde et intérieure reprenait quelquefois cet accent criard qui me frappait comme un souvenir; si vous venez tous ensemble, vous entrerez tous ensemble au tombeau.

Ils s'arrêtèrent. En ce moment, un homme de couleur, vêtu d'une veste et d'un pantalon blanc, coiffé d'un madras, à la manière des riches colons, arriva près de Biassou. La consternation était peinte sur sa figure.

— Eh bien! dit le généralissime à voix basse, qu'est-ce? qu'avez-vous, Rigaud?

C'était ce chef mulâtre du rassemblement des Cayes, depuis connu sous le nom de général Rigaud, homme rusé sous des dehors candides, cruel sous un air de douceur. Je l'examinai avec attention.

— Général, répondit Rigaud (et il parlait très bas, mais j'étais placé près de Biassou, et j'entendais), il y a là, aux limites du camp, un émissaire de Jean-François. Boukmann vient d'être tué dans un engagement avec M. de Touzard; et les blancs ont dû exposer sa tête tomme un trophée dans leur ville.

— N'est-ce que cela? dit Biassou; et ses yeux brillaient de la secrète joie de voir diminuer le nombre des chefs, et, par conséquent, croître son importance.

— L'émissaire de Jean-François a en outre un message à vous remettre.

— C'est bon, reprit Biassou. Quittez cette mine de déterré, mon cher Rigaud.

— Mais, objecta Rigaud, ne craignez-vous pas, général, l'effet de la mort de Boukmann sur votre armée?

— Vous n’êtes pas si simple que vous le paraissez, Rigaud, répliqua le chef; vous allez juger Biassou. Faites retarder seulement d’un quart d’heure l’admission du messager.

Alors il s’approcha de l’obi, qui, durant ce dialogue, entendu de moi seul, avait commencé son office de devin, interrogeant les nègres émerveillés, examinant les signes de leurs fronts et de leurs mains, et leur distribuant plus ou moins de bonheur à venir, suivant le son, la couleur et la grosseur de la pièce de monnaie jetée par chaque nègre à ses pieds dans une patène d’argent doré. Biassou lui dit quelques mots à l’oreille. Le sorcier, sans interrompre, continua ses opérations métoposcopiques.

Ici l’obi fit une pause.

— Compagnons, ajouta-t-il gravement, j’avais observé ce signe sur le front de Bug-Jargal, chef des braves du Morne- Rouge.

Ces paroles, qui me confirmaient encore la prise de Bug-Jargal, furent suivies des lamentations d’une horde qui ne se composait que de noirs, et dont les chefs portaient des caleçons écarlates; c’était la bande du Morne-Rouge.

Cependant l’obi recommençait: « - Si vous avez, dans la partie droite du front, sur la ligne de la lune, quelque figure qui ressemble à une fourche, craignez de demeurer oisif ou de trop rechercher la débauche.

Un vieux nègre espagnol-domingois interrompit le sorcier. Il se traînait vers lui en implorant un pansement. Il avait été blessé au front, et l’un de ses yeux, arraché de son orbite, pendait tout sanglant. L’obi l’avait oublié dans sa revue médicale. Au moment où il l’aperçut il s’écria:

— Des figures rondes dans la partie droite du front, sur la ligne de la lune, annoncent des maladies aux yeux. - Hombre, dit-il au misérable blessé, ce signe est bien apparent sur ton front; voyons ta main.

— Alas! exelentisimo señor, repartit l'autre, mir usted mi ojo! [Hélas! très excellent seigneur, regardez mon oeil.]

— Fatras [Nom sous lequel on désignait un vieux nègre hors de service], répliqua l'obi avec humeur, j'ai bien besoin de voir son oeil! - Ta main, te dis-je!

Le malheureux livra sa main, en murmurant toujours: mi ojo!

— Bon! dit le sorcier. - Si l'on trouve sur la ligne de vie un point entouré d'un petit cercle, on sera borgne, parce que cette figure annonce la perte d'un oeil. C'est cela, voici le point et le petit cercle, tu seras borgne.

— Ya le soy [Je le suis déjà.], répondit le fatras en gémissant pitoyablement.

Mais l'obi, qui n'était plus chirurgien, l'avait repoussé rudement, et poursuivait sans se soucier de la plainte du pauvre borgne:

«Escuchate, hombres! - Si les sept lignes du front sont petites, tortueuses, faiblement marquées, elles annoncent un homme dont la vie sera courte.

«Celui qui aura entre les deux sourcils sur la ligne de la lune la figure de deux flèches croisées mourra dans une bataille.

«Si la ligne de vie qui traverse la main présente une croix à son extrémité près de la jointure, elle présage qu'on paraîtra sur l'échafaud...”

— Et ici, reprit l'obi, je dois vous le dire, hermanos, l'un des plus braves appuis de l'indépendance, Boukmann, porte ces trois signes funestes.

A ces mots tous les nègres tendirent la tête, retinrent leur haleine; leurs yeux immobiles, attachés sur le jongleur, exprimaient cette sorte d'attention qui ressemble à la stupeur.

— Seulement, ajouta l'obi, je ne puis accorder ce double signe qui menace à la fois Boukmann d'une bataille et d'un échafaud. Pourtant mon art est infaillible.

Il s'arrêta, et échangea un regard avec Biassou. Biassou dit quelques mots à l'oreille d'un de ses aides de camp, qui sortit sur-le-champ de la grotte.

Biassou ricanait. - En cet instant l’aide de camp revint; il ramenait un nègre couvert de fange et de poussière, dont les pieds, déchirés par les ronces et les cailloux, prouvaient qu’il avait fait une longue course. C’était le messager annoncé par Rigaud. Il tenait d’une main un paquet cacheté, de l’autre un parchemin déployé qui portait un sceau dont l’empreinte figurait un cœur enflammé. Au milieu était un chiffre formé des lettres caractéristiques M et N, entrelacées pour désigner sans doute la réunion des mulâtres libres et des nègres esclaves. A côté de ce chiffre je lus cette légende: « Le préjugé vaincu, la verge de fer brisée; vive le roi!” Ce parchemin était un passeport délivré par Jean-François.

L’émissaire le présenta à Biassou, et, après s’être incliné jusqu’à terre, lui remit le paquet cacheté. Le généralissime l’ouvrit vivement, parcourut les dépêches qu’il renfermait, en mit une dans la poche de sa veste, et, froissant l’autre dans ses mains, s’écria d’un air désolé:

— Gens du roi!...

Les nègres saluèrent profondément.

— Gens du roi! voilà ce que mande à Jean Biassou, généralissime des pays conquis, maréchal des camps et armées de sa majesté catholique, Jean-François, grand amiral de France, lieutenant général des armées de sa dite majesté, le roi des Espagnes et des Indes:

«Boukmann, chef de cent vingt noirs de la Montagne Bleue à la Jamaïque, reconnus indépendants par le gouvernement général de Belle-Combe, Boukmann vient de succomber dans la glorieuse lutte de la liberté et de l’humanité contre le despotisme et la barbarie. Ce généreux chef a été tué dans un engagement avec les brigands blancs de l’infâme Touzard. Les monstres ont coupé sa tête, et ont annoncé qu’ils allaient l’exposer ignominieusement sur un échafaud dans la place d’armes de leur ville du Cap. - Vengeance!”

Le sombre silence du découragement succéda un moment dans l’armée à cette lecture. Mais l’obi s’était dressé debout sur l’autel, et il s’écriait, en agitant sa baguette blanche, avec des gestes triomphants:

— Salomon, Zorobabel, Eléazar Thaleb, Cardan, Judas Bowtharicht, Averroès, Albert le Grand, Bohabdil, Jean de Hagen, Anna Baratro, Daniel Ogrumof, Rachel Flintz, Altornino! je vous rends grâces. La ciencia des voyants ne m’a pas trompé. Hijos, amigos, hermanos; muchachos, mozos, madres, y vosotros todos qui me escuchais aqui [Fils, amis, frères, garçons, enfants, mères, et vous tous qui m'écoutez ici.], qu'avais-je prédit? que habia dicho? Les signes du front de Boukmann m'avaient annoncé qu'il vivrait peu, et qu'il mourrait dans un combat; les lignes de sa main, qu'il paraîtrait sur un échafaud. Les révélations de mon art se réalisent fidèlement, et les événements s'arrangent d'eux-mêmes pour exécuter jusqu'aux circonstances que nous ne pouvions concilier, la mort sur le champ de bataille, et l'échafaud! Frères, admirez!

Le découragement des noirs s'était changé durant ce discours en une sorte d'effroi merveilleux. Ils écoutaient l'obi avec une confiance mêlée de terreur; celui-ci, enivré de lui-même, se promenait de long en large sur la caisse de sucre, dont la surface offrait assez d'espace pour que ses petits pas pussent s'y déployer fort à l'aise. Biassou ricanait.

Il adressa la parole à l'obi.

— Monsieur le chapelain, puisque vous savez les choses à venir, il nous plairait que vous voulussiez bien lire ce qu'il adviendra de notre fortune, à nous Jean Biassou, mariscal de campo.

L'obi, s'arrêtant fièrement sur l'autel grotesque où la crédulité des noirs le divinisait, dit au mariscal de campo: - Venga vuestra merced! [Vienne votre grâce!] En ce moment l'obi était l'homme important de l'armée. Le pouvoir militaire céda devant le pouvoir sacerdotal. Biassou s'approcha. On lisait dans ses yeux quelque dépit.

— Votre main, général, dit l'obi en se baissant pour la saisir. Empezo [Je commence.]. La ligne de la jointure, également marquée dans toute sa longueur, vous promet des richesses et du bonheur. La ligne de vie, longue, marquée, vous prédit une vie exempte de maux, une verte vieillesse; étroite, elle désigne votre sagesse, votre esprit ingénieux, la generosidad de votre cœur; enfin j'y vois ce que les chiromancos appellent le plus heureux de tous les signes, une foule de petites rides qui lui donnent la forme d'un arbre chargé de rameaux et qui s'élèvent vers le haut de la main, c'est le pronostic assuré de l'opulence et des grandeurs. La ligne de santé, très longue, confirme les indices de la ligne de vie; elle indique aussi le courage; recourbée vers le petit doigt, elle forme une sorte de crochet. Général, c'est le signe d'une sévérité utile.

A ce mot, l'oeil brillant du petit obi se fixa sur moi à travers les ouvertures de son voile, et je remarquai encore une fois un accent connu, caché en quelque sorte sous la gravité habituelle de sa voix. Il continuait avec la même intention de geste et d'intonation:

— ... Chargée de petits cercles, la ligne de santé vous annonce un grand nombre d'exécutions nécessaires que vous devrez ordonner. Elle s'interrompt vers le milieu pour former un demi-cercle, signe que vous serez exposé à de grands périls avec les bêtes féroces, c'est-à-dire les blancs, si vous ne les exterminez. - La ligne de fortune, entourée, comme la ligne de vie, de petits rameaux qui s'élèvent vers le haut de la main, confirme l'avenir de puissance et de suprématie auquel vous êtes appelé; droite et déliée dans sa partie supérieure, elle annonce le talent de gouverner. - La cinquième ligne, celle du triangle, prolongée jusque vers la racine du doigt du milieu, vous promet le plus heureux succès dans toute entreprise. - Voyons les doigts. - Le pouce, traversé dans sa longueur de petites lignes qui vont de l'ongle à la jointure, vous promet un grand héritage: celui de la gloire de Boukmann sans doute! ajouta l'obi d'une voix haute. - La petite éminence qui forme la racine de l'index est chargée de petites rides doucement marquées: honneurs et dignités! - Le doigt du milieu n'annonce rien. Votre doigt annulaire est sillonné de lignes croisées les unes sur les autres: vous vaincrez tous vos ennemis, vous dominerez tous vos rivaux! Ces lignes forment une croix de Saint-André, signe de génie et de prévoyance! - La jointure qui unit le petit doigt à la main offre des rides tortueuses: la fortune vous comblera de faveurs. J'y vois encore la figure d'un cercle, présage à ajouter aux autres, qui vous annonce puissance et dignités!

«Heureux, dit Éléazar Thaleb, celui qui porte tous ces signes! le destin est chargé de sa prospérité, et son étoile lui amènera le génie qui donne la gloire.”

— Maintenant, général, laissez-moi interroger votre front. « Celui, dit Rachel Flintz la bohémienne, qui porte au milieu du front sur la ride du soleil une petite figure carrée ou un triangle, fera une grande fortune...” La voici, bien prononcée. « Si ce signe est à droite, il promet une importante succession...” Toujours celle de Boukmann! « Le signe d'un fer à cheval entre les deux sourcils, au-dessous de la ride de la lune, annonce qu'on saura se venger de l'injure et de la tyrannie.” Je porte ce signe: vous le portez aussi.

La manière dont l'obi prononça les mots, je porte ce signe, me frappa encore.

— On le remarque, ajouta-t-il du même ton, chez les braves qui savent méditer une révolte courageuse et briser la servitude dans un combat. La griffe de lion que vous avez empreinte au-dessus du sourcil prouve votre bouillant courage. Enfin, général Jean Biassou, votre front présente le plus éclatant de tous les signes de prospérité, c'est une combinaison de lignes qui forment la lettre M, la première du nom de la Vierge. En quelque partie du front, sur quelque ride que cette figure paraisse, elle annonce le génie, la gloire et la puissance. Celui qui la porte fera toujours triompher la cause qu'il embrassera; ceux dont il sera le chef n'auront jamais à regretter aucune perte; il vaudra à lui seul tous les défenseurs de son parti. Vous êtes cet élu du destin!

— Gratias, monsieur le chapelain, dit Biassou, se préparant à retourner à son trône d'acajou.

— Attendez, général, reprit l'obi, j'oubliais encore un signe. La ligne du soleil, fortement prononcée sur votre front, prouve du savoir-vivre, le désir de faire des heureux, beaucoup de libéralité, et un penchant à la magnificence.

Biassou parut comprendre que l'oubli venait plutôt de sa part que de celle de l'obi. Il tira de sa poche une bourse assez, lourde et la jeta dans le plat d'argent, pour ne pas faire mentir la ligne du soleil.

Cependant l'éblouissant horoscope du chef avait produit son effet dans l'armée. Tous les rebelles, sur lesquels la parole de l'obi était devenue plus puissante que jamais depuis les nouvelles de la mort de Boukmann, passèrent du découragement à l'enthousiasme, et, se confiant aveuglément à leur sorcier infaillible et à leur général prédestiné, se mirent à hurler à l'envi: - Vive l'obi! Vive Biassou! L'obi et Biassou se regardaient, et je crus entendre le rire étouffé de l'obi répondant au ricanement du généralissime.

Je ne sais pourquoi cet obi tourmentait ma pensée; il me semblait que j'avais déjà vu ou entendu ailleurs quelque chose qui ressemblait à cet être singulier; je voulus le faire parler.

— Monsieur l'obi, señor cura, doctor medico, monsieur le chapelain, bon per! lui dis-je.

Il se retourna brusquement vers moi.

— Il y a encore ici quelqu'un dont vous n'avez point tiré l'horoscope, c'est moi.

Il croisa ses bras sur le soleil d'argent qui couvrait sa poitrine velue, et ne me répondit pas.

Je repris:

— Je voudrais bien savoir ce que vous augurez de mon avenir; mais vos honnêtes camarades m’ont enlevé ma montre et ma bourse, et vous n’êtes pas sorcier à prophétiser gratis.

Il s’avança précipitamment jusqu’auprès de moi, et me dit sourdement à l’oreille — Tu te trompes! Voyons ta main.

Je la lui présentai en le regardant en face. Ses yeux étincelaient. Il parut examiner ma main.

«- Si la ligne de vie, me dit-il, est coupée vers le milieu par deux petites lignes transversales et bien apparentes, c’est le signe d’une mort prochaine. - Ta mort est prochaine!

«Si la ligne de santé ne se trouve pas au milieu de la main, et qu’il n’y ait que la ligne de vie et la ligne de fortune réunies à leur origine de manière à former un angle, on ne doit pas s’attendre, avec ce signe, à une mort naturelle. - Ne t’attends point à une mort naturelle!

«Si le dessous de l’index est traversé d’une ligne dans toute sa longueur, on mourra de mort violente!” Entends-tu? prépare-toi à une mort violente! Il y avait quelque chose de joyeux dans cette voix sépulcrale qui annonçait la mort; je l’écoutai avec indifférence et mépris.

— Sorcier, lui dis-je avec un sourire de dédain, tu es habile, tu pronostiques à coup sûr.

Il se rapprocha encore de moi,

— Tu doutes de ma science! eh bien! écoute encore. - La rupture de la ligne du soleil sur ton front m’annonce que tu prends un ennemi pour un ami, et un ami pour un ennemi.

Le sens de ces paroles semblait concerner ce perfide Pierrot que j’aimais et qui m’avait trahi, ce fidèle Habibrah, que je haïssais, et dont les vêtements ensanglantés attestaient la mort courageuse et dévouée.

— Que veux-tu dire? m’écriai-je.

— Ecoute jusqu’au bout, poursuivit l’obi. Je t’ai dit de l’avenir, voici du passé: - La ligne de la lune est légèrement courbée sur ton front; cela signifie que ta femme t’a été enlevée.

Je tressaillis; je voulais m’élancer de mon siège. Mes gardiens me retinrent.

— Tu n’es pas patient, reprit le sorcier; écoute donc jusqu’à la fin. La petite croix qui coupe l’extrémité de cette courbure complète l’éclaircissement. Ta femme t’a été enlevée la nuit même de tes noces.

— Misérable! m’écriai-je, tu sais où elle est! Qui es-tu?

Je tentai encore de me délivrer et de lui arracher son voile; mais il fallut céder au nombre et à la force; et je vis avec rage le mystérieux obi s’éloigner en me disant:

— Me crois-tu maintenant? Prépare-toi à ta mort prochaine!

XXXII

Il fallut, pour me distraire un moment des perplexités où m'avait jeté cette scène étrange, le nouveau drame qui succéda sous mes yeux à la comédie ridicule que Biassou et l'obi venaient de jouer devant leur bande ébahie.

Biassou s'était replacé sur son siège d'acajou; l'obi s'était assis à sa droite, Rigaud à sa gauche, sur les deux carreaux qui accompagnaient le trône du chef. L'obi, les bras croisés sur la poitrine, paraissait absorbé dans une profonde contemplation; Biassou et Rigaud mâchaient du tabac; et un aide de camp était venu demander au mariscal de campo s'il fallait faire défiler l'armée, quand trois groupes tumultueux de noirs arrivèrent ensemble à l'entrée de la grotte avec des clameurs furieuses. Chacun de ces attroupements amenait un prisonnier qu'il voulait remettre à la disposition de Biassou, moins pour savoir s'il lui conviendrait de leur faire grâce que pour connaître son bon plaisir sur le genre de mort que les malheureux devaient endurer. Leurs cris sinistres ne l'annonçaient que trop: Mort! Mort! - Muerte! muerte! - Death! Death! criaient quelques nègres anglais, sans doute de la horde de Boukmann, qui étaient déjà venus rejoindre les noirs espagnols et français de Biassou.

Le mariscal de campo leur imposa silence d'un signe de main, et fit avancer les trois captifs sur le seuil de la grotte. J'en reconnus deux avec surprise; l'un était ce citoyen-général C, ce philanthrope correspondant de tous les négrophiles du globe, qui avait émis un avis si cruel pour les esclaves dans le conseil, chez le gouverneur. L'autre était le planteur équivoque qui avait tant de répugnance pour les mulâtres, au nombre desquels les blancs le comptaient. Le troisième paraissait appartenir à la classe des petits blancs; il portait un tablier de cuir, et avait les manches retroussées au-dessus du coude. Tous trois avaient été surpris séparément, cherchant à se cacher dans les montagnes.

Le petit blanc fut interrogé le premier.

— Qui es-tu, toi? lui dit Biassou.

— Je suis Jacques Belin, charpentier de l'hôpital des Pères, au Cap.

Une fine surprise mêlée de honte se peignit dans les yeux du généralissime des pays conquis.

— Jacques Belin! dit-il en se mordant les lèvres.

— Oui, reprit le charpentier; est-ce que tu ne me reconnais pas?

— Commence, toi, dit le mariscal de campo, par me reconnaître et me saluer.

— Je ne salue pas mon esclave! répondit le charpentier.

— Ton esclave, misérable! s’écria le généralissime.

— Oui, répliqua le charpentier, oui, je suis ton premier maître. Tu feins de me méconnaître; mais souviens-toi, Jean Biassou; je t’ai vendu treize piastres-gourdes à un marchand domingois.

Un violent dépit contracta tous les traits de Biassou.

— Hé quoi! poursuivit le petit blanc, tu parais honteux de m’avoir servi! Est-ce que Jean Biassou ne doit pas s’honorer d’avoir appartenu à Jacques Belin? Ta propre mère, la vieille folle! a bien souvent balayé mon échoppe; mais à présent je l’ai vendue à monsieur le majordome de l’hôpital des Pères; elle est si décrépite qu’il ne m’en a voulu donner que trente-deux livres, et six sous pour l’appoint. Voilà cependant ton histoire et la sienne; mais il paraît que vous êtes devenus fiers, vous autres nègres et mulâtres, et que tu as oublié le temps où tu servais, à genoux, maître Belin, charpentier au Cap.

Biassou l’avait écouté avec ce ricanement féroce qui lui donnait l’air d’un tigre.

— Bien! dit-il.

Alors il se tourna vers les nègres qui avaient amené maître Belin:

— Emportez deux chevalets, deux planches et une scie, et emmenez cet homme. Jacques Belin, charpentier au Cap, remercie-moi, je te procure une mort de charpentier.

Son rire acheva d’expliquer de quel horrible supplice allait être puni l’orgueil de son ancien maître. Je frissonnai; mais Jacques Belin ne fronça pas le sourcil; il se tourna fièrement vers Biassou.

— Oui, dit-il, je dois te remercier, car je t’ai vendu pour le prix de treize piastres, et tu m’as rapporté certainement plus que tu ne vaux.

On l’entraîna.

XXXIII

Les deux autres prisonniers avaient assisté plus morts que vifs à ce prologue effrayant de leur propre tragédie. Leur attitude humble et effrayée contrastait avec la fermeté un peu fanfaronne du charpentier; ils tremblaient de tous leurs membres.

Biassou les considéra l’un après l’autre avec son oeil de renard; puis, se plaisant à prolonger leur agonie, il entama avec Rigaud une conversation sur les différentes espèces de tabac, affirmant que le tabac de la Havane n’était bon qu’à fumer en cigares, et qu’il ne connaissait pas pour priser de meilleur tabac d’Espagne que celui dont feu Boukmann lui avait envoyé deux barils, pris chez M. Lebattu, propriétaire de l’île de la Tortue. Puis, s’adressant brusquement au citoyen-général C:

— Qu’en penses-tu? lui dit-il.

Cette apostrophe inattendue fit chanceler le citoyen. Il répondit en balbutiant

— Je m’en rapporte, général, à l’opinion de votre excellence...

— Propos de flatteur! répliqua Biassou. Je te demande ton avis et non le mien. Est-ce que tu connais un tabac meilleur à prendre en prise que celui de M. Lebattu?

— Non vraiment, monseigneur, dit C, dont le trouble amusait Biassou.

— Général! Excellence! monseigneur! reprit le chef d’un air impatienté; tu es un aristocrate!

— Oh! vraiment non! s’écria le citoyen-général; je suis un bon patriote de 91 et fervent négrophile...

— Négrophile, interrompit le généralissime; qu’est-ce que c’est qu’un négrophile?

— C’est un ami des noirs, balbutia le citoyen.

— Il ne suffit pas d’être ami des noirs, repartit sévèrement Biassou, il faut l’être aussi des hommes de couleur.

Je crois avoir dit que Biassou était sacatra.

— Des hommes de couleur, c’est ce que je voulais dire, répondit humblement le négrophile. Je suis lié avec tous les plus fameux partisans des nègres et des mulâtres...

Biassou, heureux d’humilier un blanc, l’interrompit encore: -Nègres et mulâtres! qu’est-ce que cela veut dire? Viens-tu ici nous insulter avec ces noms odieux, inventés par le mépris des blancs? Il n’y a ici que des hommes de couleur et des noirs, entendez-vous, monsieur le colon?

— C’est une mauvaise habitude contractée dès l’enfance, reprit C; pardonnez-moi, je n’ai point eu l’intention de vous offenser, monseigneur.

— Laisse là ton monseigneur; je te répète que je n’aime point ces façons d’aristocrate.

C voulut encore s’excuser; il se mit à bégayer une nouvelle explication.

— Si vous me connaissiez, citoyen...

— Citoyen! pour qui me prends-tu? s’écria Biassou avec colère. Je déteste ce jargon des jacobins. Est-ce que tu serais un jacobin, par hasard? Songe que tu parles au généralissime des gens du roi! Citoyen!... l’insolent!

Le pauvre négrophile ne savait plus sur quel ton parler à cet homme, qui repoussait également les titres de monseigneur et de citoyen, le langage des aristocrates et celui des patriotes; il était atterré. Biassou, dont la colère n’était que simulée, jouissait cruellement de son embarras.

— Hélas! dit enfin le citoyen-général, vous me jugez bien mal, noble défenseur des droits imprescriptibles de la moitié du genre humain.

Dans l’embarras de donner une qualification quelconque à ce chef qui paraissait les refuser toutes, il avait eu recours à l’une de ces périphrases sonores que les révolutionnaires substituent volontiers au nom ou au titre de la personne qu’ils haranguent.

Biassou le regarda fixement et lui dit;

— Tu aimes donc les noirs et les sang-mêlés?

— Si je les aime! s’écria le citoyen C, je corresponds avec Brissot et...

Biassou l’interrompit en ricanant.

— Ha! Ha! Je suis charmé de voir en toi un ami de notre cause. En ce cas, tu dois détester ces misérables colons qui ont puni notre juste insurrection par les plus cruels supplices, Tu dois penser avec nous que ce ne sont pas les noirs, mais les blancs qui sont les véritables rebelles, puisqu’ils se révoltent contre la nature et l’humanité. Tu dois exécrer ces monstres!

— Je les exècre! répondit C.

— Hé bien! poursuivit Biassou, que penserais-tu d’un homme qui aurait, pour étouffer les dernières tentatives des esclaves, planté cinquante têtes de noirs des deux côtés de l’avenue de son habitation?

La pâleur de C devint effrayante.

— Que penserais-tu d’un blanc qui aurait proposé de ceindre la ville du Cap d’un cordon de têtes d’esclaves?...

— Grâce! grâce! dit le citoyen terrifié.

— Est-ce que je te menace? reprit froidement Biassou. Laisse-moi achever... D’un cordon de têtes qui environnât la ville, du fort Picolet au cap Caracol? Que penserais-tu de cela, hein? réponds!

Le mot de Biassou, Est-ce que je te menace? avait rendu quelque espérance à C; il songea que peut-être le chef savait ces horreurs sans en connaître l’auteur, et répondit avec quelque fermeté, pour prévenir toute présomption qui lui fût contraire:

— Je pense que ce sont des crimes atroces.

Biassou ricanait.

— Bon! et quel châtiment infligerais-tu au coupable?

Ici le malheureux C hésita.

— Hé bien! reprit Biassou, es-tu l’ami des noirs, ou non?

Des deux alternatives, le négrophile choisit la moins menaçante; et ne remarquant rien d’hostile pour lui-même dans les yeux de Biassou, il dit d’une voix faible:

— Le coupable mérite la mort.

— Fort bien répondu, dit tranquillement Biassou en jetant le tabac qu’il mâchait.

Cependant son air d’indifférence avait rendu quelque assurance au pauvre négrophile; il fit un effort pour écarter tous les soupçons qui pouvaient peser sur lui.

— Personne, s’écria-t-il, n’a fait de vœux plus ardents que les miens pour le triomphe de votre cause. Je corresponds avec Brissot et Pruneau de Pomme-Gouge, en France; Magaw en Amérique; Peter Paulus, en Hollande; l’abbé Tamburini, en Italie...

Il continuait d’étaler complaisamment cette litanie philanthropique, qu’il récitait volontiers, et qu’il avait notamment débitée en d’autres circonstances et dans un autre but chez M. de Blanchelande, quand Biassou l’arrêta.

— Eh! que me font à moi tous tes correspondants! indique-moi seulement où sont tes magasins, tes dépôts; mon armée a besoin de munitions. Tes plantations sont sans doute riches, ta maison de commerce doit être forte, puisque tu corresponds avec tous les négociants du monde.

Le citoyen C hasarda une observation timide.

— Héros de l’humanité, ce ne sont point des négociants, ce sont des philosophes, des philanthropes, des négrophiles.

— Allons, dit Biassou en hochant la tête, le voilà revenu à ses diables de mots inintelligibles. Eh bien, si tu n’as ni dépôts ni magasins à piller, à quoi donc es-tu bon?

Cette question présentait une lueur d’espoir que C saisit avidement.

— Illustre guerrier, répondit-il, avez-vous un économiste dans votre armée?

— Qu’est-ce encore que cela? demanda le chef,

— C’est, dit le prisonnier avec autant d’emphase que sa crainte le lui permettait, c’est un homme nécessaire par excellence. C’est celui qui seul apprécie, suivant leurs valeurs respectives, les ressources matérielles d’un empire, qui les échelonne dans l’ordre de leur importance, les classe suivant leur valeur, les bonifie et les améliore en combinant leurs sources et leurs résultats, et les distribue à propos, comme autant de ruisseaux fécondateurs, dans le grand fleuve de l’utilité générale, qui vient grossir à son tour la mer de la prospérité publique.

— Caramba! dit Biassou en se penchant vers l’obi. Que diantre veut-il dire avec ses mots, enfilés les uns dans les autres comme les grains de votre chapelet?

L’obi haussa les épaules en signe d’ignorance et de dédain. Cependant le citoyen C continuait:

— ... J’ai étudié, daignez m’entendre, vaillant chef des braves régénérateurs de Saint-Domingue, j’ai étudié les grands économistes, Turgot, Raynal, et Mirabeau, l’ami des hommes! J’ai mis leur théorie en pratique. Je sais la science indispensable au gouvernement des royaumes et des états quelconques...

— L’économiste n’est pas économe de paroles! dit Rigaud avec son sourire doux et goguenard.

Biassou s’était écrié:

— Dis-moi donc, bavard! est-ce que j’ai des royaumes et des états à gouverner?

— Pas encore, grand homme, repartit C, mais cela peut venir; et d'ailleurs ma science descend, sans déroger, à des détails utiles pour la gestion d'une armée.

Le généralissime l'arrêta encore brusquement.

— Je ne gère pas mon armée, monsieur le planteur, je la commande.

— Fort bien, observa le citoyen; vous serez le général, je serai l'intendant. J'ai des connaissances spéciales pour la multiplication des bestiaux...

— Crois-tu que nous élevons les bestiaux? dit Biassou en ricanant; nous les mangeons. Quand le bétail de la colonie française me manquera, je passerai les mornes de la frontière, et j'irai prendre les bœufs et les moutons espagnols qu'on élève dans les hattes des grandes plaines de Cotuy, de la Vega, de Sant-Jago, et sur les bords de la Yuna; j'irai encore chercher, s'il le faut, ceux qui paissent dans la presqu'île de Samana et au revers de la montagne de Cibos, à partir des bouches du Neybe jusqu'au-delà de Santo-Domingo. D'ailleurs je serai charmé de punir ces damnés planteurs espagnols, ce sont eux qui ont livré Ogé! Tu vois que je ne suis pas embarrassé du défaut de vivres, et que je n'ai pas besoin de ta science nécessaire par excellence!

Cette vigoureuse déclaration déconcerta le pauvre économiste; il essaya pourtant encore une dernière planche de salut.

— Mes études ne se sont pas bornées à l'éducation du bétail. J'ai d'autres connaissances spéciales qui peuvent vous être fort utiles. Je vous indiquerai les moyens d'exploiter la braie et les mines de charbon de terre.

— Que m'importe! dit Biassou. Quand j'ai besoin de charbon, je brûle trois lieues de forêt.

— Je vous enseignerai à quel emploi est propre chaque espèce de bois, poursuivit le prisonnier; le chicaron et le sabiecca pour les quilles de navire, les yabas pour les courbes; les tocumas [Néfliers.] pour les membrures; les hacamas, les gaïacs, les cèdres, les accomas...

— Que te lleven todos los demonios de las diez-y-siete infiernos! [Que puissent t'emporter tous les démons des dix-sept enfers!] s'écria Biassou impatienté.

— Plaît-il, mon gracieux patron? dit l'économiste tout tremblant, et qui n'entendait pas l'espagnol.

— Ecoute, reprit Biassou, je n'ai pas besoin de vaisseaux. Il n'y a qu'un emploi vacant dans ma suite; ce n'est pas la place de mayor-domo, c'est la place de valet de chambre. Vois, señor filosofo, si elle te convient. Tu me serviras à genoux; tu m’apporteras la pipe, le calalou [Ragoût créole.] et la soupe de tortue; et tu porteras derrière moi un éventail de plumes de paon ou de perroquet, comme ces deux pages que tu vois. Hum! réponds, veux-tu être mon valet de chambre?

Le citoyen C, qui ne songeait qu’à sauver sa vie, se courba jusqu’à terre avec mille démonstrations de joie et de reconnaissance.

— Tu acceptes donc? demanda Biassou.

— Pouvez-vous douter, mon généreux maître, que j’hésite un moment devant une si insigne faveur que celle de servir votre personne?

A cette réponse, le ricanement diabolique de Biassou devint éclatant. Il croisa les bras, se leva d’un air de triomphe, et, repoussant du pied la tête du blanc prosterné devant lui, il s’écria d’une voix haute:

— J’étais bien aise d’éprouver jusqu’où peut aller la lâcheté des blancs, après avoir vu jusqu’où peut aller leur cruauté! Citoyen C, c’est à toi que je dois ce double exemple. Je te connais! comment as-tu été assez stupide pour ne pas t’en apercevoir? C’est toi qui as présidé aux supplices de juin, de juillet et d’août; c’est toi qui as fait planter cinquante têtes de noirs des deux côtés de ton avenue, en place de palmiers; c’est toi qui voulais égorger les cinq cents nègres restés dans tes fers après la révolte, et ceindre la ville du Cap d’un cordon de têtes d’esclaves, du fort Picolet à la pointe Caracol. Tu aurais fait, si tu l’avais pu, un trophée de ma tête; maintenant tu t’estimerais heureux que je voulusse de toi pour valet de chambre. Non! non! j’ai plus de soin de ton honneur que toi-même; je ne te ferai pas cet affront. Prépare-toi à mourir.

Il fit un geste, et les noirs déposèrent auprès de moi le malheureux négrophile, qui, sans pouvoir prononcer une parole, était tombé à ses pieds comme foudroyé.

XXXIV

— A ton tour à présent! dit le chef en se tournant vers le dernier des prisonniers, le colon soupçonné par les blancs d’être sang-mêlé, et qui m’avait envoyé un cartel pour cette injure.

Une clameur générale des rebelles étouffa la réponse du colon. - Muerte! muerte! Mort! Death! Touyé! touyé! s’écriaient-ils en grinçant des dents et en montrant les poings au malheureux captif.

— Général, dit un mulâtre qui s’exprimait plus clairement que les autres, c’est un blanc; il faut qu’il meure!

Le pauvre planteur, à force de gestes et de cris, parvint à faire entendre quelques paroles.

— Non, non! monsieur le général, non, mes frères, je ne suis pas un blanc! C’est une abominable calomnie! Je suis un mulâtre, un sang-mêlé comme vous, fils d’une négresse comme vos mères et vos sœurs!

— Il ment! disaient les nègres furieux. C’est un blanc. Il a toujours détesté les noirs et les hommes de couleur.

— Jamais! reprenait le prisonnier. Ce sont les blancs que je déteste. Je suis un de vos frères. J’ai toujours dit avec vous: Nègre cé blan, blan cé nègre! [Dicton populaire chez les nègres révoltés, dont voici la traduction littérale: « Les nègres sont les blancs, les blancs sont les nègres.” On rendrait mieux le sens en traduisant ainsi: Les nègres sont les maîtres, les blancs sont les esclaves.]

— Point! point! criait la multitude! touyé blan, touyé blan! [Tuez le blanc! Tuez le blanc!]

Le malheureux répétait en se lamentant misérablement:

— Je suis un mulâtre! Je suis un des vôtres.

— La preuve? dit froidement Biassou.

— La preuve, répondit l’autre dans son égarement, c’est que les blancs m’ont toujours méprisé.

— Cela peut être vrai, répliqua Biassou, mais tu es un insolent.

Un jeune sang-mêlé adressa vivement la parole au colon.

— Les blancs te méprisaient, c’est juste; mais en revanche tu affectais, toi, de mépriser les sang-mêlés parmi lesquels ils te rangeaient. On m’a même dit que tu avais provoqué en duel un blanc qui t’avait un jour reproché d’appartenir à notre caste.

Une rumeur universelle de rage et d’indignation s’éleva dans la foule, et les cris de mort, plus violents que jamais, couvrirent les justifications du colon, qui, jetant sur moi un regard oblique d’étonnement et de prière, redisait en pleurant:

— C’est une calomnie! Je n’ai point d’autre gloire et d’autre bonheur que d’appartenir aux noirs. Je suis un mulâtre!

— Si tu étais un mulâtre, en effet, observa Rigaud paisiblement, tu ne te servirais pas de ce mot [Il faut se souvenir que les hommes de couleur rejetaient avec colère cette qualification, inventée, diraient-ils, par le mépris des blancs.].

— Hélas! sais-je ce que je dis? reprenait le misérable. Monsieur le général en chef, la preuve que je suis sang-mêlé, c’est ce cercle noir que vous pouvez voir autour de mes ongles [Plusieurs sang-mêlés présentent en effet à l’origine des ongles ce signe, qui s’efface avec l’âge, mais renaît chez leurs enfants.].

Biassou repoussa cette main suppliante.

— Je n’ai pas la science de monsieur le chapelain, qui devine qui vous êtes à l’inspection de votre main. Mais écoute; nos soldats t’accusent, les uns d’être un blanc, les autres d’être un faux frère. Si cela est, tu dois mourir. Tu soutiens que tu appartiens à notre caste, et que tu ne l’as jamais reniée. Il ne te reste qu’un moyen de prouver ce que tu avances et de te sauver.

— Lequel, mon général, lequel? demanda le colon avec empressement. Je suis prêt.

— Le voici, dit Biassou froidement. Prends ce stylet et poignarde toi-même tes deux prisonniers blancs.

En parlant ainsi, il nous désignait du regard et de la main. Le colon recula d’horreur devant le stylet que Biassou lui présentait avec un sourire infernal.

— Eh bien, dit le chef, tu balances! C’est pourtant l’unique moyen de me prouver, ainsi qu’à mon armée, que tu n’es pas un blanc, et que tu es des nôtres. Allons, décide-toi, tu me fais perdre mon temps.

Les yeux du prisonnier étaient égarés. Il fit un pas vers le poignard, puis laissa retomber ses bras, et s’arrêta en détournant la tête. Un frémissement faisait trembler tout son corps.

— Allons donc! s’écria Biassou d’un ton d’impatience et de colère. Je suis pressé. Choisis, ou de les tuer toi-même, ou de mourir avec eux.

Le colon restait immobile et comme pétrifié.

— Fort bien! dit Biassou en se tournant vers les nègres; il ne veut pas être le bourreau, il sera le patient. Je vois que c'est un blanc; emmenez-le, vous autres...

Les noirs s'avançaient pour saisir le colon. Ce mouvement décida de son choix entre la mort à donner et la mort à recevoir. L'excès de la lâcheté a aussi son courage. Il se précipita sur le poignard que lui offrait Biassou, puis, sans se donner le temps de réfléchir à ce qu'il allait faire, le misérable se jeta comme un tigre sur le citoyen C, qui était couché près de moi.

Alors commença une horrible lutte. Le négrophile, que le dénouement de l'interrogatoire dont l'avait tourmenté Biassou venait de plonger dans un désespoir morne et stupide, avait vu la scène entre le chef et le planteur sang-mêlé d'un oeil fixe, et tellement absorbé dans la terreur de son supplice prochain, qu'il n'avait point paru la comprendre; mais quand il vit le colon fondre sur lui, et le fer briller sur sa tête, l'imminence du danger le réveilla en sursaut. Il se dressa debout; il arrêta le bras du meurtrier en criant d'une voix lamentable:

— Grâce! grâce! Que me voulez-vous donc? Que vous ai-je donc fait?

— Il faut mourir, monsieur, répondit le sangmêlé, cherchant à dégager son bras et fixant sur sa victime des yeux effarés. Laissez-moi faire, je ne vous ferai point de mal.

— Mourir de votre main, disait l'économiste, pourquoi donc? Epargnez-moi! Vous m'en voulez peut-être de ce que j'ai dit autrefois que vous étiez un sang-mêlé? Mais laissez-moi la vie, je vous proteste que je vous reconnais pour un blanc. Oui, vous êtes un blanc, je le dirai partout, mais grâce!

Le négrophile avait mal choisi son moyen de défense.

— Tais-toi! tais-toi! cria le sang-mêlé furieux, et craignant que les nègres n'entendissent cette déclaration.

Mais l'autre hurlait, sans l'écouter, qu'il le savait blanc et de bonne race. Le sang-mêlé fit un dernier effort pour le réduire au silence, écarta violemment les deux mains qui le retenaient, et fouilla de son poignard à travers les vêtements du citoyen C.

L'infortuné sentit la pointe du fer, et mordit avec rage le bras qui l'enfonçait.

— Monstre! scélérat! tu m'assassines!

Il jeta un regard vers Biassou.

— Défendez-moi, vengeur de l’humanité!

Mais le meurtrier appuya fortement sur le poignard; un flot de sang jaillit autour de sa main et jusqu’à son visage. Les genoux du malheureux négrophile plièrent subitement, ses bras s’affaissèrent, ses yeux s’éteignirent, sa bouche poussa un sourd gémissement. Il tomba mort.

XXXV

Cette scène, dans laquelle je m'attendais à jouer bientôt mon rôle, m'avait glacé d'horreur. Le vengeur de l'humanité avait contemplé la lutte de ses deux victimes d'un oeil impassible. Quand ce fut terminé, il se tourna vers ses pages épouvantés.

— Apportez-moi d'autre tabac, dit-il; et il se remit à le mâcher paisiblement.

L'obi et Rigaud étaient immobiles, et les nègres paraissaient eux-mêmes effrayés de l'horrible spectacle que leur chef venait de leur donner.

Il restait cependant encore un blanc à poignarder, c'était moi; mon tour était venu. Je jetai un regard sur cet assassin, qui allait être mon bourreau. Il me fit pitié. Ses lèvres étaient violettes, ses dents claquaient, un mouvement convulsif dont tremblaient tous ses membres le faisait chanceler, sa main revenait sans cesse, et comme machinalement, sur son front pour en essuyer les taches de sang, et il regardait d'un air insensé le cadavre fumant étendu à ses pieds. Ses yeux hagards ne se détachaient pas de sa victime.

J'attendais le moment où il achèverait sa tâche par ma mort. J'étais dans une position singulière avec cet homme; il avait déjà failli me tuer pour prouver qu'il était blanc; il allait maintenant m'assassiner pour démontrer qu'il était mulâtre.

— Allons, lui dit Biassou, c'est bien. Je suis content de toi, l'ami! Il jeta un coup d'oeil sur moi, et ajouta: - Je te fais grâce de l'autre. Va-t'en. Nous te déclarons bon frère, et nous te nommons bourreau de notre armée.

A ces paroles du chef, un nègre sortit des rangs, s'inclina trois fois devant Biassou, et s'écria en son jargon, que je traduirai en français pour vous en faciliter l'intelligence:

— Et moi, général?

— Eh bien, toi! que veux-tu dire? demanda Biassou.

— Est-ce que vous ne ferez rien pour moi, mon général? dit le nègre. Voilà que vous donnez de l'avancement à ce chien de blanc, qui assassine pour se faire reconnaître des nôtres. Est-ce que vous ne m'en donnerez pas aussi à moi qui suis un bon noir?

Cette requête inattendue parut embarrasser Biassou; il se pencha vers Rigaud, et le chef du rassemblement des Cayes lui dit en français:

— On ne peut le satisfaire, tâchez d'éluder sa demande.

— Te donner de l'avancement? dit alors Biassou au bon noir; je ne demande pas mieux, Quel grade désires-tu?

— Je voudrais être official [Officier.].

— Officier! reprit le généralissime, eh bien! quels sont tes titres pour obtenir l'épaulette?

— C'est moi, répondit le noir avec emphase, qui ai mis le feu à l'habitation Lagoscette, dès les premiers jours d'août. C'est moi qui ai massacré M. Clément, le planteur, et porté la tête de son raffineur au bout d'une pique. J'ai égorgé dix femmes blanches et sept petits enfants; l'un d'entre eux a même servi d'enseigne aux braves noirs de Boukmann. Plus tard, j'ai brûlé quatre familles de colons dans une chambre du fort Galifet, que j'avais fermée à double tour avant de l'incendier. Mon père a été roué au Cap, mon frère a été pendu au Rocrou, et j'ai failli moi-même être fusillé. J'ai brûlé trois plantations de café, six plantations d'indigo, deux cents carreaux de cannes à sucre; j'ai tué mon maître M. Noë et sa mère...

— Epargne-nous tes états de service, dit Rigaud, dont la feinte mansuétude cachait une cruauté réelle, mais qui était féroce avec décence, et ne pouvait souffrir le cynisme du brigandage.

— Je pourrais en citer encore bien d'autres, repartit le nègre avec orgueil; mais vous trouvez sans doute que cela suffit pour mériter le grade d'official, et pour porter une épaulette d'or sur ma veste, comme nos camarades que voilà.

Il montrait les aides de camp et l'état-major de Biassou. Le généralissime parut réfléchir un moment, puis il adressa gravement ces paroles au nègre:

— Je serais charmé de t'accorder un grade; je suis satisfait de tes services; mais il faut encore autre chose. - Sais-tu le latin?

Le brigand ébahi ouvrit de grands yeux, et dit:

— Plaît-il, mon général?

— Eh bien oui, reprit vivement Biassou, sais-tu le latin?

— Le... latin?..., répéta le noir stupéfait.

— Oui, oui, oui, le latin! sais-tu le latin? poursuivit le rusé chef. Et, déployant un étendard sur lequel était écrit le verset du psaume: In exitu Israël de Aegypto, il ajouta: - Explique-nous ce que veulent dire ces mots.

Le noir, au comble de la surprise, restait immobile et muet, et froissait machinalement le pagne de son caleçon, tandis que ses yeux effarés allaient du général au drapeau, et du drapeau au général.

— Allons, répondras-tu? dit Biassou avec impatience.

Le noir, après s'être gratté la tête, ouvrit et ferma plusieurs fois la bouche, et laissa enfin tomber ces mots embarrassés:

— Je ne sais pas ce que veut dire le général.

Le visage de Biassou prit une subite expression de tolère et d'indignation.

— Comment! misérable drôle! s'écria-t-il, comment! tu veux être officier et tu ne sais pas le latin!

— Mais, notre général..., balbutia le nègre, confus et tremblant.

— Tais-toi! reprit Biassou, dont l'emportement semblait croître. Je ne sais à quoi tient que je ne te fasse fusiller sur l'heure pour ta présomption. Comprenez-vous, Rigaud, ce plaisant officier qui ne sait seulement pas le latin? Eh bien, drôle, puisque tu ne comprends point ce qui est écrit sur te drapeau, je vais te l'expliquer. In exitu, tout soldat, Israël, qui ne sait pas le latin, de Aegypto, ne peut être nommé officier. - N'est-ce point cela, monsieur le chapelain?

Le petit obi fit un signe affirmatif. Biassou continua:

— Ce frère, que je viens de nommer bourreau de l'armée, et dont tu es jaloux, sait le latin.

Il se tourna vers le nouveau bourreau.

— N'est-il pas vrai, l'ami? Prouvez à te butor que vous en savez plus que lui. Que signifie Dominus vobiscum?

Le malheureux colon sang-mêlé, arraché de sa sombre rêverie par cette voix redoutable, leva la tête, et quoique ses esprits fussent encore tout égarés par le lâche assassinat qu'il venait de commettre, la terreur le décida à l'obéissance. Il y avait quelque chose d'étrange dans l'air dont cet homme cherchait à retrouver un souvenir de collège parmi ses pensées d'épouvante et de remords, et dans la manière lugubre dont il prononça l'explication enfantine.

— Dominus vobiscum... cela veut dire: Que le Seigneur soit avec vous!

— Et cum spiritu tuo! ajouta solennellement le mystérieux obi.

— Amen, dit Biassou. Puis, reprenant son accent irrité, et mêlant à son courroux simulé quelques phrases de mauvais latin à la façon de Sganarelle, pour convaincre les noirs de la science de leur chef: - Rentre le dernier dans ton rang! cria-t-il au nègre ambitieux. Sursum corda! Ne t'avise plus à l’avenir de prétendre monter au rang de tes chefs qui savent le latin, orate fratres, ou je te fais pendre! Bonus, bona, bonum!

Le nègre, émerveillé et terrifié tout ensemble, retourna à son rang en baissant honteusement la tête au milieu des huées générales de tous ses camarades, qui s’indignaient de ses prétentions si mal fondées, et fixaient des yeux d’admiration sur leur docte généralissime.

Il y avait un côté burlesque dans cette scène, qui acheva cependant de m’inspirer une haute idée de l’habileté de Biassou. Le moyen ridicule qu’il venait d’employer avec tant de succès [Toussaint Louverture s’est servi plus tard du même expédient avec le même avantage.] pour déconcerter les ambitions toujours si exigeantes dans une bande de rebelles me donnait à la fois la mesure de la stupidité des nègres et de l’adresse de leur chef.

XXXVI

Cependant l’heure de l’almuerzo [Déjeuner.] de Biassou était venue. On apporta devant le mariscal de campo de sû magestad catolica une grande écaille de tortue dans laquelle fumait une espèce d’olla podrida, abondamment assaisonnée de tranches de lard, où la chair de tortue remplaçait le carnera [L’agneau.], et la patate les garganzas [Les pois chiches.]. Un énorme chou caraïbe flottait à la surface de ce puchero. Des deux côtés de l’écaille, qui servait à la fois de marmite et de soupière, étaient deux coupes d’écorce de coco pleines de raisins secs, de sandias [Melons d’eau.], d’ignames et de figues; c’était le postre [Dessert.]. Un pain de maïs et une outre de vin goudronné complétaient l’appareil du festin. Biassou tira de sa poche quelques gousses d’ail et en frotta lui-même le pain; puis, sans même faire enlever le cadavre palpitant couché devant ses yeux, il se mit à manger, et invita Rigaud à en faire autant. L’appétit de Biassou avait quelque chose d’effrayant.

L’obi ne partagea point leur repas. Je compris que, comme tous ses pareils, il ne mangeait jamais en public, afin de faire croire aux nègres qu’il était d’une essence surnaturelle, et qu’il vivait sans nourriture.

Tout en déjeunant, Biassou ordonna à un aide de camp de faire commencer la revue, et les bandes se mirent à défiler en bon ordre devant la grotte. Les noirs du Morne-Rouge passèrent les premiers; ils étaient environ quatre mille divisés en petits pelotons serrés que conduisaient des chefs ornés, comme je l’ai déjà dit, de caleçons ou de ceintures écarlates. Ces noirs, presque tous grands et forts, portaient des fusils, des haches et des sabres; un grand nombre d’entre eux avaient des arcs, des flèches et des zagaies, qu’ils s’étaient forgés à défaut d’autres armes. Ils n’avaient point de drapeau, et marchaient en silence d’un air consterné.

Eu voyant défiler cette horde, Biassou se pencha à l’oreille de Rigaud, et lui dit en français:

— Quand donc la mitraille de Blanchelande et de Rouvray me débarrassera-t-elle de ces bandits du Morne-Rouge? Je les hais; ce sont presque tous des congos! Et puis ils ne savent tuer que dans le combat; ils suivaient l’exemple de leur chef imbécile, de leur idole Bug-Jargal, jeune fou qui voulait faire le généreux et le magnanime. Vous ne le connaissez pas, Rigaud? Vous ne le connaîtrez jamais, je l’espère. Les blancs l’ont fait prisonnier, et ils me délivreront de lui comme ils m’ont délivré de Boukmann.

— A propos de Boukmann, répondit Rigaud, voici les noirs marrons de Macaya qui passent, et je vois dans leurs rangs le nègre que Jean-François vous a envoyé pour vous annoncer la mort de Boukmann. Savez-vous bien que cet homme pourrait détruire tout l’effet des prophéties de l’obi sur la fin de ce chef, s’il disait qu’on l’a arrêté pendant une demi-heure aux avant-postes, et qu’il m’avait confié sa nouvelle avant l’instant où vous l’avez fait appeler?

— Diabolo! dit Biassou. vous avez raison, mon cher; il faut fermer la bouche à cet homme-là. Attendez!

Alors, élevant la voix:

— Macaya! cria-t-il.

Le chef des nègres marrons s’approcha, et présenta son tromblon au col évasé en signe de respect.

— Faites sortir de vos rangs, reprit Biassou, ce noir que j’y vois là-bas, et qui ne doit pas en faire partie.

C’était le messager de Jean-François. Macaya l’amena au généralissime, dont le visage prit subitement cette expression de colère qu’il savait si bien simuler.

— Qui es-tu? demanda-t-il au nègre interdit.

— Notre général, je suis un noir.

— Caramba! je le vois bien! Mais comment t’appelles-tu?

— Mon nom de guerre est Vavelan; mon patron chez les bienheureux est saint Sabas, diacre et martyr, dont la fête viendra le vingtième jour avant la nativité de Notre-Seigneur.

Biassou l’interrompit:

— De quel front oses-tu te présenter à la parade, au milieu des espingoles luisantes et des baudriers blancs, avec ton sabre sans fourreau, ton caleçon déchiré, tes pieds couverts de boue?

— Notre général, répondit le noir, ce n’est pas ma faute. J’ai été chargé par le grand-amiral Jean-François de vous porter la nouvelle de la mort du chef des marrons anglais, Boukmann; et si mes vêtements sont déchirés, si mes pieds sont sales, c’est que j’ai couru à perdre haleine pour vous l’apporter plus tôt; mais on m’a retenu au camp, et...

Biassou fronça le sourcil.

— Il ne s’agit point de cela, gavacho! mais de ton audace d’assister à la revue dans ce désordre. Recommande ton âme à saint Sabas, diacre et martyr, ton patron. Va te faire fusiller!

Ici j’eus encore une nouvelle preuve du pouvoir moral de Biassou sur les rebelles. L’infortuné, chargé d’aller lui-même se faire exécuter, ne se permit pas un murmure; il baissa la tête, croisa les bras sur sa poitrine, salua trois fois son juge impitoyable, et, après s’être agenouillé devant l’obi, qui lui donna gravement une absolution sommaire, il sortit de la grotte. Quelques minutes après, une détonation de mousqueterie annonça à Biassou que le nègre avait obéi et vécu.

Le chef, débarrassé de toute inquiétude, se tourna alors vers Rigaud, l’oeil étincelant de plaisir, et avec un ricanement de triomphe qui semblait dire: - Admirez! [Toussaint Louverture, qui s’était formé à l’école de Biassou, et qui, s’il ne lui était pas supérieur en habileté, était du moins fort loin de l’égaler en perfidie et en cruauté. Toussaint Louverture a donné plus tard le spectacle du même pouvoir sur les nègres fanatisés. Ce chef, issu, dit-on, d’une race royale africaine, avait reçu, comme Biassou, quelque instruction grossière, à laquelle il ajoutait du génie. Il s’était dressé une façon de trône républicain à Saint-Domingue dans le même temps où Bonaparte se fondait en France une monarchie sur la victoire. Toussaint admirait naïvement le premier consul; mais le premier consul, ne voyant dans Toussaint qu’un parodiste gênant de sa fortune, repoussa toujours dédaigneusement toute correspondance avec l’esclave affranchi qui osait lui écrire: Au premier des blancs le premier des noirs.]

XXXVII

Cependant la revue continuait. Cette armée, dont le désordre m’avait offert un tableau si extraordinaire quelques heures auparavant, n’était pas moins bizarre sous les armes. C’étaient tantôt des troupes de nègres absolument nus, munis de massues, de tomahawks, de casse-têtes, marchant au son de la corne à bouquin, comme les sauvages; tantôt des bataillons de mulâtres, équipés à l’espagnole ou à l’anglaise, bien armés et bien disciplinés, réglant leurs pas sur le roulement d’un tambour; puis des cohues de négresses, de négrillons, chargés de fourches et de broches; des fatras courbés sous de vieux fusils sans chien et sans canon; des griotes avec leurs parures bariolées; des griots, effroyables de grimaces et de contorsions, chantant des airs incohérents sur la guitare, le tam-tam et le balafo. Cette étrange procession était de temps à autre coupée par des détachements hétérogènes de griffes, de marabouts, de sacatras, de mamelucos, de quarterons, de sang-mêlés libres, ou par des hordes nomades de noirs marrons à l’attitude fière, aux carabines brillantes, traînant dans leurs rangs leurs cabrouets tout chargés, ou quelque canon pris aux blancs, qui leur servait moins d’arme que de trophée, et hurlant à pleine voix les hymnes du camp du Grand-Pré et d’Oua-Nassé. Au-dessus de toutes ces têtes flottaient des drapeaux de toutes couleurs, de toutes devises, blancs, rouges, tricolores, fleurdelysés, surmontés du bonnet de liberté, portant pour inscriptions: - Mort aux prêtres et aux aristocrates! - Vive la religion! - Liberté! Égalité! - Vive le roi! - A bas la métropole! - Viva España! - Plus de tyrans! etc. Confusion frappante qui indiquait que toutes les forces des rebelles n’étaient qu’un amas de moyens sans but, et qu’en cette armée il n’y avait pas moins de désordre dans les idées que dans les hommes.

En passant tour à tour devant la grotte, les bandes inclinaient leur bannière, et Biassou rendait le salut. Il adressait à chaque troupe quelque réprimande ou quelque éloge; et chaque parole de sa bouche, sévère ou flatteuse, était recueillie par les siens avec un respect fanatique et une sorte de crainte superstitieuse.

Ce flot de barbares et de sauvages passa enfin. J’avoue que la vue de tant de brigands, qui m’avait distrait d’abord, finissait par me peser. Cependant le jour tombait, et, au moment où les derniers rangs défilèrent, le soleil ne jetait plus qu’une teinte de cuivre rouge sur le front granitique des montagnes de l’orient.

XXXVIII

Biassou paraissait rêveur. Quand la revue fut terminée, qu’il eut donné ses derniers ordres. et que tous les rebelles furent rentrés sous leurs ajoupas, il m’adressa la parole.

— Jeune homme, me dit-il, tu as pu juger à ton aise de mon génie et de ma puissance. Voici que l’heure est venue pour toi d’en aller rendre compte à Léogri.

— Il n’a pas tenu à moi qu’elle ne vint plus tôt, lui répondis-je froidement.

— Tu as raison, répliqua Biassou. Il s’arrêta un moment comme pour épier l’effet que produirait sur moi ce qu’il allait me dire, et il ajouta: - Mais il ne tient qu’à toi qu’elle ne vienne pas.

— Comment! m’écriai-je étonné; que veux-tu dire?

— Oui, continua Biassou, ta vie dépend de toi; tu peux la sauver, si tu le veux.

Cet accès de clémence, le premier et le dernier sans doute que Biassou ait jamais eu, me parut un prodige. L’obi, surpris comme moi, s’était élancé du siège où il avait conservé si longtemps la même attitude extatique, à la mode des fakirs hindous. Il se plaça en face du généralissime, et éleva la voix avec colère:

— Que dice el exelentisimo señor mariscal de campo? [Que dit le très excellent seigneur maréchal de camp?] Se souvient-il de ce qu’il m’a promis? Il ne peut, ni lui ni le bon Giu, disposer maintenant de cette vie: elle m’appartient.

En ce moment encore, à cet accent irrité, je crus me ressouvenir de ce maudit petit homme; mais ce moment fut insaisissable, et aucune lumière n’en jaillit pour moi.

Biassou se leva sans s’émouvoir, parla bas un instant avec l’obi, lui montra le drapeau noir que j’avais remarqué, et, après quelques mots échangés, le sorcier remua la tête de haut en bas et la releva de bas en haut, en signe d’adhésion. Tous deux reprirent leurs places et leurs attitudes.

— Ecoute, me dit alors le généralissime en tirant de la poche de sa veste l’autre dépêche de Jean-François, qu’il y avait déposée; nos affaires vont mal; Boukmann vient de périr dans un combat. Les blancs ont exterminé deux mille noirs dans le district du Cul-de-Sac. Les colons continuent de se fortifier et de hérisser la plaine de postes militaires. Nous avons perdu, par notre faute, l’occasion de prendre le Cap; elle ne se représentera pas de longtemps. Du côté de l’est, la route principale est coupée par une rivière; les blancs, afin d’en défendre le passage, y ont établi une batterie sur des pontons, et ont formé sur chaque bord deux petits camps. Au sud, il y a une grande route qui traverse ce pays montueux appelé le Haut-du-Cap; ils l’ont couverte de troupes et d’artillerie. La position est également fortifiée du côté de la terre par une bonne palissade, à laquelle tous les habitants ont travaillé, et l’on y a ajouté des chevaux de frise. Le Cap est donc à l’abri de nos armes. Notre embuscade aux gorges de Dompte-Mulâtre a manqué son effet. A tous nos échecs se joint la fièvre de Siam, qui dépeuple le camp de Jean-François. En conséquence, le grand amiral de France [Nous avons déjà dit que Jean-François prenait ce titre] pense, et nous partageons son avis, qu’il conviendrait de traiter avec le gouverneur Blanchelande et l’assemblée coloniale. Voici la lettre que nous adressons à l’assemblée à ce sujet: écoute!

«Messieurs les députés,

«De grands malheurs ont affligé cette riche et importante colonie; nous y avons été enveloppés, et il ne nous reste plus rien à dire pour notre justification. Un jour vous nous rendrez toute la justice que mérite notre position. Nous devons être compris dans l’amnistie générale que le roi Louis XVI a prononcée pour tous indistinctement.

«Sinon, comme le roi d’Espagne est un bon roi, qui nous traite fort bien, et nous témoigne des récompenses, nous continuerons de le servir avec zèle et dévouement.

«Et puis, nous ne savons ce qu'on entend par volonté de la nation, vu que depuis que le monde règne nous n'avons exécuté que celle d'un roi. Le prince de France nous aime, celui d'Espagne ne cesse de nous secourir. Nous les aidons, ils nous aident; c'est la cause de l'humanité. Et d'ailleurs ces majestés viendraient à nous manquer, que nous aurions bien vite trôné un roi.

«Telles sont nos intentions, moyennant quoi nous consentirons à faire la paix.

«Signé JEAN-FRANCOIS, général; BIASSOU, maréchal de camp; DESPREZ, MANZEAU, TOUSSAINT, AUBERT, commissaires ad hoc [Il paraîtrait que cette lettre, ridiculement caractéristique, fut en effet envoyée à l'assemblée.].”

— Tu vois, ajouta Biassou après la lecture de cette pièce de diplomatie nègre, dont le souvenir s'est fixé mot pour mot dans ma tête, tu vois que nous sommes pacifiques. Or, voici ce que je veux de toi. Ni Jean-François, ni moi, n'avons été élevés dans les écoles des blancs, où l'on apprend le beau langage. Nous savons nous battre, mais nous ne savons point écrire. Cependant nous ne voulons pas qu'il reste rien dans notre lettre à l'assemblée qui puisse exciter les burlerias orgueilleuses de nos anciens maîtres. Tu parais avoir appris cette science frivole qui nous manque. Corrige les fautes qui pourraient, dans notre dépêche, prêter à rire aux blancs. A ce prix, je t'accorde la vie.

Il y avait dans ce rôle de correcteur des fautes d'orthographe diplomatique de Biassou quelque chose qui répugnait trop à ma fierté pour que je balançasse un moment. Et d'ailleurs, que me faisait la vie? Je refusai son offre.

Il parut surpris.

— Comment! s'écria-t-il, tu aimes mieux mourir que de redresser quelques traits de plume sur un morceau de parchemin?

— Oui, lui répondis-je.

Ma résolution semblait l'embarrasser. Il me dit après un instant de rêverie:

— Ecoute bien, jeune fou, je suis moins obstiné que toi. Je te donne jusqu'à demain soir pour te décider à m'obéir; demain, au coucher du soleil, tu seras ramené devant moi. Pense alors à me satisfaire. Adieu, la nuit porte conseil. Songes-y bien, chez nous la mort n'est pas seulement la mort.

Le sens de ces dernières paroles, accompagnées d'un rire affreux, n'était pas équivoque; et les tourments que Biassou avait coutume d'inventer pour ses victimes achevaient de l'expliquer.

— Candi, ramenez le prisonnier, poursuivit Biassou; confiez-en la garde aux noirs du Morne-Rouge; je veux qu'il vive encore un tour de soleil, et mes autres soldats n'auraient peut-être pas la patience d'attendre que les vingt-quatre heures fussent écoulées.

Le mulâtre Candi, qui était le chef de sa garde, me fit lier les bras derrière le dos. Un soldat prit l'extrémité de la corde, et nous sortîmes de la grotte.

XXXIX

Quand les événements extraordinaires, les angoisses et les catastrophes viennent fondre tout à coup au milieu d’une vie heureuse et délicieusement uniforme, ces émotions inattendues, ces coups du sort, interrompent brusquement le sommeil de l’âme, qui se reposait dans la monotonie de la prospérité. Cependant le malheur qui arrive de cette manière ne semble pas un réveil, mais seulement un songe. Pour celui qui a toujours été heureux, le désespoir commence par la stupeur. L’adversité imprévue ressemble à la torpille; elle secoue, mais engourdit; et l’effrayante lumière qu’elle jette soudainement devant nos yeux n’est point le jour. Les hommes, les choses, les faits, passent alors devant nous avec une physionomie en quelque sorte fantastique; et se meuvent comme dans un rêve. Tout est changé dans l’horizon de notre vie, atmosphère et perspective; mais il s’écoule un long temps avant que nos yeux aient perdu cette sorte d’image lumineuse du bonheur passé qui les suit, et, s’interposant sans cesse entre eux et le sombre présent, en change la couleur et donne je ne sais quoi de faux à la réalité. Alors tout ce qui est nous paraît impossible et absurde; nous croyons à peine à notre propre existence, parce que, ne retrouvant rien autour de nous de ce qui composait notre être, nous ne comprenons pas comment tout cela aurait disparu sans nous entraîner, et pourquoi de notre vie il ne serait reste que nous. Si cette position violente de l’âme se prolonge, elle dérange l’équilibre de la pensée et devient folie, état peut-être heureux, dans lequel la vie n’est plus pour l’infortuné qu’une vision, dont il est lui-même le fantôme.

XL

J’ignore, messieurs, pourquoi je vous expose ces idées. Ce ne sont point de celles que l’on comprend ni que l’on fait comprendre. Il faut les avoir senties. Je les ai éprouvées. C’était l’état de mon âme au moment ou les gardes de Biassou me remirent aux nègres du Morne-Rouge. Il me semblait que c’étaient des spectres qui me livraient à des spectres, et sans opposer de résistance je me laissai lier par la ceinture au tronc d’un arbre. Ils m’apportèrent quelques patates cuites dans l’eau, que je mangeai par cette sorte d’instinct machinal que la bonté de Dieu laisse à l’homme au milieu des préoccupations de l’esprit.

Cependant la nuit était venue; mes gardiens se retirèrent dans leurs ajoupas, et six d’entre eux seulement restèrent près de moi, assis ou couchés devant un grand feu qu’ils avaient allumé pour se préserver du froid nocturne. Au bout de quelques instants. tous s’endormirent profondément.

L’accablement physique dans lequel je me trouvais alors ne contribuait pas peu aux vagues rêveries qui égaraient ma pensée. Je me rappelais les jours sereins et toujours les mêmes que, peu de semaines auparavant, je passais encore près de Marie, sans même entrevoir dans l’avenir une autre possibilité que celle d’un bonheur éternel. Je les comparais à la journée qui venait de s’écouler, journée où tant de choses étranges s’étaient déroulées devant moi, comme pour me faire douter de leur existence, où ma vie avait été trois fois condamnée, et n’avait pas été sauvée. Je méditais sur mon avenir présent, qui ne se composait plus que d’un lendemain, et ne m’offrait plus d’autre certitude que le malheur et la mort, heureusement prochaine. Il me semblait lutter contre un cauchemar affreux. Je me demandais s’il était possible que tout ce qui s’était passé, que ce qui m’entourait fût le camp du sanguinaire Biassou, que Marie fût pour jamais perdue pour moi, et que ce prisonnier gardé par six barbares, garrotté et voué à une mort certaine, ce prisonnier que me montrait la lueur d’un feu de brigands, fût bien moi. Et, malgré tous mes efforts pour fuir l’obsession d’une pensée bien plus déchirante encore, mon cœur revenait a Marie. Je m’interrogeais avec angoisse sur son sort; je me roidissais dans mes liens comme pour voler à son secours, espérant toujours que le rêve horrible se dissiperait, et que Dieu n’aurait pas voulu faire entrer toutes les horreurs sur lesquelles je n’osais m’arrêter dans la destinée de l’ange qu’il m’avait donnée pour épouse. L'enchaînement douloureux de mes idées ramenait alors Pierrot devant moi, et la rage me rendait presque insensé; les artères de mon front me semblaient prêtes à se rompre; je me haïssais, je me maudissais, je me méprisais pour avoir un moment uni mon amitié pour Pierrot à mon amour pour Marie; et, sans chercher à m'expliquer quel motif avait pu le pousser à se jeter lui-même dans les eaux de la Grande-Rivière, je pleurais de ne point l'avoir tué. Il était mort! j'allais mourir; et la seule chose que je regrettasse de sa vie et de la mienne, c'était ma vengeance.

Toutes ces émotions m'agitaient au milieu d'un demi-sommeil dans lequel l'épuisement m'avait plongé. Je ne sais combien de temps il dura; mais j'en fus soudainement arraché par le retentissement d'une voix mâle qui chantait distinctement, mais de loin: Yo que soy contrabandista. J'ouvris les yeux en tressaillant; tout était noir, les nègres dormaient, le feu mourait. Je n'entendais plus rien; je pensai que cette voix était une illusion du sommeil, et mes paupières alourdies se refermèrent. Je les ouvris une seconde fois précipitamment; la voix avait recommencé, et chantait avec tristesse et de plus près ce couplet d'une romance espagnole:

En los campos de Ocaña,
Prisonero cai;
Me llevan à Cotadilla;
Desdichado fui! [Dans les champs d'Ocaña,/ Je tombai prisonnier;/ Ils m'emmenèrent à Cotadilla;/ Je fus malheureux.]

Cette fois, il n'y avait plus de rêve. C'était la voix de Pierrot! Un moment après, elle s'éleva encore dans l'ombre et le silence, et fit entendre pour la deuxième fois, presque à mon oreille, l'air connu: Yo que soi contrabandista. Un dogue vint joyeusement se rouler à mes pieds, c'était Rask. Je levai les yeux. Un noir était devant moi, et la lueur du foyer projetait à côté du chien son ombre colossale; c'était Pierrot. La vengeance me transporta; la surprise me rendit immobile et muet. Je ne dormais pas. Les morts revenaient donc! Ce n'était plus un songe, mais une apparition. Je me détournai avec horreur. A cette vue, sa tête tomba sur sa poitrine.

— Frère, murmura-t-il à voix basse, tu m'avais promis de ne jamais douter de moi quand tu m'entendrais chanter cet air; frère, dis, as-tu oublié ta promesse?

La colère me rendit la parole.

— Monstre! m'écriai-je, je te retrouve donc enfin; bourreau, assassin de mon oncle, ravisseur de Marie, oses-tu m'appeler ton frère? Tiens, ne m’approche pas!

J’oubliais que j’étais attaché de manière à ne pouvoir faire presque aucun mouvement. J’abaissai comme involontairement les yeux sur mon côté pour y chercher mon épée. Cette intention visible le frappa. Il prit un air ému, mais doux.

— Non, dit-il, non, je n’approcherai pas. Tu es malheureux, je te plains; toi, tu ne me plains pas, quoique je sois plus malheureux que toi.

Je haussai les épaules. Il comprit ce reproche muet. Il me regarda d’un air rêveur.

— Oui, tu as beaucoup perdu; mais, crois-moi, j’ai perdu plus que toi.

Cependant ce bruit de voix avait réveillé les six nègres qui me gardaient. Apercevant un étranger, ils se levèrent précipitamment en saisissant leurs armes; mais dès que leurs regards se furent arrêtés sur Pierrot, ils poussèrent un cri de surprise et de joie, et tombèrent prosternés en battant la terre de leurs fronts.

Mais les respects que ces nègres rendaient à Pierrot, les caresses que Rask portait alternativement de son maître à moi, en me regardant avec inquiétude, comme étonné de mon froid accueil, rien ne faisait impression sur moi en ce moment. J’étais tout entier à l’émotion de ma rage, rendue impuissante par les liens qui me chargeaient.

— Oh! m’écriai-je enfin, en pleurant de fureur sous les entraves qui me retenaient, oh! que je suis malheureux! Je regrettais que ce misérable se fût fait justice à lui-même; je le croyais mort, et je me désolais pour ma vengeance. Et maintenant le voilà qui vient me narguer lui-même; il est là, vivant, sous mes yeux, et je ne puis jouir du bonheur de le poignarder! Oh! qui me délivrera de ces exécrables nœuds?

Pierrot se retourna vers les nègres, toujours en adoration devant lui.

— Camarades, dit-il, détachez le prisonnier!

XLI

Il fut promptement obéi. Mes six gardiens coupèrent avec empressement les cordes qui m’entouraient. Je me levai debout et libre, mais je restai immobile; l’étonnement m’enchaînait à son tour.

— Ce n’est pas tout, reprit alors Pierrot; et, arrachant le poignard de l’un de ses nègres, il me le présenta en disant: - Tu peux te satisfaire. A Dieu ne plaise que je te dispute le droit de disposer de ma vie! Tu l’as sauvée trois fois; elle est bien à toi maintenant; frappe, si tu veux frapper.

Il n’y avait ni reproche ni amertume dans sa voix. Il n’était que triste et résigné.

Cette voie inattendue ouverte à ma vengeance par celui même qu’elle brûlait d’atteindre avait quelque chose de trop étrange et de trop facile. Je sentis que toute ma haine pour Pierrot, tout mon amour pour Marie ne suffisaient pas pour me porter à un assassinat; d’ailleurs quelles que fussent les apparences, une voix me criait au fond du cœur qu’un ennemi et un coupable ne vient pas de cette manière au-devant de la vengeance et du châtiment. Vous le dirai-je enfin? il y avait dans le prestige impérieux dont cet être extraordinaire était environné quelque chose qui me subjuguait moi-même malgré moi dans ce moment. Je repoussai le poignard.

— Malheureux! lui dis-je, je veux bien te tuer dans un combat, mais non t’assassiner. Défends-toi!

— Que je me défende! répondit-il étonné! et contre qui?

— Contre moi!

Il fit un geste de stupeur.

— Contre toi! C’est la seule chose pour laquelle je ne puisse t’obéir. Vois-tu Rask? je puis bien l’égorger, il se laissera faire; mais je ne saurais le contraindre à lutter contre moi, il ne me comprendrait point. Je ne te comprends pas; je suis Rask pour toi.

Il ajouta après un silence:

— Je vois la haine dans tes yeux, comme tu l’as pu voir un jour dans les miens. Je sais que tu as éprouvé bien des malheurs, ton oncle massacré, tes champs incendiés, tes amis égorgés; on a saccagé tes maisons, dévasté ton héritage; mais ce n’est pas moi, ce sont les miens. Ecoute, je t’ai dit un jour que les tiens m’avaient fait bien du mal; tu m’as répondu que ce n’était pas toi; qu’ai-je fait alors?

Son visage s’éclaircit; il s’attendait à me voir tomber dans ses bras. Je le regardai d’un air farouche.

— Tu désavoues tout ce que m’ont fait les tiens, lui dis-je avec l’accent de la fureur, et tu ne parles pas de ce que tu m’as fait, toi!

— Quoi donc? demanda-t-il.

Je m’approchai violemment de lui, et ma voix devint un tonnerre:

— Où est Marie? qu’as-tu fait de Marie?

A ce nom, un nuage passa sur son front; il parut un moment embarrassé. Enfin, rompant le silence:

— Maria! répondit-il. Oui, tu as raison... Mais trop d’oreilles nous écoutent.

Son embarras, ces mots: Tu as raison, rallumèrent un enfer dans mon cœur. Je crus voir qu’il éludait ma question. En ce moment il me regarda avec son visage ouvert, et me dit avec une émotion profonde:

— Ne me soupçonne pas, je t’en conjure. Je te dirai tout cela ailleurs. Tiens, aime-moi comme je t’aime, avec confiance.

Il s’arrêta un instant pour observer l’effet de ses paroles, et ajouta avec attendrissement:

— Puis-je t’appeler frère?

Mais ma colère jalouse avait repris toute sa violence, et ces paroles tendres, qui me parurent hypocrites, ne firent que l’exaspérer.

— Oses-tu bien me rappeler ce temps? m’écriai-je, misérable ingrat!

Il m’interrompit. De grosses larmes brillaient dans ses yeux.

— Ce n’est pas moi qui suis ingrat!

— Eh bien, parle! repris-je avec emportement. Qu’as-tu fait de Marie?

— Ailleurs, ailleurs! me répondit-il. Ici nos oreilles n’entendent pas seules ce que nous disons. Au reste, tu ne me croirais pas sans doute sur parole, et puis le temps presse. Voilà qu’il fait jour, et il faut que je te tire d’ici. Ecoute, tout est fini, puisque tu doutes de moi, et tu feras aussi bien de m’achever avec un poignard; mais attends encore un peu avant d’exécuter ce que tu appelles ta vengeance; je dois d’abord te délivrer. Viens avec moi trouver Biassou.

Cette manière d’agir et de parler cachait un mystère que je ne pouvais comprendre. Malgré toutes mes préventions contre cet homme, sa voix faisait toujours vibrer une corde dans mon cœur. En l’écoutant, je ne sais quelle puissance me dominait. Je me surprenais balançant entre la vengeance et la pitié, la défiance et un aveugle abandon. Je le suivis.

XLII

Nous sortîmes du quartier des nègres du Morne-Rouge. Je m'étonnais de marcher libre dans ce camp barbare où la veille chaque brigand semblait avoir soif de mon sang. Loin de chercher à nous arrêter, les noirs et les mulâtres se prosternaient sur notre passage avec des exclamations de surprise, de joie et de respect. J'ignorais quel rang Pierrot occupait dans l'armée des révoltés; mais je me rappelais l'empire qu'il exerçait sur ses compagnons d'esclavage, et je m'expliquais sans peine l'importance dont il paraissait jouir parmi ses camarades de rébellion.

Arrivés à la ligne de gardes qui veillait devant la grotte de Biassou, le mulâtre Candi, leur chef, vint à nous, nous demandant de loin, avec menaces, pourquoi nous osions avancer si près du général; mais quand il fut à portée de voir distinctement les traits de Pierrot, il ôta subitement sa montera brodée en or, et, comme terrifié de sa propre audace, il s'inclina jusqu'à terre, et nous introduisit près de Biassou, en balbutiant mille excuses, auxquelles Pierrot ne répondit que par un geste de dédain.

Le respect des simples soldats nègres pour Pierrot ne m'avait pas étonné; mais en voyant Candi, l'un de leurs principaux officiers, s'humilier ainsi devant l'esclave de mon oncle, je commençai à me demander quel pouvait être cet homme dont l'autorité semblait si grande. Ce fut bien autre chose quand je vis le généralissime, qui était seul au moment où nous entrâmes, et mangeait tranquillement un calalou, se lever précipitamment à l'aspect de Pierrot, et, dissimulant une surprise inquiète et un violent dépit sous des apparences de profond respect, s'incliner humblement devant mon compagnon, et lui offrir son propre trône d'acajou. Pierrot refusa.

— Jean Biassou, dit-il, je ne suis pas venu vous prendre votre place, mais simplement vous demander une grâce.

— Alteza, répondit Biassou en redoublant ses salutations, vous savez que vous pouvez disposer de tout ce qui dépend de Jean Biassou, de tout ce qui appartient à Jean Biassou, et de Jean Biassou lui-même.

Ce titre d'alteza, qui équivaut à celui d'altesse ou de hautesse, donné à Pierrot par Biassou, accrut encore mon étonnement.

— Je n'en veux pas tant, reprit vivement Pierrot; je ne vous demande que la vie et la liberté de ce prisonnier.

Il me désignait de la main. Biassou parut un moment interdit; cet embarras fut court.

— Vous désolez votre serviteur, alteza; vous exigez de lui bien plus qu'il ne peut vous accorder, à son grand regret. Ce prisonnier n'est point Jean Biassou, n'appartient pas à Jean Biassou, et ne dépend pas de Jean Biassou.

— Que voulez-vous dire? demanda Pierrot sévèrement. De qui dépend-il donc? Y a-t-il un autre pouvoir que vous?

— Hélas oui! alteza.

— Et lequel?

— Mon armée.

L'air caressant et rusé avec lequel Biassou éludait les questions hautaines et franches de Pierrot annonçait qu'il était déterminé à n'accorder à l'autre que les respects auxquels il paraissait obligé.

— Comment! s'écria Pierrot, votre armée! Et ne la commandez-vous pas?

Biassou, conservant son avantage, sans quitter pourtant son attitude d'infériorité, répondit avec une apparence de sincérité:

— Sù alteza pense-t-elle que l'on puisse réellement commander à des hommes qui ne se révoltent que pour ne pas obéir?

J'attachais trop peu de prix à la vie pour rompre le silence; mais ce que j'avais vu la veille de l'autorité illimitée de Biassou sur ses bandes aurait pu me fournir l'occasion de le démentir et de montrer à nu sa duplicité. Pierrot lui répliqua:

— Eh bien! si vous ne savez pas commander à votre armée, et si vos soldats sont vos chefs, quels motifs de haine peuvent-ils avoir contre ce prisonnier?

— Boukmann vient d'être tué par les troupes du gouvernement, dit Biassou, en composant tristement son visage féroce et railleur; les miens ont résolu de venger sur ce blanc la mort du chef des nègres marrons de la Jamaïque; ils veulent opposer trophée à trophée, et que la tête de ce jeune officier serve de contrepoids à la tête de Boukmann dans la balance où le bon Giu pèse les deux partis.

— Comment avez-vous pu, dit Pierrot, adhérer à ces horribles représailles? Ecoutez-moi, Jean Biassou; ce sont ces cruautés qui perdront notre juste cause. Prisonnier au camp des blancs, d'où j'ai réussi à m'échapper, j'ignorais la mort de Boukmann, que vous m'apprenez. C'est un juste châtiment du ciel pour ses crimes. Je vais vous apprendre une autre nouvelle; Jeannot, ce même chef de noirs, qui avait servi de guide aux blancs pour les attirer dans l'embuscade de Dompte-Mulâtre, Jeannot vient aussi de mourir. Vous savez, ne m'interrompez pas, Biassou, qu'il rivalisait d'atrocité avec Boukmann et vous; or, faites attention à ceci, ce n'est point la foudre du ciel, ce ne sont point les blancs qui l'ont frappé, c'est Jean-François lui-même qui a fait cet acte de justice.

Biassou, qui écoutait avec un sombre respect, fit une exclamation de surprise. En ce moment Rigaud entra, salua profondément Pierrot, et parla bas à l'oreille du généralissime. On entendait au-dehors une grande agitation dans le camp. Pierrot continuait:

— ... Oui. Jean-François, qui n'a d'autre défaut qu'un luxe funeste, et l'étalage ridicule de cette voiture à six chevaux qui le mène chaque jour de son camp à la messe du curé de la Grande-Rivière. Jean-François a puni les fureurs de Jeannot. Malgré les lâches prières du brigand, quoique à son dernier moment il se soit cramponné au curé de la Marmelade, chargé de l'exhorter, avec tant de terreur qu'on a dû l'arracher de force, le monstre a été fusillé hier, au pied même de l'arbre armé de crochets de fer auxquels il suspendait ses victimes vivantes. Biassou, méditez cet exemple! Pourquoi ces massacres qui contraignent les blancs à la férocité? Pourquoi encore user de jongleries afin d'exciter la fureur de nos malheureux camarades, déjà trop exaspérés? Il y a au Trou-Coffi un charlatan mulâtre, nommé Romaine-la- Prophétesse, qui fanatise une bande de noirs; il profane la sainte messe; il leur persuade qu'il est en rapport avec la Vierge, dont il écoute les prétendus oracles en mettant sa tête dans le tabernacle; et il pousse ses camarades au meurtre et au pillage, au nom de Marie!

Il y avait peut-être une expression plus tendre encore que la vénération religieuse dans la manière dont Pierrot prononça ce nom. Je ne sais comment cela se fit, mais je m'en sentis offensé et irrité.

— ... Eh bien! poursuivit l'esclave, vous avez dans votre camp je ne sais quel obi, je ne sais quel jongleur comme ce Romaine-la-Prophétesse! Je n'ignore point qu'ayant à conduire une armée composée d'hommes de tous pays, de toutes familles, de toutes couleurs, un lien commun vous est nécessaire, mais ne pouvez-vous le trouver autre part que dans un fanatisme féroce et des superstitions ridicules? Croyez-moi, Biassou, les blancs sont moins cruels que nous. J'ai vu beaucoup de planteurs défendre les jours de leur esclave; je n’ignore pas que, pour plusieurs d’entre eux, ce n’était pas sauver la vie d’un homme, mais une somme d’argent; du moins leur intérêt leur donnait une vertu. Ne soyons pas moins cléments qu’eux, c’est aussi notre intérêt. Notre cause sera-t-elle plus sainte et plus juste quand nous aurons exterminé des femmes, égorgé des enfants, torturé des vieillards, brûlé des colons dans leurs maisons? Ce sont là pourtant nos exploits de chaque jour. Faut-il, répondez, Biassou, que le seul vestige de notre passage soit toujours une trace de sang ou une trace de feu?

Il se tut. L’éclat de son regard, l’accent de sa voix donnaient à ses paroles une force de conviction et d’autorité impossible à reproduire. Comme un renard pris par un lion, l’oeil obliquement baissé de Biassou semblait chercher par quelle ruse il pourrait échapper à tant de puissance. Pendant qu’il méditait, le chef de la bande des Cayes, ce même Rigaud qui la veille avait vu d’un front tranquille tant d’horreurs se commettre devant lui, paraissait s’indigner des attentats dont Pierrot avait tracé le tableau, et s’écriait avec une hypocrite consternation:

— Eh! mon bon Dieu, qu’est-ce que c’est qu’un peuple en fureur!

XLIII

Cependant la rumeur extérieure s'accroissait et paraissait inquiéter Biassou. J'ai appris plus tard que cette rumeur provenait des nègres du Morne-Rouge, qui parcouraient le camp en annonçant le retour de mon libérateur, et exprimaient l'intention de le seconder, quel que fût le motif pour lequel il s'était rendu près de Biassou. Rigaud venait d'informer le généralissime de cette circonstance; et c'est la crainte d'une scission funeste qui détermina le chef rusé à l'espèce de concession qu'il fit aux désirs de Pierrot.

— Alteza, dit-il avec un air de dépit, si nous sommes sévères pour les blancs, vous êtes sévère pour nous. Vous avez tort de m'accuser de la violence du torrent; il m'entraîne. Mais enfin que podria hacer ahora [Que pourrais-je faire maintenant?] qui vous fût agréable?

— Je vous l'ai déjà dit, señor Biassou, répondit Pierrot; laissez-moi emmener ce prisonnier.

Biassou demeura un moment pensif, puis s'écria, donnant à l'expression de ses traits le plus de franchise qu'il put:

— Allons, alteza, je veux vous prouver quel est mon désir de vous plaire. Permettez-moi seulement de dire deux mots en secret au prisonnier; il sera libre ensuite de vous suivre.

— Vraiment! qu'à cela ne tienne, répondit Pierrot.

Et son visage, jusqu'alors fier et mécontent, rayonnait de joie. Il s'éloigna de quelques pas.

Biassou m'entraîna dans un coin de la grotte et me dit à voix basse:

— Je ne puis t'accorder la vie qu'à une condition; tu la connais, y souscris-tu?

Il me montrait la dépêche de Jean-François. Un consentement m'eût paru une bassesse.

— Non, lui dis-je.

— Ah! reprit-il avec son ricanement. Toujours aussi décidé! Tu comptes donc beaucoup sur ton protecteur? Sais-tu qui il est?

— Oui, lui répliquai-je vivement; c'est un monstre comme toi, seulement plus hypocrite encore!

Il se redressa avec étonnement; et, cherchant à deviner dans mes yeux si je parlais sérieusement:

— Comment! dit-il, tu ne le connais donc pas?

Je répondis avec dédain:

— Je ne reconnais en lui qu’un esclave de mon oncle, nommé Pierrot.

Biassou se remit à ricaner.

— Ha! ha! voilà qui est singulier! Il demande ta vie et ta liberté, et tu l’appelles « un monstre comme moi”!

— Que m’importe? répondis-je. Si j’obtenais un moment de liberté, ce ne serait pas pour lui demander ma vie, mais la sienne!

— Qu’est-ce que cela? dit Biassou. Tu parais pourtant parler comme tu penses, et je ne suppose pas que tu veuilles plaisanter avec ta vie. Il y a là-dessous quelque chose que je ne comprends pas. Tu es protégé par un homme que tu hais; il plaide pour ta vie, et tu veux sa mort! Au reste, cela m’est égal, à moi. Tu désires un moment de liberté, c’est la seule chose que je puisse t’accorder. Je te laisserai libre de le suivre; donne-moi seulement d’abord ta parole d’honneur de venir te remettre dans mes mains deux heures avant le coucher du soleil. - Tu es français, n’est-ce pas?

Vous le dirai-je, messieurs? la vie m’était à charge; je répugnais d’ailleurs à la recevoir de ce Pierrot, que tant d’apparences désignaient à ma haine; je ne sais pas si même il n’entra pas dans ma résolution la certitude que Biassou, qui ne lâchait pas aisément une proie, ne consentirait jamais à ma délivrance; je ne désirais réellement que quelques heures de liberté pour achever, avant de mourir, d’éclaircir le sort de ma bien-aimée Marie et le mien. La parole que Biassou, confiant en l’honneur français, me demandait était un moyen sûr et facile d’obtenir encore un jour; je la donnai.

Après m’avoir lié de la sorte, le chef se rapprocha de Pierrot.

— Alteza, dit-il d’un ton obséquieux, le prisonnier blanc est à vos ordres; vous pouvez l’emmener; il est libre de vous accompagner.

Je n’avais jamais vu autant de bonheur dans les yeux de Pierrot.

— Merci, Biassou! s’écria-t-il en lui tendant la main, merci! Tu viens de me rendre un service qui te fait maître désormais de tout exiger de moi! Continue à disposer de mes frères du Morne-Rouge jusqu’à mon retour.

Il se tourna vers moi.

— Puisque tu es libre, dit-il, viens!

Et il m’entraîna avec une énergie singulière.

Biassou nous regarda sortir d’un air étonné, qui perçait même à travers les démonstrations de respect dont il accompagna le départ de Pierrot.

XLIV

Il me tardait d’être seul avec Pierrot. Son trouble quand je l’avais questionné sur le sort de Marie, l’insolente tendresse avec laquelle il osait prononcer son nom, avaient encore enraciné les sentiments d’exécration et de jalousie qui germèrent en mon cœur au moment où je le vis enlever à travers l’incendie du fort Galifet celle que je pouvais à peine appeler mon épouse. Que m’importait, après cela, les reproches généreux qu’il avait adressés devant moi au sanguinaire Biassou, les soins qu’il avait pris de ma vie, et même cette empreinte extraordinaire qui marquait toutes ses paroles et toutes ses actions? Que m’importait ce mystère qui semblait l’envelopper; qui le faisait apparaître vivant à mes yeux quand je croyais avoir assisté à sa mort; qui me le montrait captif chez les blancs quand je l’avais vu s’ensevelir dans la Grande-Rivière; qui changeait l’esclave en altesse, le prisonnier en libérateur? De toutes ces choses incompréhensibles, la seule qui fût claire pour moi, c’était le rapt odieux de Marie, un outrage à venger, un crime à punir. Ce qui s’était déjà passé d’étrange sous mes yeux suffisait à peine pour me faire suspendre mon jugement, et j’attendais avec impatience l’instant où je pourrais contraindre mon rival a s’expliquer. Ce moment vint enfin.

Nous avions traversé les triples haies de noirs prosternés sur notre passage, et s’écriant avec surprise: Miraculo! ya no esta prisonero! [Miracle! Il n’est déjà plus prisonnier!] J’ignore si c’est de moi ou de Pierrot qu’ils voulaient parler. Nous avions franchi les dernières limites du camp; nous avions perdu de vue derrière les arbres et les rochers les dernières vedettes de Biassou; Rask, joyeux, nous devançait, puis revenait à nous; Pierrot marchait avec rapidité; je l’arrêtai brusquement.

— Ecoute, lui dis-je, il est inutile d’aller plus loin. Les oreilles que tu craignais ne peuvent plus nous entendre; parle, qu’as-tu fait de Marie?

Une émotion concentrée faisait haleter ma voix. Il me regarda avec douceur.

— Toujours! me répondit-il.

— Oui, toujours! m’écriai-je furieux, toujours! Je te ferai cette question jusqu’à ton dernier souffle, jusqu’à mon dernier soupir. Où est Marie?

— Rien ne peut donc dissiper tes doutes sur ma foi! - Tu le sauras bientôt.

— Bientôt, monstre! répliquai-je. C’est maintenant que je veux le savoir. Où est Marie? où est Marie? entends-tu? Réponds, ou échange ta vie contre la mienne! Défends-toi!

— Je t’ai déjà dit, reprit-il avec tristesse, que cela ne se pouvait pas. Le torrent ne lutte pas contre sa source; ma vie, que tu as sauvée trois fois, ne peut combattre contre ta vie. Je le voudrais d’ailleurs, que la chose serait encore impossible. Nous n’avons qu’un poignard pour nous deux.

En parlant ainsi il tira un poignard de sa ceinture et me le présenta.

— Tiens, dit-il.

J’étais hors de moi. Je saisis le poignard et le fis briller sur sa poitrine. Il ne songeait pas à s’y soustraire.

— Misérable, lui dis-je, ne me force point à un assassinat. Je te plonge cette lame dans le cœur, si tu ne me dis pas où est ma femme à l’instant.

Il me répondit sans colère:

— Tu es le maître. Mais, je t’en prie à mains jointes, laisse-moi encore une heure de vie, et suis-moi. Tu doutes de celui qui te doit trois vies, de celui que tu nommais ton frère; mais, écoute, si dans une heure tu en doutes encore, tu seras libre de me tuer. Il sera toujours temps. Tu vois bien que je ne veux pas te résister. Je t’en conjure au nom même de Maria... Il ajouta péniblement: - De ta femme. - Encore une heure; et si je te supplie ainsi, va, ce n’est pas pour moi, c’est pour toi!

Son accent avait une expression ineffable de persuasion et de douleur. Quelque chose sembla m’avertir qu’il disait peut-être vrai, que l’intérêt seul de sa vie ne suffirait pas pour donner à sa voix cette tendresse pénétrante, cette suppliante douceur, et qu’il plaidait pour plus que lui-même. Je cédai encore une fois à cet ascendant secret qu’il exerçait sur moi, et qu’en ce moment je rougissais de m’avouer.

— Allons, dis-je, je t’accorde ce sursis d’une heure; je te suivrai.

Je voulus lui rendre le poignard.

— Non, répondit-il, garde-le, tu te défies de moi. Mais viens, ne perdons pas de temps.

XLV

Il recommença à me conduire. Rask, qui pendant notre entretien avait fréquemment essayé de se remettre en marche, puis était revenu chaque fois vers nous, demandant en quelque sorte du regard pourquoi nous nous arrêtions, Rask reprit joyeusement sa course. Nous nous enfonçâmes dans une forêt vierge. Au bout d'une demi-heure environ, nous débouchâmes sur une jolie savane verte, arrosée d'une eau de roche, et bordée par la lisière fraîche et profonde des grands arbres centenaires de la forêt. Une caverne, dont une multitude de plantes grimpantes, la clématite, la liane, le jasmin, verdissaient le front grisâtre, s'ouvrait sur la savane. Rask allait aboyer, Pierrot le fit taire d'un signe, et, sans dire une parole, m'entraîna par la main dans la caverne.

Une femme, le dos tourné à la lumière, était assise dans cette grotte, sur un tapis de sparterie. Au bruit de nos pas, elle se retourna. - Mes amis, c'était Marie!

Elle était vêtue d'une robe blanche comme le jour de notre union, et portait encore dans ses cheveux la couronne de fleurs d'oranger, dernière parure virginale de la jeune épouse, que mes mains n'avaient pas détachée de son front. Elle m'aperçut, me reconnut, jeta un cri, et tomba dans mes bras, mourante de joie et de surprise. J'étais éperdu.

A ce cri, une vieille femme qui portait un enfant dans ses bras accourut d'une deuxième chambre pratiquée dans un enfoncement de la caverne. C'était la nourrice de Marie, et le dernier enfant de mon malheureux oncle. Pierrot était allé chercher de l'eau à la source voisine. Il en jeta quelques gouttes sur le visage de Marie. Leur fraîcheur rappela la vie; elle ouvrit les yeux.

— Léopold, dit-elle, mon Léopold!

— Marie!... répondis-je; et le reste de nos paroles s'acheva dans un baiser.

— Pas devant moi au moins! s'écria une voix déchirante.

Nous levâmes les yeux; c'était Pierrot. Il était là, assistant à nos caresses comme à un supplice. Son sein gonflé haletait, une sueur glacée tombait à grosses gouttes de son front. Tous ses membres tremblaient. Tout à coup il cacha son visage de ses deux mains, et s'enfuit hors de la grotte en répétant avec un accent terrible: - Pas devant moi!

Marie se souleva de mes bras à demi, et s’écria en le suivant des yeux:

— Grand Dieu! mon Léopold, notre amour paraît lui faire mal. Est-ce qu’il m’aimerait?

Le cri de l’esclave m’avait prouvé qu’il était mon rival; l’exclamation de Marie me prouvait qu’il était aussi mon ami.

— Marie! répondis-je, et une félicité inouïe entra dans mon cœur en même temps qu’un mortel regret; Marie! est-ce que tu l’ignorais?

— Mais je l’ignore encore; me dit-elle avec une chaste rougeur. Comment! il m’aime! Je ne m’en étais jamais aperçue.

Je la pressai sur mon cœur avec ivresse.

— Je retrouve ma femme et mon ami! m’écriai-je; que je suis heureux et que je suis coupable! J’avais douté de lui.

— Comment! reprit Marie étonnée, de lui! de Pierrot! Oh oui, tu es bien coupable. Tu lui dois deux fois ma vie, et peut-être plus encore, ajouta-t-elle en baissant les yeux. Sans lui le crocodile de la rivière m’aurait dévorée; sans lui les nègres... C’est Pierrot qui m’a arrachée de leurs mains, au moment où ils allaient sans doute me rejoindre à mon malheureux père!

Elle s’interrompit et pleura.

— Et pourquoi, lui demandai-je, Pierrot ne t’a-t-il pas renvoyée au Cap, à ton mari?

— Il l’a tenté, répondit-elle, mais il ne l’a pu. Obligé de se cacher également des noirs et des blancs, cela lui était fort difficile. Et puis, on ignorait ce que tu étais devenu. Quelques-uns disaient t’avoir vu tomber mort, mais Pierrot m’assurait que non, et j’étais bien certaine du contraire, car quelque chose m’en aurait avertie; et si tu étais mort, je serais morte aussi, en même temps.

— Pierrot, lui dis-je, t’a donc amenée ici?

— Oui, mon Léopold; cette grotte isolée est connue de lui seul. Il avait sauvé en même temps que moi tout ce qui restait de la famille, ma bonne nourrice et mon petit frère; il nous y a cachés. Je t’assure qu’elle est bien commode; et sans la guerre qui fouille tout le pays, maintenant que nous sommes ruinés, j’aimerais à l’habiter avec toi. Pierrot pourvoyait à tous nos besoins. Il venait souvent; il avait une plume rouge sur la tête. Il me consolait, me parlait de toi, m’assurait que je te serais rendue. Cependant, ne l’ayant pas vu depuis trois jours, je commençais à m’inquiéter, lorsqu’il est revenu avec toi. Ce pauvre ami, il a donc été te chercher?

— Oui, lui répondis-je.

— Mais comment se fait-il avec cela, reprit-elle, qu'il soit amoureux de moi? En es-tu sûr?

— Sûr maintenant! lui dis-je. C'est lui qui, sur le point de me poignarder, s'est laissé fléchir par la crainte de t'affliger; c'est lui qui te chantait ces chansons d'amour dans le pavillon de la rivière.

— Vraiment! reprit Marie avec une naïve surprise, c'est ton rival! Le méchant homme aux soucis est ce bon Pierrot! Je ne puis croire cela. Il était avec moi si humble, si respectueux, plus que lorsqu'il était notre esclave! Il est vrai qu'il me regardait quelquefois d'un air singulier; mais ce n'était que de la tristesse, et je l'attribuais à mon malheur. Si tu savais avec quel dévouement passionné il m'entretenait de mon Léopold! Son amitié parlait de toi presque comme mon amour.

Ces explications de Marie m'enchantaient et me désolaient à la fois. Je me rappelais avec quelle cruauté j'avais traité ce généreux Pierrot, et je sentais toute la force de son reproche tendre et résigné: - Ce n'est pas moi qui suis ingrat!

En ce moment Pierrot rentra. Sa physionomie était sombre et douloureuse. On aurait dit un condamné qui revient de la torture, mais qui en a triomphé. Il s'avança vers moi à pas lents, et me dit d'une voix grave, en montrant le poignard que j'avais placé dans ma ceinture:

— L'heure est écoulée.

— L'heure! quelle heure? lui dis-je.

— Celle que tu m'avais accordée; elle m'était nécessaire pour te conduire ici. Je t'ai supplié alors de me laisser la vie, maintenant je te conjure de me l'ôter.

Les sentiments les plus doux du cœur, l'amour, l'amitié, la reconnaissance, s'unissaient en ce moment pour me déchirer. Je tombai aux pieds de l'esclave, sans pouvoir dire un mot, en sanglotant amèrement. Il me releva avec précipitation.

— Que fais-tu? me dit-il.

— Je te rends l'hommage que je te dois; je ne suis plus digne d'une amitié comme la tienne. Ta reconnaissance ne peut aller jusqu'à me pardonner mon ingratitude.

Sa figure eut quelque temps encore une expression de rudesse; il paraissait éprouver de violents combats; il fit un pas vers moi et recula, il ouvrit la bouche et se tut. Ce moment fut de courte durée; il m’ouvrit ses bras en disant

— Puis-je à présent t’appeler frère?

Je ne lui répondis qu’en me jetant sur son cœur.

Il ajouta, après une légère pause:

— Tu es bon, mais le malheur t’avait rendu injuste.

— J’ai retrouvé mon frère, lui dis-je; je ne suis plus malheureux; mais je suis bien coupable.

— Coupable, frère! Je l’ai été aussi, et plus que toi. Tu n’es plus malheureux; moi, je le serai toujours!

XLVI

La joie que les premiers transports de l’amitié avaient fait briller sur son visage s’évanouit; ses traits prirent une expression de tristesse singulière et énergique.

— Ecoute, me dit-il d’un ton froid; mon père était roi au pays de Kakongo. Il rendait la justice à ses sujets devant sa porte; et, à chaque jugement qu’il portait, il buvait, suivant l’usage des rois, une pleine coupe de vin de palmier. Nous vivions heureux et puissants. Des européens vinrent; ils me donnèrent ces connaissances futiles qui t’ont frappé. Leur chef était un capitaine espagnol; il promit à mon père des pays plus vastes que les siens, et des femmes blanches; mon père le suivit avec sa famille... - Frère, ils nous vendirent!

La poitrine du noir se gonfla, ses yeux étincelaient; il brisa machinalement un jeune néflier qui se trouvait près de lui, puis il continua sans paraître s’adresser à moi.

— Le maître du pays Kakongo eut un maître, et son fils se courba en esclave sur les sillons de Santo-Domingo. On sépara le jeune lion de son vieux père pour les dompter plus aisément. - On enleva la jeune épouse à son époux pour en tirer plus de profit en les unissant à d’autres. - Les petits enfants cherchèrent la mère qui les avait nourris, le père qui les baignait dans les torrents; ils ne trouvèrent que des tyrans barbares, et couchèrent parmi les chiens!

Il se tut; ses lèvres remuaient sans qu’il parlât, son regard était fixe et égaré. Il me saisit le bras brusquement.

— Frère, entends-tu? j’ai été vendu à différents maîtres comme une pièce de bétail. - Tu te souviens du supplice d’Ogé; ce jour-là j’ai revu mon père. Ecoute: - c’était sur la roue!

Je frémis. Il ajouta:

— Ma femme a été prostituée à des blancs. Ecoute, frère: elle est morte et m’a demandé vengeance. Te le dirai-je? continua-t-il en hésitant et en baissant les yeux, j’ai été coupable, j’en ai aimé une autre. - Mais passons!

Tous les miens me pressaient de les délivrer et de me venger. Rask m’apportait leurs messages.

Je ne pouvais les satisfaire, j’étais moi-même dans les prisons de ton oncle. Le jour où tu obtins ma grâce, je partis pour arracher mes enfants des mains d’un maître féroce; j’arrivai. - Frère, le dernier des petits-fils du roi de Kakongo venait d’expirer sous les coups d’un blanc! les autres l’avaient précédé.

Il s’interrompit et me demanda froidement:

— Frère, qu’aurais-tu fait?

Ce déplorable récit m’avait glacé d’horreur. Je répondis à sa question par un geste menaçant. Il me comprit et se mit à sourire avec amertume. Il poursuivit:

— Les esclaves se révoltèrent contre leur maître, et le punirent du meurtre de mes enfants. Ils m’élurent leur chef. Tu sais les malheurs qu’entraîna cette rébellion. J’appris que ceux de ton oncle se préparaient à suivre le même exemple. J’arrivai dans l’Acul la nuit même de l’insurrection. - Tu étais absent. - Ton oncle venait d’être poignardé dans son lit. Les noirs incendiaient déjà les plantations. Ne pouvant calmer leur fureur, parce qu’ils croyaient me venger en brûlant les propriétés de ton oncle, je dus sauver ce qui restait de ta famille. Je pénétrai dans le fort par l’issue que j’y avais pratiquée. Je confiai la nourrice de ta femme à un noir fidèle. J’eus plus de peine à sauver ta Maria. Elle avait couru vers la partie embrasée du fort pour en tirer le plus jeune de ses frères, seul échappé au massacre. Des noirs l’entouraient; ils allaient la tuer. Je me présentai et leur ordonnai de me laisser me venger moi-même. Ils se retirèrent. Je pris ta femme dans mes bras, je confiai l’enfant à Rask, et je les déposai tous deux dans cette caverne, dont je connais seul l’existence et l’accès. - Frère, voilà mon crime.

De plus en plus pénétré de remords et de reconnaissance, je voulus me jeter encore une fois aux pieds de Pierrot, il m’arrêta d’un air offensé.

— Allons, viens, dit-il un moment après en me prenant par la main, emmène ta femme et partons tous les cinq.

Je lui demandai avec surprise où il voulait nous conduire.

— Au camp des blancs, me répondit-il. Cette retraite n’est plus sûre. Demain, à la pointe du jour, les blancs doivent attaquer le camp de Biassou; la forêt sera certainement incendiée. Et puis nous n’avons pas un moment à perdre; dix têtes répondent de la mienne. Nous pouvons nous hâter, car tu es libre; nous le devons, car je ne le suis pas.

Ces paroles accrurent ma surprise; je lui en demandai l’explication.

— N’as-tu pas entendu raconter que Bug-Jargal était prisonnier? dit-il avec impatience.

— Oui, mais qu’as-tu de commun avec ce Bug-Jargal?

Il parut à son tour étonné, et répondit gravement:

— Je suis ce Bug-Jargal.

XLVII

J’étais habitué, pour ainsi dire, à la surprise avec cet homme. Ce n’était pas sans étonnement que je venais de voir un instant auparavant l’esclave Pierrot se transformer en roi africain. Mon admiration était au comble d’avoir maintenant à reconnaître en lui le redoutable et magnanime Bug-Jargal, chef des révoltés du Morne-Rouge. Je comprenais enfin d’où venaient les respects que rendaient tous les rebelles, et même Biassou, au chef Bug-Jargal, au roi de Kakongo.

Il ne parut pas s’apercevoir de l’impression qu’avaient produite sur moi ces dernières paroles.

— L’on m’avait dit, reprit-il, que tu étais de ton côté prisonnier au camp de Biassou; j’étais venu pour te délivrer.

— Pourquoi me disais-tu donc tout à l’heure que tu n’étais pas libre?

— Il me regarda, comme cherchant à deviner ce qui amenait cette question toute naturelle.

— Ecoute, me dit-il, ce matin j’étais prisonnier parmi les tiens. J’entendis annoncer dans le camp que Biassou avait dèclaré son intention de faire mourir avant le coucher du soleil un jeune captif nommé Léopold d’Auverney. On renforça les gardes autour de moi. J’appris que mon exécution suivrait la tienne, et qu’en cas d’évasion dix de mes camarades répondraient de moi. - Tu vois que je suis pressé.

Je le retins encore.

— Tu t’es donc échappé? lui dis-je.

— Et comment serais-je ici? Ne fallait-il pas te sauver? Ne te dois-je pas la vie? Allons, suis-moi maintenant. Nous sommes à une heure de marche du camp des blancs comme du camp de Biassou. Vois, l’ombre de ces cocotiers s’allonge, et leur tête ronde parait sur l’herbe comme l’œuf énorme du condor. Dans trois heures le soleil sera couché. Viens, frère, le temps presse.

Dans trois heures le soleil sera couché. Ces paroles si simples me glacèrent comme une apparition funèbre. Elles me rappelèrent la promesse fatale que j’avais faite à Biassou. - Hélas! en revoyant Marie, je n’avais plus pensé à notre séparation éternelle et prochaine; je n’avais été que ravi et enivré; tant d’émotions m’avaient enlevé la mémoire, et j’avais oublié ma mort dans mon bonheur. Le mot de mon ami me rejeta violemment dans mon infortune. Dans trois heures le soleil sera couché! Il fallait une bonne heure pour me rendre au camp de Biassou.

— Mon devoir était impérieusement prescrit; le brigand avait ma parole, et il valait mieux encore mourir que de donner à ce barbare le droit de mépriser la seule chose à laquelle il parût se fier encore, l'honneur d'un français. L'alternative était terrible; je choisis ce que je devais choisir; mais, je l'avouerai, messieurs, j'hésitai un moment. Etais-je coupable?

XLVIII

Enfin, poussant un soupir, je pris d'une main la main de Bug-Jargal, de l'autre celle de ma pauvre Marie, qui observait avec anxiété le nuage sinistre répandu sur mes traits.

— Bug-Jargal, dis-je avec effort, je te confie le seul être au monde que j'aime plus que toi, Marie. - Retournez au camp sans moi, car je ne puis vous suivre.

— Mon Dieu, s'écria Marie respirant à peine, quelque nouveau malheur!

Bug-Jargal avait tressailli. Un étonnement douloureux se peignait dans ses yeux.

— Frère, que dis-tu?

La terreur qui oppressait Marie à la seule idée d'un malheur que sa trop prévoyante tendresse semblait deviner me faisait une loi de lui en cacher la réalité et de lui épargner des adieux si déchirants; je me penchai à l'oreille de Bug- Jargal, et lui dis à voix basse:

— Je suis captif. J'ai juré à Biassou de revenir me mettre en son pouvoir deux heures avant la fin du jour; j'ai promis de mourir.

Il bondit de fureur; sa voix devint éclatante.

— Le monstre! Voilà pourquoi il a voulu t'entretenir secrètement; c'était pour t'arracher cette promesse. J'aurais dû me défier de ce misérable Biassou. Comment n'ai-je pas prévu quelque perfidie? Ce n'est pas un noir, c'est un mulâtre.

— Qu'est-ce donc? Quelle perfidie? Quelle promesse? dit Marie épouvantée; qui est ce Biassou?

— Tais-toi, tais-toi, répétai-je bas à Bug-Jargal, n'alarmons pas Marie.

— Bien, me dit-il d'un ton sombre. Mais comment as-tu pu consentir à cette promesse? pourquoi l'as-tu donnée?

— Je te croyais ingrat, je croyais Marie perdue pour moi. Que m'importait la vie?

— Mais une promesse de bouche ne peut t'engager avec ce brigand?

— J'ai donné ma parole d'honneur.

Il parut chercher à comprendre ce que je voulais dire.

— Ta parole d'honneur! Qu'est-ce que cela? Vous n'avez pas bu à la même coupe? Vous n'avez pas rompu ensemble un anneau ou une branche d’érable à fleurs rouges?

— Non.

— Eh bien! que nous dis-tu donc? Qu’est-ce qui peut t’engager?

— Mon honneur, répondis-je.

— Je ne sais pas ce que cela signifie. Rien ne te lie avec Biassou. Viens avec nous.

— Je ne puis, frère, j’ai promis.

— Non! tu n’as pas promis! s’écria-t-il avec emportement; puis élevant la voix: - Sœur, joignez-vous à moi! empêchez votre mari de nous quitter; il veut retourner au camp des nègres d’où je l’ai tiré, sous prétexte qu’il a promis sa mort à leur chef, à Biassou.

— Qu’as-tu fait? m’écriai-je.

Il était trop tard pour prévenir l’effet de ce mouvement généreux qui lui faisait implorer pour la vie de son rival l’aide de celle qu’il aimait. Marie s’était jetée dans mes bras avec un cri de désespoir. Ses mains jointes autour de mon cou la suspendaient sur mon cœur, car elle était sans force et presque sans haleine.

— Oh! murmurait-elle péniblement, que dit-il là, mon Léopold? N’est-il pas vrai qu’il me trompe, et que ce n’est pas au moment qui vient de nous réunir que tu veux me quitter, et me quitter pour mourir? Réponds-moi vite ou je meurs. Tu n’as pas le droit de donner ta vie, parce que tu ne dois pas donner la mienne. Tu ne voudrais pas te séparer de moi pour ne me revoir jamais.

— Marie, repris-je, ne le crois pas; je vais te quitter en effet; il le faut; mais nous nous reverrons ailleurs.

— Ailleurs, reprit-elle avec effroi, ailleurs, où?...

— Dans le ciel! répondis-je, ne pouvant mentir à cet ange.

Elle s’évanouit encore une fois, mais alors c’était de douleur. L’heure pressait; ma résolution était prise. Je la déposai entre les bras de Bug-Jargal, dont les yeux étaient pleins de larmes.

— Rien ne peut donc te retenir? me dit-il. Je n’ajouterai rien à ce que tu vois. Comment peux-tu résister à Maria? Pour une seule des paroles qu’elle t’a dites, je lui aurais sacrifié un monde, et toi tu ne veux pas lui sacrifier ta mort?

— L’honneur! répondis-je. Adieu, Bug-Jargal; adieu frère, je te la lègue.

Il me prit la main; il était pensif, et semblait à peine m’entendre.

— Frère, il y a au camp des blancs un de tes parents; je lui remettrai Maria; quant à moi, je ne puis accepter ton legs.

Il me montra un pic dont le sommet dominait toute la contrée environnante.

— Vois ce rocher; quand le signe de ta mort y apparaîtra, le bruit de la mienne ne tardera pas à se faire entendre. - Adieu.

Sans m’arrêter au sens inconnu de ces dernières paroles, je l’embrassai; je déposai un baiser sur le front pâle de Marie, que les soins de sa nourrice commençaient à ranimer, et je m’enfuis précipitamment, de peur que son premier regard, sa première plainte ne m’enlevassent toute ma force.

XLIX

Je m’enfuis, je me plongeai dans la profonde forêt, en suivant la trace que nous y avions laissée, sans même oser jeter un coup d’oeil derrière moi. Comme pour étourdir les pensées qui m’obsédaient, je courus sans relâche à travers les taillis, les savanes et les collines, jusqu’à ce qu’enfin, à la crête d’une roche, le camp de Biassou, avec ses lignes de cabrouets, ses rangées d’ajoupas et sa fourmilière de noirs, apparût sous mes yeux. Là, je m’arrêtai. Je touchais au terme de ma course et de mon existence. La fatigue et l’émotion rompirent mes forces; je m’appuyai contre un arbre pour ne pas tomber, et je laissai errer mes yeux sur le tableau qui se développait à mes pieds dans la fatale savane.

Jusqu’à ce moment je croyais avoir goûté toutes les coupes d’amertume et de fiel. Je ne connaissais pas le plus cruel de tous les malheurs; c’est d’être contraint par une force morale plus puissante que celle des événements à renoncer volontairement, heureux, au bonheur vivant, à la vie. Quelques heures auparavant, que m’importait d’être au monde? Je ne vivais pas; l’extrême désespoir est une espèce de mort qui fait désirer la véritable. Mais j’avais été tiré de ce désespoir; Marie m’avait été rendue; ma félicité morte avait été pour ainsi dire ressuscitée; mon passé était redevenu mon avenir, et tous mes rêves éclipsés avaient reparu plus éblouissants que jamais; la vie enfin, une vie de jeunesse, d’amour et d’enchantement, s’était de nouveau déployée radieuse devant moi dans un immense horizon. Cette vie, je pouvais la recommencer; tout m’y invitait en moi et hors de moi. Nul obstacle matériel, nulle entrave visible. J’étais libre, j’étais heureux, et pourtant il fallait mourir. Je n’avais fait qu’un pas dans cet éden, et je ne sais quel devoir, qui n’était pas même éclatant, me forçait à reculer vers un supplice. La mort est peu de chose pour une âme flétrie et déjà glacée par l’adversité; mais que sa main est poignante, qu’elle semble froide, quand elle tombe sur un cœur épanoui et comme réchauffé par les joies de l’existence! Je l’éprouvais; j’étais sorti un moment du sépulcre, j’avais été enivré dans ce court moment de ce qu’il y a de plus céleste sur la terre, l’amour, le dévouement, la liberté; et maintenant il fallait brusquement redescendre au tombeau!

Quand l’affaissement du regret fut passé, une sorte de rage s’empara de moi; je m’enfonçai à grands pas dans la vallée; je sentais le besoin d’abréger. Je me présentai aux avant-postes des nègres. Ils parurent surpris et refusaient de m’admettre. Chose bizarre! je fus contraint presque de les prier. Deux d’entre eux enfin s’emparèrent de moi, et se chargèrent de me conduire à Biassou.

J’entrai dans la grotte de ce chef. Il était occupé à faire jouer les ressorts de quelques instruments de torture dont il était entouré. Au bruit que firent ses gardes en m’introduisant, il tourna la tête; ma présence ne parut pas l’étonner.

— Vois-tu? dit-il en m’étalant l’appareil horrible qui l’environnait.

Je demeurai calme; je connaissais la cruauté du « héros de l’humanité”, et j’étais déterminé à tout endurer sans pâlir.

— N’est-ce pas, reprit-il en ricanant, n’est-ce pas que Léogri a été bien heureux de n’être que pendu?

Je le regardai sans répondre, avec un froid dédain.

— Faites avertir le chapelain, dit-il alors à un aide de camp.

Nous restâmes un moment tous deux silencieux, nous regardant en face. Je l’observais; il m’épiait.

En ce moment Rigaud entra; il paraissait agité, et parla bas au généralissime.

— Qu’on rassemble tous les chefs de mon armée, dit tranquillement Biassou.

Un quart d’heure après, tous les chefs, avec leurs costumes diversement bizarres, étaient réunis devant la grotte. Biassou se leva.

— Ecoutez, amigos! les blancs comptent nous attaquer ici, demain au point du jour. La position est mauvaise; il faut la quitter. Mettons-nous tous en marche au coucher du soleil, et gagnons la frontière espagnole. - Macaya, vous formerez l’avant-garde avec vos noirs marrons. - Padrejan, vous enclouerez les pièces prises à l’artillerie de Praloto; elles ne pourraient nous suivre dans les mornes. Les braves de la Croix-des-Bouquets s’ébranleront après Macaya. - Toussaint suivra avec les noirs de Léogane et du Trou. - Si les griots et les griotes font le moindre bruit, j’en charge le bourreau de l’armée. - Le lieutenant-colonel Cloud distribuera les fusils anglais débarqués au cap Cabron, et conduira les sang-mêlés ci-devant libres, par les sentiers de la Vista. - On égorgera les prisonniers. s’il en reste. On mâchera les balles; on empoisonnera les flèches. Il faudra jeter trois tonnes d’arsenic dans la source où l’on puise l’eau du camp; les coloniaux prendront cela pour du sucre, et boiront sans défiance. - Les troupes du Limbé, du Dondon et de l’Acul marcheront après Cloud et Toussaint. - Obstruez avec des rochers toutes les avenues de la savane; carabinez tous les chemins; incendiez les forêts. - Rigaud, vous resterez près de nous. - Candi, vous rassemblerez ma garde autour de moi. - Les noirs du Morne-Rouge formeront l’arrière-garde, et n’évacueront la savane qu’au soleil levant.

Il se pencha vers Rigaud. et dit à voix basse:

— Ce sont les noirs de Bug-Jargal; s’ils pouvaient être écrasés ici! Muerta la tropa, muerto el gefe! [Morte la bande, mort le chef!] Allez, hermanos, reprit-il en se redressant. Candi vous portera le mot d’ordre.

Les chefs se retirèrent.

— Général. dit Rigaud, il faudrait expédier la dépêche de Jean-François. Nous sommes mal dans nos affaires; elle pourrait arrêter les blancs.

Biassou la tira précipitamment de sa poche.

— Vous m’y faites penser; mais il y a tant de fautes de grammaire, comme ils disent, qu’ils en riront. - Il me présenta le papier. - Ecoute, veux-tu sauver ta vie? Ma bonté le demande encore une fois à ton obstination. Aide-moi à refaire cette lettre; je te dicterai mes idées; tu écriras cela en style blanc. Je fis un signe de tête négatif. Il parut impatienté.

— Est-ce non? me dit-il

— Non! répondis-je.

Il insista.

— Réfléchis bien.

Et son regard semblait appeler le mien sur l’attirail de bourreau avec lequel il jouait.

— C’est parce que j’ai réfléchi, repris-je, que je refuse. Tu me parais craindre pour toi et les tiens, tu comptes sur ta lettre à l’assemblée pour retarder la marche et la vengeance des blancs. Je ne veux pas d’une vie qui servirait peut-être à sauver la tienne. Fais commencer mon supplice.

— Ah! ah! muchacho! répliqua Biassou en poussant du pied les instruments de torture, il me semble que tu te familiarises avec cela. J’en suis fâché, mais je n’ai pas le temps de t’en faire faire l’essai. Cette position est dangereuse; il faut que j’en sorte au plus vite. Ah! tu refuses de me servir de secrétaire! aussi bien, tu as raison, car je ne t’en aurais pas moins fait mourir après. On ne saurait vivre avec un secret de Biassou; et puis, mon cher, j’avais promis ta mort à monsieur le chapelain.

Il se tourna vers l’obi, qui venait d’entrer.

— Bon per, votre escouade est-elle prête?

Celui-ci fit un signe affirmatif.

— Avez-vous pris pour la composer des noirs du Morne-Rouge? Ce sont les seuls de l’armée qui ne soient point encore forcés de s’occuper des apprêts du départ.

L’obi répondit oui par un second signe.

Biassou alors me montra du doigt le grand drapeau noir que j’avais déjà remarqué, et qui figurait dans un coin de la grotte.

— Voici qui doit avertir les tiens du moment où ils pourront donner ton épaulette à ton lieutenant. - Tu sens que dans cet instant-là je dois déjà être en marche. - A propos. tu viens de te promener, comment as-tu trouvé les environs?

— J’y ai remarqué, répondis-je froidement, assez d’arbres pour y pendre toi et toute ta bande.

— Eh bien! répliqua-t-il avec un ricanement forcé, il est un endroit que tu n’as sans doute pas vu, et avec lequel le bon per te fera faire connaissance. - Adieu, jeune capitaine, bonsoir à Léogri.

Il me salua avec ce rire qui me rappelait le bruit du serpent à sonnettes, fit un geste, me tourna le dos, et les nègres m’entraînèrent. L’obi voilé nous accompagnait, son chapelet à la main.

LI

Je marchais au milieu d’eux sans faire de résistance; il est vrai qu’elle eût été inutile. Nous montâmes sur la croupe d’un mont situé à l’ouest de la savane, où nous nous reposâmes un instant; là je jetai un dernier regard sur ce soleil couchant qui ne devait plus se lever pour moi. Mes guides se levèrent, je les suivis. Nous descendîmes dans une petite vallée qui m’eût enchanté dans un tout autre instant. Un torrent la traversait dans sa largeur et communiquait au sol une humidité féconde; ce torrent se jetait à l’extrémité du vallon dans un de ces lacs bleus dont abonde l’intérieur des mornes à Saint-Domingue. Que de fois, dans les temps plus heureux, je m’étais assis pour rêver sur le bord de ces beaux lacs, à l’heure du crépuscule, quand leur azur se change en une nappe d’argent où le reflet des premières étoiles du soir sème des paillettes d’or! Cette heure allait bientôt venir, mais il fallait passer! Que cette vallée me sembla belle! on y voyait des platanes à fleurs d’érable d’une force et d’une hauteur prodigieuses; des bouquets touffus de mauritias, sorte de palmier qui exclut toute autre végétation sous son ombrage, des dattiers, des magnolias avec leurs larges calices, de grands catalpas montrant leurs feuilles polies et découpées parmi les grappes d’or des faux ébéniers. L’odier du Canada y mêlait ses fleurs d’un jaune pâle aux auréoles bleues dont se charge cette espèce de chèvrefeuille sauvage que les nègres nomment coali. Des rideaux verdoyants de lianes dérobaient à la vue les flancs bruns des rochers voisins. Il s’élevait de tous les points de ce sol vierge un parfum primitif comme celui que devait respirer le premier homme sur les premières roses de l’Eden.

Nous marchions cependant le long d’un sentier tracé sur le bord du torrent. Je fus surpris de voir ce sentier aboutir brusquement au pied d’un roc à pic, au bas duquel je remarquai une ouverture en forme d’arche, d’où s’échappait le torrent. Un bruit sourd, un vent impétueux sortaient de cette arche naturelle. Les nègres prirent à gauche, et nous gravîmes le roc en suivant un chemin tortueux et inégal, qui semblait y avoir été creusé par les eaux d’un torrent desséché depuis longtemps. Une voûte se présenta, à demi bouchée par les ronces, les houx et les épines sauvages qui y croissaient. Un bruit pareil à celui de l’arche de la vallée se faisait entendre sous cette voûte. Les noirs m’y entraînèrent. Au moment où je fis le premier pas dans ce souterrain, l’obi s’approcha de moi, et me dit d’une voix étrange: - Voici ce que j’ai à te prédire maintenant; un de nous deux seulement sortira de cette voûte et repassera par ce chemin. - Je dédaignai de répondre. Nous avançâmes dans l’obscurité. Le bruit devenait de plus en plus fort; nous ne nous entendions plus marcher. Je jugeai qu’il devait être produit par une chute d’eau; je ne me trompais pas.

Après dix minutes de marche dans les ténèbres, nous arrivâmes sur une espèce de plate-forme intérieure, formée par la nature dans le centre de la montagne. La plus grande partie de cette plate-forme demi-circulaire était inondée par le torrent qui jaillissait des veines du mont avec un bruit épouvantable. Au-dessus de cette salle souterraine, la voûte formait une sorte de dôme tapissé de lierre d’une couleur jaunâtre. Cette voûte était traversée presque dans toute sa largeur par une crevasse à travers laquelle le jour pénétrait, et dont le bord était couronné d’arbustes verts, dorés en ce moment des rayons du soleil. A l’extrémité nord de la plate-forme, le torrent se perdait avec fracas dans un gouffre au fond duquel semblait flotter sans pouvoir y pénétrer, la vague lueur qui descendait de la crevasse. Sur l’abîme se penchait un vieil arbre, dont les plus hautes branches se mêlaient à l’écume de la cascade, et dont la souche noueuse perçait le roc, un ou deux pieds au-dessous du bord. Cet arbre, baignant ainsi à la fois dans le torrent sa tête et sa racine, qui se projetait sur le gouffre comme un bras décharné, était si dépouillé de verdure qu’on n’en pouvait reconnaître l’espèce. Il offrait un phénomène singulier: l’humidité qui imprégnait ses racines l’empêchait seule de mourir, tandis que la violence de la cataracte lui arrachait successivement ses branches nouvelles, et le forçait de conserver éternellement les mêmes rameaux.

LII

Les noirs s’arrêtèrent en cet endroit terrible, et je vis qu’il fallait mourir.

Alors, près de ce gouffre dans lequel je me précipitais en quelque sorte volontairement, l’image du bonheur auquel j’avais renoncé peu d’heures auparavant revint m’assaillir comme un regret, presque comme un remords. Toute prière était indigne de moi; une plainte m’échappa pourtant.

— Amis, dis-je aux noirs qui m’entouraient, savez-vous que c’est une triste chose que de périr à vingt ans, quand on est plein de force et de vie, qu’on est aimé de ceux qu’on aime, et qu’on laisse derrière soi des yeux qui pleureront jusqu’à ce qu’ils se ferment?

Un rire horrible accueillit ma plainte. C’était celui du petit obi. Cette espèce de malin esprit, cet être impénétrable s’approcha brusquement de moi.

— Ha! ha! ha! Tu regrettes la vie. Labado sea Dios! Ma seule crainte, c’était que tu n’eusses pas peur de la mort!

C’était cette même voix, ce même rire, qui avaient déjà fatigué mes conjectures.

— Misérable, lui dis-je, qui es-tu donc?

— Tu vas le savoir! me répondit-il d’un accent terrible. Puis, écartant le soleil d’argent qui parait sa brune poitrine: - Regarde!

Je me penchai jusqu’à lui. Deux noms étaient gravés sur le sein velu de l’obi en lettres blanchâtres, traces hideuses et ineffaçables qu’imprimait un fer ardent sur la poitrine des esclaves. L’un de ces noms était Effingham, l’autre était celui de mon oncle, le mien, d’Auverney! Je demeurai muet de surprise.

— Eh bien! Léopold d’Auverney, me demanda l’obi, ton nom te dit-il le mien?

— Non, répondis-je étonné de m’entendre nommer par cet homme, et cherchant à rallier mes souvenirs. Ces deux noms ne furent jamais réunis que sur la poitrine du bouffon... Mais il est mort, le pauvre nain, et d’ailleurs il nous était attaché, lui. Tu ne peux pas être Habibrah!

— Lui-même! s’écria-t-il d’une voix effrayante; et, soulevant la sanglante gorra, il détacha son voile. Le visage difforme du nain de la maison s’offrit à mes yeux; mais à l’air de folle gaieté que je lui connaissais avait succédé une expression menaçante et sinistre.

— Grand Dieu! m’écriai-je frappé de stupeur, tous les morts reviennent-ils? C’est Habibrah, le bouffon de mon oncle!

Le nain mit la main sur son poignard, et dit sourdement:

— Son bouffon, - et son meurtrier.

Je reculai avec horreur.

— Son meurtrier! Scélérat, est-ce donc ainsi que tu as reconnu ses bontés?

Il m’interrompit.

— Ses bontés! dis ses outrages!

— Comment! repris-je, c’est toi qui l’as frappé, misérable!

— Moi! répondit-il avec une expression horrible. Je lui ai enfoncé le couteau si profondément dans le cœur, qu’à peine a-t-il eu le temps de sortir du sommeil pour entrer dans la mort. Il a crié faiblement: A moi, Habibrah! - J’étais à lui.

Son atroce récit, son atroce sang-froid me révoltèrent.

— Malheureux! lâche assassin! tu avais donc oublié les faveurs qu’il n’accordait qu’à toi? tu mangeais près de sa table, tu dormais près de son lit...

— ... Comme un chien! interrompit brusquement Habibrah; como un perro! Va! je ne me suis que trop souvenu de ces faveurs qui sont des affronts! Je m’en suis vengé sur lui, je vais m’en venger sur toi! Ecoute. Crois-tu donc que pour être mulâtre, nain et difforme, je ne sois pas homme? Ah! j’ai une âme, et une âme plus profonde et plus forte que celle dont je vais délivrer ton corps de jeune fille! J’ai été donné à ton oncle comme un sapajou. Je servais à ses plaisirs, j’amusais ses mépris. Il m’aimait, dis-tu; j’avais une place dans son cœur; oui, entre sa guenon et son perroquet. Je m’en suis choisi une autre avec mon poignard!

Je frémissais.

Oui, continua le nain, c’est moi! c’est bien moi! regarde-moi en face, Léopold d’Auverney! Tu as assez ri de moi, tu peux frémir maintenant. Ah! tu me rappelles la honteuse prédilection de ton oncle pour celui qu’il nommait son bouffon! Quelle prédilection, bon Giu! Si j’entrais dans vos salons, mille rires dédaigneux m’accueillaient; ma taille, mes difformités, mes traits, mon costume dérisoire, jusqu’aux infirmités déplorables de ma nature, tout en moi prêtait aux railleries de ton exécrable oncle et de ses exécrables amis. Et moi, je ne pouvais pas même me taire; il fallait, o rabia! il fallait mêler mon rire aux rires que j'excitais! Réponds, crois-tu que de pareilles humiliations soient un titre à la reconnaissance d'une créature humaine? Crois-tu qu'elles ne vaillent pas les misères des autres esclaves, les travaux sans relâche, les ardeurs du soleil, les carcans de fer et le fouet des commandeurs? Crois-tu qu'elles ne suffisent pas pour faire germer dans un cœur d'homme une haine ardente, implacable, éternelle, comme le stigmate d'infamie qui flétrit ma poitrine? Oh! pour avoir souffert si longtemps, que ma vengeance a été courte! Que n'ai-je pu faire endurer à mon odieux tyran tous les tourments qui renaissaient pour moi à tous les moments de tous les jours! Que n'a-t-il pu avant de mourir connaître l'amertume de l'orgueil blessé et sentir quelles traces brûlantes laissent les larmes de honte et de rage sur un visage condamné à un rire perpétuel! Hélas! il est bien dur d'avoir tant attendu l'heure de punir, et d'en finir d'un coup de poignard! Encore s'il avait pu savoir quelle main le frappait! Mais j'étais trop impatient d'entendre son dernier râle; j'ai enfoncé trop vite le couteau; il est mort sans m'avoir reconnu, et ma fureur a trompé ma vengeance! Cette fois, du moins, elle sera plus complète. Tu me vois bien, n'est-ce pas? Il est vrai que tu dois avoir peine à me reconnaître dans le nouveau jour qui me montre à toi! Tu ne m'avais jamais vu que sous un air riant et joyeux; maintenant que rien n'interdit à mon âme de paraître dans mes yeux, je ne dois plus me ressembler. Tu ne connaissais que mon masque; voici mon visage!

Il était horrible.

— Monstre! m'écriai-je, tu te trompes, il y a encore quelque chose du baladin dans l'atrocité de tes traits et de ton cœur.

— Ne parle pas d'atrocité! interrompit Habibrah. Songe à la cruauté de ton oncle...

— Misérable! repris-je indigné, s'il était cruel, c'était par toi! Tu plains le sort des malheureux esclaves; mais pourquoi alors tournais-tu contre tes frères le crédit que la faiblesse de ton maître t'accordait? Pourquoi n'as-tu jamais essayé de le fléchir en leur faveur?

— J'en aurais été bien fâché! Moi, empêcher un blanc de se souiller d'une atrocité! Non! non! Je l'engageais au contraire à redoubler de mauvais traitements envers ses esclaves, afin d'avancer l'heure de la révolte, afin que l'excès de l'oppression amenât enfin la vengeance! En paraissant nuire à mes frères, je les servais!

Je restai confondu devant une si profonde combinaison de la haine.

— Eh bien! continua le nain, trouves-tu que j’ai su méditer et exécuter? Que dis-tu du bouffon Habibrah? Que dis-tu du fou de ton oncle?

— Achève ce que tu as si bien commencé, lui répondis-je. Fais-moi mourir, mais hâte-toi! il se mit à se promener de long en large sur la plate-forme, en se frottant les mains.

— Et s’il ne me plaît pas de me hâter, à moi? si je veux jouir à mon aise de tes angoisses? Vois-tu, Biassou me devait ma part dans le butin du dernier pillage. Quand je t’ai vu au camp des noirs, je ne lui ai demandé que ta vie. Il me l’a accordée volontiers; et maintenant elle est à moi! Je m’en amuse. Tu vas bientôt suivre cette cascade dans ce gouffre, sois tranquille; mais je dois te dire auparavant qu’ayant découvert la retraite où ta femme avait été cachée, j’ai inspiré aujourd’hui à Biassou de faire incendier la forêt, cela doit être commencé à présent. Ainsi ta famille est anéantie. Ton oncle a péri par le fer; tu vas périr par l’eau, ta Marie par le feu!

— Misérable! misérable! m’écriai-je; et je fis un mouvement pour me jeter sur lui.

Il se retourna vers les nègres.

— Allons, attachez-le! il avance son heure.

Alors les nègres commencèrent à me lier en silence avec des cordes qu’ils avaient apportées. Tout à coup je crus entendre les aboiements lointains d’un chien, je pris ce bruit pour une illusion causée par le mugissement de la cascade. Les nègres achevèrent de m’attacher, et m’approchèrent du gouffre qui devait m’engloutir. Le nain, croisant les bras, me regardait avec une joie triomphante. Je levai les yeux vers la crevasse pour fuir son odieuse vue, et pour découvrir encore le ciel. En ce moment un aboiement plus fort et plus prononcé se fit entendre. La tête énorme de Rask passa par l’ouverture. Je tressaillis. Le nain s’écria:

— Allons! Les noirs, qui n’avaient pas remarqué les aboiements, se préparèrent à me lancer au milieu de l’abîme.

LIII

— Camarades! cria une voix tonnante.

Tous se retournèrent; c’était Bug-Jargal. Il était debout sur le bord de la crevasse; une plume rouge flottait sur sa tête.

— Camarades, répéta-t-il, arrêtez!

Les noirs se prosternèrent. Il continua:

— Je suis Bug-Jargal.

Les noirs frappèrent la terre de leurs fronts, en poussant des cris dont il était difficile de distinguer l’expression.

— Déliez le prisonnier, cria le chef.

Ici le nain parut se réveiller de la stupeur où l’avait plongé cette apparition inattendue. Il arrêta brusquement les bras des noirs prêts à couper mes liens.

— Comment! qu’est-ce? s’écria-t-il, Que quiere decir eso?

Puis, levant la tête vers Bug-Jargal:

— Chef du Morne-Rouge, que venez-vous faire ici?

Bug-Jargal répondit:

— Je viens commander à mes frères!

— En effet, dit le nain avec une rage concentrée, ce sont des noirs du Morne-Rouge! Mais de quel droit, ajouta-t-il en haussant la voix, disposez-vous de mon prisonnier?

Le chef répondit:

— Je suis Bug-Jargal.

Les noirs frappèrent la terre de leurs fronts.

— Bug-Jargal, reprit Habibrah, ne peut défaire ce qu’a fait Biassou. Ce blanc m’a été donné par Biassou. Je veux qu’il meure; il mourra. - Vosotros, dit-il aux noirs, obéissez! Jetez-le dans le gouffre.

A la voix puissante de l’obi, les noirs se relevèrent et firent un pas vers moi. Je crus que c’en était fait.

— Déliez le prisonnier! cria Bug-Jargal.

En un clin d’oeil je fus libre. Ma surprise égalait la rage de l’obi. Il voulut se jeter sur moi. Les noirs l’arrêtèrent. Alors il s’exhala en imprécations et en menaces.

— Demonios! rabia! infierno de mi alma! Comment! misérables! vous refusez de m’obéir! vous méconnaissez mi voz! Pourquoi ai-je perdu el tiempo à écouter este maldicho! J’aurais dû le faire jeter tout de suite aux poissons del baratro! A force de vouloir une vengeance complète, je la perds! O rabia de Satan! Escuchate, vosotros! Si vous ne m’obéissez pas, si vous ne précipitez pas cet exécrable blanc dans le torrent, je vous maudis! Vos cheveux deviendront blancs; les maringouins et les bigailles vous dévoreront tout vivants; vos jambes et vos bras plieront comme des roseaux; votre haleine brûlera votre gosier comme un sable ardent; vous mourrez bientôt, et après votre mort vos esprits seront condamnés à tourner sans cesse une meule grosse comme une montagne, dans la lune où il fait froid!

Cette scène produisait sur moi un effet singulier. Seul de mon espèce dans cette caverne humide et noire, environné de ces nègres pareils à des démons, balancé en quelque sorte au penchant de cet abîme sans fond, tour à tour menacé par ce nain hideux, par ce sorcier difforme, dont un jour pâle laissait à peine entrevoir le vêtement bariolé et la mitre pointue, et protégé par le grand noir, qui m’apparaissait au seul point d’où l’on pût voir le ciel, il me semblait être aux portes de l’enfer, attendre la perte ou le salut de mon âme, et assister à une lutte opiniâtre entre mon bon ange et mon mauvais génie.

Les noirs paraissaient terrifiés des malédictions de l’obi. Il voulut profiter de leur indécision, et s’écria:

— Je veux que le blanc meure. Vous m’obéirez; il mourra.

Bug-Jargal répondit gravement:

— Il vivra! Je suis Bug-Jargal. Mon père était roi au pays de Kakongo, et rendait la justice sur le seuil de sa porte.

Les noirs s’étaient prosternés de nouveau.

Le chef poursuivit:

— Frères! allez dire à Biassou de ne pas déployer sur la montagne le drapeau noir qui doit annoncer aux blancs la mort de ce captif; car ce captif a sauvé la vie à Bug-Jargal, et Bug-Jargal veut qu’il vive!

Ils se relevèrent. Bug-Jargal jeta sa plume rouge au milieu d’eux. Le chef du détachement croisa les bras sur sa poitrine, et ramassa le panache avec respect; puis ils sortirent sans proférer une parole.

L’obi disparut avec eux dans les ténèbres de l’avenue souterraine.

Je n’essaierai pas de vous peindre, messieurs, la situation où je me trouvais. Je fixai des yeux humides sur Pierrot, qui de son côté me contemplait avec une singulière expression de reconnaissance et de fierté.

— Dieu soit béni, dit-il enfin, tout est sauvé. Frère, retourne par où tu es venu. Tu me retrouveras dans la vallée.

Il me fit un signe de la main, et se retira.

LIV

Pressé d'arriver à ce rendez-vous et de savoir par quel merveilleux bonheur mon sauveur m'avait été ramené si à propos, je me disposai à sortir de l'effrayante caverne. Cependant de nouveaux dangers m'y étaient réservés. A l'instant où je me dirigeai vers la galerie souterraine, un obstacle imprévu m'en barra tout à coup l'entrée. C'était encore Habibrah. Le rancuneux obi n'avait pas suivi les nègres comme je l'avais cru; il s'était caché derrière un pilier de roches, attendant un moment plus propice pour sa vengeance. Ce moment était venu. Le nain se montra subitement et rit. J'étais seul, désarmé; un poignard, le même qui lui tenait lieu de crucifix, brillait dans sa main. A sa vue je reculai involontairement.

— Ha! ha! maldicho! tu croyais donc m'échapper! mais le fou est moins fou que toi. Je te tiens, et cette fois je ne te ferai pas attendre. Ton ami Bug-Jargal ne t'attendra pas non plus en vain. Tu iras au rendez-vous dans la vallée, mais c'est le flot de ce torrent qui se chargera de t'y conduire.

En parlant ainsi, il se précipita sur moi le poignard levé.

— Monstre! lui dis-je en reculant sur la plate-forme, tout à l'heure tu n'étais qu'un bourreau, maintenant tu es un assassin!

— Je me venge! répondit-il en grinçant des dents.

En ce moment j'étais sur le bord du précipice; il fondit sur moi, afin de m'y pousser d'un coup de poignard. J'esquivai le choc. Le pied lui manqua sur cette mousse glissante dont les rochers humides sont en quelque sorte enduits; il roula sur la pente arrondie par les flots. - Mille démons! s'écria-t-il en rugissant. - Il était tombé dans l'abîme.

Je vous ai dit qu'une racine du vieil arbre sortait d'entre les fentes du granit, un peu au-dessous du bord. Le nain la rencontra dans sa chute, sa jupe chamarrée s'embarrassa dans les nœuds de la souche, et, saisissant ce dernier appui, il s'y cramponna avec une énergie extraordinaire. Son bonnet aigu se détacha de sa tête; il fallut lâcher son poignard; et cette arme d'assassin et la gorra sonnante du bouffon disparurent ensemble en se heurtant dans les profondeurs de la cataracte.

Habibrah, suspendu sur l'horrible gouffre, essaya d'abord de remonter sur la plate-forme; mais ses petits bras ne pouvaient atteindre jusqu'à l'arête de l'escarpement, et ses ongles s'usaient en efforts impuissants pour entamer la surface visqueuse du roc qui surplombait dans le ténébreux abîme. Il hurlait de rage.

La moindre secousse de ma part eût suffi pour le précipiter; mais c'eût été une lâcheté, et je n'y songeai pas un moment. Cette modération le frappa. Remerciant le ciel du salut qu'il m'envoyait d'une manière si inespérée, je me décidais à l'abandonner à son sort, et j'allais sortir de la salle souterraine, quand j'entendis tout à coup la voix du nain sortir de l'abîme, suppliante et douloureuse:

— Maitre! criait-il, maître! ne vous en allez pas, de grâce! au nom du bon Giu, ne laissez pas mourir, impénitente et coupable, une créature humaine que vous pouvez sauver. Hélas! les forces me manquent, la branche glisse et plie dans mes mains, le poids de mon corps m'entraîne, je vais la lâcher ou elle va se rompre. - Hélas! maître! l'effroyable gouffre tourbillonne au-dessous de moi! Nombre santo de Dios! N'aurez-vous aucune pitié pour votre pauvre bouffon? Il est bien criminel; mais ne lui prouverez-vous pas que les blancs valent mieux que les mulâtres, les maîtres que les esclaves?

Je m'étais approché du précipice presque ému, et la terne lumière qui descendait de la crevasse me montrait sur le visage repoussant du nain une expression que je ne lui connaissais pas encore, celle de la prière et de la détresse.

— Señor Léopold, continua-t-il, encouragé par le mouvement de pitié qui m'était échappé, serait-il vrai qu'un être humain vît son semblable dans une position aussi horrible, pût le secourir, et ne le fît pas? Hélas! tendez-moi la main, maître. Il ne faudrait qu'un peu d'aide pour me sauver. Ce qui est tout pour moi est si peu de chose pour vous! Tirez- moi à vous, de grâce! Ma reconnaissance égalera mes crimes.

Je l'interrompis:

— Malheureux! ne rappelle pas ce souvenir!

— C'est pour le détester, maitre! reprit-il. Ah! soyez plus généreux que moi! O ciel! ô ciel! je faiblis! Je tombe. - Ay desdichado! La main! votre main! tendez-moi la main! au nom de la mère qui vous a porté!

Je ne saurais vous dire à quel point était lamentable cet accent de terreur et de souffrance! J'oubliai tout. Ce n'était plus un ennemi, un traître, un assassin, c'était un malheureux qu'un léger effort de ma part pouvait arracher à une mort affreuse. Il m'implorait si pitoyablement! Toute parole, tout reproche eût été inutile et ridicule; le besoin d'aide paraissait urgent. Je me baissai, et, m'agenouillant le long du bord, l'une de mes mains appuyée sur le tronc de l'arbre dont la racine soutenait l'infortuné Habibrah, je lui tendis l'autre... - Dès qu'elle fut à sa portée, il la saisit de ses deux mains avec une force prodigieuse, et, loin de se prêter au mouvement d'ascension que je voulais lui donner, je le sentis qui cherchait à m'entraîner avec lui dans l'abîme. Si le tronc de l'arbre ne m'eût pas prêté un aussi solide appui, j'aurais été infailliblement arraché du bord par la secousse violente et inattendue que me donna le misérable.

— Scélérat! m'écriai-je, que fais-tu?

— Je me venge! répondit-il avec un rire éclatant et infernal. Ah! je te tiens enfin! Imbécile! tu t'es livré toi-même! je te tiens! Tu étais sauvé, j'étais perdu; et c'est toi qui rentres volontairement dans la gueule du caïman, parce qu'elle a gémi après avoir rugi! Me voilà consolé, puisque ma mort est une vengeance! Tu es pris au piège, amigo! et j'aurai un compagnon humain chez les poissons du lac.

— Ah! traître! dis-je en me roidissant, voilà comme tu me récompenses d'avoir voulu te tirer du péril!

— Oui, reprenait-il, je sais que j'aurais pu me sauver avec toi, mais j'aime mieux que tu périsses avec moi. J'aime mieux ta mort que ma vie! Viens!

En même temps, ses deux mains bronzées et calleuses se crispaient sur la mienne avec des efforts inouïs; ses yeux flamboyaient, sa bouche écumait; ses forces. dont il déplorait si douloureusement l'abandon un moment auparavant, lui étaient revenues, exaltées par la rage et la vengeance; ses pieds s'appuyaient ainsi que deux leviers aux parois perpendiculaires du rocher, et il bondissait comme un tigre sur la racine, qui, mêlée à ses vêtements, le soutenait malgré lui; car il eût voulu la briser afin de peser de tout son poids sur moi et de m'entraîner plus vite. Il interrompait quelquefois, pour la mordre avec fureur, le rire épouvantable que m'offrait son monstrueux visage. On eût dit l'horrible démon de cette caverne cherchant à attirer une proie dans son palais d'abîmes et de ténèbres.

Un de mes genoux s'était heureusement arrêté dans une anfractuosité du rocher; mon bras s'était en quelque sorte noué à l'arbre qui m'appuyait; et je luttais contre les efforts du nain avec toute l'énergie que le sentiment de conservation peut donner dans un semblable moment. De temps en temps je soulevais péniblement ma poitrine, et j'appelais de toutes mes forces: Bug-

Jargal! Mais le fracas de la cascade et l’éloignement me laissaient bien peu d’espoir qu’il pût entendre ma voix.

Cependant le nain, qui ne s’était pas attendu à tant de résistance, redoublait ses furieuses secousses. Je commençais à perdre mes forces, bien que cette lutte eût duré bien moins de temps qu’il ne m’en faut pour vous la raconter. Un tiraillement insupportable paralysait presque mon bras; ma vue se troublait; des lueurs livides et confuses se croisaient devant mes yeux, des tintements remplissaient mes oreilles; j’entendais crier la racine prête à se rompre, rire le monstre prêt à tomber, et il me semblait que le gouffre hurlant se rapprochait de moi.

Avant de tout abandonner à l’épuisement et au désespoir, je tentai un dernier appel; je rassemblai mes forces éteintes, et je criai encore une fois: Bug-Jargal! Un aboiement me répondit. J’avais reconnu Rask, je tournais les yeux, Bug- Jargal et son chien étaient au bord de la crevasse. Je ne sais s’il avait entendu ma voix ou si quelque inquiétude l’avait ramené. Il vit mon danger.

— Tiens bon! me cria-t-il.

Habibrah, craignant mon salut, me criait de son côté en écumant de fureur:

— Viens donc! viens! et il ramassait, pour en finir, le reste de sa vigueur surnaturelle.

En ce moment, mon bras fatigué se détacha de l’arbre. C’en était fait de moi! quand je me sentis saisir par-derrière; c’était Rask. A un signe de son maître il avait sauté de la crevasse sur la plate-forme, et sa gueule me retenait puissamment par les basques de mon habit. Ce secours inattendu me sauva. Habibrah avait consumé toute sa force dans son dernier effort; je rappelai la mienne pour lui arracher ma main. Ses doigts engourdis et roides furent enfin contraints de me lâcher; la racine, si longtemps tourmentée, se brisa sous son poids; et, tandis que Rask me retirait violemment en arrière, le misérable nain s’engloutit dans l’écume de la sombre cascade, en me jetant une malédiction que je n’entendis pas, et qui retomba avec lui dans l’abîme.

Telle fut la fin du bouffon de mon oncle.

LV

Cette scène effrayante, cette lutte forcenée, son dénouement terrible, m’avaient accablé. J’étais presque sans force et sans connaissance. La voix de Bug-Jargal me ranima.

— Frère! me criait-il, hâte-toi de sortir d’ici! Le soleil sera couché dans une demi-heure. Je vais t’attendre là-bas. Suis Rask.

Cette parole amie me rendit tout à la fois espérance, vigueur et courage. Je me relevai. Le dogue s’enfonça rapidement dans l’avenue souterraine; je le suivis; son jappement me guidait dans l’ombre. Après quelques instants je revis le jour devant moi; enfin nous atteignîmes l’issue, et je respirai librement. En sortant de dessous la voûte humide et noire je me rappelai la prédiction du nain, au moment où nous y étions entrés:

«L’un de nous deux seulement repassera par ce chemin.”

Son attente avait été trompée, mais sa prophétie s’était réalisée.

LVI

Parvenu dans la vallée, je revis Bug-Jargal; je me jetai dans ses bras, et j’y demeurai oppressé, ayant mille questions à lui faire et ne pouvant parler.

– Écoute, me dit-il, ta femme, ma sœur, est en sûreté. Je l’ai remise, au camp des blancs, à l’un de vos parents, qui commande les avant-postes; je voulais me rendre prisonnier, de peur qu’on ne sacrifiât en ma place les dix têtes qui répondent de la mienne. Ton parent m’a dit de fuir et de tâcher de prévenir ton supplice, les dix noirs ne devant être exécutés que si tu l’étais, ce que Biassou devait faire annoncer en arborant un drapeau noir sur la plus haute de nos montagnes. Alors j’ai couru, Rask m’a conduit, et je suis arrivé à temps, grâce au ciel! Tu vivras, et moi aussi.

Il me tendit la main et ajouta:

– Frère, es-tu content?

Je le serrai de nouveau dans mes bras; je le conjurai de ne plus me quitter, de rester avec moi parmi les blancs; je lui promis un grade dans l’armée coloniale. Il m’interrompit d’un air farouche.

– Frère, est-ce que je te propose de t’enrôler parmi les miens?

Je gardai le silence, je sentais mon tort. Il ajouta avec gaieté:

– Allons, viens vite revoir et rassurer ta femme!

Cette proposition répondait à un besoin pressant de mon cœur; je me levai ivre de bonheur; nous partîmes. Le noir connaissait le chemin; il marchait devant moi; Rask nous suivait…

Ici d’Auverney s’arrêta et jeta un sombre regard autour de lui. La sueur coulait à grosses gouttes de son front. Il couvrit son visage avec sa main. Rask le regardait d’un air inquiet.

– Oui, c’est ainsi que tu me regardais! murmura-t-il.

Un instant après, il se leva violemment agité, et sortit de la tente. Le sergent et le dogue l’accompagnèrent.

LVII

— Je gagerais, s'écria Henri, que nous approchons de la catastrophe! Je serais vraiment fâché qu'il arrivât quelque chose à Bug-Jargal; c'était un fameux homme!

Paschal ôta de ses lèvres le goulot de sa bouteille revêtue d'osier, et dit:

— J'aurais voulu, pour douze paniers de Porto, voir la noix de coco qu'il vida d'un trait.

Alfred, qui était en train de rêver à un air de guitare, s'interrompit, et pria le lieutenant Henri de lui rattacher ses aiguillettes; il ajouta:

— Ce nègre m'intéresse beaucoup. Seulement je n'ai pas encore osé demander à d'Auverney s'il savait aussi l'air de la hermosa Padilla.

— Biassou est bien plus remarquable, reprit Paschal; son vin goudronné ne devait pas valoir grand-chose, mais du moins cet homme-là savait ce que c'est qu'un Français. Si j'avais été son prisonnier, j'aurais laissé pousser ma moustache pour qu'il me prêtât quelques piastres dessus, comme la ville de Goa à ce capitaine portugais. Je vous déclare que mes créanciers sont plus impitoyables que Biassou.

— A propos, capitaine! voilà quatre louis que je vous dois! s'écria Henri en jetant sa bourse à Paschal.

Le capitaine regarda d'un oeil étonné son généreux débiteur, qui aurait à plus juste titre pu se dire son créancier. Henri se hâta de poursuivre.

— Voyons, messieurs, que pensez-vous jusqu'ici de l'histoire que nous raconte le capitaine?

— Ma foi, dit Alfred, je n'ai pas écouté fort attentivement, mais je vous avoue que j'aurais espéré quelque chose de plus intéressant de la bouche du rêveur d'Auverney. Et puis il y a une romance en prose, et je n'aime pas les romances en prose; sur quel air chanter cela? En somme, l'histoire de Bug-Jargal m'ennuie; c'est trop long.

— Vous avez raison, dit l'aide de camp Paschal; c'est trop long. Si je n'avais pas eu ma pipe et mon flacon, j'aurais passé une méchante nuit. Remarquez en outre qu'il y a beaucoup de choses absurdes. Comment croire, par exemple, que ce petit magot de sorcier... comment l'appelle-t-il déjà? Habitbas? comment croire qu'il veuille, pour noyer son ennemi, se noyer lui-même?

Henri l'interrompit en souriant:

— Dans de l’eau, surtout! n’est-ce pas, capitaine Paschal? Quant à moi, ce qui m’amusait le plus pendant le récit d’Auverney, c’était de voir son chien boiteux lever la tête chaque fois qu’il prononçait le nom de Bug-Jargal.

— Et en cela, interrompit Paschal, il faisait précisément le contraire de ce que j’ai vu faire aux vieilles bonnes femmes de Celadas quand le prédicateur prononçait le nom de Jésus; j’entrais dans l’église avec une douzaine de cuirassiers...

Le bruit du fusil du factionnaire avertit que d’Auverney rentrait. Tout le monde se tut. Il se promena quelque temps les bras croisés et en silence. Le vieux Thadée, qui s’était rassis dans un coin, l’observait à la dérobée, et s’efforçait de paraître caresser Rask, pour que le capitaine ne s’aperçût pas de son inquiétude.

D’Auverney reprit enfin:

LVIII

— Rask nous suivait. Le rocher le plus élevé de la vallée n’était plus éclairé par le soleil; une lueur s’y peignit tout à coup, et passa. Le noir tressaillit; il me serra fortement la main.

— Ecoute, me dit-il.

Un bruit sourd, semblable à la décharge d’une pièce d’artillerie, se fit entendre alors dans les vallées, et se prolongea d’échos en échos.

— C’est le signal! dit le nègre d’une voix sombre.

Il reprit: - C’est un coup de canon, n’est-ce pas?

Je fis un signe de tête affirmatif.

En deux bonds il fut sur une roche élevée; je l’y suivis. Il croisa les bras, et se mit à sourire tristement.

— Vois-tu? me dit-il.

Je regardai du côté qu’il m’indiquait, et je vis le pic qu’il m’avait montré lors de mon entrevue avec Marie, le seul que le soleil éclairât encore, surmonté d’un grand drapeau noir.

Ici, d’Auverney fit une pause.

— J’ai su depuis que Biassou, pressé de partir, et me croyant mort, avait fait arborer l’étendard avant le retour du détachement qui avait dû m’exécuter.

Bug-Jargal était toujours là, debout, les bras croisés, et contemplant le lugubre drapeau. Soudain il se retourna vivement et fit quelques pas, comme pour descendre du roc.

— Dieu! Dieu! mes malheureux compagnons! Il revint à moi. - As-tu entendu le canon? me demanda-t-il. - Je ne répondis point.

— Eh bien! frère, c’était le signal. On les conduit maintenant.

Sa tête tomba sur sa poitrine. Il se rapprocha encore de moi.

— Va retrouver ta femme, frère; Rask te conduira.

Il siffla un air africain, le chien se mit à remuer la queue, et parut vouloir se diriger vers un point de la vallée.

Bug-Jargal me prit la main et s’efforça de sourire, mais ce souffre était convulsif.

— Adieu! me cria-t-il d’une voix forte; et il se perdit dans les touffes d’arbres qui nous entouraient.

J’étais pétrifié. Le peu que je comprenais à ce qui venait d’avoir lieu me faisait prévoir tous les malheurs.

Rask, voyant son maître disparaître, s’avança sur le bord du roc, et se mit à secouer la tête avec un hurlement plaintif. Il revint en baissant la queue; ses grands yeux étaient humides; il me regarda d’un air inquiet, puis il retourna vers l’endroit d’où son maître était parti, et aboya à plusieurs reprises. Je le compris; je sentais les mêmes craintes que lui. Je fis quelques pas de son côté; alors il partit comme un trait en suivant les traces de Bug-Jargal! je l’aurais eu bientôt perdu de vue, quoique je courusse aussi de toutes mes forces, si, de temps en temps, il ne se fût arrêté, comme pour me donner le temps de le joindre. - Nous traversâmes ainsi plusieurs vallées, nous franchîmes des collines couvertes de bouquets de bois. Enfin...

La voix de d’Auverney s’éteignit. Un sombre désespoir se manifesta sur tous ses traits; il put à peine articuler ces mots:

— Poursuis, Thadée, car je n’ai pas plus de force qu’une vieille femme.

Le vieux sergent n’était pas moins ému que le capitaine; il se mit pourtant en devoir de lui obéir. - Avec votre permission. - Puisque vous le désirez, mon capitaine... - Il faut vous dire, mes officiers, que, quoique Bug-Jargal, dit Pierrot, fût un grand nègre, bien doux, bien fort, bien courageux, et le premier brave de la terre, après vous, s’il vous plaît, mon capitaine, je n’en étais pas moins bien animé contre lui, ce que je ne me pardonnerai jamais, quoique mon capitaine me l’ait pardonné. Si bien, mon capitaine, qu’après avoir entendu annoncer votre mort pour le soir du second jour, j’entrai dans une furieuse colère contre ce pauvre homme, et ce fut avec un vrai plaisir infernal que je lui annonçai que ce serait lui ou, à défaut, dix des siens, qui vous tiendraient compagnie, et qui seraient fusillés en matière de représailles, comme on dit. A cette nouvelle, il ne manifesta rien, sinon qu’une heure après il se sauva en pratiquant un grand trou...

D’Auverney fit un geste d’impatience. Thadée reprit:

— Soit! - Quand on vit le grand drapeau noir sur la montagne, comme il n’était pas revenu, ce qui ne nous étonnait pas, avec votre permission, mes officiers, on tira le coup de canon de signal, et je fus chargé de conduire les dix nègres au lieu de l’exécution, appelé la Bouche-du-Grand-Diable, et éloigné du camp environ... Enfin, qu’importe! Quand nous fûmes là, vous sentez bien, messieurs, que ce n’était pas pour leur donner la clef des champs, je les fis lier, comme cela se pratique, et je disposai mes pelotons. Voilà que je vois arriver de la forêt le grand nègre. Les bras m’en tombèrent. Il vint à moi tout essoufflé.

— J’arrive à temps! dit-il. Bonjour, Thadée.

— Oui, messieurs, il ne dit que cela, et il alla délier ses compatriotes. J'étais là, moi, tout stupéfait. Alors, avec votre permission, mon capitaine, il s'engagea un grand combat de générosité entre les noirs et lui, lequel aurait bien dû durer un peu plus longtemps... N'importe! oui, je m'en accuse, ce fut moi qui le fis cesser. Il prit la place des noirs. En ce moment son grand chien... Pauvre Rask! il arriva et me sauta à la gorge. Il aurait bien dû, mon capitaine, s'y tenir quelques moments de plus! Mais Pierrot fit un signe, et le pauvre dogue me lâcha; Bug-Jargal ne put pourtant pas empêcher qu'il ne vînt se coucher à ses pieds. Alors, je vous croyais mort, mon capitaine. J'étais en colère... - Je criai...

Le sergent étendit la main, regarda le capitaine, mais ne put articuler le mot fatal.

— Bug-Jargal tombe. - Une balle avait cassé la patte de son chien - Depuis ce temps-là, mes officiers (et le sergent secouait la tête tristement), depuis ce temps-là il est boiteux. J'entendis des gémissements dans le bois voisin; j'y entrai; c'était vous, mon capitaine, une balle vous avait atteint au moment où vous accouriez pour sauver le grand nègre. - Oui, mon capitaine, vous gémissiez; mais c'était sur lui! Bug-Jargal était mort! - Vous, mon capitaine, on vous rapporta au camp. Vous étiez blessé moins dangereusement que lui, car vous guérîtes, grâce aux bons soins de madame Marie.

Le sergent s'arrêta. D'Auverney reprit d'une voix solennelle et douloureuse:

— Bug-Jargal était mort!

Thadée baissa la tête.

— Oui, dit-il; et il m'avait laissé la vie; et c'est moi qui l'ai tué! -

CHAPTER I THE MORTUARY AND ITS VISITORS.

Did you see it? did you see it? did you see it? Oh! did you see it? Who saw it? Who did see it For mercy's sake, who saw it?

Sterne: Tristram Shandy.

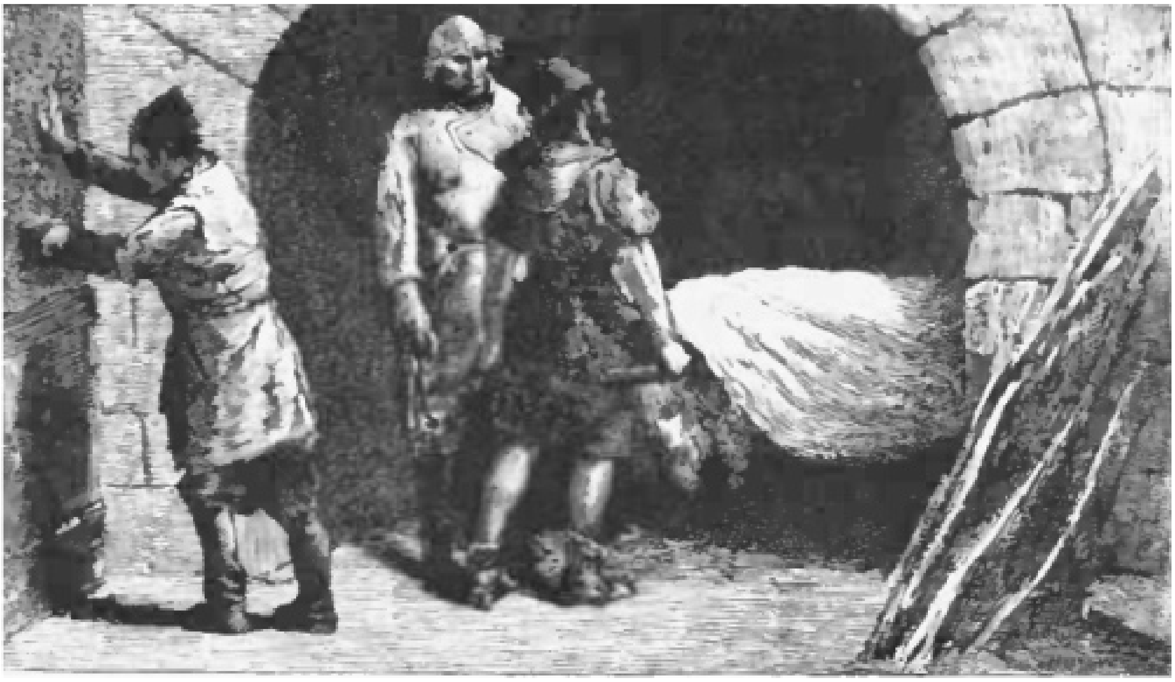
That's what comes of falling in love, Neighbor Niels. Poor Guth Stersen would not be stretched out yonder on that great black slab, like a starfish forgotten by the tide, if she had kept her mind on mending her father's boat and patching his nets. Saint Usuph, the fisher, console our old friend in his affliction!"

"And her lover," added a shrill, tremulous voice, " Gill Stadt, that fine young man beside her, would not be there now, if instead of making love to Guth and seeking his luck in those accursed Roeraas mines, he had stayed at home and rocked his little brother's cradle, under the smoky cross-beams of his mother's hut."

Neighbor Niels, whom the first speaker addressed, interrupted: "Your memory is growing old along with yourself. Mother Oily. Gill never had a brother, and that makes poor Widow Stadt's grief all the harder to bear, for her home is now left utterly desolate; if she looks up to heaven for consolation, she sees nought but her old roof, where still hangs the cradle of her son, grown to be a tall young man, and dead."

‘'Poor mother!" replied old Oily, "it was the young man's own fault. Why should he go to Roeraas to be a miner?"

"I do believe," said Niels, "that those infernal mines rob us of a man for every escalin's worth of copper which we get out of them. What do you think, Father Braal? "



Spiagudry accompanied the Bearers, and the Door closed .

“Miners are fools,” replied the fisherman. “ If he would live, the fish should not leave the water. Man should not enter the bowels of the earth.”

“But,” asked a young man in the crowd, “how if Gill Stadt had to work in the mines to win his sweetheart?”

“A man should never risk his life,” interrupted Oily, “ for affections which are far from being worth a life, or filling it. A pretty wedding-bed Gill earned for his Guth! “

“So then that young woman,” inquired a curious bystander, “ drowned herself in despair at the death of this young man? “

“Who says so? “ loudly exclaimed a soldier, pushing his way through the crowd. “ That young girl, whom I knew well, was indeed engaged to marry a young miner who was lately crushed by falling rocks in the underground tunnels of Storwaadsgrube, near Roeraas; but she was also the sweetheart of one of my mates, and as she was going to Munkholm secretly, day before yesterday, to celebrate with her lover the death of her betrothed, her boat capsized on a reef, and she was drowned.”

A confused sound of voices arose: “ Impossible, master soldier,” cried the old women. The young ones were silent; and Neighbor Niels maliciously reminded fisher Braal of his serious statement: “ That ‘s what comes of falling in love!”

The soldier was about to lose his temper with his opponents; he had already called them “ old witches from the cave of Quiragoth,” and they were not disposed to bear so grave an insult patiently, when a sharp and imperious voice, crying “ Silence, silence, you old fools! “ put an end to the dispute. All w r as still, as when the sudden crow of a cock is heard amid the cackling of the hens.

Before relating the rest of the scene, it may be well to describe the spot where it occurred. It was as the reader has doubtless guessed one of those gloomy structures which public pity and social forethought devote to unknown corpses, the last asylum of the dead, whose lives were usually sad ones; where the careless spectator, the surly or kindly observer gather, and friends often meet tearful relatives, whom long and unendurable anxiety has robbed of all but one sad hope. At the period now remote, and in the uncivilized region to which I have carried my reader, there had as yet been no attempt, as in our cities of gold and mud, to make these resting-places into ingeniously forbidding or elegantly funereal edifices. Daylight did not fall through tomb-shaped openings, into artistically sculptured vaults, upon beds which seem as if the guardian of the place were anxious to leave the dead some of the conveniences of life, and the pillow seems arranged for sleep. If the keeper’s door were left ajar, the eye, wearied with gazing upon hideous, naked corpses, had not as now the pleasure of resting upon elegant furniture and happy children. Death was there in all its deformity, in all its horror; and there was no attempt to deck its fleshless skeleton with ribbons and gewgaws.

The room in which our actors stood was spacious and dark, which made it seem still larger; it was lighted only by a broad, low door opening upon the port of Throndhjem, and a rough hole in the ceiling, through which a dull, white light fell, mingled with rain, hail, or snow, according to the weather, upon the corpses lying directly under it. The room was divided by an iron railing, breast-high, running across it from side to side. The public entered the outer portion through the low door; in the inner part were six long black granite slabs, arranged abreast and parallel to each other. A small side door served to admit the keeper and his assistant to either section, their rooms occupying the rear of the building, close to the water. The miner and his betrothed occupied two granite beds; decomposition had already begun its work upon the young woman’s body, showing itself in large blue and purple spots running along her limbs on the line of the blood-vessels. Gill’s features were stern and set; but his body was so horribly mutilated that it was impossible to judge whether his beauty were really so great as old Oily declared.

It was before these disfigured remains, in the midst of the mute crowd, that the conversation which we have faithfully interpreted, began.

A tall, withered old man, sitting with folded arms and bent head upon a broken stool in the darkest corner of the room, had apparently paid no heed until the moment when he rose suddenly, exclaiming, “ Silence, silence, you old fools! “ and seized the soldier by the arm.

All were hushed; the soldier turned and broke into a burst of laughter at the sight of his strange interrupter, whose pale face, thin greasy locks, long fingers, and complete costume of reindeer leather amply justified this mirthful reception. But a clamor arose from the crowd of women, for a moment confounded: “ It is the keeper of the Spladgest! -That infernal doorkeeper to the dead! -That diabolical Spiagudry!- That accursed sorcerer! “

“Silence, you old fools, silence! If this be the witches’ Sabbath, hasten away and find your broomsticks; if you don’t, they’ll fly off without you. Let this worthy descendant of the god Thor alone.”

Then Spiagudry, striving to assume a gracious expression, addressed the soldier: “ You say, my good fellow, that this wretched woman -”

“Old rascal! “ muttered Oily; “yes, we are all ‘wretched women,’ to him, because our bodies, if they fall into his claws, only bring him thirty escalins’ reward, while he gets forty for the paltry carcass of a man.”

“Silence, old women!” repeated Spiagudry. “ In truth, these daughters of the Devil are like their kettles; when they wax warm, they must needs sing. Tell me, my valiant king of the sword, your comrade, this Guth’s lover, will doubtless kill himself in despair at her loss, won’t he? “

Here burst forth the long-repressed storm. “Do you hear the miscreant, the old Pagan! “ cried twenty shrill, discordant voices. “He would fain see one less man living, for the sake of the forty escalins that a dead body brings him.”

“And what if I would? “ replied the keeper of the Spladgest. “Doesn’t our gracious king and master, Christian V., -may Saint Hospitius bless him!- declare himself the natural guardian of all miners, so that when they die he may enrich his royal treasury with their paltry leavings? “

“You honor the king,” answered fisher Braal, “ by comparing the royal treasury to the strong-box of your charnelhouse, and him to yourself, Neighbor Spiagudry.”

“Neighbor, indeed!” said the keeper, shocked by such familiarity. “Your neighbor! say rather your host! since it may easily chance some day, my dear boatdweller, that I shall have to lend you one of my six stone beds for a week. Besides,” he added, with a laugh, “ if I spoke of that soldier’s death, it was merely from a desire to see the perpetuation of the custom of suicide for the sake of those great and tragic passions which ladies are wont to inspire.”

“Well, you tall corpse and keeper of corpses,” said the soldier, “ what are you after, with your amiable grimace, which looks so much like the last smile of a man who has been hanged? “

“Capital, my valiant fellow! “ replied Spiagudry. “ I always felt that there was more wit beneath the helmet of Constable Thurn, who conquered the Devil with his sword and his tongue, than under the mitre of Bishop Isleif, who wrote the history of Iceland, or the square cap of Professor Shoenning, who described our cathedral.”

“In that case, if you will take my advice, my old bag of leather, you will give up the revenues of the charnelhouse, and go and sell yourself to the viceroy’s museum of curiosities at Bergen. I swear to you, by Belphegor, that they pay their weight in gold there for rare beasts; but say, what do you want with me? “

“When the bodies brought here are found in the water, we have to give half the reward to the fisherman. I was going to ask you, therefore, illustrious heir to Constable Thurn, if you would persuade your unfortunate comrade not to drown himself, but to choose some other mode of death; it can’t matter much to him, and he would not wish to wrong the unhappy Christian who must entertain his corpse, if the loss of Guth should really drive him to that act of despair.”

“You are quite mistaken, my charitable and hospitable friend. My comrade will not have the pleasure of occupying an apartment in your tempting tavern with its six beds. Don’t you suppose he has already consoled himself with another Valkyria for the death of that girl? He had long been tired of your Guth, by my beard!”

At these words, the storm, which Spiagudry had for a moment drawn upon his own head, again burst more furiously than ever upon the luckless soldier.

"What, miserable scamp!" shrieked the old women; " is that the way you forget us? And yet we love such good-for-nothings! "

The young girls still kept silence. Some of them even thought greatly against their will, of course -that this graceless fellow was very good-looking.

"Oh, ho! "said the soldier; "has the witches' Sabbath come round again? Beelzebub's punishment is frightful indeed if he be condemned to hear such choruses once a week! "

No one can say how this fresh squall would have ended, if general attention had not at this moment been utterly absorbed by a noise from without. The uproar increased steadily, and presently a swarm of little ragged boys entered the Spladgest, tumultuously shouting and crowding about a covered bier carried by two men.

"Where does that come from? " the keeper asked the bearers.

"From Urchtal Sands."

"Oglypiglap! " shouted Spiagudry.

One of the side doors opened, a little man of Lappish race, dressed in leather, entered, and signed to the bearers to follow him. Spiagudry accompanied them, and the door closed before the curious crowd had time to guess, by the length of the body on the bier, whether it were a man or a woman.

This subject still occupied all their thoughts, when Spiagudry and his assistant reappeared in the second compartment, carrying the corpse of a man, which they placed upon one of the granite couches.

"It 's a long time since I've handled such handsome clothes," said Oglypiglap; then, shaking his head and standing on tiptoe, he hung above the dead man the elegant uniform of a captain in the army. The corpse's head was disfigured, and his limbs were covered with blood; the keeper sprinkled the body several times from an old broken pail.

"By Saint Beelzebub! " cried the soldier, " it is an officer of my regiment. Let me see; can it be Captain Bollar, -from grief at his uncle's death? Bah! he is the heir. Baron Randnier? He lost his estate at cards yesterday, but he will win it back to-morrow, with his adversary's castle. Can it be Captain Lory, whose dog was drowned, or Paymaster Stunck, whose wife was unfaithful to him? But, really, I don't see why he should blow out his brains for that! "

The crowd steadily increased. Just at this instant, a young man who was crossing the wharf, seeing the mob of people, dismounted from his horse, handed the bridle to the servant behind him, and entered the Spladgest. He wore a simple travelling dress, was armed with a sword, and wrapped in a large green cloak; a black plume, fastened to his hat by a diamond buckle, fell over his noble face and waved to and fro upon his lofty brow, shaded by chestnut hair; his boots and spurs, soiled with mud, showed that he had come a long distance.

As he entered, a short, thick-set man, also wrapped in a cloak and hiding his hands in huge gloves, replied to the soldier.

“And who told you that he killed himself? That man no more committed suicide, I’ll be bound, than the roof of your cathedral set itself on fire.”

As the double-edged sword makes two wounds, this phrase gave birth to two answers.

“Our cathedral! “ said Niels; “ it is covered with copper now. It was that miserable Hans who set it on fire to make work for the miners, one of whom was his favorite Gill Stadt, whom you see lying yonder.”

“What the devil! “ cried the soldier, in his turn; “ do you dare tell me, the second musketeer in the Munkholm garrison, that that man did not blow out his brains! “

“Ho was murdered,” coldly replied the little fellow.

“Just listen to the oracle! Go along with you. Your little gray eyes can see no better than your hands do under the big gloves with which you cover them in the middle of the summer.”

The little man’s eyes flashed.

“Soldier, pray to your patron saint that these hands may never leave their mark upon your face! “

“Oh! -enough of this!” cried the soldier, in a rage. Then, pausing suddenly, he said: “ No, there must be no word of a duel before dead men.”

The little man growled a few words in a foreign tongue, and vanished.

A voice cried out: “ He was found ou Urchtal Sands.”

“On Urchtal Sands? “ said the soldier; “ Captain Dispolsen was to land there this morning, from Copenhagen.”

“Captain Dispolsen has not yet reached Munkholm,” said another voice.

“They say that Hans of Iceland haunts those sands just now,” added a fourth.

“Then it is possible that this may be the captain,” said the soldier, “ if Hans was the murderer; for we all know that the Icelander murders in so devilish a fashion that his victims often seem to be suicides.”

“What sort of man is this Hans? “ asked some one.

“He is a giant,” said one.

“He is a dwarf,” said another.

“Has nobody seen him, then? “ put in a voice.

“Those who see him for the first time, see him for the last time also.”

“Hush! “ said old Oily; “ they say there are but three persons who ever exchanged human speech with him, that reprobate of a Spiagudry, Widow Stadt, and but he had a sad life and a sad death that poor Gill, who lies yonder. Hush! “

“Hush! “ was repeated on all sides.

“Now,” suddenly exclaimed the soldier, “ I am sure that this is indeed Captain Dispolsen. I recognize the steel chain which our prisoner, old Schumacker, gave him when he went away.”

The young man with the black plume broke the silence abruptly: “ Are you sure it is Captain Dispolsen? “

“Sure, by the merits of Saint Beelzebub!” said the soldier.

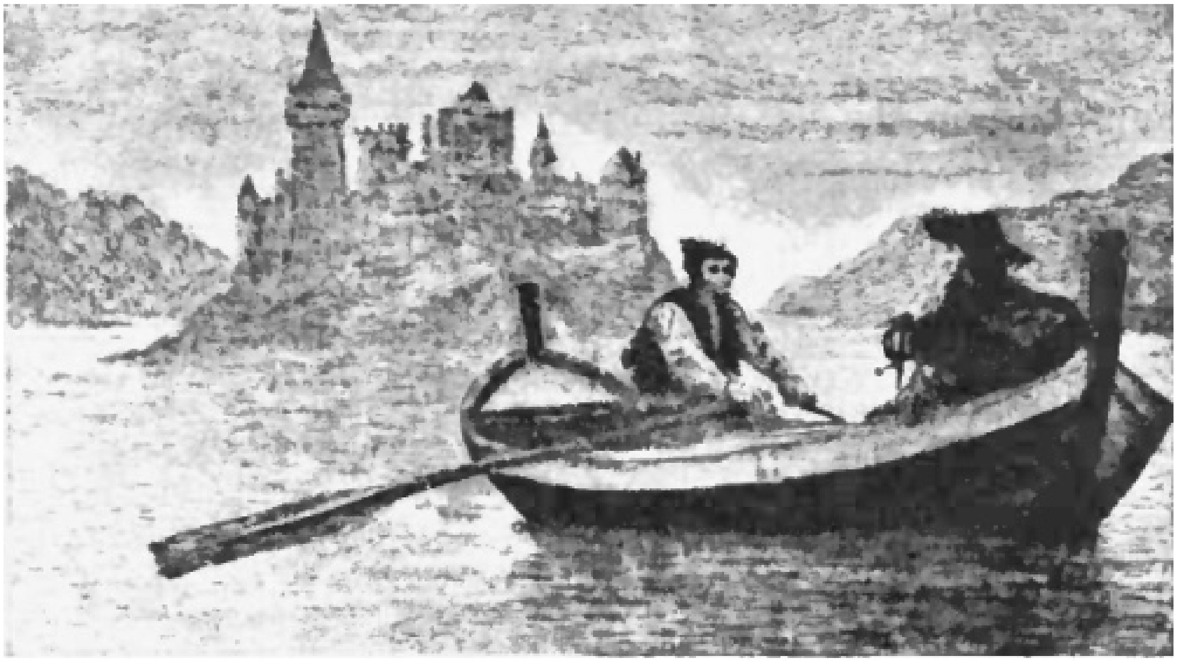
The young man left the room hurriedly.

“Get me a boat for Munkholm,” he said to his servant.

“But, the general, sir?”

“Take the horses to him. I will follow to-morrow. Am I my own master, or not? Come, night is falling, and I am in haste. A boat!”

The servant obeyed, and for some time stood watching his young master as he moved away from the shore.



A Boat was just lauding at the Foot of the Gate

CHAPTER II. MUNCKHOLM FORTRESS.

I will sit by you while you tell me some pleasant tale to pass away the time.
Maturin: Bertram.

The reader is already aware that we are at Throndhjem, one of the four chief cities in Norway, although not the residence of the viceroy. At the date of this story (1699) the kingdom of Norway was still united to Denmark, and governed by a viceroy whose seat was in Bergen, a larger, handsomer, and more southerly town than Throndhjem, in spite of the disagreeable nickname attached to it by the famous Admiral Tromp.

Throndhjem offers a pleasant prospect as you approach it by the fjord to which the city gives its name. The harbor is quite large, although it cannot be entered easily in all weathers. At this time it resembled nothing so much as a long canal, lined on the right bv Danish and Norwegian ships, and on the left by foreign vessels, as prescribed by law. lu the background lay the town, situated on a well cultivated plain, and crowned by the lofty spires of the cathedral. This church one of the finest pieces of Gothic architecture, as we may judge from Professor Shoenuing’s book, so learnedly quoted by Spiagudry, which describes it as it was before repeated fires had laid it waste bore upon its highest pinnacle the episcopal cross, the distinctive sign that it was the cathedral of the Lutheran bishop of Throndhjem. Beyond the town, in the blue distance, were the slender white peaks of the Kiölen Mountains, like the sharp-pointed ornaments on an antique crown.

In the middle of the harbor, within cannon-shot of the shore, upon a mass of rocks lashed by the waves, rose the lonely fortress of Munkholm, a gloomy prison which then held a prisoner celebrated for the splendor of his long prosperity and for his sudden disgrace.

Schumacker, born in an obscure station, was loaded with favors by his master, then hurled from the chair of the Lord High Chancellor of Denmark and Norway to the traitor’s bench, dragged to the scaffold, and thence by royal clemency cast into a lonely dungeon at the extreme end of the two kingdoms. His creatures had overthrown him, but gave him no right to inveigh against their ingratitude. How could he complain if the steps gave way beneath him, which he had built so high for his own aggrandizement only?

The founder of the Danish nobility, from the depth of his exile, saw the grandees whom he had created share his own dignities between them. Count d’Ahlefeld, his mortal enemy, succeeded him as chancellor; General Arensdorf, as earl-marshal, distributed military titles, and Bishop Spollyson took the position of inspector of universities. The only one of his foes who did not owe his rise to him was Count Ulric Frederic Guldenlew, natural son of King Frederic III., and now viceroy of Norway. He was the most generous of all.

Toward the sombre rock of Munkholm the boat of the youth with the black plume now slowly moved. The sun sank rapidly behind the lonely fortress, whose walls cut off its last beams, already so horizontal that the peasant on the distant eastern hills of Larsynn might see beside him on the heather the faint shadow of the sentinel keeping his watch on Munkholm’s highest tower.

CHAPTER III THE DANDY’S CONFESSIONS.

Ah! my heart could receive no more painful wound! . . . A young man destitute of morals. . . . He dared gaze at her! His glance soiled her purity. Claudia! The mere thought drives me mad.
Lessing.

Andrew, go and order them to ring the curfew bell in half an hour. Let Sorsyll relieve Duckness at the portcullis, and Malvidius keep watch on the platform of the great tower. Let a careful lookout be kept in the direction of the Lion of Schleswig donjon. Do not forget to fire the cannon at seven o’clock, as a signal to lift the harbor chain. But no, we must wait a little for Captain Dispolsen; better light the signals instead, and see if the Walderhog beacon is lighted, as I ordered to-day. Be sure to keep refreshments ready for the captain. And, I forgot, -give Toric-Belfast, the second musketeer of the regiment, two days’ arrest; he has been absent all day.”

So said the sergeant-at-arms beneath the black and smoky roof of the Munkholm guard-house, in the low tower over the outer castle gate.

The soldiers addressed left their cards or bed to carry out his orders; then silence was restored. At this moment the measured beat of oars was heard outside.

“That must be Captain Dispolsen at last! “ said the sergeant, opening the tiny grated window which looked out upon the gulf.

A boat was just landing at the foot of the iron gate.

“Who goes there? “ cried the sergeant in hoarse tones.

“Open! “ was the answer; “ peace and safety.”

“There is no admittance here. Have you a passport?”

“Yes.”

“I must make sure of that. If you lie, by the merits of my patron saint, you shall taste the waters of the gulf! “ Then, closing the lattice and turning away, he added: “ It is not the captain yet.”

A light shone behind the iron gate. The rusty bolts creaked, the grating rose, the gate opened, and the ser- geant examined a parchment handed him by the new- comer.

“Pass in,” said he. “ But stay,” he added hastily, “ leave your hat-buckle outside. No one is allowed to enter the prisons of the State wearing jewels. The order declares that ‘ the king and the members of the royal family, the viceroy and members of the vice-regal family, the bishop, and the officers of the garrison, are alone excepted.’ You come under none of these heads, do you?”

The young man, without reply, removed the forbidden ornament, and flung it to the fisherman who brought him thither, in payment of his services; the latter, fearing lest he might repent his generosity, made haste to put a broad expanse of sea between the benefactor and his benefit.

While the sergeant, grumbling at the chancellor’s imprudence in being so prodigal with his passes, replaced the clumsy bars, and while the lingering sound of his heavy boots still echoed on the stairs leading to the guard-house, the young man, throwing his mantle over his shoulder, hurriedly crossed the dark vault of the low tower, the long parade-ground, and the ordnance-room, where lay a few old dismantled culverins, still to be seen in the Copenhagen museum, all nearer approach to which was forbidden by the warning cry of a sentinel. He reached the great portcullis, which was raised on sight of his parchment. Thence, followed by a soldier, he crossed diagonally, without hesitation, and like one familiar with the place, one of the four square courts which skirt the great circular yard, in whose midst rose the huge round rock upon which stood the donjon, called the castle of the Lion of Schleswig, from the forced sojourn there of Jotham the Lion, Duke of Schleswig, held captive by his brother, Rolf the Dwarf.

It is not our purpose to give a description of Munkholm keep, the more so that the reader, confined in a State prison, might fear that he could not escape through the garden. He would be mistaken; for the castle of the Lion of Schleswig, meant for prisoners of distinction only, among other conveniences affords them the pleasure of a walk in a sort of wild garden of considerable extent, where clumps of holly, a few ancient yews, and some dark pines grow among the rocks around the lofty prison, inside an enclosure of thick walls and huge towers.

Reaching the foot of the round rock, the young man climbed the rude winding steps which lead to the foot of one of the towers of the enclosure, having a postern below, which served as the entrance to the keep. Here he blew a loud blast on a copper horn handed to him by the warder of the great portcullis. “ Come in, come in! “ eagerly exclaimed a voice from within; “ it must be that confounded captain! “

As the postern swung open, the new-comer saw, in a dimly lighted Gothic apartment, a young officer stretched carelessly upon a pile of cloaks and reindeer-skins, beside one of the three-beaked lamps which our ancestors used to hang from the rose-work of their ceilings, and which at this moment stood upon the ground. The elegance and indeed excessive luxury of his dress was in strong contrast with the bare walls and rude furniture; he held a book, and turned slightly toward the new-comer.

“Is it you, Captain? How are you, Captain? You little suspected that you were keeping a man waiting who has not the pleasure of your acquaintance; but our acquaintance will soon be made, will it not? Begin by receiving my commiseration upon your return to this venerable castle. Short as my stay here may be, I shall soon be about as gay as the owl nailed at donjon doors to serve as scarecrow, and when I return to Copenhagen, to my sister’s wedding feast, the deuce take me if four women out of a hundred will know me! Tell me, are the knots of pink ribbon at the hem of my doublet still in fashion? Has any one translated a new novel by that Frenchwoman, Mademoiselle Scudéry? I have ‘ Clelia; ‘ I suppose people are still reading it in Copenhagen. It is my code of gallantry, now that I am forced to sigh remote from so many bright eyes; for, bright as they are, the eyes of our young prisoner you know who I mean have never a message for me. Ah!

were it not for my father’s orders! . . . I must tell you in confidence, Captain, that my father, -but don’t mention it, charged me to you understand me Schumacker’s daughter. But I have my labor for my pains; that pretty statue is not a woman; she weeps all day long and never looks at me.”

The young man, unable thus far to interrupt the officer’s extreme volubility, uttered an exclamation of surprise: -

“What! What did you say? Charged you to seduce the daughter of that unfortunate Schumacker! “

“Seduce? Well, so be it, if that is the name you give it now in Copenhagen; but I defy the Devil himself to succeed. Day before yesterday, being on duty, I put on for her express benefit a superb French ruff sent direct from Paris. Would you believe that she never even raised her eyes to look at me, although I passed through her room three or four times clinking my new spurs, whose rowels are no bigger than a Lombardy ducat? That ‘s the newest fashion, isn’t it?”

“Heavens! Heavens!” said the young man, striking his forehead; “but this confounds me! “

“I thought it would!” rejoined the officer, mistaking the meaning of the remark. “ Not to take the least notice of me! It is incredible, and yet it is true.”

The young man strode up and down the room in violent excitement.

“Won’t you take some refreshment, Captain Dispolsen? “ cried the officer.

The young man started.

“I am not Captain Dispolsen.”

“What! “ said the officer angrily, sitting up as he spoke; “and pray who are you, then, that venture to introduce yourself here at this hour? “

The youug man displayed his papers.

“I wish to see Count Grittenfeld, -I would say, your prisoner.”

“The Count! the Count! “ muttered the officer in some displeasure. “ But, to be sure, this paper is in order; here is the signature of Vice-Chancellor Grummond de Knud:

‘ Admit the bearer to visit all the royal prisons at any hour and at any time.’ Grummond de Kuud is brother to old General Levin de Knud, who is in command at Throndhjem, and you must know that this old general had the bringing up of my future brother-in-law.”

“Thanks for these family details, Lieutenant. Don’t you think you have told me enough of them?”

“The impertinent fellow is right,” said the lieutenant, biting his lips. “ Hullo, there, officer, officer of the tower! Escort this stranger to Schumacker, and do not scold if I have taken down your lamp with three beaks and but one wick. I was curious to examine an article which is doubtless the work of Sciold the Pagan or Havar the giant-killer; and besides it is no longer the fashion to hang anything but crystal chandeliers from the ceiling.”

With these words, as the young man and his escort crossed the deserted donjon garden, the martyr to fashion resumed the thread of the love adventures of the Amazonian Clelia and Horatius the One-eyed.

CHAPTER IV MASTER AND MAN.

Benvolio, Where the devil should this Romeo be? Came he not home to-night?

Mercutio. Not to his father’s; I spoke with his man.

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.

A man and two horses entered the courtyard of the palace of the governor of Throndhjem. The horseman dismounted, shaking his head with a discontented air. He was about to lead the two animals to the stable, when his arm was seized, and a voice cried: “ How! You here alone, Poöl! And your master, -where is your master?”

It was old General Levin de Knud, who, seeing from his window the young man’s servant and the empty saddle, descended quickly, and fastened upon the groom a gaze which betrayed even more alarm than his question.

“Your Excellency,” said Poöl, with a low bow, “ my master has left Throndhjem.”

“What! has he been here, and gone again without seeing his general, without greeting his old friend! And how long since? “

“He arrived this evening and left this evening.”

“This evening, this very evening! But where did he stay? Where has he gone? “

“He stopped at the Spladgest, and has embarked for Munkholm.”

“Ah! I supposed he was at the antipodes. But what is his business at that castle? What took him to the Spladgest? Just like my knight-errant. After all, I am rather to blame, for why did I give him such a bringing up? I wanted him to be free in spite of his rank.”

“Therefore he is no slave to etiquette,” said Poöl.

“No; but he is to his own caprice. Well, he will doubtless return. Rest and refresh yourself, Poöl. Tell me,” and the general’s face took on an expression of solicitude, “tell me, Poöl, have you been doing much running up and down? “

“General, we came here direct from Bergen. My master was melancholy.”

“Melancholy! Why, what can have occurred between him and his father? Is he averse to this marriage? “

“I do not know. But they say that his Serene Highness insists upon it.”

“Insists! You say, Poöl, that the viceroy insists upon this match! But why should he insist unless Ordener refused? “

“I don’t know, your Excellency. He seems sad.”

“Sad! Do you know how his father received him? “

“The first time, it was at the camp, near Bergen. His Serene Highness said, ‘ I seldom see you, my son.’ ‘ So much the better for me, my lord and father,’ replied my master, ‘if you take note of it.’ Then he gave his Grace certain details about his travels in the North, and his Grace said: ‘ It is well.’ Next day my master came back from the palace and said: ‘They want me to marry; but I must consult my second father, General Levin.’ I saddled the horses, and here we are.”

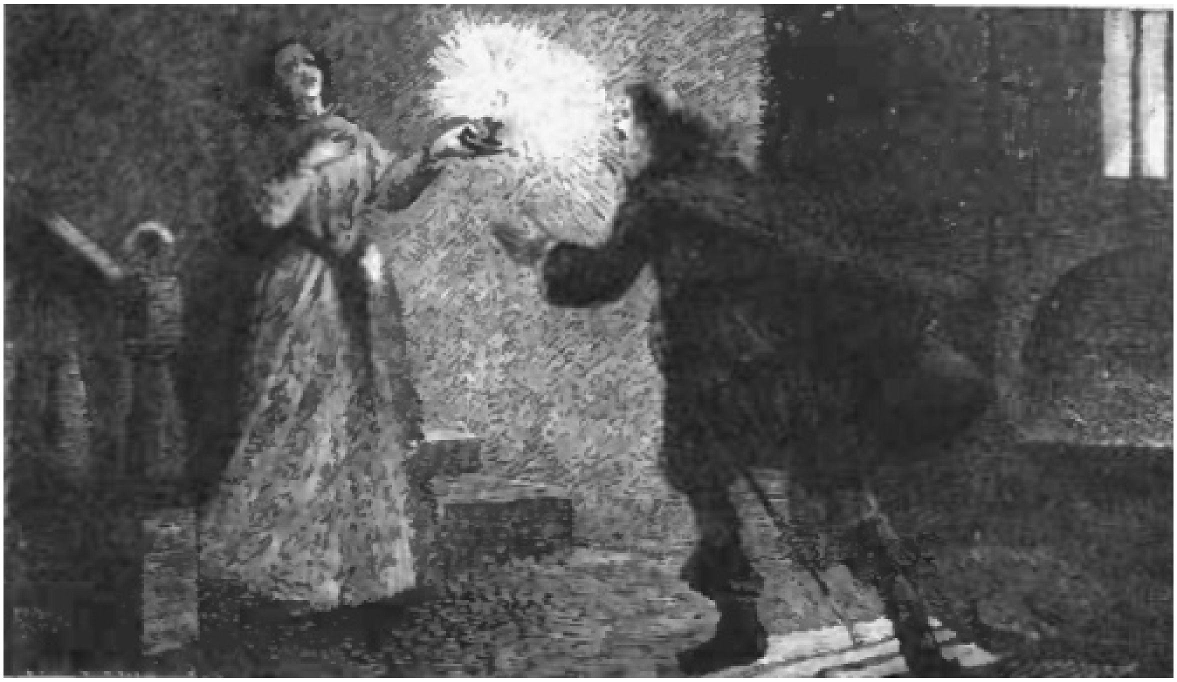
“Really, my good Poöl,” said the general, in trembling tones, “ did he really call me his second father? “

“Yes, your Excellency.”

“Woe to me if this marriage distresses him, for I will sooner incur the king’s displeasure than lend myself to it. And yet, the daughter of the Lord High Chancellor of both kingdoms By the way, Poöl, does Ordener know that his future mother-in-law, Countess d’Ahlefeld, has been here incognito since yesterday, and that the count is expected?”

“I don’t know, General.”

“Oh, yes,” thought the old governor, “ he knows it; for why else should he beat a retreat the instant that he arrived?” Upon this, the general, with a friendly wave of the hand to Poöl, and a salute to the sentinel who presented arms to him, returned in anxious mood to the quarters which he had left in anxious mood.



He vainly tried to grasp the Lamp

CHAPTER V THE BITTERNESS OP CAPTIVITY.

It seemed as if every emotion had stirred his heart, and had also deserted it; nothing remained but the mournful, piercing gaze of a man thoroughly familiar with men, who saw, at a glance, the aim and object of all things.-

Schiller: The Visions.

When, after leading the stranger along the winding stairs and lofty halls of the donjon of the Lion of Schleswig, the officer finally threw open the door of the room occupied by the man he sought, the first words that fell upon his ear were once more these: “ Has Captain Dispolsen come at last? “

The speaker was an old man, seated with his back to the door, his elbows on a writing-table, his head buried in his hands. He wore a black woollen gown, and above a bed at one end of the room hung a broken escutcheon, around which were grouped the broken collars of the orders of the Elephant and the Dannebrog; a count’s coronet, reversed, was fastened under the shield, and two fragments of a hand of Justice, tied crosswise, completed the strange ornamentation. The old man was Schumacker.

“No, my Lord,” replied the officer; then he said to the stranger, “This is the prisoner;” and leaving them together, he closed the door, without heeding the shrill voice of the old man, who exclaimed: “ If it is not the captain, I will see no one.”

At these words the stranger remained by the door; and the prisoner, thinking himself alone, for he had turned away, fell back into his silent revery. Suddenly he exclaimed: “ The captain has assuredly forsaken and betrayed me! Men, -men are like the icicle which an Arab took for a diamond; he hid it carefully in his wallet, and when he looked for it again he found not even a drop of water.”

“I am no such man,” said the stranger. Schumacker rose quickly. “ Who is here? “Who overhears me? Is it some miserable tool of that Guldenlew?”

“Speak no evil of the viceroy, my lord Count.”

“Lord Count! Do you address me thus to flatter me? You have your labor for your pains; I am powerful no longer.”

‘‘ He who speaks to you never knew you in your day of power, and is none the less your friend.”

"Because he still hopes to gain something from me; those memories of the unhappy which linger in the minds of men are to be measured by the hopes of future gain."

"I am the one who should complain, noble Count; for I remember you, and you have forgotten me, I am Ordener."

A flash of joy lit up the old man's sad eyes, and a smile which he could not repress parted his white beard, as when a sunbeam breaks through a cloud.

"Ordener! Welcome, traveller Ordener! A thousand prayers for the happiness of the traveller who remembers the prisoner! "

"But," inquired Ordener, " had you really forgotten me? "

"I had forgotten you," said Schumaker, resuming his sombre mood. " as we forget the breeze which refreshes us and passes by: we are fortunate if it does not become a whirlwind to destroy us."

"Count Griffenfeld." rejoined the young man, -did you not count upon my return? "

"Old Schumacker did not count upon it; but there is a maiden here, who reminded me this very day that it was a year on the 8th of last May, since you went away."

Ordener started.

"Heavens! Can it be your Ethel, noble Count? "

"Who else? "

"Your daughter, my Lord, has deigned to count the months of my absence! Oh, how many dreary days I have passed: I have traversed Norway from Christiania to Wardhus: but my journeying? always tended back toward Throndhjem."

"Use your freedom, young man. while you may. But tell me who you are. I would like, Ordener, to know you by some other name. The son of one of my mortal foes is called Ordener."

"Perhaps, my lord Count, this mortal foe feels greater kindness for you than you for him."

"You evade my question; but keep your secret. I might learn that the fruit which quenches my thirst is a poison which will destroy me."

"Count! " cried Ordener, angrily; " Count! " he repeated, in tones of pity and reproach.

"Why should I trust you," replied Schumacker, "you who to my very face defend the merciless Guldenlew? "

“The viceroy,” gravely interrupted the young man, “ has just ordered that for the future you shall be free and unguarded within the entire precinct of the Lion of Schleswig keep. This news I learned at Bergen, and you will doubtless soon hear it from headquarters.”

“This is a favor for which I dared not hope, and I thought you were the only person to whom I had mentioned my wish. So they lessen the weight of my chains as that of my years increases; and when old age renders me helpless, they will probably tell me, ‘ You are free.’ “

So saying, the old man smiled bitterly, and added: “And you, young man, do you still cling to your foolish ideas of independence?”

“If I had not those same foolish ideas, I should not be here.”

“How did you come to Trondhjem?”

“Why, on horseback.”

“How did you reach Munkholm? “

“By boat.”

“Poor fool! You think yourself free, and yet you only leave a horse for a boat. It is not your own limbs that carry out your wishes; it is a brute beast, it is material matter; and you call that free will! “

“I force animate beings to obey me.”

“To assume a right to the obedience of certain beings is to give others a right to command you. Independence exists only in isolation.”

“You do not love mankind, noble Count? “

The old man laughed sadly. “ I weep that I am a man, and I laugh at him who would console me. You will yet learn, if you do not already know, that misfortune creates suspicion as prosperity does ingratitude. Tell me, since you come from Bergen, what favoring winds blow upon Captain Dispolsen. Some good fortune must have befallen him, that he forgets me.”

Ordener looked grave and embarrassed.

“Dispolsen, my lord Count? I come here to-day to talk to you of him. I know that he possessed your entire confidence.”

“You know? “ broke in the prisoner, uneasily. “ You are mistaken. No one on earth has my confidence. Dispolsen has, it is true, my papers, and very important papers too. He went to Copenhagen, to the king, for me. I may even confess that I reckoned more surely upon him than upon any one else, for in the days of my prosperity I never did him a service.”

“Well, noble Count, I saw him to-day “

‘‘ Your distress tells me the rest; he is a traitor.”

“He is dead.”

“Dead! “

The prisoner folded his arms and bent his head, then looking up at the young man, said: “ I told you some good fortune must have befallen him! “

His eye turned to the wall, where the signs of his former grandeur hung, and he waved his hand, as if to dismiss the witness of a grief which he strove to conquer.

“I do not pity him; ‘t is but one man the less. Nor do I pity myself; what have I to lose? But my daughter, my unfortunate daughter! I shall be the victim of this infernal plot; and what is to become of her, if her father is taken from her? “

He turned quickly to Ordener. “ How did he die? Where did you see him? “

“I saw him at the Spladgest. No one knows whether he died by suicide or by the hand of an assassin.”

“That is now all-important. If he was murdered, I know who dealt the blow. Then all is lost. He bore proof’s of the conspiracy against me. Those proofs might have saved me and ruined them! Unhappy Ethel! “

“My lord Count,” said Ordener, bowing, “ to-morrow I will tell you whether he was murdered.”

Schumacker, without answering, cast on Ordener, as he left the room, a look of quiet despair more terrible than the calm of death.

Ordener found himself in the prisoner’s empty antechamber, not knowing which way to turn. Night was far advanced and the room was dark. He opened a door at haphazard and entered a vast corridor lighted only by the moon, which moved rapidly through pale clouds. Its misty beams fell now and again upon the long, narrow glass windows, and painted on the opposite wall what seemed a procession of ghosts, appearing and disappearing simultaneously in the depths of the passage. The young man slowly crossed himself, and walked toward a light which shone faintly at the end of the corridor.

A door stood ajar; a young girl knelt in a Gothic oratory, at the foot of a bare altar, reciting in low tones litanies to the Virgin, simple and sublime aspirations, in which the soul that rises toward the Mother of Seven Sorrows asks nothing but her prayers.

The young girl was dressed in black crape and white gauze, as if to show at a glance that her days had hitherto been passed in grief and innocence.

Even in this modest attitude she bore the impress of a strange nature. Her eyes and her long hair were black (a very rare beauty in the North); her eyes, raised to heaven, seemed kindled with rapture rather than dimmed by meditation. She seemed a virgin from the shores of Cyprus or the banks of the Tiber, clad in the fauciful disguise of one of Ossian's characters and prostrate before the wooden cross and stone altar of Christ Jesus.

Ordener started and almost fell, for he recognized the devotee.

She was praying for her father, for the mighty who had fallen, for the old and desolate prisoner; and she recited aloud the psalm of the deliverance out of Egypt. She prayed for another as well, but Ordener did not hear his name. He did not hear it, for she did not utter it; she merely recited the canticle of the Sulamite, the bride who awaits her bridegroom and the return of her beloved.

Ordener stepped back into the gallery; he respected the maiden holding converse with the sky. Prayer is a great mystery, and his heart was involuntarily filled with unknown but profane ecstasy.

The door of the oratory was gently closed. Soon a light borne by a white figure moved toward him through the darkness. He stood still, for he felt one of the strongest emotions of his life; he leaned against the gloomy wall; his body was weak, and his limbs trembled beneath him. In the silence of his entire being the beating of his heart was plainly audible to his own ear.

As the young girl passed, she heard the rustle of a garment, and a quick, sudden gasp, and cried out in terror.

Ordener rushed forward. With one arm he supported her, with the other he vainly tried to grasp the lamp which she had dropped, and which went out.

"It is I," he said softly.

"It is Ordener! " said the girl; for the last echo of that voice, which she had not heard for a year, still rang in her ear.

And the moon, passing by, revealed the joy of her fair face. Then she repeated, in timid confusion, freeing herself from the young man's arms, " It is my lord Ordener."

"Himself, Countess Ethel."

"Why do you call me countess? "

"Why do you call me my lord? "

The young girl smiled, and was silent. The young man was silent, and sighed. She was first to break the silence.

“How came you here? “

“Pardon me, if my presence disturbs you. I came to see the count, your father.”

“Then,” said Ethel, in a changed tone, “ you only came for my father’s sake.”

The young man bent his head, for these words seemed to him unjust.

“I suppose you have been in Throndhjem a long time,” she continued reproachfully, “ I suppose you have been here a long time already? Your absence from this castle cannot have seemed long to you.”

Ordener, deeply wounded, made no reply.

“You are right,” said the prisoner, in a voice which trembled with anger and distress; “ but,” she added, in a haughty tone, “ I hope, my lord Ordener, that you did not overhear my prayers? “

“Countess,” reluctantly replied the young man, “I did hear you.”

“Ah! my lord Ordener, it was far from courteous to listen.”

“I did not listen, noble Countess,” said Ordener in a low voice; “ I overheard you accidentally.”

“I prayed for my father,” rejoined the girl, looking steadily at him, as if expecting an answer to this very simple statement.

Ordener was silent.

“I also prayed,” she continued uneasily, and apparently anxious as to the effect which her words might produce upon him, “ I also prayed for some one who bears your name, for the son of the viceroy, Count Guldenlew. For we should pray for every one, even our persecutors.”

And she blushed, for she thought she was lying; but she was offended with the young man, and she fancied that she had mentioned him in her prayer; she had only named him in her heart.

“Ordener Guldenlew is very unfortunate, noble lady, if you reckon him among the number of your persecutors; and yet he is very fortunate to possess a place in your prayers.”

“Oh, no,” said Ethel, troubled and alarmed by his cold manner, “ no, I did not pray for him. I do not know what I did, nor what I do. As for the viceroy’s son, I detest him; I do not know him. Do not look at me so sternly; have I offended you? Can you not forgive a poor prisoner, you who spend your days in the society of some fair and noble lady, free and happy like yourself? “

“I, Countess! “ exclaimed Ordener.

Ethel burst into tears; the young man flung himself at her feet.

“Did you not tell me,” she continued, smiling through her tears, “that your absence seemed to you short?”

“Who, I, Countess ‘?”

“Do not call me countess,” said she, gently; “ I am no longer a countess to any one, and far less to you.”

The young man sprang up, and could not help clasping her to his heart in convulsive delight.

“Oh, my adored Ethel, call me your own Ordener! Tell me,” -and his ardent glances rested on her eyes wet with tears,- “ tell me, do you love me still? “

The young girl’s answer went unheard, for Ordener, carried away by his emotions, snatched from her lips with her reply that first favor, that sacred kiss, which in the sight of God suffices to make two lovers man and wife.

Both were speechless, because the moment was one of those solemn ones, so rare and so brief in this world, when the soul seems to feel something of celestial bliss. These instants when two souls thus converse in a language understood by no other are not to be described; then all that is human is hushed, and the two immaterial beings become mysteriously united for life in this world and eternity in the next.

Ethel slowly withdrew from Ordener’s arms, and by the light of the moon each gazed into the other’s face with ecstasy; only, the young man’s eye of fire flashed with masculine pride and leonine courage, while the maiden’s downcast face was marked by that modesty and angelic shame which in a virgin beauty are always blended with all the joys of love.

“Were you trying to avoid me just now,” she said at last, “ here in this corridor, my Ordener? “

“Not to avoid you. I was like the unfortunate blind man who is restored to sight after the lapse of long years, and who turns away from the light’s first radiance.”

“Your comparison is more applicable to me, for during your absence my only pleasure has been the presence of a wretched man, my father. I spent my weary days in trying to comfort him, and,” she added, looking down, “ in hoping for your coming. I read the fables of the Edda to my father, and when he doubted all men, I read him the Gospel, that at least he might not doubt Heaven; then I talked to him of you, and he was silent, which shows that he loves you. But when I had spent my evenings in vainly watching the arrival of travellers by various roads. and the ships which anchored in the harbor, he shook his head with a bitter smile, and I wept. This prison, where my whole past life has been spent, grew hateful to me; and yet my father, who until you came was all-sufficient for my wants, was still here; but you were not here, and I longed for that liberty which I had never known.”

There was a charm which no tongue can express, in the maiden’s eyes, in the simplicity of her love, and the sweet hesitation of her confession. Ordener listened with the dreamy delight of a being who has been removed from the world of reality to enjoy an ideal world.

“And I,” said he, “ no longer desire that liberty which you do not share! “

“What, Ordener! “ quickly exclaimed Ethel, “ will you leave us no more?”

These words recalled the young man to all that he had forgotten.

‘‘My Ethel, I must leave you this very night. I will see you again to-morrow, and to-morrow I must leave you again, to remain until I may return never more to leave you.”

“Alas’” mournfully broke in the girl, “must you leave rne again? “

“I repeat, my beloved Ethel, that I will come back soon to wrest you from this prison or bury myself in it with you.”

“A prisoner with him!” she said softly. “Ah! do not deceive me. Must I only hope for such happiness? “

“What oath do you require? What would you have me do? “ cried Ordener; “ tell me, Ethel, are you not my wife? “ And in a transport of affection he pressed her to his heart.

“I am yours,” she whispered.

The two pure and noble hearts throbbed rapturously together, and were but purer and nobler for the embrace.

At this moment a violent burst of laughter was heard close by. A man wrapped in a cloak opened a dark lantern which he had concealed, and the light suddenly revealed Ethel’s alarmed, confused face and Ordener’s proud but astonished features.

“Courage, my pretty pair! Courage! It strikes me that after so short a walk in the regions of Romance you can scarcely have followed all the windings of the stream of Sentiment, but that you must have taken a short-cut to reach the village of Kisses so quickly.”

Our readers have doubtless recognized the lieutenant, who so cordially admired Mademoiselle de Scudéry. Roused from his reading of “ Clelia “ by the midnight bell, which the two lovers had failed to hear, he started on his nightly rounds. As he passed the end of the eastern corridor, he caught a few words, and saw what seemed two ghosts moving in the gallery by the light of the moon. Being naturally bold and curious, he hid his lantern under his cloak, and advanced on tiptoe to the two phantoms, so disagreeably awakened from their ecstasy by his sudden burst of laughter.

Ethel made a movement to escape from Ordener; then, returning to his side as if instinctively, and to ask his protection, she hid her burning blushes on her lover's breast,

He raised his head with all the dignity of a king.

"Woe," said he, " woe to him who has frightened and distressed you, Ethel! "

"Yes, indeed," said the lieutenant; "woe befall me if I am so unfortunate as to alarm so sensitive a lady! "

"Sir Lieutenant," haughtily exclaimed Ordener, " I command you to be silent! "

"Sir Insolent," replied the officer, " I command you to be silent! "

"Do you hear me? " returned Ordener in tones of thunder. " -Buy pardon by your silence."

"Tibi tua," responded the lieutenant; " take your own advice, buy pardon by your silence! "

"Silence! " cried Ordener in a voice which made the windows shake; and seating the trembling girl in one of the old arm-chairs in the corridor, he grasped the officer rudely by the arm.

"Oh, clown! " said the lieutenant, half laughing, half angry; " don't you see that the doublet which you are so mercilessly crushing is made of the finest Abingdon velvet? "

Ordener looked him full in the face.

"Lieutenant, my patience is not so long as my sword."

"I understand you, my fine fellow," said the lieutenant, with a sardonic smile. " You want me to do you the honor to fight with you. But do you know who I am? No, no, if you please! ' Prince with prince; clown with clown,' as the fair Leander has it."

"If he had added, ' Coward with coward,' " Ordener replied, " I should assuredly never have the distinguished honor of measuring weapons with you."

“I would not hesitate, most worthy shepherd, if you did but wear a uniform.”

“I have neither lace nor fringes, Lieutenant; but I wear a sword.” The proud youth, flinging back his cloak, set his cap firmly on his head and grasped his sword-hilt, when Ethel, roused by such imminent danger, seized his arm and clasped his neck, with an exclamation of terror and entreaty.

“You are wise, my pretty mistress, if you do not want your young coxcomb punished for his temerity,” said the lieutenant, who at Ordener’s threats had put himself upon his guard without any show of emotion; “ for Cyrus was about to quarrel with Cambyses, if it be not too great an honor to compare this rustic to Cambyses.”

“For Heaven’s sake, Lord Ordener,” said Ethel, “ do not make me the cause and witness of such a misfortune! “ Then lifting her lovely eyes to his, she added, “ Ordener, I implore you! “

Ordener slowly replaced his half-drawn blade in its scabbard, and the lieutenant exclaimed,

“By my faith, Sir Knight, I do not know whether you be a knight, but I give you the title because you seem to deserve it, let us act according to the laws of valor, if not of gallantry. The lady is right. Engagements like that which I believe you worthy to enter upon with me should not be witnessed by ladies, although begging this charming damsel’s pardon they may be caused by them. We can therefore only properly discuss the duellum remotum here and now, and as the offended party if you will fix the time, place, and weapons, my fine Toledo blade or my Merida dagger shall be at the service of your chopping-knife from the Ashkreuth forges or your hunting-knife tempered in Lake Sparbo.”

The “ duel adjourned,” which the officer suggested was usual in the North, where scholars aver that the custom of duelling originated. The most valiant gentlemen offered and accepted a ducllum rcmotum. It was sometimes deferred for several months, or even years, and during that space of time the foes must not allude by word or deed to the matter which caused the challenge. Thus in love both rivals forbore to see their sweetheart, so that things might remain unchanged. All confidence was put in the loyalty of a knight upon such a point; as in the ancient tournament, if the judges, deeming the laws of courtesy violated, cast their truncheon into the arena, instantly every combatant stayed his hand; but until the doubt was cleared up, the throat of the conquered man must remain at the selfsame distance from his victor’s sword.

“Very well, Chevalier,” replied Ordener, after a brief reflection; “ a messenger shall inform you of the place.”

“Good! “ answered the lieutenant; “ so much the bet- ter. That will give me time to go to my sister’s wedding; for you must know that you are to have the honor of fighting with the future brother-in-law of a great lord, the son of the viceroy of Norway, Baron Ordener Guldenlew, who upon the occasion of this ‘ auspicious union,’ as Artamenes has it, will be made Count Daneskiold, a colonel, and a knight of the Order of the Elephant; and I myself, who am a son of the lord high chancellor of both kingdoms, shall undoubtedly be made a captain.”

“Very good, very good, Lieutenant d’Ahlefeld,” impatiently exclaimed Ordener, “ you are not a captain yet, nor is the son of the viceroy a colonel; and swords are always swords.”

“And clowns always clowns, in spite of every effort to lift them to our own level,” muttered the soldier.

“Chevalier,” added Ordener, “you know the laws of duelling. You are not to enter this donjon again, and you are not to speak of this affair.”

“Trust me to be silent; I shall be as dumb as Mutius Scævola when he held his hand on the burning coals. I will not enter the donjon again, nor permit any Argus of the garrison to do so; for I have just received orders to allow Schumacker to go unguarded in future, which order I was directed to convey to him to-night, as I should have done had I not spent most of the evening in trying on some new boots from Cracow. The order, between you and me, is a very rash one. Would you like to have me show you my boots? “

During this conversation Ethel, seeing that their anger was appeased, and not knowing the meaning of a duellum remotum, had disappeared, first softly whispering in Ordener’s ear, “ To-morrow.”

“I wish, Lieutenant d’Ahlefeld, that you would help me out of the fortress.”

“Gladly,” said the officer, “ although it is somewhat late, or rather very early. But how will you find a boat? “

“That is my affair,” said Ordener.

Then, chatting pleasantly, they crossed the garden, the circular courtyard, and the square court, Ordener escorted by the officer of the guard, meeting with no obstacle; they passed through the great gate, the ordnance-room, the parade-ground, and reached the low tower, whose iron doors opened at the lieutenant’s order.

“Good-by, Lieutenant d’Ahlefeld,” said Ordener.

“Good-by,” replied the officer. “ I declare that you are a brave champion, although I do not know who you are or whether those of your peers whom you may bring to our meeting will be entitled to assume the position of seconds, and ought not rather confine themselves to the modest part of witnesses.”

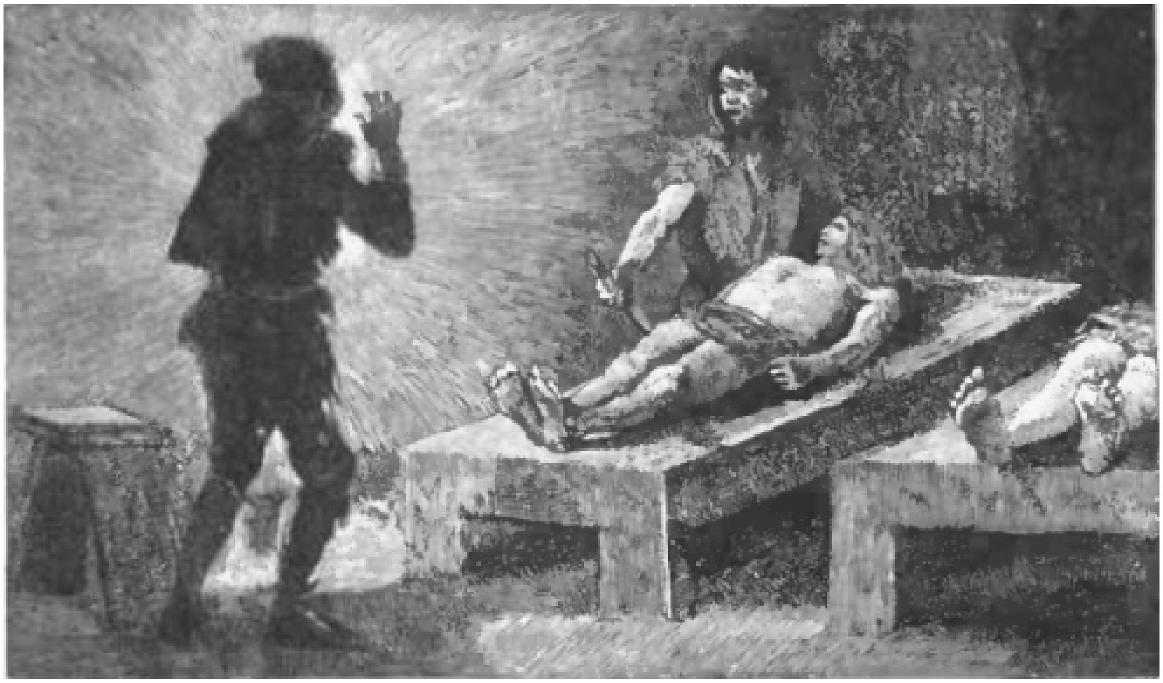
They shook hands, the iron grating was closed, and the lieutenant went back, humming an air by Lully, to enjoy his Polish boots and French novel.

Ordener, left alone upon the threshold, took off his clothes, which he wrapped in his cloak and fastened upon his head with his sword-belt; then, putting into practice Schumacker’s principles of independence, he sprang into the still, cold waters of the fjord, and swam through the darkness towards the shore, in the direction of the Spladgest, a point which he was almost sure to reach, dead or alive.

The fatigues of the day had exhausted him, so that it was only with great difficulty that he landed. He dressed himself hastily, and walked towards the Spladgest, which reared its black bulk before him, the moon having been for some time completely veiled.

As he approached the building he heard the sound of voices; a faint light shone from the opening in the roof. Amazed, he knocked loudly at the square door. The noise ceased; the light disappeared. He knocked again. The light reappeared, and he saw a black figure climb out of the hole in the roof and vanish. Ordener knocked for the third time with the hilt of his sword, and shouted: “ Open, in the name of his Majesty the King! Open, in the name of his Serene Highness the Viceroy! “

The door opened slowly, and Ordener found himself face to face with the pale features and tall, thin figure of Spiagudry, who, his clothes in disorder, his eyes fixed, his hair standing erect, his hands covered with blood, held a lamp, whose flame trembled less visibly than his long and lanky figure.



His Lamp lit up a strange and hideous Scene

CHAPTER VI GOLD IS OFTEN BOUGHT TOO DEARLY.

Pirro. Never!
Angelo. What! I believe you would try to play the virtuous man. Wretch! If you utter a single word -
Pirro. But, Angelo, I beseech you, for the love of God-
Angelo. Do not meddle with what you cannot prevent.
Pirro. Ah! When the Devil holds one by a single hair, as well yield him the entire head. Unhappy that I am!
Emilia Galotti.

An hour after the young traveller with the black plume left the Spladgest, night fell, and the crowd dispersed. Oglypiglap closed the outer door of the funereal structure, while his master, Spiagudry, gave the bodies deposited within a final sprinkling. Then both withdrew to their scantily furnished abode, and while Oglypiglap slept upon his wretched pallet, like one of the corpses intrusted to his care, the venerable Spiagudry, seated at a stone table covered with old books, dried plants, and fleshless bones, was buried in grave studies which, although really very harmless, had done no little to give him a reputation among the people, for sorcery and witchcraft, the disagreeable consequence of science at this period.

He had been absorbed in his meditations for some hours, and, ready at last to exchange his books for his bed, he paused at this mournful passage from Thormodr Torfesen:

“When a man lights his lamp, death is beside him ere it be extinguished.”

“With the learned doctor’s leave,” he muttered, “ he shall not be beside me to-night.”

And he took up his lamp to blow it out.

“Spiagudry!” cried a voice from the room where the corpses lay. The old man shook from head to foot. Not that he believed, as another might have done in his place, that the gloomy guests of the Spladgest had risen in revolt against their master. He was enough of a scholar to be proof against such imaginary terrors; and his alarm was genuine, because he knew the voice which called him only too well.

“Spiagudry! “ angrily repeated the voice, “ must I come and pull off your ears before I can make you hear me?”

“Saint Hospitius have mercy, not on my soul, but on my body! “ said the terrified old man; and with a step both hastened and delayed by fear, he moved towards the second side door, which he opened. Our readers have not forgotten that this door led into the mortuary.

His lamp lit up a strange aud hideous scene, on the one hand, the thin, tall, stooping figure of Spiagudry; on the other, a short, stout man, dressed from head to foot in the skins of wild beasts, still stained with dried blood, standing at the feet of Gill Stadt’s corpse, which, with the dead bodies of the young girl and the captain, occupied the background. These three mute witnesses, buried in shadow, were the only ones who could behold, without Flying in horror, the two living beings who now entered into conversation.

The features of the little man, thrown into vivid relief by the light, were singularly wild and fierce. His beard was red and bushy, and his forehead, hidden under an elkskin cap, seemed bristling with hair of the same color; his mouth was large, his lips thick, his teeth white, sharp, and far apart, his nose hooked like an eagle’s beak; and his grayish-blue eyes, which were extremely quick, flashed a side glance at Spiagudry, in which the ferocity of a tiger was only tempered by the malice of a monkey. This singular character was armed with a broadsword, an unsheathed dagger, and a stone axe, upon whose long handle he leaned; his hands were covered with thick gloves made of a blue fox-skin.

“That old ghost keeps me waiting a long time,” said he, as if talking to himself; and he uttered a sound like the roar of a wild beast.

Spiagudry would certainly have turned pale with fright, had he been capable of turning paler than he was. “ Do you know,” continued the little man, addressing him directly, “ that I come from Urchtal Sands? Do you want to change your straw bed for one of these beds of stone, that you keep me waiting thus? “

Spiagudry trembled more than ever; the two solitary teeth left to him chattered in his head.

“Excuse me, master,” said he, bending his long back to a level with the little man; “ I was asleep.”

“Do you want me to make you acquainted with a far sounder sleep than that? “

Spiagudry’s face assumed an expression of terror, the only thing which could be more comic than his expression of mirth.

“Well! what is it? “ continued the little man. “ What ails you? Is my presence disagreeable to you? “

“Oh, my lord and master! “ replied the old keeper, “ there can surely be no greater happiness for me than to see your Excellence.”

And the effort which he made to twist his frightened face into a smile would have unbent the brow of any but the dead.

“Tailless old fox, my Excellence commands you to hand over the clothes of Gill Stadt.”

As he uttered this name, the little man’s fierce, mocking features grew dark and sad.

“Oh, master, pardon me, but I no longer have them! “ said Spiagudry. “ Your Grace knows that we are obliged to turn over the property of all workers in the mine to the Crown, the king inheriting by right of their being his wards.”

The little man turned to the corpse, folded his arms, and said in a hollow voice: “ He is right. These miserable miners are like the eider duck; their nests are made for them, but their down is plucked from them.”

Then raising the corpse in his arms and hugging it to his heart, he began to utter wild yells of love and grief, like the howls of a bear caressing her young. With these inarticulate sounds were blended, at intervals, a few words in a strange lingo, which Spiagudry did not understand.

He let the corpse drop back upon the stone, and turned towards the guardian.

“Do you know, accursed sorcerer, the name of the illfated soldier who was so unlucky as to be preferred by that girl to Gill? “

And he kicked the cold remains of Guth Stersen.

Spiagudry shook his head.

“Well .’ by the axe of Ingulf, the first of my race, I will exterminate every wearer of that uniform! “ and he pointed to the officer’s dress. “ He on whom I must be avenged will surely be of the number. I will burn down the entire forest to consume the poisonous shrub that it contains. I swore it on the day that Gill died, and I have already given him a companion that will delight his corpse. Oh, Gill! so there you lie, lifeless and powerless, you who outswam the seal, outran the deer; you who outwrestled the bear in the mountains of Kiölen. There you lie motionless, you who traversed the province of Throndhjem, from the Orkel to the Lake of Miösen, in a single day; you who climbed the peaks of the Dovrefjeld as the squirrel climbs the oak. There you lie mute and dumb, Gill, -you who on the stormy summits of Kongsberg sang louder thau the thunder's roar. Oh, Gill! so it is in vain that for your sake I filled up the Färöe mines; in vain for your sake I burned the Throndhjem cathedral. All my labor is in vain, and I shall never see the race of the children of Iceland, the descendants of Ingulf the Destroyer, perpetuated in you; you will never inherit my stone axe; but you leave me the legacy of your skull, from which I may henceforth drink sea-water and the blood of men."

With these words he seized the corpse by the head, exclaiming: " Help me, Spiagudry! " And pulling off his gloves, he displayed his broad hands, armed with long, hard, crooked nails, like the claws of a wild beast.

Spiagudry, seeing him about to hew off the corpse's head with his sword, cried out with unconcealed horror, " Good heavens! master! A dead man! "

"Well," calmly responded the little man, " would you rather have me sharpen my blade upon a living one? "

"Oh, let me entreat your Grace- How can your Excellency commit such profanation? Your Worship- Sir, your Serenity would not-"

"Are you done? Do I require all these titles, living skeleton, to believe in your deep respect for my sabre? "

"By Saint Waldemar! By Saint Usuph! In the name of Saint Hospitius, spare the dead! "

"Help me, and do not talk of saints to the devil! "

"My lord," continued the suppliant Spiagudry, " by your illustrious ancestor, Saint Ingulf

"Ingulf the Destroyer was an outlaw like myself."

"In the name of Heaven," said the old man, falling on his knees, " whose anger I would spare you! "

Impatience overcame the little man. His dull gray eyes Flashed like a couple of live coals.

"Help me! " he repeated, flourishing his sword.

These words were uttered in the voice which might beseem a lion, could he speak. The keeper, shuddering and half dead with fright, sat down upon the black stone slab, and held Gill's cold, damp head in his hands, while the little man, by means of sword and dagger, removed the crown with rare skill.

When his task was done, he gazed at the bloody skull for some time, muttering strange words; then he handed it over to Spiagudry, to be cleaned and prepared, saying with a sort of howl,

“And I, when I die, shall not have the comfort of thinking that an heir to the soul of Ingulf will drink sea-water and the blood of men from out my skull.”

After a mournful pause, he added,

“The hurricane is followed by a hurricane, each avalanche brings down another avalanche, but I shall be the last of my race. Why did not Gill hate every human face even as I do? What demon foe to the demon of Ingulf urged him into those fatal mines in search of a handful of gold? “

Spiagudry, who now returned with Gill’s skull, interrupted him: “ Your Excellency is right; even gold, as Snorri Sturleson says, may often be bought at too high a price.”

“You remind me,” said the little man, “ of a commission I have for you; here is an iron casket which I found upon yonder officer, all of whose property, as you see, did not fall into your possession; it is so firmly fastened, that it must contain gold, the only thing precious in the eyes of men. You will give it to widow Stadt, in Thoctree village, to pay her for her son.”

He drew a small iron box from his reindeer-skin knapsack. Spiagudry received it with a low bow.

“Obey my orders faithfully,” said the little man, with a piercing glance; “ remember that nothing can prevent two demons from meeting; I think you are even more of a coward than a miser, and you will answer to me for that box.”

“Oh, master, with my soul! “

“Not at all. With your flesh and bones.”

At this moment the outer door of the Spladgest echoed with a loud knock. The little man was amazed; Spiagudry tottered, and shaded his lamp with his hand.

“Who is there? “ growled the little man. “ And you, old villain, how you will shake when you hear the last trump sound, if you shiver so now! “

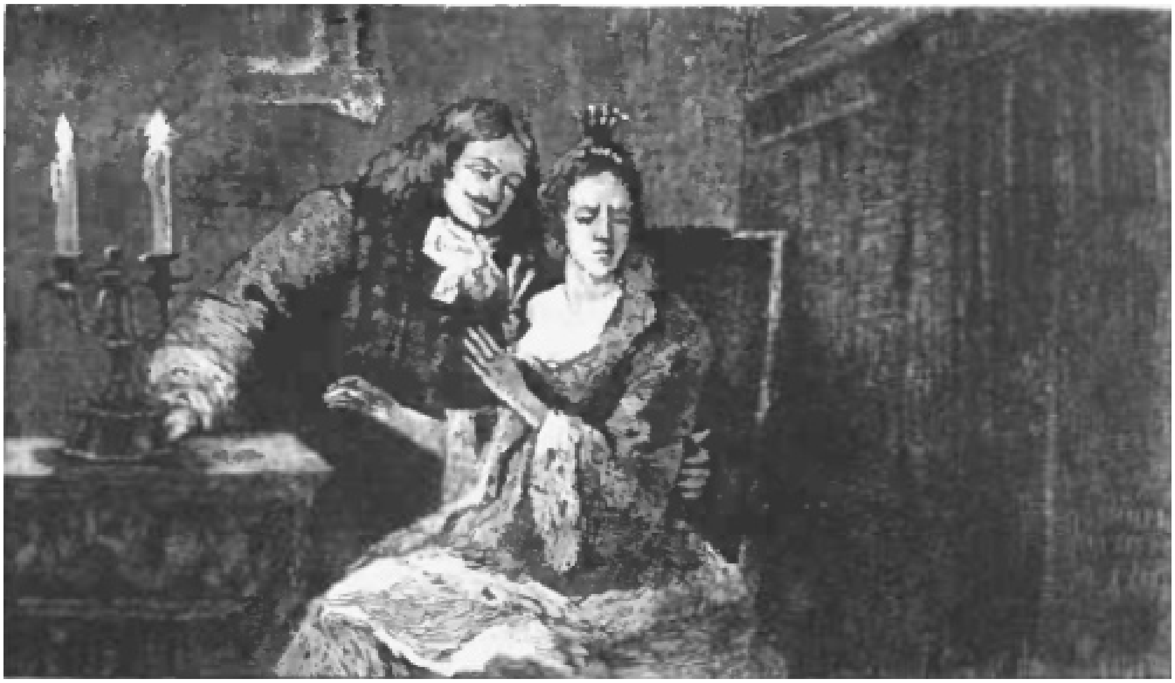
A second and louder knock was heard.

“It is some dead man in haste to enter,” said the little man.

“No, master,” muttered Spiagudry, “ no corpses are brought here after midnight.”

“Living or dead, he drives me hence. You, Spiagudry, be faithful and be dumb. I swear to you, by the spirit of Ingulf and the skull of Gill, that you shall see the dead bodies of the entire regiment of Muukholm pass through your hostelry in review.”

And the little man, binding Gill’s skull to his belt, and drawing on his gloves, hurried, with the nimbleness of a goat, and by the help of Spiagudry’s shoulders, through the opening in the roof, where he vanished. A third knock shook the whole Spladgest, and a voice outside commanded him to open in the name of the king and viceroy. Then the keeper, moved alike by two different terrors, one of which might be called the terror of memory, and the other of hope, hurried toward the low door, and opened it.



The noble Lady, Countess d’Ahlefeld

CHAPTER VII CHECKMATED.

In the pursuit of such pleasure as may be found in temporal felicity, she wore herself out, on rough and painful paths, without ever attaining her object.

Confessions of Saint Augustine.

Returning to his closet after leaving Poël, the governor of Throndhjem ensconced himself in a big easy-chair, and to distract his thoughts directed one of his secretaries to read over the petitions presented to the government.

Bowing low, the secretary began:

“1. The Rev. Dr. Anglyvius prays that a substitute may be provided for the Rev. Dr. Foxtipp, the head of the Episcopal library, on account of his incompetency. The petitioner does not know who should take the place of the said incompetent doctor; he would merely state that he, Dr. Anglyvius, has for a long time exercised the functions of librari -”

“Send the rascal to the bishop,” interrupted the general.

“2. Athanasius M under, priest and chaplain to the prisons, asks pardon for twelve penitent convicts on the occasion of the glorious marriage of his Grace, Ordener Guldenlew, Baron Thorwick, Knight of the Dannebrog, son of the viceroy, and the noble lady Ulrica d’Ahlefeld, daughter of his Grace the lord high chancellor of the two kingdoms.”

“Lay it on the table,” said the general. “ I pity convicts.”

“3. Faustus-Prudens Destrombidès, Norwegian subject and Latin poet, asks leave to write the epithalamium for the said noble pair.”

“Ah, ha! The worthy man must be growing old, for he is the same man who wrote an epithalamium in 1074, for the marriage planned between Schumacker, then Count of Griffenfeld, and Princess Louisa Charlotte of Holstein-Augustenburg.- a marriage which never took place. I fear,” muttered the governor,- “ that Faustus-Prudens is destined to be the poet of broken matches. Lay his petition on the table, and go on. Inquire, on behalf of the said poet, if there be not a vacant bed at the Throndhjem hospital.”

“4. The miners of Guldbrandsdal, the Färöe Islands, Sund-Moer, Hubfallo, Roeraas, and Kongsberg, petition to be released from the costs of the royal protectorate.”

“These miners are restless. I hear that they are even beginning to grumble at our long delay in answering their petition. Let it be laid aside for mature consideration.”

“5. Braal, fisherman, declares, in virtue of the Odelsrecht, that he persists in his intention of buying back his patrimony.

“6. The magistrates of Noes, Loevig, Indal, Skongen, Stod, Sparbo, and other towns and villages of Northern Throndhjem, pray that a price may be set upon the head of the assassin, thief, and incendiary, Hans, said to be a native of Klipstadur, in Iceland. Nychol Orugix, executioner for the province of Throndhjem, who claims that Hans is his property, opposes the petition. Beniguus Spiagudry, keeper of the Spladgest, to whom the corpse should belong, supports the petition.”

“That robber is a very dangerous fellow,” said the general, “ particularly now that we are threatened with trouble among the miners. Issue a proclamation offering a thousand crowns reward for his head.”

“Why,” broke in the general, “ is not this the same Spiagudry who keeps the Spladgest? “

“Yes, to be sure, your Excellency,” replied the secretary, “ keeper, for his Majesty, of the institution of the Spladgest, in the royal city of Throndhjem, sets forth that he, Benignus Spiagudry, discovered that the stars called fixed are not lighted by the star called the sun; item, that the real name of Odin is Frigg, sun of Fridulf; item, that the marine lobworm feeds on sand; item, that the noise of the inhabitants drives the fish away from the coast of Norway, so that the means of subsistence are growing less in proportion to the increase of the population; item, that the fjord known as Otte-Sund was formerly known as Limfjord, and only took the name of Otte-Sund after Otho the Red cast his spear into it; item, he sets forth that it was by his advice and under his direction that an old statue of Freya was changed into the statue of Justice, which now adorns the market-place in Throndhjem, and that the lion found at the feet of the idol has been turned into a devil, symbolizing crime; item

“Oh, spare me the rest of his eminent services! Let me see, what does he want? “

The secretary turned over several pages, and went on:

“Your most humble petitioner feels that he may justly petition your Excellency, in return for so many useful labors in the domain of science and literature, to increase the reward to ten escalins for every corpse, male or female, which cannot but be gratifying to the dead, as proving the value set upon their bodies.”

Here the door opened, and the usher in a loud voice announced, “The noble lady, Countess d’Ahlefeld.”

At the same time a tall woman, wearing the small coronet of a countess, richly dressed in scarlet satin trimmed with gold fringe and ermine, entered, and accepting the hand which the general offered her, seated herself beside him.

The countess was perhaps fifty years old. Age had added little to the furrows with which pride and ambition had long since marked her face. She looked at the old governor haughtily, and with an artificial smile.

“Well, General, your ward delays. He should have been here before sunset.”

“He would have been here, my lady Countess, if he had not gone to Munkholm upon his arrival.”

“To Munkholm! I hope it was not to see Schumacker?”

“That may be.”

“Could Baron Thorwick’s first visit be to Schumacker!”

“Why not, Countess? Schumacker is unfortunate and unhappy.”

“What, General! Is the viceroy’s son on familiar terms with a prisoner of state? “

“When Frederic Guldenlew confided his son to my care, he begged me, noble lady, to bring him up as if he were my own. I thought that an acquaintance with Schumacker might be useful to Ordener, who is destined some day to wield such power; consequently, with the viceroy’s permission, I obtained from my brother, Grummond de Knud, a permit to enter all the prisons, which I gave to Ordener. He often uses it.”

“And how long, noble General, has Baron Ordener had the pleasure of this useful acquaintance? “

“Rather more than a year, Countess. It seems that Schumacker’s society pleased him, for it kept him at Throndhjem for a long time; and it was only reluctantly, and by my express request, that he left the city last year to visit Norway.”

“And does Schumacker know that his comforter is the son of one of his greatest enemies? “

“He knows that he is a friend, and that is enough for him, as for us.”

“But you, General,” said the countess, with a searching look, “when you tolerated nay, encouraged this connection, did you know that Schumacker had a daughter? “

“I knew it, noble Countess.”

“And this fact seemed to you of no importance to your pupil? “

“The pupil of Levin de Knud, the son of Frederic Guldenlew, is an honest man. Ordener knows the barrier which separates him from Schumacker’s daughter; he is incapable of winning the affection, unless his purpose was upright, of any girl, above all the daughter of an unfortunate man.”

The noble Countess d’Ahlefeld blushed and paled. She turned away her head to avoid the calm gaze of the old man, as if it were that of an accuser.

“But,” she stammered, “ this connection strikes me, General, let me speak my mind, as strange and imprudent. It is said that the miners and tribes of the North are threatening to revolt, and that the name of Schumacker is mixed up with the affair.”

“Noble lady, you surprise me! “ exclaimed the governor. “ Schumacker has hitherto borne his misfortunes calmly. The report is doubtless ill-founded.”

At this moment the door opened, and the usher announced that a messenger from his Grace the lord high chancellor wished to speak with the noble countess.

The lady rose hurriedly, took leave of the governor, and while he continued his inspection of the petitions she hastened to her apartments in a wing of the palace, directing that the messenger should follow her.

She had been seated on a rich sofa in the midst of her women for a few instants only, when the messenger entered. The countess on seeing him made a slight gesture of aversion, which she hid at once by a friendly smile.

And yet the messenger’s appearance was not at all repulsive. He was a man of somewhat diminutive stature, whose plumpness suggested anything else rather than a messenger. Still, a close study of his face showed it to be frank to the point of impudence, and his look of good humor had a spice of deviltry and malice. He bowed low to the countess, and offered her a package sealed with silk thread.

“Noble lady,” said he, “ deign to permit me to venture to lay at your feet a precious message from his Grace your illustrious husband, my revered master.”

“Is he not coming himself? And why did he choose you as his messenger?” inquired the countess.

“Important business delays the coming of his Grace, as this letter will inform you, Madam. For myself, I am by the orders of my noble master to enjoy the distinguished honor of a private interview with you.”

The countess turned pale, and exclaimed in a trembling voice, “ With me, me, Musdœmon? “

“If it distresses the noble lady in the slightest degree, her unworthy servant will be reduced to despair.”

“Distress me! No, of course not,” returned the countess, trying to smile. “ But is this conversation so essential? “

The messenger bowed down to the ground.

“Absolutely essential. The letter which the illustrious countess has deigned to receive from my hands probably contains a formal order to that effect.”

It was strange to see the proud Countess d’Ahlfeld tremble and turn pale before a servant who paid her such profound respect. She slowly opened the package and read its contents. After a second reading she turned to her women, and said in a faint voice: “ Go; leave us alone.”

“I hope the noble lady,” said the messenger, bending his knee, “ will deign to pardon the liberty which I venture to take and the trouble which I seem to cause her.”

“On the contrary,” replied the countess, with a forced smile, “ I assure you that I am very happy to see you.”

The women withdrew.

“Elphega, have you forgotten that there was a time when you were not averse to being alone with me? “

It was the messenger who addressed the noble countess, and the words were accompanied by a laugh like that uttered by the Devil, at the instant that his compact expires and he seizes the soul which sold itself to him.

The great lady bowed her humbled head.

“Would that I had indeed forgotten it!” she murmured.

“Poor fool! Why should you blush for things which no human eye ever saw? “

“God sees what men do not see.”

“God, weak woman! You are not worthy to deceive your husband, for he is less credulous than you.”

“Your insults to my remorse are scarcely generous, Musdœmon.”

“Well, if you feel remorse, Elphega, why insult it yourself by daily committing fresh crimes? “

The Countess d’Ahlefeld hid her face in her hands; the messenger continued: “ Elphega, you must choose: remorse and more crimes, or crime and no more remorse. Do as I do: choose the second course; it is better at least it is more cheerful.”

“Heaven grant,” said the countess, in low tones, “ that those words may not be counted against you in eternity.”

“Come, my dear, a truce to jest.”

Then Musdœmon, seating himself behind the countess, and putting his arm about her neck, added: “ Elphega, try to be, at least in imagination, what you were twenty years ago.”

The unfortunate countess, the slave of her accomplice, strove to respond to his loathsome caresses. There was something too revolting, even for these degraded souls, in this adulterous embrace of two beings who scorned and despised each other. The illegal caresses which had once delighted them, and which some horrible and unknown expediency compelled them still to lavish upon each other, now tortured them. Strange but just change of guilty affections! Their crime had become their punishment.

The countess, to cut short this guilty torment, at last asked her odious lover, tearing herself from his arms, with what verbal message her husband had charged him.

“D’Ahlfeld,” said Musdœmon, “just as he was about to see his power continued by the marriage of Ordener Guldenlew to our daughter-”

“Our daughter! “ exclaimed the haughty countess; aud she fixed her eye on Musdœmon with a look of pride and contempt.

“Well,” coldly continued the messenger, “ I think that Ulrica is at least as much mine as his. I was saying that the match would not be wholly satisfactory to your husband unless Schumacker could at the same time be destroyed. In his remote prison the old favorite is yet almost as much to be dreaded as in his palace. He has obscure but powerful friends at court, powerful because they are obscure; and the king, learning a month since that the chancellor’s negotiations with the Duke of Holstein-Ploen were at a standstill, cried out impatiently: ‘ Griffenfeld knew more than all of them put together.’ A schemer named Dispolsen, come from Munkholm to Copenhagen, had several secret interviews with him, after which the king sent to the chancellor’s office for Schumacker’s patents of nobility and title-deeds. No one knows the object of Schumacher’s ambition; but if he desire nothing but his liberty, for a prisoner of state that is the same as to desire power! He must therefore die, and must die by authority of justice; we are now striving to invent a crime for him. Your husband, Elphega, on the plea of inspecting the northern provinces incognito, will assure himself of the result of our underhand dealings among the miners, whom we hope to incite to rebel, in Schumacker’s name, which revolt we can easily put down later. What troubles us is the loss of certain important papers relating to this plot, and which we have every reason to believe have fallen into the hands of Dispolsen. Knowing that he had set out to return to Munkholm, carrying to Schumacker his parchments, his diplomas, and possibly these documents which might ruin, or at least compromise us, we posted certain faithful men in the gorges of Kiölen, directing them to rid us of him, after robbing him of his papers. But if, as we are assured, Dispolsen left Bergen by water, our efforts in that quarter are in vain. However, as I came along I gathered vague reports of the murder of a captain by the name of Dispolsen. We shall see. Meantime we are searching for a famous bandit, Hans, called Hans of Iceland, whom we wish to put at the head of the revolt in the mines. And you, my dear, what news have you for me here? Has the pretty bird at Munkholm been caught in her cage? Has the old minister’s daughter finally fallen a prey to our falco fulvus, our son Frederic?”

The countess, recovering her pride, again exclaimed: “Our son!”

“I’ faith, how old may he be? Twenty-four. We have known each other some twenty-six years, Elphega.”

“God knows,” cried the countess, “ my Frederic is the chancellor’s lawful heir.”

“If God knows it,” laughingly replied the messenger, “ the Devil does not. Moreover, your Frederic is but a presumptuous youngster, quite unworthy of me, and it is not worth our while to quarrel for such a trifle. He is only fit to make love to a girl. Has he at least succeeded? “

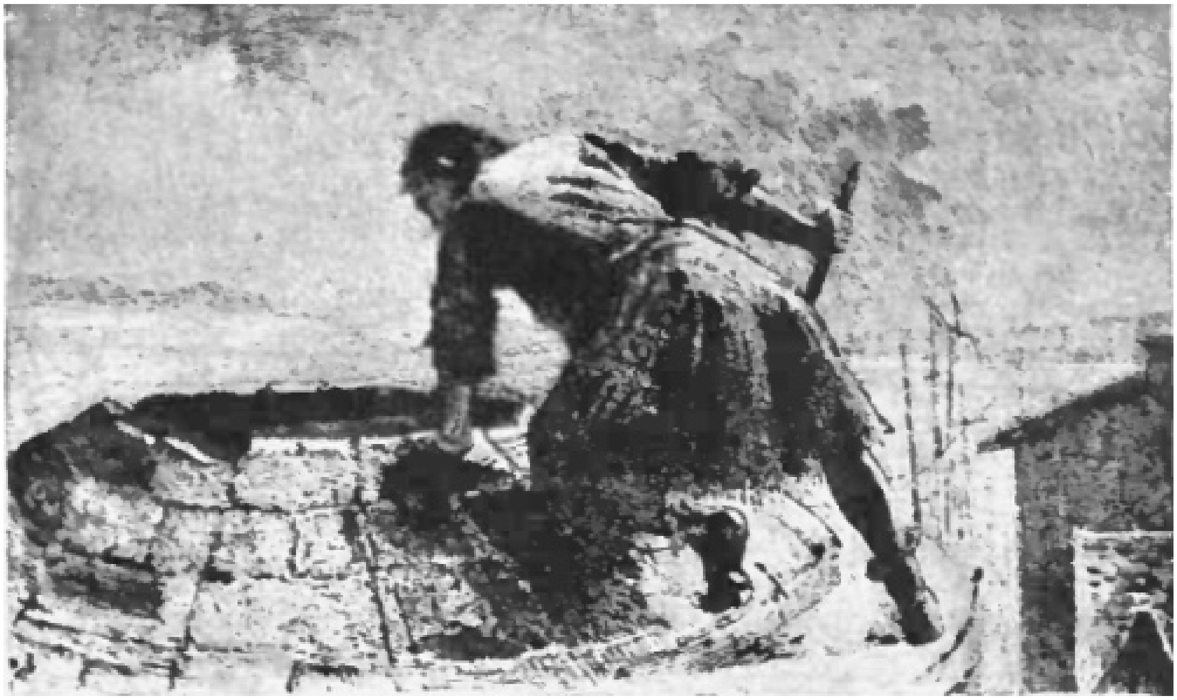
“Not yet, so far as I know.”

“Oh, Elphega, do try to play a less passive part in our affairs. The count and myself, as you see, are tolerably active. I return to your husband to-morrow. For mercy’s sake, do not confine yourself to praying for our sins, like the Madonna whom the Italians invoke when about to commit a murder! D’Ahlefeld, too, must see to rewarding me a little more munificently than he has hitherto done. My fortune is closely connected with yours; but I am tired of being the husband’s servant when I am the wife’s lover, and of being only the tutor, the teacher, the pedagogue, when I am almost the father.”

At this instant midnight struck, and one of the women entered, reminding the countess that by the palace regulations all lights must be put out at that hour.

The countess, glad to end a painful interview, recalled her attendants.

“Permit me, gracious Countess,’’ said Musdœmon, as he withdrew, “ to retain a hope of seeing you to-morrow, and to lay at your feet my homage and sincere respect.”



A low Growl was heard above their Heads

CHAPTER VIII BE FAITHFUL AND SILENT.

It cannot be but thou hast murdered him; So should a murderer look; so dead, so grim!
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night’s Dream.

Upon my honor, old man,” said Ordener to Spiagudry, “I began to think that the corpses who lodge in this building would have to open the door.”

“Excuse me, sir,” replied the keeper, in whose ears the names of king and viceroy still rang, as he repeated his trite excuse, “I was- I was sound asleep.”

“Then I suppose your dead men do not sleep, and it was probably they whom I heard talking just now.”

Spiagudry was confused.

“You stranger. you heard? “

“Oh, yes! but what does it matter? I did not come here to meddle with your affairs, but to interest you in mine. Let us go inside.”

Spiagudry was by no means anxious to allow the newcomer to see Gill’s body, but these last words comforted him considerably; and besides, how could he prevent his entrance?

He accordingly allowed the young man to pass, and closing the door, said: “ Benignus Spiagudry is at your service in all that relates to human science; yet if, as your unseasonable visit seems to show, you suppose that you are dealing with a sorcerer, you are wrong; ne famun crcdas; I am only a learned man. Enter my laboratory, stranger.”

“Not at all,” said Ordener; “ my errand is with these corpses.”

“These corpses! “ said Spiagudry, beginning to tremble again. “ But, sir, you cannot see them.”

“What! I cannot see bodies which are placed here for the sole purpose of being seen! I repeat, that I wish to question you concerning one of them; it is your duty to answer. Obey cheerfully, old man, or you will be forced to obey.”

Spiagudry had a sincere respect for swords, and he saw the flash of steel at Ordener’s side.

“Nihil linn arrogat armis” he muttered; and fumbling with his bunch of keys, he opened the grating, and admitted the stranger into the second section of the hall.

“Show me the captain’s clothes,” said the latter.

At this instant a ray from the lamp fell upon Gill Stadt’s bloody head.

“Good God! “ exclaimed Ordener, “ what abominable sacrilege! “

“Great Saint Hospitius, pity me! “ sighed the poor keeper.

“Old man,” continued Ordener, in threatening tones, “are you so remote from the toinb that you can safely violate the respect which is its due? And do you not fear, wretched fellow, that the living will teach you what you owe to the dead? “

“Oh,” cried the poor keeper, “ mercy! It was not I! If you only knew And he stopped; for he remembered the little man’s words: “ Be faithful, be dumb.” “ Did you see any one escape through that aperture? “ he asked faintly.

“Yes; was it your accomplice? “

“No; it was the guilty man, the only guilty man! I swear it by all the torments of hell, by all the blessings of heaven, by this same body so infamously profaned! “ and he fell upon the pavement before Ordener.

Hideous as Spiagudry was, there was yet an accent of truth in his despair and protestations, which convinced the young man.

“Old man,” said he, “ rise; and if you did not outrage death, do not degrade age.”

The keeper rose. Ordener continued: “ Who is the culprit? “

“Oh, silence, noble youth! You know not of whom you speak. Silence! “

And Spiagudry mentally repeated: “ Be faithful, be dumb.”

Ordener answered coldly: “ Who is the culprit? I must know! “

“In Heaven’s name, sir, do not say so! Be silent, for fear

“Fear will not silence me, but shall make you speak.”

“Excuse me; forgive me, young master! “ said the agonized Spiagudry. “ I cannot.”

“You can, for I insist. Tell me the profaner’s name! “

Spiagudry still strove to evade.

“Well, noble master, the profaner of this corpse is the assassin of that officer.”

“Then that officer was murdered? “ asked Ordener, reminded, by this abrupt transition, of the object of his search.

“Yes, undoubtedly, sir.”

“And by whom, by whom? “

“In the name of the saint on whom your mother called when she gave you birth, do not seek to know his name, young master; do not force me to reveal it.”

“If my desire to know it required any spur, you would add it, old man, in the shape of curiosity. I command you to name the murderer.”

“Well, then,” said Spiagudry, “ see these deep wounds, made by long, sharp nails on the body of this unfortunate man. They will name the assassin.”

And the old man showed Ordener a number of ugly scratches on the naked, freshly washed corpse.

“What! “ said Ordener, “ was it some wild beast? “

“No, my young lord.”

“But unless it was the Devil “

“Hush! Beware, lest your guesses come too close to the mark. Did you never hear,” added the keeper in a low voice, “ of a man or a monster with human face, whose nails are as long as those of Ashtaroth who ruined us all, or of Antichrist who will yet destroy us? “

“Speak more plainly.”

“‘ Woe unto you! ‘ says the Apocalypse “

“I demand the assassin’s name! “

“The assassin his name? My lord, have pity on me; have pity on yourself! “

“The second of those prayers would destroy the first, even if serious reasons did not compel me to tear that name from your lips. Abuse my patience no longer.”

“So be it, if you insist, young man,” said Spiagudry, raising himself, and in a loud voice. “ The murderer, the profaner, is Hans of Iceland.”

This terrible name was not unknown to Ordener.

“What! “ he cried, “ Hans! that execrable bandit! “

“Do not call him a bandit, for he has no followers.”

“Then, wretch, how do you know him? What common crimes have brought you together? “

“Oh, noble master, do not stoop to believe in appearances. Is the oak-tree poisonous because the serpent finds shelter within its trunk? “

“No idle words! A scoundrel has no friend who is not an accomplice.”

“I am not his friend, and still less his accomplice; and if all my oaths fail to convince you, sir, let me implore you to observe that this monstrous sacrilege exposes me, twenty-four hours hence, when Gill Stadt’s body is to be removed, to the torture allotted to those guilty of profanation, and thus casts me into the most fearful state of anxiety ever endured by innocent man.”

These considerations of personal interest moved Ordener more than the suppliant voice of the poor keeper, much of whose pathetic though useless resistance to the little man’s sacrilegious act they had doubtless inspired. Ordener reflected a moment, while Spiagudry tried to read in his face whether this pause meant peace or boded a storm.

At last he said, in a severe though quiet tone: “ Old man, speak the truth! Did you find any papers upon that officer? “

“None, upon my honor.”

“Do you know if Hans of Iceland found any? “

“I swear by Saint Hospitius that I do not know.”

“You do not know? Do you know where this Hans of Iceland hides? “

“He never hides; he roams about perpetually.”

“Perhaps; but where is his den? “

“That pagan,” whispered the old man, “ has as many dens as the island of Hitteren has reefs, or the dog-star rays.”

“I order you again,” broke in Ordener, “ to speak in plain terms. Let me set you an example; hearken. You are mysteriously allied with a brigand, whose accomplice you still declare that you are not. If you know him, you must know where he has gone. Do not interrupt me. If you are not his accomplice, you will not hesitate to lead me in search of him! “

Spiagudry could not contain his fright.

“You, noble lord! you, -great God! full of youth and life, you would provoke, seek out that demon! When four-armed Ingiald fought the giant Nyctolm, at least, he had four arms! “

“Well,” said Ordener, with a smile, “ if four arms are a requisite, will you not be my guide? “

“I! your guide! How can you jest with an old man who’ almost needs a guide himself? “

“Listen,” replied Ordener; “ do not try to jest with me. If this profanation, of which I would fain believe you innocent, exposes you to be punished for sacrilege, you cannot stay here. You must fly. I offer you my protection, but on condition that you lead me to the brigand’s lair. Be my guide, I will be your saviour. Nay, more: if I catch Hans of Iceland, I shall bring him here, dead or alive. You can then prove your innocence, and I promise to restore your office. Stay; meantime, here are more coins than your place brings you in a year.”

Ordener, by keeping his purse until the last, had observed that gradation in his arguments required by the wholesome laws of logic. They were strong enough in themselves to make Spiagudry consider. He began by taking the money.

“Noble master, you are right,” said he; and his eye, hitherto vague and uncertain, was fixed upon Ordener. “ If I follow you, I incur the future vengeance of the terrible Hans. If I stay, I fall to-morrow into the hands of Orugix the hangman. What is the penalty of sacrilege? Never mind. In either case, my poor life is in danger; but as, according to the wise remark of Saemond-Sigfusson, otherwise called the Sage, inter duo pcricula œqualia, minus imminens eligcndum est, I will follow you. Yes, sir, I will be your guide. Pray do not forget, however, that I have done all I could to dissuade you from your daring scheme.”

“Very good,” said Ordener. “ Then you will be my guide. Old man,” he added, with a meaning glance, “ I count upon your fidelity.”

“Oh, master! “ replied the keeper, “ Spiagudry’s faith is as pure as the gold which you so graciously gave me.”

“Let it remain so, or I will show you that the steel which I bear about me is as sterling as my gold. Where do you think Hans of Iceland is? “

“Why, as the southern part of the province of Throndhjem is full of troops sent thither on some errand of the lord chancellor, Hans must have gone in the direction of Walderhog cave, or toward Lake Miösen. Our road lies through Skongen.”

“When can you start? “

“At the close of the day now dawning, when night falls and the Spladgest is closed, your poor servant will begin his duties as your guide, for which he must deprive the dead of his care. We will try to hide the mutilation of the miner from the eyes of the people for this one day.”

“Where shall I meet you to-night? “

“In the market-place, if it please my master, near the statue of Justice, which was formerly Freya, and which will doubtless protect me with her shadow, in gratitude for the fine devil which I had carved at her feet.”

Spiagudry would probably have repeated the terms of his petition to the governor, had not Ordener interrupted him.

"Enough, old man; it is a bargain."

"A bargain," repeated the keeper.

He had scarcely uttered these words, when a low growl was heard above their heads. The keeper shuddered.

"What is that? " he said.

"Is there not," asked Ordener, equally surprised, ‘‘ any other living being dwelling here besides yourself? "

"You remind me of my assistant, Oglypiglap," replied Spiagudry, reassured by the thought. " It was probably his snores which we heard. A sleeping Lapp, Bishop Arngrimmsson says, makes as much noise as a waking woman."

As they talked, they approached the door of the Spladgest. Spiagudry opened it softly.

"Good-by, young sir," he said to Ordener; " may Heaven keep you merry. Good-by until to-night. If your road lead you by the cross of Saint Hospitius, deign to utter a prayer for your wretched servant, Benignus Spiagudry."

Then hastily closing the door, as much through fear of being seen as to guard his lamp from the early morning breezes, he returned to Gill's corpse, and did his best so to arrange it that the wound might not be perceived.

Many reasons combined to persuade the timid keeper to accept the stranger's perilous offer. The motives for his bold resolve may be ranked as follows: (1) fear of Ordener here and now; (2) dread of Orugix the hangman; (3) an ancient grudge against Hans of Iceland, -a grudge which he scarcely dared acknowledge even to himself, so strong was the power of fear; (4) a love of science, which would benefit largely by his journey; (5) confidence in his own cunning, which would enable him to evade Hans; (6) a wholly speculative attraction for certain metal contained in the young adventurer's purse, and probably also in the iron casket stolen from the captain and intended for Widow Stadt, a message which now ran a great risk of never leaving the messenger's hands.

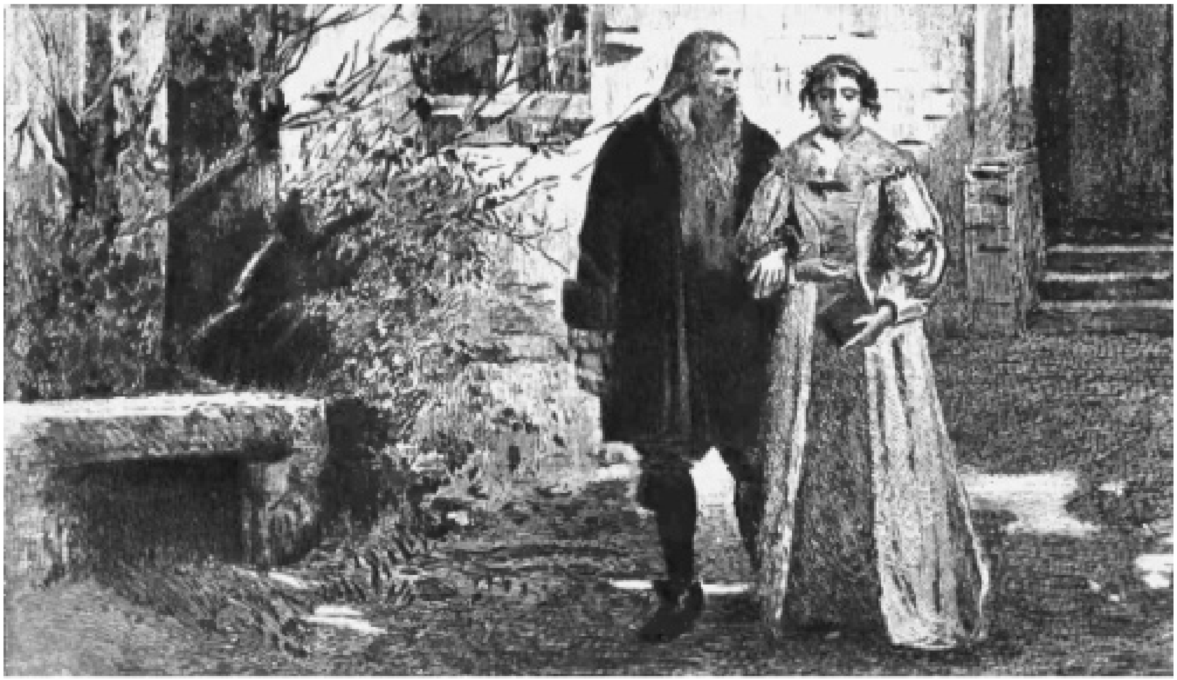
Still another and a final reason was the well or ill founded hope of returning sooner or later to the post which he was about to desert. Besides, what did it matter to him whether the robber killed the traveller, or the traveller the robber? At this point in his meditations he could not help saying aloud: " It will be one more corpse for me, anyhow."

Another growl was heard, and the unhappy keeper shivered.

“Indeed, that is not Oglypiglap’s snore,” said he; “that noise comes from without.”

Then, after a moment’s thought, he added: “ How silly I am to be so frightened! The dog on the wharf probably waked and barked.”

Then he finished his arrangement of Gill’s disfigured remains, and closing all the doors, threw himself upon his mattress to sleep off the fatigue of the past night and gain strength for the comin” one.



Schumacker, leaning on his Daughters Arm

CHAPTER IX THE CODE OF HONOR.

Juliet. Oh, think’st thou we shall ever meet again?
Romeo. I doubt it not: and all these woes shall serve For sweet discourses in our time to come.
Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.

The signal-light at Munkholm castle had just been extinguished, and in its place the sailor entering Throndhjem fjord saw the helmet of the soldier on guard gleam from afar in the beams of the rising sun like a planet moving in its orbit, when Schumacker, leaning on his daughter’s arm, came down as usual into the garden which surrounded his prison. Both had spent a restless night, the old man unable to sleep, the maiden kept awake by happy thoughts. They walked in silence for a time; then the aged prisoner said, fixing a sad and serious gaze upon the lovely girl:

“You blush and smile at your own thoughts, Ethel; you are happy, for you have no cause to blush for the past, and you smile at the future.”

Ethel blushed still deeper, and her smile faded.

“My lord and father,” she stammered in confusion, “ I brought the volume containing the Edda.”

“Very well; read, my daughter,” said Schumacker; and he resumed his meditations.

Then the melancholy captive, seated on a black rock shaded by a dark fir, listened to his daughter’s sweet voice without heeding the words which she read, as a thirsty traveller delights in the murmur of the stream that quenches his fever.

Ethel read him the story of the shepherdess Allanga, who refused a king until he proved himself a warrior. Prince Bagnar-Lodbrok could not win the maid until he returned triumphant over the robber of Klipstadur, Ingulf the Destroyer.

Suddenly a sound of footsteps and the rustling of the foliage interrupted the reading and roused Schumacker from his revery. Lieutenant d’Ahlefeld appeared from behind the rock upon which they sat. Ethel’s head drooped as she recognized their tormentor, and the officer exclaimed: -

“I’ faith, fair lady, your lovely lips just uttered the name of Ingulf the Destroyer. I heard you, and I presume that you were talking of his grandson. Hans of Iceland, and that reminded you of him. Ladies love to talk of robbers. By the way, there are tales of Ingulf and his descendants which are both fearful and interesting. Ingulf the Destroyer had but one son, born of the witch Thoarka; that son also had but one son, whose mother was likewise a witch. For four centuries the race has been perpetuated thus for the desolation of Iceland, there being always a single scion, who never produces more than one offshoot. By this series of solitary heirs the infernal spirit of Ingulf has been handed down to the present day, and flourishes in the famous Hans of Iceland, who was doubtless so happy as to occupy your virgin thoughts just now."

The officer paused for an instant. Ethel was silent from embarrassment, Schumacker from vexation. Delighted to find them willing, if not to answer, at least to listen, he added, " The Klipstadur outlaw's one passion is a hatred of the human race, his one thought to harm them."

"He is wise," abruptly remarked the old man.

"He always lives alone," resumed the lieutenant.

"He is fortunate," said Schumacker.

The lieutenant was charmed by this double interruption, which seemed to seal a compact for conversation.

"May the god Mithra preserve us," he cried, " from such wise men and such fortunate men! Accursed be the evilminded zephyr which brought the last demon of Iceland to Norway. I was wrong to say evil-minded, for they say it was a bishop to whom we owe the pleasure of possessing Hans of Klipstadur. If we may believe the story, certain Iceland peasants, having captured little Hans among the Bessestad mountains in his infancy, were about to kill him, as Astyages slew the Bactrian lion's whelp; but the bishop of Scalholt interfered, and took the cub under his own protection, hoping to make a Christian of the devil. The good bishop tried in a thousand ways to develop his infernal intellect, forgetting that the hemlock cannot be changed into a lily even in the hot-houses of Babylon. So when the young devil grew up, he repaid all this care by escaping one fine night upon the trunk of a tree, across the seas, lighting his flight by setting the bishop's house on fire. That's the old women's account of the way this Icelander came to Norway, and now, thanks to his education, he affords us a perfect type of the monster.

Since then the destruction of the Färöe mines, the death of three hundred men crushed beneath the ruins, the overthrow of the hanging rock at Golyn at midnight upon the village below, the fall of Half-Broer bridge from the rocks upon the high-road, the burning of Throndhjem cathedral, the extinction of beacon-lights upon the coast on stormy nights, and countless crimes and murders hidden in Lakes Sparbo or Miösen, or concealed in the caves of Walderhog and Rylass, and in the gorges of the Dovrefjeld, bear witness to the presence of this Ahriman incarnate in the province of Throndhjem. The old women declare that a new hair grows in his beard with every fresh crime; in that case his beard must be as luxuriant as that of the most venerable Assyrian magi. Yet you must have heard, fair lady, how often the governor has tried to stop the extraordinary growth of that beard."

Schumacker again broke the silence.

"And has every effort to capture this fellow," he asked with a look of triumph and an ironical smile, "been unsuccessful? I congratulate the chancellor."

The officer did not understand the ex-chancellor's sarcasm.

"Hans has hitherto proved as invincible as Horatius Cocles. Old soldiers, young militiamen, country boors, mountaineers, all fly or die before him. He is a demon who can neither be avoided nor caught; the best luck that can befall those who go in search of him is not to find him. You may be surprised, gracious lady," he went on, seating himself familiarly beside Ethel, who drew nearer to her father, "at all my curious anecdotes concerning this supernatural being. It was not without a purpose that I collected these strange traditions. It seems to me- and I shall be pleased if you, fair lady, share my opinion that the adventures of Hans would make a delicious romance, after the style of Mademoiselle de Scudéry's sublime stories, ' Artamenes,' or 'Clelia,' only six volumes of which latter I have yet read, but it is none the less a masterpiece in my eyes. Of course we should have to soften our climate, dress up our traditions, and modify our barbarous names. For instance, Throndhjem, which I should call ' Durtinianum,' should see its forests converted, by a touch of my magic wand, into delightful groves watered by a thousand streamlets far more poetic than our hideous torrents. Our dark, deep caves should give place to charming grottos carpeted with gilded pebbles and azure shells. In one of these grottos should live a famous magician, Haunus of Thule. For you must own that the name Hans of Iceland is by no means agreeable. This giant,- you must feel that it would be absurd not to make the hero of such a work a giant, this giant- should descend in a direct line from the god Mars (Ingulf the Destroyer affords no food for imagination) and the enchantress Theona,- don't you think I have made a happy change in the name Thoarka?

- daughter of the Cumean sibyl. Hannus, after being educated by the great Magian of Thule, should finally escape from the pontiff’s palace in a car drawn by two dragons, it would be very narrow-minded to cling to the shabby old legend of the trunk of a tree. Reaching the land of Durtinianum, and ravished by that enchanting region, he should choose it as the place of his abode and the scene of his crimes. It would be no easy matter to draw an agreeable picture of the robberies of Hans. However, we might soften their horror by an ingeniously planned love-affair. The shepherdess Alcyppe, walking one day with her lamb in a grove of myrtles and olives, should be noticed by the giant, who should suddenly yield to the magic of her eyes. But Alcyppe should love the handsome Lycidas, an officer of the militia, garrisoned in her village. The giant should be annoyed by the centurion’s happiness, and the centurion by the giant’s attentions. You can fancy, dear lady, how charming such imaginative powers might make the adventures of Haunus. I will wager my Polish boots against a pair of slippers that such a subject, treated by Mademoiselle de Scudéry, would set all the women in Copenhagen wild with delight.”

The last words roused Schumacker from the melancholy thoughts in which he had been buried during the lieutenant’s fruitless display of brains.

“Copenhagen! “ he exclaimed. “ What news is there from Copenhagen, sir officer? “

“None, i’ faith, that I know of,” replied the lieutenant, “save that the king has given his consent to the great marriage which is just now occupying the thoughts of both kingdoms.”

“What! “ rejoined Schumacker; “ what marriage? “

The appearance of a fourth speaker arrested the words on the lieutenant’s lips.

All three looked up. The prisoner’s moody features brightened, the lieutenant’s frivolous face grew grave, and Ethel’s sweet countenance, which had been pale and confused during the officer’s long soliloquy, again beamed with life and joy. She sighed heavily, as if her heart were eased of an intolerable weight, and her sad smile rested upon the new-comer. It was Ordener.

The old man, the girl, and the officer were placed in a singular position toward Ordener; they had each a secret in common with him, therefore each felt embarrassed by the presence of the other. Ordener’s return to the donjon was no surprise to Schumacker or Ethel, who were expecting him; but it amazed the lieutenant as much as the sight of the lieutenant astonished Ordener, who might have feared some indiscretion on the part of the officer in regard to the scene of the previous night, if the silence ordained by the etiquette of duelling had not reassured him. He could therefore only be surprised at seeing him quietly seated between his two prisoners.

These four persons could say nothing while together, for the very reason that they would have had much to say had they been alone. Therefore, aside from glances of intelligence and embarrassment, Ordener met with an absolutely silent reception.

The lieutenant burst out laughing.

"By the train of the royal mantle, my dear new-comer, here 's a silence by no means unlike that of the senators of Gaul when Brennus the Roman Upon my honor, I have forgotten which were the Romans and which the Gauls, the senators or the general Never mind. Since you are here, help me to enlighten this worthy old gentleman as to the news. I was just about to tell him, when you made your sudden entry on the stage, about the famous marriage which is now absorbing both Medes and Persians."

"What marriage? " asked Ordener and Schumacker with a single voice.

"By the cut of your clothes, sir stranger," cried the lieutenant, clapping his hands, " I guessed that you came from some other world. Your present question turns my doubt to certainty. You must have landed only yesterday on the banks of the Nidder in a fairycar drawn by two winged dragons; for you could not have travelled through Norway without hearing of the wonderful marriage of the viceroy's son and the lord chancellor's daughter.-"

Schumacker turned to the lieutenant.

"What! Is Ordener Guldenlew to marry Ulrica d'Ahlefeld? "

"As you say," replied the officer; " and it will all be settled before the fashion of French farthingales reaches Copenhagen."

"Frederic's son must be about twenty-two years old, for I had been in Copenhagen fortress a year when the news of his birth reached me. Let him marry young," added Schumacker with a bitter smile. " When disgrace comes upon him, at least no one can accuse him of having aspired to a cardinal's hat."

The old favorite alluded to one of his own misfortunes, of which the lieutenant knew nothing.

“No, indeed,” said he, laughing heartily. “ Baron Ordener will receive the title of count, the collar of the Order of the Elephant, and a colonel’s epaulettes, which would scarcely match with the cardinal’s hat.”

“So much the better,” answered Schumacker. Then after a pause he added, shaking his head as if he saw his revenge before him, “ Some day they may make an iron collar of his fine order; they may break his count’s coronet over his head; they may strike him in the face with his colonel’s epaulettes.”

Ordener seized the old man’s hand.

“For the sake of your hatred, sir, do not curse an enemy’s good fortune before you know whether it be good fortune in his eyes.”

“Pooh! “ said the lieutenant. “ What are the old fellow’s railings to Baron Thorwick? “

“Lieutenant,” cried Ordener, “ they may be more to him than you think. And,” he added, after a brief silence, “your grand marriage is not so certain as you suppose.”

“Fiat quod vis” rejoined the lieutenant, with an ironical bow; “ the king, the viceroy, and the chancellor have, it is true, made every arrangement for the wedding; but if it displeases you, Sir Stranger, what matter the lord chancellor, the viceroy, and the king!”

‘‘ You may be right,” said Ordener, seriously.

“Oh, by my faith! “ and the lieutenant threw himself back in a fit of laughter, “ this is too good! How I wish Baron Thorwick could hear a fortune-teller so well instructed in regard to the things of this world decide his fate. Believe me, my learned prophet, your beard is not long enough for a good sorcerer.”

“Sir Lieutenant,” coldly answered Ordener, “ I do not think that Ordener Guldenlew will ever marry a woman whom he does not love.”

“Ha, ha! here we have the Book of Proverbs. And who tells you, Sir Green mantle, that the “baron does not love Ulrica d’Ahlefeld? “

“And, if it please you, in your turn, who tells you that he does? “

Here the lieutenant, as often happens, was led by the heat of the conversation into stating a fact of which he was by no means certain.

“Who tells me that he loves her? The question is absurd. I am sorry for your powers of divination; but everybody knows that this match is no less a marriage of inclination than of convenience.”

“At least, everybody but me,” said Ordener, gravely.

“Except you? So be it. But what difference does that make? You cannot prevent the viceroy’s son from being in love with the chancellor’s daughter.”

“In love? “

“Madly in love!”

“He must indeed be mad to be in love with her.”

“Hullo! don’t forget of whom and to whom you speak. Would not one say that the son of the viceroy could not take a fancy to a lady without consulting this clown? “

As he spoke, the officer rose. Ethel, who saw Ordener’s face flush, hurried toward him.

“Oh! “ said she, “ pray be calm; do not heed these insults. What does it matter to us whether the viceroy’s son loves the chancellor’s daughter or not?”

The gentle hand laid on the young man’s heart stilled the tempest raging within. He cast an enraptured glance at his Ethel, and did not hear the lieutenant, who, recov- ering his good-humor, exclaimed: “ The lady acts with infinite grace the part of the Sabine woman interceding between her father and her husband. My words were rather heedless; I forgot,” he added, turning to Ordener, “that there is a bond of brotherhood between us, and that we can no longer provoke each other. Chevalier, give me your hand. Confess, you too forgot that you were speaking of the viceroy’s son to his future brother-in-law, Lieutenant d’Ahlefeld.”

At this name Schumacker, who had hitherto looked on with an indifferent or merely an impatient eye, sprang from his stone seat with a terrible cry: “ D’Ahlefeld! A D’Ahlefeld here! Serpent! How could I fail to recognize the abominable father in his son? Leave me in peace in my cell! I was not condemned to the punishment of seeing you. It only needs, as he desired just now, that the son of Guldenlew should join the son of d’Ahlefeld! Traitors! cowards! why do they not come themselves to enjoy my tears of madness and rage? Abhorred, abhorred race! Son of d’Ahlefeld, leave me! “

The officer, at first bewildered by the sharpness of these invectives, soon lost his temper and found his speech.

“Silence, lunatic! Cease your devilish litanies! “

“Leave me! leave me! “ repeated the old man; “ and take my curse, my curse upon you and the miserable race of Guldenlew, which is to be allied to you! “

“By Heaven! “ exclaimed the enraged officer, “ you insult me doubly!”

Ordener restrained the lieutenant, who was beside himself with passion.

“Respect an old man, even if he be your enemy, Lieutenant; we have already one question to settle together, and I will answer to you for the prisoner’s offences.”

“So be it,” said the lieutenant; “ you contract a double debt. The fight will be to the death, for I have both, my brother-in-law and myself to avenge. Think that with my gauntlet you pick up that of Ordener Guldenlew.”

“Lieutenant d’Ahlefeld,” replied Ordener, “ you espouse the cause of the absent with a, warmth which proves your generosity. Would there not be as much in showing pity for an unfortunate old man to whom adversity gives some right to be unjust? “

D’Ahlefeld was one of those souls in whom virtue is kindled by praise. He pressed Ordener’s hand, and approached Schumacker, who, exhausted by his emotion, had sunk back upon the rock, in the tearful Ethel’s arms.

“Lord Schumacker,” said the officer, “ you abused the privileges of your age, and I might have abused the privileges of my youth, if you had not found a champion. I enter your prison this morning for the last time, for I come to tell you that you may henceforth remain, by special order of the viceroy, free and unguarded in this donjon. Receive this good news from the lips of an enemy.”

“Go! “ said the old prisoner, in a hollow voice.

The lieutenant bowed and obeyed, inwardly pleased that he had won the approving glance of Ordener.

Schumacker sat for some time with folded arms and bent head, buried in thought. Suddenly he looked up at Ordener, who stood before him in silence.

“Well? “ said he.

“My lord Count, Dispolsen was murdered.”

The old man’s head again drooped upon his breast. Ordener went on: “ His assassin is a noted robber, Hans of Iceland.”

“Hans of Iceland! “ said Schumacker.

“Hans of Iceland! “ repeated Ethel.

“He robbed the captain,” added Ordener.

"And so," said the old man, " you heard nothing of an iron casket, sealed with the arms of Griffenfeld? "

"No, my lord."

Schumacker hid his face in his hands.

"I will restore it to you, my lord Count; trust me. The murder was committed yesterday morning. Hans fled toward the north. I have a guide who knows all his haunts. I have often roamed through the mountains of Throndhjem. I shall overtake the thief."

Ethel turned pale. Schumacker rose; his expression was almost joyful, as if he believed that virtue still existed in men.

"Noble Ordener," he said, " farewell." And raising his hand to heaven, he disappeared among the bushes.

As Ordener turned, he saw Ethel upon the moss-grown rock, pale as an alabaster image on a black pedestal.

"Good God, Ethel! " he cried, rushing to her and supporting her in his arms, " what is the matter? "

"Oh! " replied the trembling girl in scarcely audible tones. " Oh, if you have, I do not say a spark of love, but of pity for me, sir, if you did not speak yesterday only to deceive me, if it be not to cause my death that you have deigned to enter this prison, Lord Ordener, my Ordener, give up, in Heaven's name, in the name of all the angels, give up your mad scheme! Ordener, my beloved Ordener! " she continued, and her tears flowed freely, her head rested on the young man's breast, " make this sacrifice for me. Do not follow this robber, this frightful demon, with whom you would fight. In whose interest do you go, Ordener? Tell me, what interest can be dearer to you than that of the wretched woman whom but yesterday you called your beloved wife? "

She stopped, choked by sobs. Both arms were thrown around Ordener's neck, and her pleading eyes were fixed upon his.

‘‘ My adored Ethel, you are needlessly alarmed. God helps the righteous cause, and the interest in which I expose myself is no other than your own. That iron casket contains "

Ethel interrupted him: " My interest! Have I any other interest than your life? Ordener, what will become of me? "

"Why do you think that I shall die, Ethel? "

"Ah! Then you do not know this Hans, this infernal thief? Do you know what a monster you pursue? Do you know that he is lord of all the powers of darkness; that he overthrows mountains upon towns; that subterranean caverns crumble beneath his tread; that his breath extinguishes the beacons on every rocky coast? And how can you suppose, Ordener, that you can resist this giant aided by the demon, with your white arms and feeble sword? “

“And your prayers, Ethel, and the thought that I am fighting for you? Be assured, Ethel, the bandit’s strength and power have been greatly exaggerated. He is a man like ourselves, who deals out death until he himself be slain.”

“Then you will not heed me? My words are nothing to you? Tell me, what is to become of me if you go; if you roam from danger to danger, exposing for I know not what earthly interest your life, which is mine, by yielding it to a monster? “

Here the lieutenant’s tales recurred anew to Ethel’s fancy, exaggerated by her love and terror. She went on in a voice broken by sobs: “ I assure you, dear Ordener, they deceived you who told you that he was only a man. You should believe me rather than others, Ordener; you know that I would not mislead you. Thousands have tried to do battle with him; he has destroyed whole regiments. I only wish others would tell you the same; you might believe them and not go.”

Poor Ethel’s prayers would doubtless have shaken Ordener’s bold resolve, if he had not gone so far. The words uttered by Schumacker in his despair on the previous evening came back to him and strengthened him in his purpose.

“I might, my dear Ethel, tell you that I would not go, and yet carry out my plan; but I will never deceive you, even to console you. I ought not, I repeat, to hesitate between your tears and your true interests. Your fortune, your happiness, perhaps your life, -your very life, my Ethel, are at stake.” And he clasped her affectionately in his arms.

“And what do I care? “ she returned, weeping. “ My friend, my Ordener, my delight, for you know that you are my sole delight, do not give me a fearful and certain misery in exchange for a slight and doubtful misfortune. What is fortune or life to me?”

“Your father’s life, Ethel, is also at stake.”

She tore herself from his arms.

“My father’s life? “ she repeated in a low voice, turning pale.

“Yes, Ethel. This brigand, doubtless bribed by Count Griffenfeld’s enemies, has in his possession papers whose loss imperils the life of your father, already the object of so many attacks. I would die to win back those papers.”

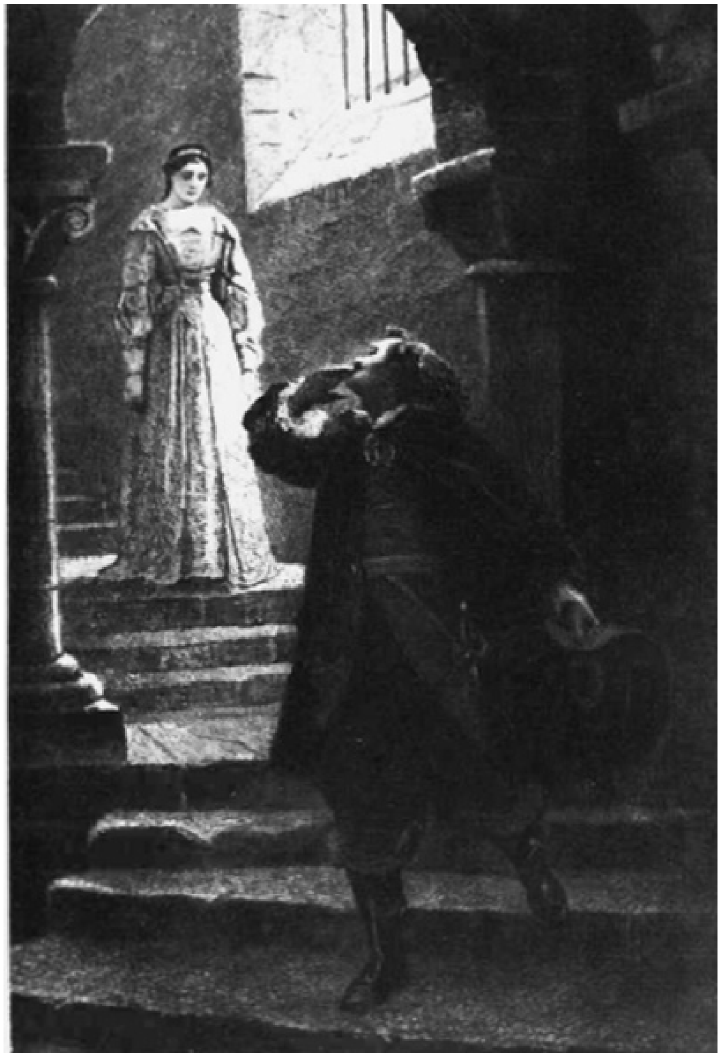
Ethel was pale and dumb for some moments. Her tears were dried, her heaving breast labored painfully; she looked on the ground with a dull and indifferent gaze, the gaze of the condemned man as the axe is lifted over his head.

“My father’s life! “ she sighed.

Then she slowly turned her eyes toward Ordener.

“What you do is useless; but do it.”

Ordener pressed her to his bosom. “ Oh, noble girl, let me feel your heart beat against mine! Generous friend! I will soon return. Nay, you shall soon be mine; I would save your father, that I may better deserve to be his son. My Ethel, my beloved Ethel!”



Farewell

Who can describe the emotions of a true heart which feels that it is appreciated by another noble heart? And if the love uniting these two similar souls be an indissoluble bond, who can paint their indescribable raptures? It seems as if they must feel, crowded into one brief in- stant, all the joy and all the glory of life, embellished by the charm of generous sacrifice.

"Oh, my Ordener, go; and if you never return, grief will kill me. I shall have that tardy consolation."

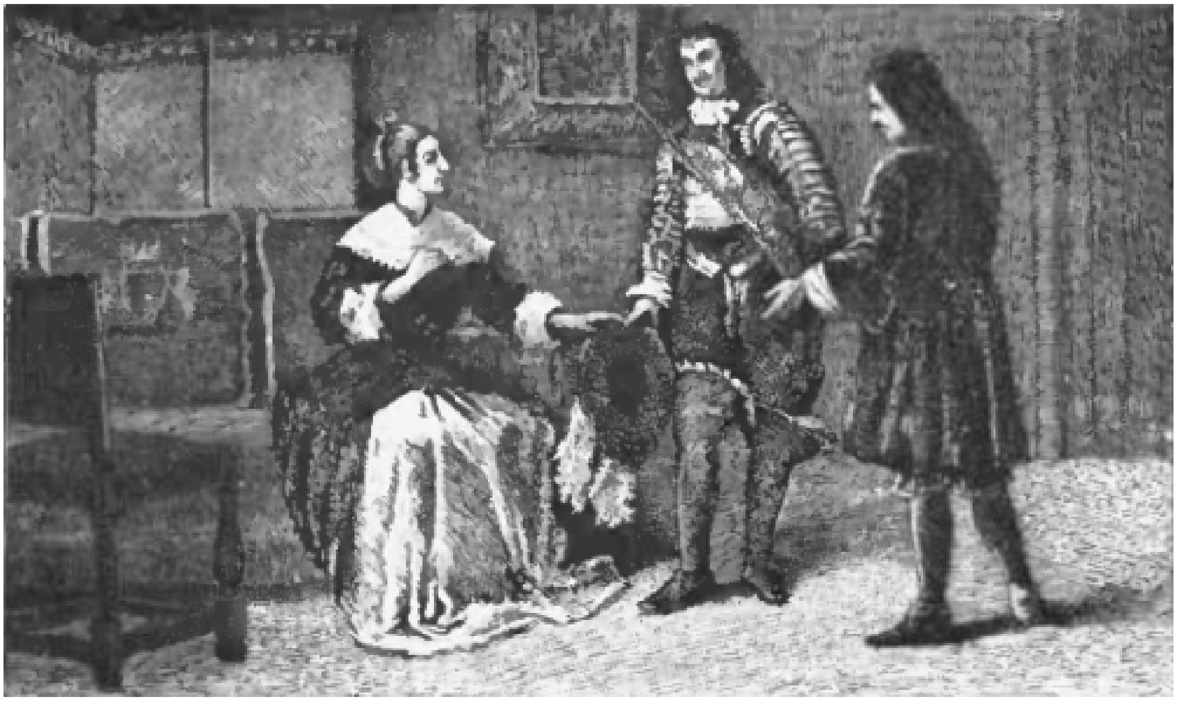
Both rose, and Ordener placed Ethel's arm within his own, and took that adored hand in his. They silently traversed the winding alleys of the gloomy garden, and reluctantly reached the gate which led into the world. There, Ethel, drawing a pair of tiny gold scissors from her bosom, cut off a curl of her beautiful black hair.

“Take it, Ordener; let it go with you; let it be happier than I am.”

Ordener devotedly pressed to his lips this gift from his beloved.

She added: “ Ordener, think of me; I will pray for you. My prayers may be as potent with God as your arms with the demon.”

Ordener bowed before this angel. His soul was too full for words. They remained clasped in each other’s arms for some time. As they were about to part, perhaps forever, Ordener, with a sad thrill, enjoyed the happiness of holding Ethel to his heart once more. At last, placing a long, pure kiss upon the sweet girl’s clouded brow, he rushed violently down the winding stairs, which a moment later echoed with the sweet and painful word, “ Farewell!”



Countess d’Ahlefeld, Frederic, and Musdæmon

CHAPTER X TUTOR AND PUPIL.

You would never think her unhappy. Everything about her speaks of happiness. She wears necklaces of gold, and purple robes. When she goes out, a throng of vassals lie prostrate in her path, and obedient pages spread carpets before her feet. But none see her in the solitude that she loves; for then she weeps, and her husband does not see her tears. I am that miserable being, the spouse of an honorable man, of a noble count, the mother of a child whose smiles stab me to the heart.

Maturin: Bertram.

The Countess d'Ahlefeld rose after a sleepless night to face a restless day. Half reclining on a sofa, she pondered the bitter aftertaste of corrupt pleasures, and the crime which wastes life in ecstasy without enjoyment and grief without alleviation. She thought of Musdœmon, whom guilty illusions had once painted in such seductive colors, so frightful now that she had penetrated his mask and seen his soul through his body. The wretched woman wept, not because she had been deceived, but because her eyes were no longer blinded, tears of regret, but not of repentance; therefore her tears afforded her no relief. At this moment her door was opened. She dried her eyes quickly, and turned away, annoyed at being surprised, for she had given orders that she was not to be disturbed. On seeing Musdœmon her vexation changed to fright, which was dispelled when she found that her son Frederic was with him.

"Mother," cried the lieutenant, " how does it happen that you are here? I thought you were at Bergen. Have our fine ladies taken to running about the country? "

The countess received Frederic with kisses, to which, like all spoiled children, he responded very coldly. This was possibly the worst of punishments to the unhappy woman. Frederic was her beloved son, the only creature in the world for whom she felt an unselfish affection; for a degraded woman often, even when all sense of wifely duty has vanished, retains some trace of the mother.

"I see, my son, that when you heard I was in Throndhjem you hastened to me at once."

"Oh, no; not I. I was bored to death at the fort; so I came to town, where I met Musdœmon, who brought me here."

The poor mother sighed heavily.

“By the way, mother,” continued Frederic, “ I am very glad to see you, for you can tell me whether knots of pink ribbon on the hem of the doublet are still worn in Copenhagen. Did you think to bring me a flask of that Oil of Youth to whiten the skin? You did not forget, I hope, the last French novel, or the pure gold lace which I asked you to get for my scarlet cloak, or those little combs which are so much used just now to hold the curls in place, or -”

The poor woman had brought nothing to her son, the only love she had on earth.

“My dear boy, I have been ill, and my sufferings prevented my thinking of your pleasures.”

“Have you been ill, mother? Well, are you better now? By the bye, how is my pack of Norman hounds? I’ll wager that they have neglected to bathe my monkey in rose-water every night. You’ll see that I shall find my parrot Bilboa dead on my return. When I am away no one thinks of my pets.”

“At least your mother thinks of you, my son,” said his mother in a faltering voice.

Had this been the inexorable hour when the destroying angel hurls sinful souls into everlasting torments, he would have felt pity for the torture which at this instant wrung the heart of the unfortunate countess. Musdœmon laughed in his sleeve.

“Sir Frederic,” said he, “I see that the steel sword has no desire to rust in its iron scabbard. You do not care to lose the wholesome traditions of Copenhagen drawing rooms within the walls of Munkholm. But yet, allow me to ask you, what is the use of all this Oil of Youth, these pink ribbons, and little combs? What is the use of all these preparations for a siege, if the only feminine fortress within the walls of Munkholm is impregnable?”

“Upon my honor, she is,” laughingly responded Frederic. “ Certainly, if I have failed, General Schack himself would fail. But how can you surprise a fortress where nothing is exposed, where every post is unremittingly guarded? How can you contend against chemisettes which cover all but the neck, against sleeves that hide the whole arm, so that only the face and hands remain to prove that the young woman is not as black as the Emperor of Mauritania? My dear tutor, you yourself would have to go to school again. Believe me, that fort is not to be taken where Modesty is garrisoned.”

“Indeed! “ said Musdœmon. “ But may not Modesty be forced to surrender, if Love lay siege to it, instead of confining himself to a blockade of delicate attentions? “

“Labor in vain, rny dear friend. Love is already in possession of the place, but he serves to reinforce Modesty.”

‘‘ Ah, Sir Frederic, this is news indeed, with Love on your side “

“And who tells you, Musdœmon, that he is on my side? “

“On whose, then? “ exclaimed Musdœmon and the countess, who had listened in silence until now, but who was reminded of Ordener by the lieutenant’s last words.

Frederic was about to answer, and was already preparing a spicy account of the scene of the previous night, when he remembered the silence prescribed by the etiquette of duelling, which changed his gayety to confusion.

“I’ faith,” said he, “ I don’t know, that of some clown perhaps, some retainer.”

“Some soldier of the garrison? “ said Musdœmon, laughing heartily.

“What, my son! “ exclaimed the countess in her turn. “ Are you sure that she loves a rustic, a serf? What luck, if you are sure of it! “

“Oh, of course I am sure. But it ‘s not one of the soldiers of the garrison,” added the lieutenant, with an offended air. “ I am sure enough of what I say, however, to beg you, mother, to cut short my very unnecessary exile at that confounded castle.”

The countess’s face brightened on hearing of the young girl’s fall. Ordener Guldenlew’s eagerness to visit Munkholm now appeared to her in very different colors. She gave her son the benefit of them.

“You must give us an account, Frederic, of Ethel Schumacker’s loves. I am not surprised; the daughter of a boor can only love a boor. Meantime, do not curse that castle which yesterday afforded you the honor of the first advances towards an acquaintance, from a certain distinguished personage.”

“What, mother! “ said the lieutenant, staring at her,- “what distinguished personage?”

“A truce to jests, my son. Did no one visit you yesterday? You see that I know all about it.”

“I’ faith, more than I do, Mother. Deuce take me if I saw a face yesterday, except those of the masks carved beneath the cornices of those old towers.”

“What, Frederic! You saw nobody? “

“No one, mother! “

In omitting to mention his antagonist of the donjon, Frederic obeyed the law which bound him to silence; besides, could that clodhopper be counted as any one?

“What! “ said his mother. “ Did not the viceroy’s son visit Munkholm last night?”

The lieutenant laughed. “ The viceroy’s son! Indeed, mother, you must be dreaming, or else you are joking.”

“Neither, my son. Who was on guard yesterday? “

“I myself, mother.”

“And you did not see Baron Ordener? “

“Not a bit of it,” repeated the lieutenant.

“But consider, my boy, he may have entered in disguise. You never saw him, having been brought up at Copenhagen, while he was educated at Throndhjem. Remember all the stories about his caprices and whims, and his eccentric ideas. Are you sure, my son, that you did not see any one? “

Frederic hesitated an instant.

“No,” he cried, “ no one. I can say no more.”

“Then,” replied the countess, “ I suppose the baron did not go to Munkholm.”

Musdœmon, at first surprised like Frederic, had listened attentively. He interrupted the countess.

“Allow me, noble lady. Master Frederic, pray tell me the name of the dependent loved by Schumacker’s daughter.”

He repeated his question; for Frederic, who for some moments had been lost in thought, did not hear him.

“I do not know; or rather no, I do not know.”

“And how, sir, do you know that she loves a dependent? “

“Did I say so? A dependent? well, yes; he is a dependent.”

The awkwardness of the lieutenant’s position increased momentarily. This series of questions, the ideas to which they gave rise, his enforced silence, threw him into a confusion which he feared he could not much longer control.

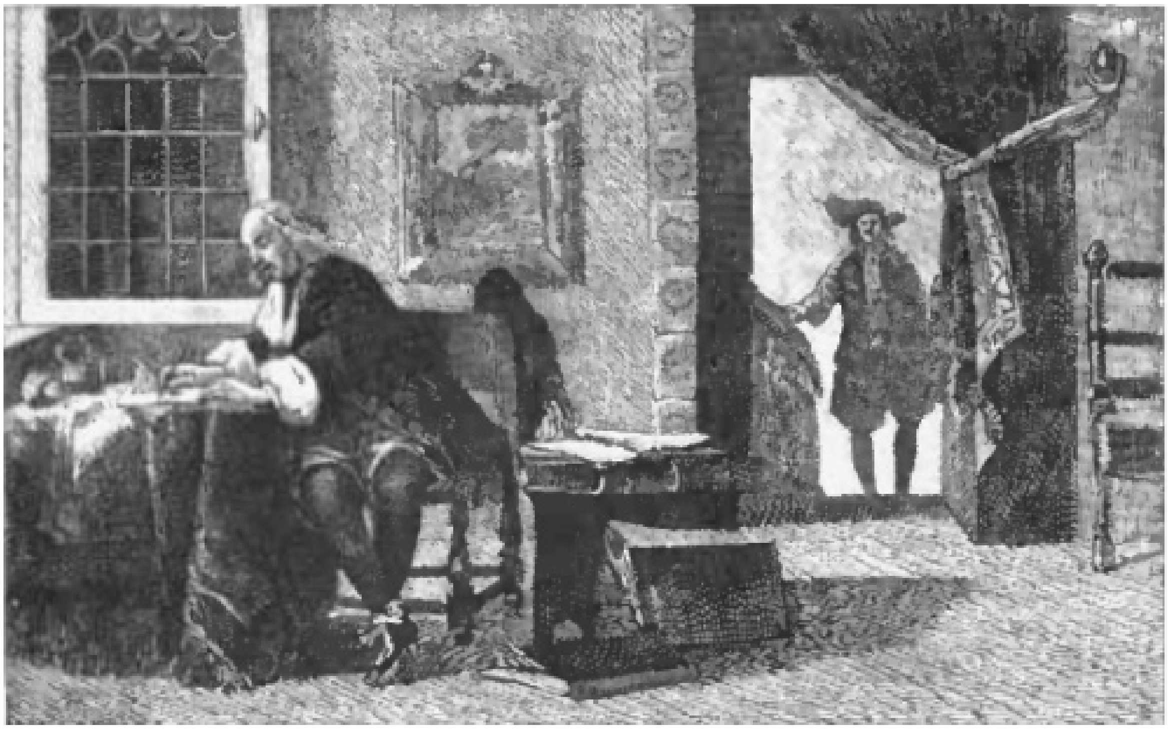
“Upon my word, Mr. Musdœmon, and you, my lady mother, if a mania for asking questions be the latest fashion, you may amuse yourselves by questioning each other. For my part, I’ll have nothing more to say to you.”

And flinging open the door, he disappeared, leaving them plunged in an abyss of doubt. He hastened down into the courtyard, for he heard

Musdœmon’s voice calling him back.

He mounted his horse and rode toward the harbor, where he intended to take a boat for Munkholm, thinking that there he might find the stranger who had given rise to such serious thoughts in the greatest feather-brain of a feather-brained capital.

“If that was Ordener Guldenlew,” he reflected, “ then my poor Ulrica But no; it is impossible that he could be such a fool as to prefer the penniless daughter of a prisoner of State to the wealthy daughter of an allpowerful minister. At any rate, Schumacker’s daughter can be no more than a caprice; and there is nothing to hinder a man who has a wife from having a mistress too; in fact, it is quite the stylish thing. But no, it was not Ordener. The viceroy’s son would never wear such a shabby jacket. And that old black plume without a buckle, beaten bv the wind and rain! And that great cloak, big enough for a tent! And that disordered hair, with no combs and no frizzes! And those boots with iron spurs, covered with mud and dust! Indeed, it could never be he. Baron Thorwick is a knight of the Dannebrog. That fellow wore no decoration. If I were a knight of the Dannebrog, I believe I should wear the collar of the order to bed. Oh. no! He had never even read ‘ Clelia.’ No, it was not the viceroy’s son.”



General Levin de Knud.

CHAPTER XI PLOTS AND COUNTERPLOTS.

If man could still retain his warmth of soul when experience has taught him, if he could inherit the legacies of time without bending beneath the weight, he would never attack those exalted virtues whose first lesson is ever self-sacrifice.

Madame De Staël: Germany.

Well, what is it? You, Poël! what brings you here?"

"Your Excellency forgets that you yourself summoned me."

"Did I? " said the general. " Oh, I wanted you to hand me that portfolio."

Poël handed the governor the portfolio, which he could have reached himself by stretching out his arm.

His Excellency mechanically replaced it without opening it; then he turned over some papers in an absent- minded way.

"Poël, I was going to ask you What time is it? "

"Six o'clock in the morning," replied the general's servant, who was facing the clock.

"I was going to tell you, Poël- What is the news today at the palace? "

The general went on shuffling his papers, writing a few words on each with a preoccupied air.

"Nothing, your Excellency, except that we are still expecting my noble master, about whom I see the general is anxious."

The general rose from his big writing-table, and looked at Poël somewhat angrily.

"Your eyes are very poor, Poël. I, anxious about Ordener, indeed! I know the reason for his absence; I do not expect him yet."

General Levin de Knud was so jealous of his authority that he would have considered it compromised had a subaltern been able to guess his secret thoughts, and learn that Ordener had acted without his orders.

"Poël," he added, " you may go."

The servant left the room.

"Really," exclaimed the general when he was left alone, " Ordener uses and abuses his privileges. A blade too often bent will break. To make me spend a night in sleepless impatience! To expose General Levin to the sarcasms of a chancellor's wife and the conjectures of a servant! And all this that an aged enemy may have those first greetings which are due to an old friend! Ordener! Ordener! whims are destructive of liberty I Let him come, only let him come now, deuce take me if I don't receive him as gunpowder does fire,- I'll blow him up! To expose the governor of Throndhjem to a servant's conjectures and a she-chancellor's sarcasms! Let him come! "

The general went on making marginal notes on his papers without reading them, so all-absorbing was his ill-temper.

"General! my noble father! " cried a familiar voice; and Ordeher clasped in his arms the old man, who did not even try to repress a cry of joy.

"Ordener, my good Ordener! Zounds! how glad I am! " He collected his thoughts in the middle of his phrase. " I am glad, Baron, that you have learned to control your feelings. You seem pleased to see me again. It was probably to mortify your flesh, that you deprived yourself of that pleasure for a whole day and night."

"Father, you have often told me that an unfortunate enemy should be put before a fortunate friend. I come from Munkholm."

"Of course," said the general, " when the enemy's misfortune is imminent. But Schumacker's future- "

"Looks more threatening than ever. Noble General, there is an odious plot on foot against that unlucky man. Men born his friends, would ruin him; a man born his foe, must serve him."

The general, whose face had gradually cleared, interrupted Ordener.

"Very good, my dear Ordener. But what are you talking about? Schumacker is under my protection. What men? What plots? "

Ordener could scarcely have replied plainly to this question. He had but very vague gleams of light, very uncertain suspicions as to the position of the man for whom he was about to expose his life. Many will think that he acted foolishly; but young hearts do what they think right by instinct, and not from calculation; and besides, in this world, where prudence is so barren and wisdom so caustic, who denies that generosity is folly? All is relative on earth, where all is limited; and virtue would be the greatest madness if there were no God behind man. Ordener was at the age to believe and to be believed. He risked his life trustingly. Even the general accepted reasons which would not have borne calm discussion.

"What plots? What men? Good father, in a few days I shall have solved the mystery; then you shall know all that I know. I must start off again tonight."

“What!” cried the old man, “ can you spare me but a few hours? Where are you going? Why are you going, my dear son? “

“You have sometimes allowed me, my noble father, to perform a praiseworthy act in secret.”

“Yes, my brave boy; but you are going without knowing why, and you know what an important affair requires your presence here.”

“My father has given me a month to consider the matter, and I shall devote that time to the interests of another. A good deed is often fruitful in good advice. Besides, we will see about it on my return.”

“How!” anxiously asked the general;” don’t you like this match? They say that Ulrica d’Ahlefeld is very beautiful. Tell me, have you seen her? “

“I believe I have,” said Ordener. “ Yes, I believe that she is handsome.”

“Well?” rejoined the governor.

“Well,” said Ordener, “ she will never be my wife.”

These cold, decisive words startled the general as if he had received a violent blow. He recalled the suspicions of the haughty countess.

“Ordener,” said he, shaking his head, “ I ought to be wise, for I have sinned. Well, I am nothing but an old fool! Ordener, the prisoner has a daughter

“Oh.” cried the young man, “ General, I wanted to speak to you of her. I ask your protection, father, for that helpless and oppressed young girl.”

“Indeed,” said the governor, gravely, “ your request is urgent.”

Ordener recovered himself.

“And why should it not be urgent for a poor captive whose life, and, what is far more precious, her honor, is in danger? “

“Life! honor! Why, I still govern here, and I know nothing of all these horrors! Explain yourself.”

“Noble father, the lives of the prisoner and his defenceless daughter are threatened by an infernal plot.”

“What you say is serious. What proofs have you?”

“The oldest son of a powerful family is even now at Munkholm. He is there to seduce Countess Ethel; he told me so himself.”

The general started back.

“Good God! Poor, forlorn creature! Ordener, Ordener, Ethel and Schumacker are under my protection. Who is this wretch? What is the name of the family? “

Ordener approached the general and wrung his hand.

“It is the D’Ahlefeld family.”

“D’Ahlefeld .’ “ said the governor. “ Yes, it is all clear. Lieutenant Frederic is at Munkholm now. My noble Ordener, would they marry you to such a brood! I understand your aversion, Ordener.”

The old man, folding his arms, thought for some moments, then clasped Ordener in his embrace.

“Ordener, you may go. Your friends shall not lack protection; I will guard them. Yes, go; you are perfectly right. That infernal Countess d’Ahlefeld is here; did you know it? “

“The noble lady, Countess d’Ahlefeld,” said the usher, opening the door.

At that name, Ordener mechanically withdrew to the back of the room; and the countess, entering without seeing him, exclaimed,

“General, your pupil is deceiving you. He never went to Munkholm.”

“Indeed? “ said the general.

“Good gracious, no! My son Frederic, who has just left the palace, was on duty yesterday in the donjon, and he saw no one.”

“Really, noble lady? “ repeated the general.

“So,” added the countess, with a triumphant smile, “ you need not wait for your Ordener any longer, General.”

The governor was cold and calm.

“I am no longer expecting him, Countess, it is true.”

“General,” said the countess, turning, “ I thought we were alone. Who is this? “

The countess looked searchiugly at Ordener, who bowed.

“Really,” she continued, “ I never saw him but once; still, if it were not for that dress, I should say General, is this the viceroy’s son? “

“Himself, noble lady,” said Ordener, with another bow.

The countess smiled.

“In that case, permit a lady who will soon be more closely allied to you, to ask where you were yesterday, Count? “

“Count! I do not think that I am so unfortunate as to have lost my noble father yet, my lady countess.”

“Certainly not; that was not my meaning. It is better to become a count by taking a wife than by losing a father.”

“One is no better than the other, noble lady.”

The countess, although slightly confused, made up her mind to laugh heartily.

“Come, the stories that I have heard are true. Your manners are somewhat boorish; but you will grow more used to accepting gifts from fair hands when Ulrica d’Ahlefeld has put the chain of the Order of the Elephant about your neck.”

“A chain indeed! “ said Ordener.

“You will see, General Levin,” resumed the countess, whose laugh was somewhat forced, “ that your intractable pupil will not consent to receive his colonel’s brevet from a lady’s hand either.”

“You are right, Countess,” replied Ordener; “ a man who wears a sword ought not to owe his epaulettes to a petticoat.”

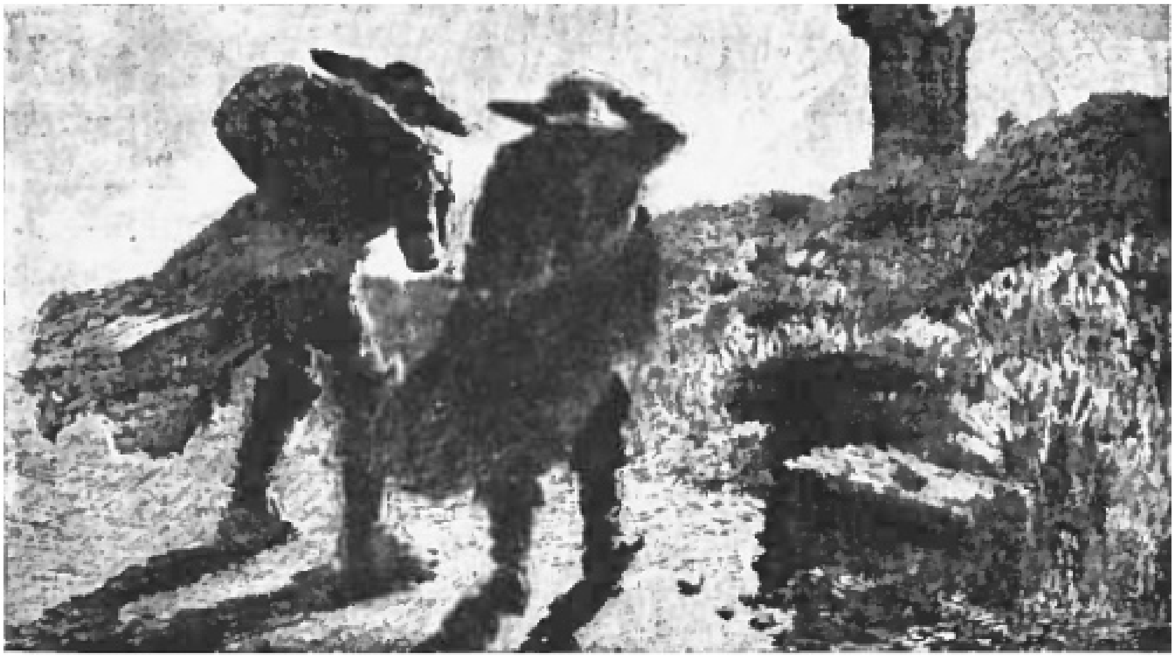
The great lady’s face darkened.

“Ho! ho! whence comes the baron? Is it really true that your Highness was not at Munkholm yesterday? “

“Noble lady, I do not always satisfy all questions. But, General, you and I will meet again.”

Then, pressing the old man’s hand and bowing to the countess, he quitted the room, leaving the lady, amazed at the extent of her own ignorance, alone with the governor, who was furious at the amount of his knowledge.

CHAPTER XII SATAN’S ARMORY.



The two Travellers

The fellow that sits next him now, parts bread with him, and pledges the breath of him in a divided draught, is the readiest man to kill him.-

Shakespeare: Timon of Athens.

If the reader will transport himself to the highway leading from Throndhjem to Skongen, a narrow, stony road which skirts Throndhjem Fjord until it reaches the village of Vygla, he will not fail to hear the footsteps of two travellers, who left the city by what is known as Skongen Gate, at nightfall, and are rapidly climbing the range of hills up which the path to Vygla winds. Both are wrapped in cloaks. One walks with a firm, youthful step, his body erect and his head well up; the point of his sword hangs below the hem of his cloak, and in spite of the darkness, we see the plume in his cap waving in the breeze. The other is rather taller than his companion, but slightly bent; upon his back is a hump, doubtless formed by a wallet which is hidden by his large black mantle, whose ragged edges bear witness to its long and faithful service. His only weapon is a stick, with which he supports his rapid and uneven steps.

If darkness prevent our reader from distinguishing the features of the two travellers, he may perhaps recognize them by the conversation which one of them opens after an hour of silent, consequently tedious travel.

“Master, my young master! we have reached the point from which Vygla tower and Throndhjem spires may both be seen at the same time. Before us, on the horizon, that black mass is the tower; behind us lies the cathedral; its flying buttresses, darker still against the sky, stand out like the skeleton ribs of a mammoth.”

“Is Vygla far from Skongen?” asked the other wayfarer.

“We have to cross the Ordals, sir; we shall not reach Skongen before three o’clock in the morning.”

“What hour is that striking now? “

“Good heavens, master! you make me shiver. Yes, that is Throndhjem clock; the wind brings the sound to us. That ‘s a sign of storm. The northwest wind brings clouds.”

“In truth, the stars have all disappeared behind us.”

“Pray let us make haste, my noble lord, the storm is close at hand, and Gill’s corpse and my escape may already have been discovered in the city. Let us make haste! “

“Willingly. Old man, your load seems heavy; give it to me, I am younger and stronger than you.”

“No, indeed, noble master; it is not for the eagle to carry the shell of the tortoise. I am too far beneath you for you to burden yourself with my wallet.”

“But, old man, if it tires you? It seems heavy. What have you in it? Just now you stumbled, and it clinked as if there were iron in it.”

The old man sprang away from the young man.

“It clinked, master? Oh, no! you are mistaken. It contains nothing but food, clothes. No, it does not tire me, sir.”

The young man’s friendly offer seemed to give his old comrade a fright which he tried to disguise.

“Well.” replied the young man, without noticing it, “ if your bundle does not tire you, keep it,”

The old man, although his fears were set at rest, made haste to change the conversation.

“It is hard to travel by night as fugitives, over a road which it would be so agreeable, sir, to take by day as observers of Nature. On the shores of the fjord, to our left, are a quantity of Runic stones, upon which may be studied inscriptions traced, they say, by gods and giants. On our right, behind the rocks at the edge of the road, lies the salt-marsh of Sciold, which undoubtedly communicates with the sea by some subterranean passage; for the sea lobworm is caught there, that strange fish, which, as your servant and guide discovered, eats sand. It was in the Vygla tower, which we are now approaching, that the pagan king Vermond roasted the breasts of Saint Etheldreda, that glorious martyr, with wood from the true cross, brought to Copenhagen by Olaf III., and conquered from him by the Norwegian king. They say that since then repeated attempts have been made to turn that cursed tower into a chapel; every cross placed there, is consumed in its turn by fire from heaven.”

At this instant a tremendous flash of lightning covered the fjord, the hill, the rocks, the tower, and faded before the two travellers could distinguish any of these objects. They instinctively paused, and the lightning was almost immediately followed by a violent peal of thunder, which echoed from cloud to cloud across the sky, and from rock to rock along the earth.

They raised their eyes. All the stars were hidden, huge clouds rolled rapidly over one another, and the tempest hung like an avalanche above their heads. The tremendous blast, before which all these masses fled, had riot yet descended to the trees, which no breath stirred, and upon which no drop of rain had as yet fallen. The roar of the storm was heard aloft, and this, with the noise of the fjord, was the only sound to be heard in the darkness of the night, made doubly dark by the blackness of the tempest.

This tumultuous silence was suddenly interrupted, close beside the travellers, by a growl which made the old man tremble.

“Omnipotent God! “ he cried, grasping the young man’s arm, “that is either the laugh of the Devil in the storm, or the voice of -”

A fresh flash, a fresh peal, cut short his words. The tempest then burst with fury, as if it had only waited this signal. The travellers drew their cloaks closer, to protect themselves alike from the rain falling in torrents from the clouds, and from the thick dust swept in whirlwinds from the dry earth by a howling blast.

“Old man.” said the youth, “ a Hash of lightning just now showed me Vygla tower on our right; let us leave the path and seek shelter there.”

“Shelter in the Cursed Tower!” exclaimed the old man; “ may Saint Hospitius protect us! Think, young master; that tower is deserted.”

“So much the better, old man! We shall not be kept waiting at the door.”

“Think of the abominable act which polluted it! “

“Well, let it purify itself by sheltering us. Come, old man, follow me. I tell you that on such a night I would test the hospitality of a den of thieves.”

Then, in spite of the old man’s remonstrances, he grasped his arm and hastened toward the building, which, as the frequent flashes showed him, was close at hand. As they approached, they saw a light in one of the loopholes of the tower.

“You see,” said the young man, “that this tower is not deserted. You feel easier now, no doubt.”

“Oh, my God! my God! “ cried the old man, “ where are you taking me, maste? Saint Hospitius forbid that I should enter that oratory of the Devil! “

They had now reached the foot of the tower. The young traveller knocked loudly at the new door of this much dreaded ruin.

“Calm yourself, old man. Some pious hermit has come hither to sanctify this profane abode by dwelling in it.” “ No,” said his comrade, “ I will not enter. I’ll answer for it that no monk can live here, unless he has one of Beelzebub’s seven chains for a chaplet.”

However, a light had descended from one narrow window to another, and now shone through the key-hole.

“You are very late, Nychol! “ cried a sharp voice; “ the gallows was erected at noon, and it takes but six hours to come from Skougeu to Vygla. Did you have an extra job?”

These questions were asked just as the door was opened. The woman who opened it, seeing two strange faces instead of the one which she expected, uttered a frightened, threatening shriek, and started back.

Her appearance was by no means reassuring. She was tall; she held above her head an iron lamp, which threw a bright light upon her face. Her livid features, her bony, angular figure, were corpse-like, and her hollow eyes emitted ominous flashes like those of a funeral torch. She wore a red serge petticoat, reaching to her bare feet, and apparently stained in spots with deeper red. Her fleshless breast was half covered by a man’s jacket of the same color, the sleeves of which were cut off at the elbow. The wind, coming in at the open door, blew about her head her long gray hair, which was insecurely fastened with a strip of bark, and lent an added ferocity to her savage face.

"Good lady," said the younger of the new-comers, " the rain falls in floods; you have a roof, and we have gold."

His aged comrade plucked him by the cloak, whispering, " Oh, master, what are you saying? If this be not the abode of the Devil, it is the habitation of some robber. Our money, instead of protecting us, will be our ruin."

"Hush!" said the young man; and drawing a purse from his bosom, he displayed it to his hostess, repeating his request as he did so.

The woman, recovering from her surprise, studied them in turn with fixed and haggard eyes. " Strangers," she cried at last, as if she had not heard their voices, " have your guardian angels forsaken you? What would you with the cursed inhabitants of the Cursed Tower? Strangers, they were no mortals who sent you here for shelter, or they would have told you: Better are the lightning and the storm than the hearth within Vygla tower. The only living man who may enter here, enters the abode of no other human being; he only leaves solitude for a crowd; he lives only by death; he has no place save in the curses of men; he serves their vengeance only; he exists by their crimes alone; and the vilest criminal, in the hour of his doom, vents on him the universal scorn, and feels that he has a right to add to it his own contempt. Strangers! You must indeed be strangers, for your foot does not yet shrink with horror from the threshold of this tower. Disturb no longer the she-wolf and her cubs; return to the road travelled by the rest of mankind, and if you would not be shunned by your fellows, do not tell them that your face ever caught the rays of the lamp of the dwellers in Vygla tower." With these words, pointing to the door, she advanced toward the two travellers. The old man trembled in every limb, and looked imploringly at the young man, who, understanding nothing of the tall woman's words because of the great rapidity of her speech, thought her crazy, and was in no wise disposed to go out again into the rain, which still fell heavily.

"Faith, good hostess, you describe a strange character, whose acquaintance I would not lose this chance of making."

"His acquaintance, young man, is soon made, sooner ended. If your evil spirit urge you to seek it, go kill some living man, or profane the dead."

"Profane the dead! " repeated the old man, in a faltering voice, hiding himself in his companion's shadow.

"I scarcely comprehend," the latter said, " your suggestions, which seem somewhat indirect; it is shorter to stay here. No one but a madman would continue his journey in such weather.”

“Unhappy man! “ exclaimed the woman, “ do not knock at the door of one who can open no door save that of the tomb.”

“And if the door of the tomb should indeed open for me with that of your abode, woman, it shall not be said that I shrank from an ill-omened word. My sword is my safeguard. Come, close the door, for the wind is cold, and take this money.”

“Bah! what is your money to me! “ rejoined their hostess; “precious in your hands, in mine it would become more vile than pewter. Well, stay if you will, and give me the gold. It may protect you from the storms of Heaven; it cannot save me from the scorn of men. Nay; you pay a higher price for hospitality than others pay for murder. Wait here an instant, and give me your gold. Yes, it is the first time that a man’s hands have entered here filled with gold, without being stained with blood.”

So saying, after putting down her lamp and barricading the door, she disappeared beneath the arch of a dark staircase built at the back of the room.

While the old man shuddered, and, invoking the glorious Saint Hospitius under every name, cordially, but in an undertone, cursed his young companion’s imprudence, the latter took the light and surveyed the large circular apartment in which they had been left. What he saw as he approached the wall, startled him; and the old man, who had watched him closely, exclaimed,

“Good God, master! a gallows? “

A tall gallows, in fact, rested against the wall, reaching to the keystone of the damp, high, arched roof.

“Yes,” said the young man, “ and here are saws of wood and iron, chains and iron collars; here is a rack, and huge pincers hanging over it.”

“Holy saints of Paradise! “ cried the old man; “ where are we? “

The young man calmly went on with his inspection.

“This is a roll of hempen cord; here are furnaces and caldrons; this part of the wall is covered with tongs and scalpels; here are leathern whips with steel tips, an axe and a mace.”

“This must be the wardrobe of hell!” interrupted the old man, terrified by this dreadful catalogue.

“Here,” continued the other, “ are copper screws, wheels with teeth of bronze, a box of huge nails, and a lever. In truth, these are sorry furnishings.

It may seem to you hard that my impatience should have brought you hither with me.”

“Really, you agree to that! “

The old man was more dead than alive.

“Do not be frightened. What matters it where you are? I am with you.”

“A fine protection! “ muttered the old man, whose increasing terror modified his fear and respect for his young companion; “ a sword three feet long against a gibbet nine feet high! “

The big, red woman returned, and again taking up the iron lamp, beckoned to the travellers to follow her. They cautiously climbed a narrow, rickety flight of stairs built in the thickness of the tower wall. At each loophole a blast of wind and rain threatened to extinguish the quivering flame of the lamp, which their hostess shielded with her long, transparent hands. After stumbling more than once upon a rolling stone, in which the old man’s alarmed fancy saw human bones scattered over the stairs, they reached the next floor, and found themselves in a circular hall like the one below. In the centre, according to Gothic custom, burned a huge fire, the smoke of which escaped through a hole in the roof, but not without perceptibly obscuring the atmosphere of the hall. It was the light from this fire, combined with that of the iron lamp, which had caught the notice of the two wayfarers. A spit, loaded with fresh-killed meat, revolved before the flames. The old man turned from it in disgust.

“It was upon that execrable hearth,” said he to his comrade, “ that the embers of the true cross consumed the limbs of a saiut.” A rude table stood some distance away from the fire. The woman invited the travellers to be seated at it.

“Strangers,” said she, placing the lamp before them, “ supper will soon be ready, and my husband will probably make haste to get here, for fear the midnight ghost should carry him off as it passes the Cursed Tower.”

Ordener for the reader has doubtless already guessed that he and his guide, Benignus Spiagudry, were the two travellers could now examine at his leisure the strange disguise, in the concoction of which Benignus had exhausted all the resources of his fertile fancy, spurred on by a dread of recognition and capture. The poor fugitive had exchanged his reindeer-skin garments for a full suit of black, left at the Spladgest by a famous Throndhjem grammarian, who drowned himself in despair because he could not find out why “Jupiter” changed to “ Jovis” in the genitive. His wooden shoes gave place to a stout pair of postilion boots, whose owner had been killed by his horses, in which his slender shanks had so much spare room that he could not have walked without the aid of half a truss of hay. The huge wig of an elegant young Frenchman, slain by thieves just outside the city gates, concealed his bald pate and floated over his sharp, crooked shoulders. One of his eyes was covered with a plaster, and, thanks to a pot of paint which he had found in the pocket of an old maid who died of disappointed love, his pale, hollow cheeks were tinged with an unwonted crimson, an ornament which the rain had now divided with his chin. Before seating himself, he carefully placed beneath him the pack which he carried on his back, first wrapping it in his old mantle, and while he absorbed his comrade's entire attention, all his thoughts seemed centred in the roast which his hostess was watching, toward which he cast ever and anon a glance of anxiety and alarm. Broken ejaculations fell from his lips at intervals:

"Human flesh! Horridas epulas! Cannibals! A feast for Moloch! Ne pueros coram populo Medea trucidet! Where are we?- Atreus- Druidess- Irmensul- The Devil struck Lycaon with lightning-" Finally he exclaimed: " Good Heavens! God be thanked! I see a tail!"

Ordener, who, having watched and listened attentively, had closely followed the train of his thoughts, could not help smiling.

"That tail need not comfort you. It may be the Devil's hind quarter."

Spiagudry did not hear this pleasantry. His eyes were riveted on the back of the room. He trembled, and whispered in Ordener's ear,

"Master, look yonder, on that heap of straw, in the shadow! "

"Well, what is it? " said Ordener.

"Three naked bodies, the corpses of three children! "

"Some one is knocking at the door," cried the red woman, who was squatting by the fire.

In fact, a knock, followed by two louder raps, was heard above the ever-increasing din of the storm.

"It is he at last! It is Nychol! "

And seizing the lamp, their hostess hurried downstairs.

The two travellers had not had time to resume their conversation, when they heard a confused murmur of voices below, in the midst of which they caught these words, uttered in a voice which made Spiagudry start and shiver:

"Be quiet, woman; we shall stay. The thunderbolt enters without waiting for the door to be opened."

Spiagudry pressed closer to Ordener.

"Master, master," he quavered, " we are lost! "

The sound of footsteps was heard on the stairs, and two men in ecclesiastic dress entered the room, followed by the startled hostess.

One of these men was tall, and wore the black gown and close-clipped hair of a Lutheran minister; the other was shorter, and wore a hermit's robe tied with a girdle of rope. The hood drawn over his face concealed all but his long black beard, and his hands were entirely hidden by his flowing sleeves.

When he saw these two peaceful strangers, Spiagudry recovered from the terror which the peculiar voice of one of them had caused.

"Don't be alarmed, my good lady," said the minister. " Christian ministers do good even to those who injure them; why should they harm those who help them? We humbly beg for shelter. If the reverend gentleman with me spoke harshly to you just now, he was wrong to forget the gentle voice recommended to us in our ordination vows. Alas! the most saintly may err. I lost my way on the road from Skongen to Throndhjem, and could find no guide through the darkness, no shelter from the storm. This reverend brother, whom I encountered, being like myself far from home, deigned to allow me to accompany him hither. He praised your kind hospitality, dear lady; doubtless he was not mistaken. Do not say to us, like the wicked shepherd, 'Advene, cur intras?' Take us in, worthy hostess, and God will save your crops from the storm, God will protect your flocks from the tempest, as you give a refuge to travellers who have gone astray! "

"Old man," broke in the woman in a fierce voice, " I have neither crops nor flocks."

"Well, if you are poor, God blesses the poor more than the rich. You and your husband shall live to a good old age, respected, not for your wealth, but for your virtues; your children shall grow up blessed in the esteem of all men, and be what their father was before them."

"Silence! " cried the hostess. " If they continue to be what we are, our children must grow old as we have, scorned by all, a scorn handed down from generation to generation. Silence, old man! Your blessing turns to curses on our heads."

“Heavens ‘. “ returned the minister, “ who then are you? Amid what crimes do you pass your life? “

“What do you call crime? What do you call virtue? We enjoy one privilege, we can possess no virtue and commit no crime.”

“The woman’s reason wanders,” said the minister, turning to the little hermit, who was drying his coarse robe before the fire.

“No, priest! “ replied the woman. “ Learn where you are. I would rather inspire horror than pity. I am not mad, but the wife of-”

A prolonged and violent knocking at the door drowned her words, to the great disappointment of Spiagudry and Ordener, who had silently listened to the dialogue.

“Cursed,” muttered the red woman, “ be the mayor and council of Skongen, who gave us this tower so near the high-road for our dwelling! Perhaps that is not Nychol, now.”

Still, she took up the lamp.

“After all, if it be another traveller, what matters it? The brook can flow where the torrent has passed.”

The four travellers, left alone, examined each other by the firelight. Spiagudry, terrified at first by the hermit’s voice, and then reassured by his black beard, might have trembled afresh if he had seen the piercing eye with which the monk observed him from beneath his cowl.

In the general silence the minister ventured a question: “ Brother monk, I presume that you are one of the Catholic priests who escaped from the last persecution, and that you were returning to your retreat when I was fortunate enough to meet you. Can you tell me where we are? “

The broken door of the ruined staircase opened before the hermit could answer.

“Woman, let a storm but burst, and there is always a crowd to sit at our hated board and take shelter beneath our accursed roof.”

“Nychol,” replied the wife, “ I could not help it! “

“What do I care how many guests you have, provided they pay? Money is as well earned by lodging a traveller as by strangling a thief.”

The speaker paused at the door, and the four strangers had ample opportunity to examine him.. He was a man of colossal size, dressed, like their hostess, in red serge. His enormous head seemed to rest directly upon his broad shoulders, in strong contrast with his gracious lady’s long, bony neck. He had a low forehead, flat nose, and thick eyebrows; his eyes, rimmed with red, shone like burning coals in a pool of blood. The lower part of his face was shaved smooth, exposing his big mouth, whose black lips were parted in a hideous grin, like the gaping edges of a never-healing wound. Two wisps of frizzled beard, extending from his cheeks to his chin, made his face seem square when seen from the front. He wore a gray felt hat, which dripped with rain, and which he did not deign to remove in the presence of the four travellers.

As he looked at him, Benignus Spiagudry uttered a cry of fright, and the Lutheran minister turned away, struck with horror and surprise; while the master of the house, recognizing, addressed him thus: “ What, are you here, minister! Indeed, I did not expect to have the pleasure of seeing your scared and woebegone face again to-day.”

The priest mastered his first feeling of repulsion. His face became serious and serene.

“And I, my son, rejoice at the chance which has brought together the shepherd and the lost sheep, to the end, no doubt, that the sheep may return to the fold.”

“Ah, by Haman’s gibbet,” rejoined the other with a loud laugh, “ this is the first time that ever I was compared to a sheep! Believe me, Father, if you would flatter the vulture, you must not call him a dove.”

“He who can change the vulture to a dove, consoles, my son, and does not flatter. You think that I fear you, and I only pity you!”

“You must indeed have a goodly store of pity. I should have fancied that you had exhausted it all on that poor devil to whom you displayed your cross this morning in the hope of hiding my gallows from his eyes.”

“That unfortunate man,” replied the priest, “ was less to be pitied than you; for he wept, and you laugh. Happy is he who learns in the moment of atonement how much less powerful is man’s arm than the word of God! “

“Well said, Father!” replied the host, with a horrid and ironical mirth. “ Happy is he. who weeps! That fellow to-day, moreover, had no other fault than that of loving the king so much that he could not live without making his Majesty’s picture upon little copper medals, which he then gilded artistically to render them more worthy of the royal effigy. Our gracious sovereign was not ungrateful, and rewarded him for such a display of affection with a fine hempen decoration, which, let me inform my worthy guests, was conferred upon him this very day, in Skongen market-place, by me, lord chancellor of the Order of the Gibbet, assisted by this gentleman here present, grand chaplain of the said order."

"Stop, wretched man! " broke in the priest. " How can he who punishes forget that punishment awaits us all? Listen to the thunder "

"Well, what is thunder? Satan's laughter."

"Good God, he has just looked on death, and he blasphemes!"

"A truce to your sermons, old fool! " cried the host, in a loud, angry tone, " unless you would curse the angel of darkness who has brought us together twice in one day, in the same carriage and under the same roof. Imitate your friend the hermit, who is silent, for he longs to be back again in his cave at Lynrass. I thank you, brother monk, for the blessing which I see you bestow upon the Cursed Tower every morning as you cross the hill; but the fact is that you always seemed tall to me until now, and that black beard of yours looked white. Are you sure that you are the hermit of Lynrass, the only hermit in the province of Throndhjem?"

"I am the only one," said the hermit in a hollow voice.

"We are, then," rejoined his host, " the two recluses of the district- Hollo, Becky, make haste with that roast lamb, for I am hungry. I was detained at Burlock village by that confounded Dr. Manryll, who would only give me twelve escalins for the corpse. That miserable fellow who keeps the Throndhjem Spladgest gets forty. Ha, Muster Periwig, what 's the matter with you? Are you going to tumble over? By the way, Becky, have you finished the skeleton of that famous magician, Orgivius the poisoner? It is high time it was delivered to the Bergen Museum. Did you send one of your little pigs to the mayor of Loevig to get what he owes me,- four double crowns for boiling a witch and two alchemists, and for removing several chains from the cross-beams of his tribunal, which they disfigured; twenty escalins for hanging Ishmael Typhaine, a Jew against whom the good bishop entered a complaint: and a crown for putting a new wooden arm to the stone gallows of the tower."

"Your wages," replied his wife in sour tones, "remain in the mayor's hands, because your son forgot to take a wooden spoon to receive the money, and none of the judge's servants were willing to put it into his hand."

The husband frowned.

"Only let their necks fall into my hands, and they shall see whether I need a wooden spoon to touch them. But we must manage the mayor carefully, for it is to him that robber Ivar complained that he was put to the rack by me, and not by a regular executioner, alleging that, as he had not yet been tried, he was not upon my level. By the way, wife, do keep the children from playing with my nippers and pincers; they have spoiled all my tools, so that I really could not use them today. Where are they, the little monsters? “ added the man, going up to the heap of straw where Spiagudry had fancied that he saw three dead bodies. “ Here they are in bed; they sleep through all our noise as soundly as if they had been hanged.”

From these words, whose grim horror was in strong contrast with the speaker’s mirth and fierce, frightful composure, the reader will have guessed who was the inhabitant of the Vygla tower. Spiagudry, who upon his first appearance recognized him from having often seen him act in his official capacity in the Throndhjem marketplace, felt ready to faint, particularly when he considered his own powerful personal motive for dreading this awful personage. He leaned over to Ordener, and said in scarcely articulate tones, “ It is Nychol Orugix, the hangman of the province of Throndhjein! “

Ordener, at first struck with horror, shuddered, and regretted both his journey and the storm. But soon a peculiar feeling of curiosity took possession of him, and although he pitied his old guide’s distress and terror, he devoted his entire attention to observing the speech and manners of the singular being before him, just as a man might listen eagerly to the growl of a hyena or the roar of a tiger, brought from the desert to one of our great cities. Poor Benignus was far from being sufficiently easy in his mind to make psychological observations. Hidden behind Ordener, he drew his mantle closely about him, raised a restless hand to his plaster, pulled the back of his loose periwig over his face, and sighed heavily.

Meantime the hostess had dished up the joint of roast lamb, with its reassuring tail, on a large earthen platter. The hangman seated himself opposite Ordener and Spiagudry, between the two clergymen; and his wife, after putting upon the table a jug of sweetened beer, a piece of rindebrod, and five wooden plates, sat down by the fire and busied herself in sharpening her husband’s dull tools.

“There, reverend sir,” said Orugix, laughing; “ the sheep offers you a piece of lamb. And you, Sir Periwig, was it the wind that blew your hair over your face? “

“The wind, sir, the storm “ stammered the trembling Spiagudry.

“Come, pluck up a spirit, old boy! You see that these reverend gentlemen and I are good fellows. Tell us who you are, and who your silent young friend is, and talk a bit. If your conversation is as amusing as your person, it must be funny indeed.”

“Your worship jests,” said the keeper, pursing his lips, showing his teeth and winking, to make himself look merry. “I am but a poor old man.”

“Yes,” interrupted the jovial hangman, “ some old scientist, some old sorcerer.”

“Oh, my lord and master, a scientist, but no sorcerer! “

“So much the worse; a sorcerer would complete our joyful Sanhedrim. Gentlemen and guests, let us drink to restore this old sage’s speech, so that he may enliven us at supper; the health of the man we hanged today, brother preacher! Well, father monk, do you refuse my beer?”

The hermit had, indeed, drawn from under his gown a large gourd of clear water, from which he filled his glass.

“Zounds, hermit of Lynrass! “ cried the hangman, “ if you will not taste my beer, I will taste the water which you prefer to it.”

“So be it,” answered the hermit,

“First take off your glove, worthy brother,” answered the hangman. “ Water should always be poured with the bare hand.”

The hermit shook his head, saying, “ It is a vow.”

“Well, then, pour,” said the hangman.

Hardly had Orugix raised the glass to his lips when he set it down hastily, while the hermit drained his at a draught.

“By the Holy Grail! good hermit, what is that infernal stuff? I have not drank its like since the day that I came near drowning in my voyage from Copenhagen to Throndhjem. Truly, hermit, that is no water from Lynrass spring; it is salt water.”

“Salt water,” repeated Spiagudry, his terror increasing as he looked at the hermit’s glove.

“Well, well! “ said the hangman, turning toward him with a loud laugh; “ so everything alarms you, old Absalom, even to the drink of a holy monk who chooses to mortify his flesh! “

“Alas! no, master! But salt water There is but one man “

“Come, come, you don’t know what you are talking about, sir doctor; your distress must be caused by your bad conscience, or else you despise our company.”

These words, uttered in a humorous tone, reminded Spiagudry that he must needs hide his fears. To mollify his much-dreaded host, he called his vast memory to his aid, and summoned up all the presence of mind which was left to him.

"I despise you, you, my lord and master! You, whose presence in a province gives that province the mc- rum impcrium! You, mighty hangman, the executioner of secular vengeance, the sword of justice, the shield of innocence! You, whom Aristotle in the sixth book and last chapter of his ' Politics ' ranks with magistrates, and whose salary Paris de Puteo, in his treatise ' De Syndico,' fixes at five gold crowns, as this passage proves: Quinque aureos manirolto! You, sir, whose Cronstadt colleagues were ennobled when they had cut off three hundred heads, -you, whose terrible but most honorable functions are performed with pride in Franconia by the most recent bridegroom, in Reutlingen by the youngest of the city councillors, in Stedien by the last-made citizen! And do I not also know, good master, that your colleagues in France have the right of havadium upon every leper, upon pigs, and upon cake on Epiphany eve? How could I fail to feel the deepest respect for you when the abbot of Saint Germain des Piés gives you a boar's head every year, on Saint Vincent's Day, and puts you at the head of his procession! "

Here the keeper's erudite flow of fancy was abruptly cut short by the hangman.

"Upon my word, this is the first that I have heard of it. The learned abbot of whom you speak, my worthy friend, has hitherto defrauded me of all these fine privileges which you describe in such attractive fashion.-Strangers," continued Orugix, " aside from all this old fool's extravagant nonsense, it is quite true that I have missed my career. I am only the poor hangman of a poor province. "Well, I certainly ought to have done better than Stillison Dickoy, the famous hangman of Moscow. Would you believe that I am the same man who was chosen twenty-four years ago to behead Schumacker? "

"Schumacker, Count of Griffenfeld! " exclaimed Ordener.

"Does that surprise you, Sir Silent? Yes, that selfsame Schumacker who, strange to say, would again fall into my hands should it please the king to recall his reprieve. Let us empty this jug, gentlemen, and I will tell you how it happens that after so brilliant a beginning I end my career so miserably.

“In 1676, I was assistant to Ehum Stuald, the royal hangman at Copenhagen. At the time of Count Griffenfeld’s sentence, my master falling ill, I was, thanks to my powerful patrons, selected to act in his place. On June 5, - I shall never forget that day,- at five o’clock in the morning, assisted by the carpenter, I erected in the public square a huge gallows, which we hung with black, out of respect for the prisoner. At eight, the king’s guards surrounded the scaffold, and the Schleswig Uhlans kept back the crowd that thronged the square. Who would not have been dazzled in my place? Erect, and sword in hand, I stood waiting on the platform. All eyes were upon me; at that moment I was the most important personage in the two kingdoms. My fortune, thought I, is made; for what could all these great lords, who have sworn the chancellor’s ruin, do without me? I already regarded myself as the royal hangman of the town, by letters-patent; I had servants and privileges of every sort. Just listen! The clock on the fortress struck ten. The prisoner left his cell, crossed the square, and ascended the scaffold with a firm step and calm face. I wanted to tie his hair; he refused, and himself performed this last office. ‘ It’s a long time,’ he said smilingly to the prior of St. An-drew’s, ‘ since I dressed my own hair.’ I offered him the black bandage; he declined it scornfully, but without showing any contempt for me. ‘ My friend,’ said he, ‘ this is perhaps the first time on record, that the space of a few feet ever held the two officers representing the extremes of the law, the chancellor and the executioner! ‘

Those words have remained graven on my memory. He also refused the black cushion which I would have given him for his knees, embraced the priest, and knelt, after declaring his innocence in a loud voice. Then I broke his escutcheon with a single blow of my mace, crying aloud, as is the custom, ‘This is not done without just cause!’ This affront shook the count’s firm bearing; he turned pale, but soon mastered himself and said, ‘ The king gave me my arms; the king can take them from me! ‘ He placed his head on the block, turned his eyes toward the east, and I raised my sword in both hands. Now listen! At that instant a shout fell upon my ears, ‘ Pardon, in the king’s name! Pardon for Schumacker! ‘ I turned; I saw a royal aide-de-camp galloping toward the gallows waving a parchment. The count rose, with a look not of pleasure, but of satisfaction. The parchment was handed to him. ‘Good God!’ cried he, ‘ imprisonment for life! Their mercy is more cruel than death.’ He stepped, looking like a thief, from the scaffold which he had mounted so serenely. It was nothing to me. I had no idea that this man’s salvation meant my ruin. After removing the scaffold, I returned to my master still full of hope, although slightly disappointed at losing the golden crown, my fee for removing a head. That was not all. Next day I received an order to leave the city, and an appointment as executioner for the province of Throndhjem.

A provincial hangman, and that in the most miserable province of Norway! Now you shall see, gentlemen, how small causes sometimes bring about great results. The count's enemies, by way of displaying their generosity, had done all in their power to keep back the pardon until the execution was over. It lacked but one minute; they blamed me for being so slow, as if it would have been decent to prevent an illustrious man from amusing himself for a few moments, before he breathed his last! As if a royal executioner beheading a lord high chancellor could act with no more dignity and sense of proportion than a country hangman turning off a Jew! Ill-will was added to this. I had a brother; indeed, I think I have one still. He had changed his name, and succeeded in finding employment in the house of the new chancellor, Count d'Ahlefeld. My presence in Copenhagen disturbed the scoundrel. My brother despised me, because it might some time fall to my lot to hang him."

Here the fluent narrator stopped to give vent to his mirth; then he went on:

"You see, my dear guests, that I made the best of it. The deuce take ambition! I ply my calling honestly. I sell my dead bodies, or Becky turns them into skeletons, which the Bergen anatomical museum buys. I laugh at everything, even at that poor woman who was a gypsy, and whom solitude has driven mad. My three heirs are growing up in the fear of the Devil and the gallows. My name is the terror of all the children in Throndhjem. The city council furnish me with a cart and red clothes. The Cursed Tower protects me from rain as well as the bishop's palace could do. Old priests, driven hither by a storm, preach to me; learned men fawn upon me. In fine, I am as happy as most people; I drink, eat, hang, and sleep."

The hangman did not close this long speech without frequent interludes of beer and noisy bursts of laughter.

"He kills, and he sleeps!" murmured the minister; " poor wretch! "

"What a lucky fellow the rascal is! " exclaimed the hermit.

"Yes, brother monk," said the hangman; "just as much of a rascal as you are, but assuredly much luckier. You see, the business would be a capital one if people did not seem to take pleasure in cutting down my profits. Would you believe it, some great wedding has just afforded the chaplain newly appointed to Throndhjem a pretext for asking the pardon of twelve criminals who really belonged to me? “

“Belonged to you! “ cried the minister.

“Yes, to be sure, Father. Seven of them were sentenced to be whipped, two to be branded on the left cheek, and three to be hanged, which makes twelve in all. Yes, I shall lose twelve crowns and thirteen escalins if the pardon is granted. What do you think, strangers, of such a chaplain, who disposes so easily of my property? That confounded priest’s name is Athanasius Munder. Oh, if I could only get hold of him! “ The minister rose, and said in a quiet voice, with a calm manner, “My son, I am Athanasius Munder.”

At these words Orugix’s face became inflamed with fury; he started from his seat. Then his angry eye met the friendly gaze of the chaplain, and he sat down again slowly, in mute confusion.

There was a momentary silence. Ordener, who had risen from the table ready to defend the priest, was first to break it.

“Nychol Orugix,” said he, “ here are thirteen crowns to pay for the pardon of those prisoners.”

“Alas! “ interrupted the minister, “ who knows whether I can obtain their pardon? I must first manage to get a word with the viceroy’s son, for it all depends upon his marrying the chancellor’s daughter.”

“Sir chaplain,” answered the young man in a firm voice, “ your wish shall be granted. Even if Ordener Guldeulew never wears the marriage ring, the chains of your protégés shall be loosed.”

“Young stranger, you can do nothing in the matter; but God hears, and will reward you! “

Meantime, Ordener’s thirteen crowns had finished the work which the priest’s mild gaze began. Nychol’s anger being allayed, he recovered his good-humor.

“Come, reverend sir, you are a good man, worthy to serve in St. Hilary’s chapel; I spoke more harshly than I intended. You do but follow your own path; it is not your fault if it crosses mine. But there is one man to whom I do bear a grudge, and that ‘s the guardian of the dead at Throndhjem, that old sorcerer, the keeper of the Spladgest. What ‘s his name now, Spliugry? Spadugry? Tell me, you old philosopher, who seem to be a perfect Babel of learning, you who know everything, can’t you help me to remember the name of that magician, your brother? You must have met him sometimes of a Sabbath, riding through the air on a broomstick, eh? “

Certainly, if poor Benignus could have escaped at that moment upon some such aerial steed, the narrator of this story doubts not that he would most gladly have trusted his frail and terrified body to its tender mercies. Never before was his love of life so strong as now that he clearly perceived the extreme imminence of his danger. Everything that he saw frightened him, the legends of the Cursed Tower, the wild eyes of the red woman, the voice, gloves, and beverage of the mysterious monk, the rash courage of his young companion, and especially the hangman, the hangman, into whose abode he had fallen in his effort to escape from the charge of crime. He trembled so violently that he could scarcely move, particularly when the conversation turned upon himself, and he heard the dreadful Orugix’s question. As he had no desire to imitate the heroism of the priest, his faltering tongue found great difficulty in framing a reply.

“Well! “ repeated the hangman, “ don’t you know the name of the keeper of the Spladgest? Does your wig make you deaf?”

“Somewhat, sir; but,” he finally stammered out, “I don’t know his name, I swear I don’t.”

“He don’t know? “ said the hermit’s terrible voice. “He does wrong to take oath to it. That man’s name is Benignus Spiagudry.”

“My name! my name! Great heavens! “ exclaimed the affrighted old man.

The hangman burst out laughing. “ And who said that it was your name? We are talking of that dog of a keeper. In good sooth, this learned fellow is scared at nothing. How would it be if his ridiculous grimaces had a genuine cause? It would be fun to hang the old fool. So then, venerable doctor,” added the hangman, whom Spiagudry’s fears entertained, “ you do not know this Benignus Spiagudry? “

“No, master,” said the keeper, somewhat reassured by his disguise; “ I assure you I don’t know him. And since he is so unfortunate as to displease you, I should be very sorry, master, indeed I should, if I did know the fellow.”

“And you, hermit,” said Orugix, “ you seem to know him? “

“Yes, truly,” replied the hermit; “ he is a tall, dried-up, bald old fellow “

Spiagudry, justly alarmed at this minute description, hastily adjusted his wig.

"He has," added the hermit, " long hands like those of a thief who has not seen a traveller for a week, a bent back "

Spiagudry sat up as straight as he could.

"Moreover, he might easily be taken for one of the corpses in his charge if he had not such sharp eyes."

Spiagudry clapped his hand to his plaster.

"Many thanks, Father," said the hangman; " I shall know the old Jew now, wherever I may run across him."

Spiagudry, who was an excellent Christian, indignant at this intolerable insult, could not help exclaiming, " Jew, master! "

Then he stopped short, trembling lest he had said too much.

"Well, Jew or Pagan, what does it matter which, if he have dealings with the Devil, as they say he has? "

"I should readily believe it," rejoined the hermit, with a sarcastic smile, not quite hidden by his cowl, " if he were not such a coward. But how could he covenant with Satan? He is as cowardly as he is wicked. When fear takes possession of him, he actually forgets his own identity."

The hermit spoke slowly, as if with intention, the very deliberation of his words lending them peculiar force.

"He forgets his own identity! " mentally repeated Spiagudry.

"It 's a pity for a bad man to be a coward," said the hangman; " for he 's not worth hating. We fight a serpent, but we can only crush a lizard."

Spiagudry ventured a few words in his own defence.

"But, gentlemen, are you sure that the official of whom you speak is really what you say? Is his reputation so bad? "

"His reputation! " repeated the hermit; " he has the worst reputation of any man in the district! "

Benignus, in his disappointment, turned to the hangman.

"Master, what fault have you to find with him? For I do not doubt that your dislike is just."

"You are right, old man, not to doubt it. As his trade resembles mine, Spiagudry does all he can to injure me."

"Oh, master, never believe it! Or, if it be so, it is because he never saw you, as I have, surrounded by your good wife and lovely children, admitting strangers to the delights of your domestic circle. Had he enjoyed your kind hospitality as I have, sir, the unfortunate man could never be your enemy."

Spiagudry had scarcely ended this wily speech, when the tall woman, who had been silent until then, rose, and said in a sharp, stern voice, " The viper's tongue is never more venomous than when it is smeared with honey." Then she sat down again, and went on polishing her pincers, a task whose hoarse, grating sound, filling up the spaces in the conversation, performed the office of the chorus in a Greek tragedy, at the expense of the ears of the four travellers.

"That woman is crazy indeed!" thought the keeper, unable otherwise to explain the ill effect of his flattery.

"Becky is right, my fair-haired sage," exclaimed the hangman. "I shall think you have a viper's tongue, if you defend that Spiagudry much longer."

"God forbid, master! " exclaimed the latter; " I would not defend him for the world."

"Very good. You do not know how far he carries his insolence. Would you believe that the impudent scamp is bold enough to dispute my right to the possession of Hans of Iceland?"

"Hans of Iceland!" exclaimed the hermit.

"Yes, to be sure. Do you know that famous knave? "

"Yes," said the hermit.

"Well, every thief belongs to the hangman, doesn't he? What does that infernal Spiagudry do? He asks to have a price set upon the head of Hans."

"He asks to have a price set upon the head of Hans? " interrupted the hermit.

"He had the audacity to do so, and that, simply that the body might fall to his share, and I might be defrauded of my property."

"What an outrage, Master Orugix, to dare to dispute your right to a thing which so plainly belongs to you!"

These words were accompanied by a malicious smile, which alarmed Spiagudry.

"The trick is all the worse, hermit, because I only need one good hanging, such as that of Hans would be, to remove me from my obscurity, and to make the fortune which I failed to make by beheading Schumacker."

"Indeed, Master Nychol? "

"Yes, brother monk, on the day that Hans is arrested, come and see me, and we will sacrifice a fat pig to my future greatness."

“Gladly; but who knows whether I shall be at liberty upon that day? Besides, you just now sent ambition to the Devil.”

“Oh, why not, Father, when I see that to destroy my best founded hopes it only needs a Spiagudry, and a request to set a price upon a man’s head? “

“Ah! “ repeated the hermit, in a peculiar tone; “ so Spiagudry asked that a price be set!”

That voice was to the wretched keeper what the toad’s eye is to a bird.

“Gentlemen,” he urged, “ why judge rashly? It is not at all sure; it may be a false report.”

“A false report!” cried Orugix; “the thing is but too certain. The petition of the city council, supported by the signature of the keeper of the Spladgest, is in Throndhjem at this very moment. It only waits the decision of his excellency the governor-general.”

The hangman was so well informed, that Spiagudry dared not continue his defence; he contented himself with swearing inwardly, for the hundredth time, at his youthful companion. But what was his horror when he heard the hermit, who for some moments had seemed lost in thought, suddenly exclaim in bantering tones: “Master Nychol, what is the penalty for sacrilege? “

These words produced the same effect on Spiagudry as if his periwig and plaster had been torn off. He anxiously awaited the reply of Orugix, who stopped to empty his glass.

“That depends on the nature of the sacrilege,” said the hangman.

“Suppose it was profaning the dead? “

Upon this the shivering Spiagudry expected every instant to hear his name issue from the lips of the unaccountable monk.

“Formerly,” coolly remarked Orugix, “ they buried the offender alive, with the body he had outraged.”

“And now? “

“Now the punishment is milder.”

“Is milder! “ said Spiagudry, scarcely daring to breathe.

“Yes,” rejoined the hangman, with the satisfied and indifferent air of an artist talking of his own art; “ they brand him first, with a hot iron, with the letter S, on the calf of the leg.”

“And then?” broke in the old keeper, upon whom it would have been difficult to inflict this part of the sentence.

“Then,” said the executioner, “ they merely hang him.”

“Mercy ‘ “ said Spiagudry; “ hang him! “

“Well, what ‘s the matter with you? You look at me as the victim looks at the gallows.”

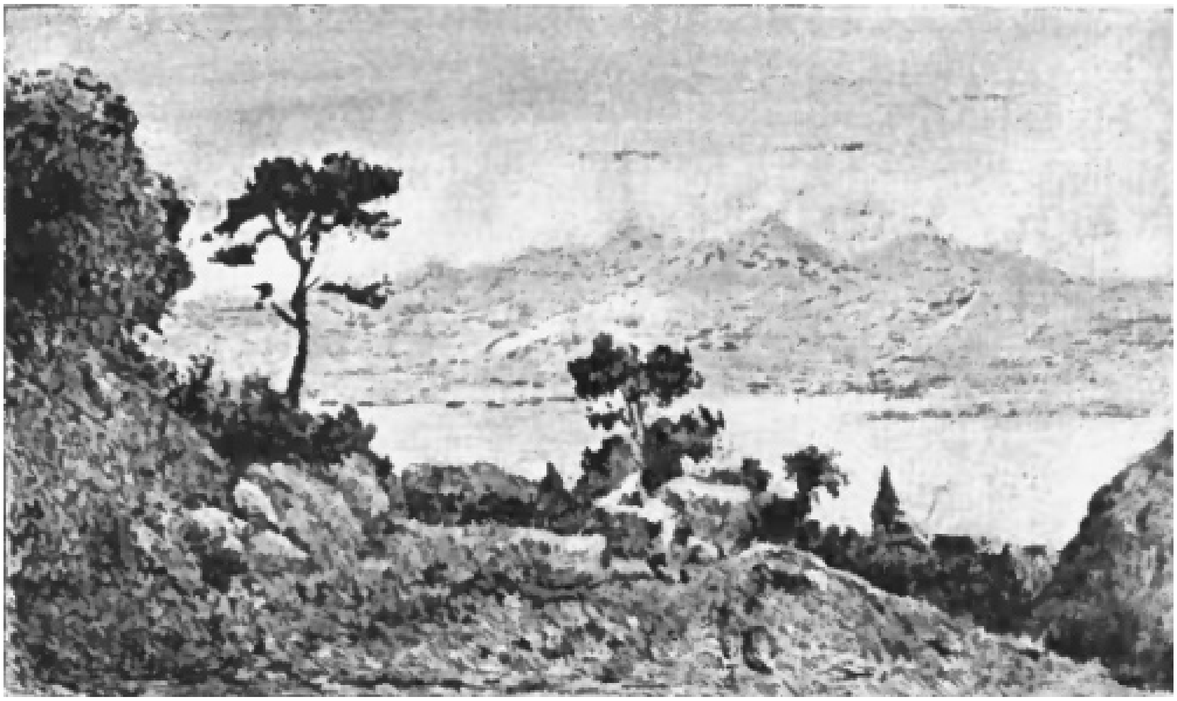
“I am glad,” said the hermit, “ to see that people are growing more humane.”

At this moment, the storm having ceased, the clear, intermittent sound of a horn was distinctly heard outside.

“Nychol,” said his wife, “they are in search of some malefactor; that ‘s the horn of the bowmen.”

“The horn of the bowmen! “ repeated each of the company, in different accents, but Spiagudry in tones of unmistakable terror.

They had scarcely uttered the words when there was a knock at the door.



Loevig

CHAPTER XIII THE LOVING CUP.

Only a man, a sign, is needed; the elements of revolution are ready. “Who will be the first? So soon as there is a fulcrum, everything will move.
Bonaparte.

Loevig- is a large town, situated on the north side of Throndhjem fjord, and sheltered by a low chain of bare hills, singularly diversified by various sorts of crops, like broad bits of mosaic resting upon the horizon. The appearance of the town is gloomy; the fishermen’s cabins, made of twigs and reeds, the conical hut, constructed of earth and stones, in which the invalid miner spends the few days which his scanty savings allow him to devote to sunshine and rest, and the frail ruin which the chamois hunter in his turn decks with a straw roof and walls hung with skins, line streets longer than the town itself, because they are narrow and crooked. In a square where now exist only the remains of a great tower, once stood the ancient fortress built by Horda the Fine Archer, lord of Loevig, and brother-in-arms of the pagan king Halfdan, occupied in 1698 by the mayor of the town, who would have been the best-lodged citizen in the city, if it had not been for the silvery stork who every summer perched on the tip of the sharp spire of the church, like the white pearl on the top of a mandarin’s pointed cap.

On the morning of the same day that Ordener reached Throndhjem, another personage, also incognito, landed at Loevig. His gilded litter, although without armorial bearings, his four tall lackeys, armed to the teeth, instantly became the topic of every conversation, and roused the curiosity of all. The landlord of the Golden Gull, a small tavern at which the great man alighted, himself assumed an air of mystery, and answered every question with an “ I don’t know,” which seemed to imply, “ I know all, but you shall know nothing.” The tall lackeys were as mute as fishes, and more obscure than the mouth of a mine.

The mayor shut himself up in his tower, waiting with great dignity for the stranger to make the first visit; but the inhabitants were soon surprised to see him call twice at the Golden Gull in vain, and at evening lie in wait for a bow from the stranger, as he sat at the half-open window. From this the gossips inferred that the great man had made his high rank known to the lord mayor. They were mistaken. A messenger sent by the stranger presented himself at the mayor’s office to get his passport signed, and the mayor noticed upon the green seal two crossed hands supporting an ermine mantle, surmounted by a count’s coronet upon a shield, from which depended the collars of the Orders of the Elephant and the Dannebrog. This was enough for the mayor, who was most desirous of obtaining from the chancellor the lord mayoralty of Throndhjem. But his advances were useless, for the great man would see no one.

The second day of the traveller’s stay in Loevig was drawing to its close, when the landlord entered his room, saying with a low bow that the messenger expected by his Grace had arrived.

“Very well,” said his Grace; “ let him come up.”

A moment later the messenger entered, carefully closed the door, then bowing to the ground before the stranger, who had half turned toward him, waited in respectful silence until he should be addressed.

“I expected you this morning,” said the stranger; “ what detained you? “

“The interests of your Grace, Count; have I another thought? “

“How is Elphega? How is Frederic? “

“They are well.”

“Good! good! “ broke in the master; “ have you nothing more interesting to tell me? What is the news at Throndhjem? “

“Nothing, except that Baron Thorwick arrived there yesterday.”

“Yes, I know that he wanted to consult that old Mecklenburger, Levin, about his marriage. Do you know the result of his interview with the governor? “

“To-day at noon, when I left, he had not yet seen the general.”

“What! and he arrived last night! You surprise me, Musdœmon. And had he seen the countess? “

“Still less, sir.”

“Then you saw him? “

“No, noble master; besides, I do not know him.”

“And how, if no one has seen him, do you know that he is in Throndhjem? “

“Through his servant, who was at the governor’s palace yesterday.”

“But he, did he go elsewhere? “

“His servant declares that as soon as he arrived, he set off for Munkholm, after first visiting the Spladgest.”

The count’s eye flashed fire.

“For Munkholm! For Schumacker’s prison! Are you positive? I always suspected that honest Levin of being a traitor. For Munkholm! What can be the attraction there? Did he want to ask Schumacker’s advice also? Did he “

“Noble lord,” interrupted Musdœmon, “ it is by no means certain that he went there.”

“What! Then why did you say so? Are you trifling with me? “

“Pardon me, your Grace! I merely repeated what the baron’s servant said. But Mr. Frederic, who was on duty yesterday at Munkholm, saw nothing of Baron Ordener.”

“That ‘s no proof! My son does not know the viceroy’s son. Ordener may have entered the fortress in disguise.”

“Yes, sir; but Mr. Frederic asserts that he saw no one.”

The count grew calmer.

“That ‘s a different matter. Did my son really say so? “

“He assured me of the fact three separate times; and Mr. Frederic’s interests in this case are identical with your own.”

This suggestion quite relieved the count.

“Ah! “ said he, “ I understand. The baron, on his arrival, must have wished to take a short sail on the fjord, and his servant fancied that he went to Munkholm. After all, why should he go there? I was foolish to take alarm. My son-in-law’s lack of eagerness to see old Levin proves, on the contrary, that his affection for him is not so strong as I feared. You will hardly believe it, my dear Musdœmon,” added the count, “ but I actually imagined that Ordener was in love with Ethel Schumacker, and I constructed a romance and an intrigue out of this journey to Munkholm. But, thank God, Ordener is not such a fool as I am. By the way, my friend, how fares it with that young Danaë in Frederic’s hands? “

Musdœmon had shared his master’s fears regarding Ethel Schumacker, and had struggled against them without overcoming them quite so readily. However, charmed to see his master smile, he took care not to disturb his peace of mind, but rather sought to add to it, that he might increase that serene temper so necessary in the great for the well-being of their favorites.

“Noble Count, your son has failed with Schumacker’s daughter; but it seems that another has been more fortunate.”

The count interrupted, him eagerly.

“Another! What other? “

“Oh, I don’t know, some peasant, serf, or vassal.”

“Do you speak the truth?” cried the count, his stern, dark face beaming.

“Mr. Frederic declares that it is so, and he told the countess the same story.”

The count rose and paced the room, rubbing his hands.

“Musdœmon, dear Musdœmon, but one more effort, and our end is gained. The young shoot is blasted. We have only to uproot the parent tree. Have you any other good news? “

“Dispolsen has been murdered.”

The count’s features brightened.

“Ah, you see that we advance from victory to victory. Have we his papers? Above all, have we that iron casket? “

“I regret to inform your Grace that the murder was not committed by our people. He was killed and robbed upon Urchtal Sands, and the deed is attributed to Hans of Iceland.”

“Hans of Iceland! “ repeated his master, his brow again clouding. “ What! that famous brigand whom we meant to put in charge of our rebellion? “

“The same, noble Count; and I fear, from what I can gather, that it will be no easy task to find him. At any rate, I have secured a leader who will take his name, and can replace him if necessary, a wild mountaineer, tall and strong as an oak, fierce and bold as a wolf in a wilderness of snow, this terrible giant must surely look much like the real Hans of Iceland.”

“Then Hans of Iceland is tall? “ inquired the count.

“That is the general opinion, your Grace.”

“I cannot but admire, my dear Musdœmon, the art with which you lay your plans. When is the insurrection to break out? “

“Oh, very soon, your Grace; perhaps it is on foot even now. The royal protectorate has long been odious to the miners; they all grasped with joy at the idea of revolt. The movement will begin at Guldbrandsdal, extend to Sund-Moer, and reach Kongsberg. Two thousand miners can be raised in three days. The rebellion will be kindled in Schumacker’s name; our emissaries use no other. The reserve forces in the South and the garrisons at Throndhjem and Skongen can be called out, and you will be here on the spot most opportunely to put down the rebellion, a fresh and significant service in the eyes of the king, and to rid him of this Schumacker, the source of such anxiety to the throne. Upon these firm foundations will rise the structure to be crowned by the marriage of our noble lady Ulrica and Baron Thorwick.”

A private interview between two scoundrels is never long, because all that is human in their souls quickly takes alarm at the infernal qualities revealed. When two depraved spirits mutually display their naked vices, each is disgusted by the other’s iniquity. Crime itself revolts at crime; and two evil-doers conversing, with all the cynicism of intimacy, of their pleasures and their interests, are like a fearful mirror, each reflecting the other’s monstrous features. Their own degradation mortifies them when seen in another, their own pride confounds them, their own nothingness alarms them; and they cannot fly from themselves or disavow their own portrait in their fellowman; for each odious harmony, each frightful coincidence, each hideous parallel finds within them an untiring voice to denounce them in their ever-wearied ear. However secret may be their intercourse, it has always two intolerable witnesses, God, whom they cannot see, and conscience, which they feel.

His confidential talks with Musdœmon distressed the count the more because the latter always unhesitatingly imputed to his master a good share of the crimes committed or about to be committed. Many courtiers think it wise to save great men from the appearance of wrong doing; they assume the responsibility of evil, and often spare their patron’s blushes by allowing him to feign resistance to advantageous crime. Musdœmon, by a refinement of skill, pursued the contrary course. He wished it to seem that he seldom advised, and always obeyed. He knew his master’s soul as familiarly as that master knew his heart; therefore he never compromised himself without compromising the count. There was no head, save that of Schumacker, that the count would have been so glad to see fall; Musdœmon knew this as well as if his master had told him, and his master knew that he knew it.

The count had learned all that he wished to learn; he was satisfied; he was now eager to dismiss Musdœmon.

“Musdœmon,” said he, with a gracious smile, “ you are the most faithful and most zealous of all my servants. All goes well, and I owe it to your devotion. I make you private secretary to the chancellor’s office.”

Musdœmon bowed low. “ Nor is that all,” added the count; “ I will ask for you, for the third time, the Order of the Dannebrog. But I still fear that your birth, your humble relations.

Musdœmon blushed, turned pale, and hid his change of color by another bow.

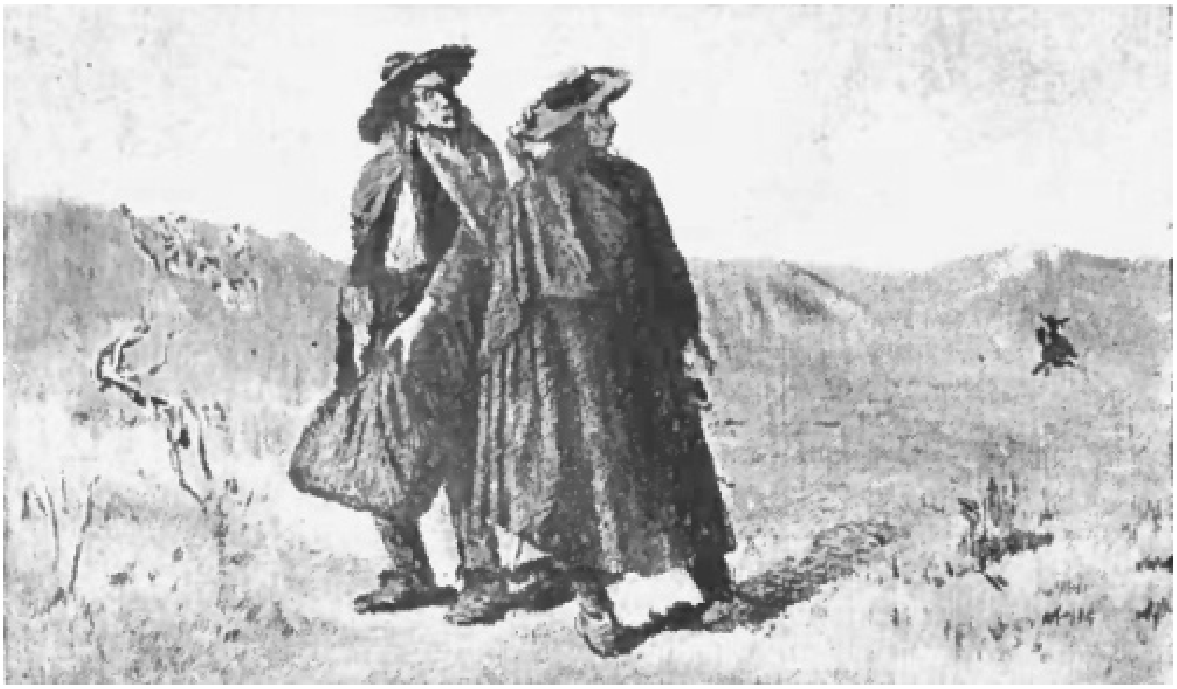
“Come,” said the count, offering him his hand to kiss, “ come, Mr. Private Secretary, draw up your pluecat! It may chance to find the king in gracious mood.”

“Whether his Majesty grant my petition or not, your Grace’s kindness overwhelms me.”

“Make haste, my dear fellow, for I am anxious to be off. We must try to get some exact information about this Hans.”

Musdœmon, with a third bow, opened the door.

“Ah! “ said the count, “ I forgot. In your new position as private secretary, you may write to the chancellor’s office and order them to dismiss this mayor of Loevig, who compromises the dignity of his position in the eyes of the villagers by his servility to strangers whom he does not know.”



Don’t I hear the Tread of a Horse?

CHAPTER XIV GREEK MEETS GREEK.

The monk at midnight visiting the cross,
The knight taming his fiery steed,
The man who with dread sound of trumpet dies.
And he who dies with peaceful voice of prayer,
Are all the objects of Thy care, lavished alike
On every pious soul, whether he tonsure wear or helm.
Hymn to Saint Anselm.

Yes, master, we really owe a pilgrimage to Lynrass grotto. “Who would have thought that the hermit, whom I cursed as if he had been the Devil, would prove to be our guardian angel, and that the sword which seemed to threaten our very lives would serve for a bridge to take us over the abyss? “

It was in these somewhat grotesquely figurative terms that Benignus Spiagudry poured into Ordener’s ears his joy, his admiration, and his gratitude for the mysterious monk. As will readily be supposed, our two travellers Had left the Cursed Tower; nay, when we again encounter them, they have even left the village of Vygla far behind them, and are painfully pursuing a steep path, interrupted by frequent pools or blocked by huge stones, which transient torrents caused by storms had washed down from the wet, sticky soil. Day had not yet dawned; but the bushes growing above the rocks on either side of the road stood out against the clear sky like dark silhouettes, and various objects, although still colorless, gradually assumed form in the dim, dull light which daybreak in the North filters through the chill fogs of early morning.

Ordener was silent, for he had yielded to that somnolent state sometimes permitted by the mechanical motion of walking. He had not slept since the night before, when he allowed himself to rest in a fishing-boat moored in Throndhjem harbor for the few hours intervening between his departure from the Spladgest and his arrival at Munkholm. Accordingly, while his body moved toward Skongen his spirit had flown back to Throndhjem Fjord, to that gloomy prison and those melancholy towers which contained the only being on earth to whom he attached any idea of hope and happiness.

Awake, thoughts of his Ethel filled his mind; asleep, her memory became a fanciful image which irradiated all his dreams. In this second life of sleep, where for a time the soul alone exists, and the physical being with all its material ills seems to disappear, he saw the beloved maiden, no more beautiful, no purer, than in reality, but happier, freer, more wholly his own. Only, upon the road to Skongen, the oblivion of his body, the torpor of his senses, could not be complete; for from time to time a bog, a stone, the branch of a tree, impeding his progress, recalled him suddenly from the ideal to the real. He would then raise his head, half open his drowsy eyes, and regret the fall from bright celestial wanderings to his painful earthly journey, where nothing could compensate for his lost illusions, save that he felt close to his heart the ringlet which was his until Ethel herself should be his own. Then this memory revived the charming dream image, and he gently relapsed, not into slumber, but into a vague, persistent revery.

“Master,” repeated Spiagudry, in a louder tone, which, combined with a blow from the trunk of a tree, aroused Ordener, “ fear nothing. The bowmen turned to the right with the hermit when they left the tower, and we are far enough away from them to venture to speak. It is true that silence was most prudent until now.”

“Indeed,” said Ordener, yawning, “ you push your prudence to extremes. It is at least three hours since we left the tower and the bowmen behind us.”

“That is true, sir; but prudence never does any harm. Only think, if I had declared myself when the chief of that infernal troop asked for Beniguus Spiagudry in a voice like that of Saturn calling for his new-born son that he might devour him! Suppose, even, I had not taken refuge in a prudent silence at that awful moment, where should I be now, noble master? “

“Faith, old man, I fancy that at that moment nothing, not even pincers, could have drawn your name from you.”

“Was I wrong, master? If I had spoken, the monk, may Saint Hospitius, and Saint Usbald the Solitary, bless him! the monk would have had no opportunity to ask the captain of the archers whether his men did not belong to the Munkholm regiment; a trifling question, merely asked in order to gain time. Did you notice, sir, after that stupid archer answered ‘ Yes,’ with what a peculiar smile the monk requested him to follow him, saying that he knew the hiding-place of the fugitive, Benignus Spiagudry? “

Here the keeper paused for a moment, as if to make a fresh start; for he suddenly resumed, in a voice quivering with emotion. “ A good priest, a worthy and upright anchorite, practising the principles of Christian virtue and evangelic charity; and I was alarmed at his mere outward appearance, forbidding enough, truly; but what a beautiful soul lies beneath! Did you notice too, noble master, that there was something peculiar in the tone with which he said to me, ‘ We shall meet again! ‘ as he led away the archers? At any other time that tone would have alarmed me; but it is not the pious and excellent hermit’s fault. Solitude undoubtedly gives that strange intonation; for I know, sir,” here the voice of Benignus sank lower, “I know another hermit, that dreadful fellow who But no; out of respect for the venerable hermit of Lynrass I will not make so odious a comparison. Neither was there anything peculiar about his gloves; it is quite cold enough to wear them; and his salty beverage does not surprise me either. Catholic anchorites often follow singular examples; the very same thing, master, is alluded to in this line by the famous Urensius, the monk of Mount Caucasus:-

‘ Rivos despiciens, marls uudain potat amaram.’

“Why didn’t I think of that verse while I was in that confounded ruin at Vygla? A little better memory would have spared me much needless alarm. To be sure, it is not easy, is it, sir, to collect your thoughts in such a den, seated at the table of a hangman, a hangman, a creature given over to universal scorn and execration, who only differs from an assassin in the frequency and impunity of his murders; whose heart to all the atrocity of the most awful brigands unites the cowardice of which at least their daring crimes do not admit; a being who offers food and drink with the same hand that wields the instruments of torture, and crushes the bones of his miserable victims between the planks of the rack! Think of breathing the same air with a hangman! And the vilest beggar, if polluted by his loathsome touch, would cast aside with horror the last rags which protected his nakedness and his disease from the wintry blast! And the chancellor, after sealing his commission, flings the paper under the table in token of his malediction and his disgust! And in France, when the hangman dies in his turn, the provost’s assistants would rather pay a fine of forty pounds than succeed him ‘. And at Pesth, when Churchill was condemned to die, and they offered to pardon him if he would turn executioner, he preferred death to such a trade. Is it not still notorious, noble sir, that Turmeryn, bishop of Maastricht, ordered a church to be purified because the hangman had entered it; and that Czarina Petrowna washed her face whenever she witnessed an execution? You know also that the kings of France, to honor warriors, permit them to be punished by their comrades, so that these brave men, even if they be criminals, may not be made infamous by contact with the hangman. And finally, which is decisive, in the ‘ Descent of Saint George into Hell,’ by the learned Melasius Iturham, does not Charon give the robber, Robin Hood, precedence over the hangman, Philip Crass? Truly, master, if ever I attain to power, which God alone can foresee, I shall put down hangmen, and restore the ancient custom and the ancient tariff. For the murder of a prince a man shall pay, as in 1150, fourteen hundred and forty doublecrown pieces; for the murder of a count, fourteen hundred and forty plain crowns; for that of a baron, fourteen hundred and forty half-crowns; the killing of a mere noble shall be rated at fourteen hundred and forty escalins; and that of a citizen “-

“Don’t I hear the tread of a horse coming toward us? “ interrupted Ordener.

They looked back, and, as day had dawned during Spiagudry’s long soliloquy, they could distinguish, a hundred paces behind them, a man dressed in black waving one hand to them, and with the other urging on one of those small dingy white ponies so often seen, either wild or domesticated, in the lower mountain ranges of Norway.

“For mercy’s sake, master,” said the timid keeper, “ let us hasten; that black fellow looks to me just like an archer! “

“What, old man; we are two, and we should fly before a single man! “

“Alas! twenty sparrows fly before an owl. What glory is there in waiting for an officer of the law? “

“And who tells you that this is one? “ rejoined Ordener, whose eyes were not blinded by fear. “ Keep up your courage, my valiant guide; I recognize this traveller. Let us wait for him.”

The keeper was forced to submit. A moment later the horseman came up with them, and Spiagudry ceased to tremble when he saw the grave, calm face of the chaplain, Athanasius Munder.

The latter greeted them with a smile, and reined in his steed, saying in an almost breathless voice, “ My dear children, it is for your sake that I retrace my steps; and the Lord will surely not permit my absence, prolonged with a charitable intent, to injure those who sorely need my presence.’’

“Sir minister,” answered Ordener, “ we shall be happy to aid you in any way we can.”

"On the contrary, it is I, noble young man, who desire to serve you. Will you deign to tell me the object of your journey? "

"Reverend sir, I cannot."

"All I ask, my son, is that your refusal may proceed from inability, and not from distrust. If not, I am indeed unhappy! Unhappy is he whom the good man distrusts, even if he have seen him but once! "

The priest's modesty and unction touched Ordener deeply.

"All that I can tell you, Father, is that we are bound to the mountains of the North."

"So I thought, my son, and that is why I followed you. There are bands of roving hunters and miners in those mountains who might injure travellers."

"What then?"

"Well, I know that it is useless to dissuade a noble young man in search of adventure; but the esteem I feel for you inspires me with another plan for helping you. The unfortunate counterfeiter to whom I bore the last consolations of religion yesterday was a miner. Just before he died he gave me a paper inscribed with his name, saying that this passport would protect me from all danger if I ever had to travel among those mountains. Alas! what can it avail a poor priest who must live and die among prisoners, and who, moreover, inter castra latronum, should seek no other defence than patience and prayer, the only weapons of God! I did not decline the pass, because we should never distress by refusal the heart of one who in a few minutes more will have nothing to receive or to give on earth. The good God deigned to inspire rne, for now I can offer you this parchment, that it may go with you in all the perils of your journey, and that the gift of the dying man may benefit the traveller."

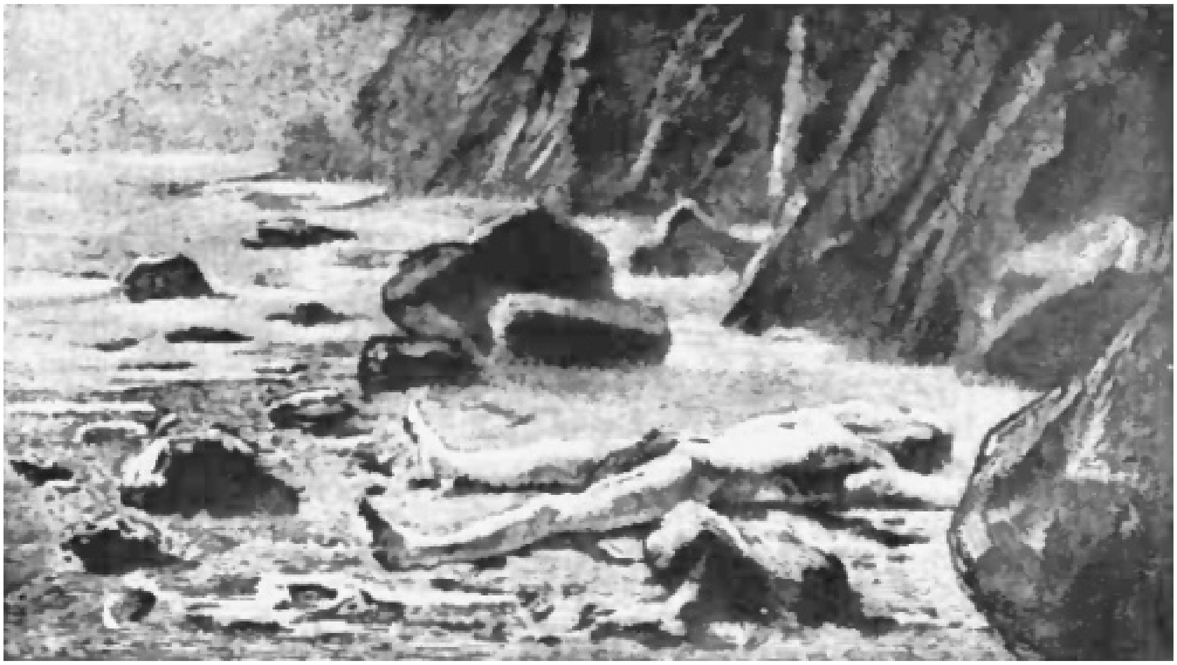
Ordener accepted the old priest's gift with emotion.

"Sir Chaplain," said he, " God grant that your prayer may be heard! Thank you.' But," he added, laying his hand on his sword, " I already carry my passport at my side."

"Young man," said the priest, "that poor parchment may perhaps protect you better than your steel blade. The gaze of a penitent man is more potent than the archangel's sword. Farewell! My prisoners await me. Pray sometimes for them and me."

"Holy priest," rejoined Ordener, with a smile, "I told you that your prisoners should be pardoned, and they shall be."

“Oh, do not speak with such assurance, my son! Do not tempt the Lord! No man can know what passes in the mind of another, and you cannot tell what the viceroy’s son may decide to do. Perhaps, alas! he will never condescend to admit a humble chaplain to his presence. Farewell, my son; may your journey be blessed, and may you sometimes remember the poor priest and pray for his unhappy prisoners.”



The Hermit of Lynrass

CHAPTER XV THE CHAPLAIN’S FREE PASS.

Welcome, Hugo; tell me, did you ever see so terrible a storm?
Maturin: Bertram.

In a room communicating with the apartments of the Governor of Throndhjem, three of his Excellency’s secretaries sat at a table loaded with parchments, papers, inkstands, and seals, a fourth chair, left vacant, showing that one of the scribes was late. They had been silently writing and thinking for some time, when one of them exclaimed: “ Did you know, Wapherney, that the poor librarian, Foxtipp, is to be dismissed by the bishop, owing to the letter which you wrote recommending Dr. Anglyvius’s petition to his favorable notice? “

“What nonsense are you talking, Richard? “ hastily inquired the secretary to whom Richard had not spoken. “ Wapherney could not have written in favor of Anglyvius, for the fellow’s petition disgusted the general when I read it to him.”

“So you told me,” answered Wapherney; “ but I found the word tributatur written on the petition in his Excellency’s own hand.”

“Indeed! “ exclaimed the other.

“Yes, my dear fellow; and several other of his Excellency’s decisions of which you told me, were also altered in marginal notes. For instance, on the petition of the miners, the general wrote, negetur.”

“What! I can’t understand that; the general dreaded the turbulent spirit of those miners.”

“Perhaps he wanted to frighten them into submission by his severity. What makes me think so is that Chaplain Munder’s request for the pardon of twelve condemned prisoners is also refused.”

The secretary whom Wapherney addressed, rose abruptly, saying, “ Oh, come now, I can’t believe that; the governor is too kind, and expressed too much compassion for those prisoners to “

“Very well, Arthur,” answered Wapherney; “ read it for yourself.”

Arthur took the petition and saw the fatal words.

“Really,” said he, “ I can scarcely credit my own eyes. I must present this to the governor again. What day did his Excellency mark these papers? “

“I believe it was some three days ago,” replied Wapherney.

“That was,” said Richard in a low voice, “ the morning before Baron Ordener’s brief appearance and mysteriously sudden disappearance.”

“Stay! “ quickly exclaimed Wapherney, before Arthur had time to answer; “ if here is not another tribuatur on Benignus Spiagudry’s ridiculous petition!”

Richard burst out laughing.

“Didn’t that old keeper of corpses disappear in a strange way, too? “

“Yes,” replied Arthur; “ a body was found in his charnel-house so mutilated that the officers of the law are in pursuit of him on a charge of sacrilege. But a little Lapp, who acted as his servant, and who was left alone at the Spladgest, thinks, as do most people, that the Devil carried him off for a sorcerer.”

“Here,” said Wapherney, laughing, “ is a fellow who leaves a good reputation behind him! “

He had hardly had his laugh out when the fourth secretary came in.

“Upon my honor, Gustavus, you are very late this morning. Did you happen to get married yesterday?”

“Oh, no! “ answered Wapherney; “ he only took the longest way round, so that he might pass under the fair Rosalie’s windows in his new cloak.”

“Wapherney,” said the new-comer, “ I only wish that you were right. But the cause of my delay is not half so agreeable; and I doubt if my new cloak produced the slightest effect upon the persons whom I visited.”

“Where have you been, then? “ asked Arthur.

“To the Spladgest.”

“Heaven is my witness,” cried Wapherney, dropping his pen, “ that we were just now speaking of that place! But though it may be talked of to pass away the time, I cannot conceive how anybody can enter it.”

“And still less,” said Richard, “ how anybody can linger there. But what did you see, my dear Gustavus? “

“Yes,” said Gustavus, “ you are curious to hear about it, if not to see it; and it would serve you right if I refused to describe those horrors which you would shudder to behold.”

The three secretaries crowded about Gustavus, who waited to be urged, although his desire to tell what he had seen was secretly no less lively than their curiosity to hear.

“Well, Wapherney, you can repeat my story to your little sister, who is so fond of frightful tales. I was pushed into the Spladgest by the crowd which thronged about it. The bodies of three soldiers and two bowmen from the Munkholm regiment had just been brought in, having been found yesterday some four miles away, in the ravine at the foot of Cascadthymore cliff. Some of the spectators declared that the poor fellows were the very ones sent out three days ago in the direction of Skongen to catch the runaway keeper of the Spladgest. If this be true, it is impossible to imagine how so many well-armed men could be murdered. The mutilation of the bodies seems to prove that they were flung from the top of the rocks. It made my hair stand on end to look at them."

"What, Gustavus! did you see them? " eagerly inquired Wapherney.

"They are still before my eyes."

"And has any one an idea as to the authors of the crime? "

"Some think that it may have been a band of miners, and assert that they heard the sound of the horn with which the soldiers call to one another, only yesterday among the mountains."

"Really! " said Arthur.

"Yes; but an old peasant demolished this supposition by remarking that there were neither mines nor miners in the neighborhood of Cascadthymore."

"Then who could it have been? "

"No one knows. If the bodies were not intact, it might be supposed the work of wild beasts, for their limbs are covered with long, deep scratches. The same is the case with the corpse of a white-bearded old man brought into the Spladgest day before yesterday, after that fearful storm which prevented you, my dear Leander Wapherney, from visiting your Hero across the fjord, on the Larsynn shore."

"All right, Gustavus," said "Wapherney, laughing. " But who was this old man? "

"From his height, his long white beard, and a rosary still clasped tightly in his hands, although he had been stripped of everything else, he was recognized as a hermit of the neighborhood; I believe they called him the Monk of Lynrass. It is evident that this poor man was murdered also; but for what purpose? People are not slaughtered now for their religious opinions, and the old hermit possessed nothing in the world but his serge gown and the good-will of all who knew him."

"And you say," observed Richard, " that his body was mangled, like those of the soldiers, as if by the claws of some savage animal? "

“Yes, my dear boy; and a fisherman declares that he noticed the same marks upon the body of an officer found murdered a few days since upon Urchtal Sands.”

“That is strange,” said Arthur.

“It is frightful,” said Richard.

“Come,” said Wapherney, “ silence, and to work, for I think the general will be here soon. My dear Gustavus, I am curious to see those corpses. If you like, we will stop a moment at the Spladgest when we leave here this evening.”

CHAPTER XVI THE WOMAN AND HER MASTER.

She with young unwakened senses,
Within her cabin on the Alpine field
Her simple homely life commences,
Her little world therein concealed.
    And I, God's hate flung o'er me,
    Had not enough, to thrust
    The stubborn rocks before me
    And strike them into dust!
    She and her peace I yet must undermine:
    Thou, Hell, hast claimed this sacrifice as thine!
    Goethe: Faust, Bayard Taylor's Translation.

In 1675, twenty-four years previous to the date of this story, sooth to say, the whole village of Thoctree rejoiced and made merry over the marriage of sweet Lucy Pelryhn and that tall, handsome, upright youth, Carroll Stadt, They had long been lovers, and every one felt a warm interest in the happy pair upon the day which was to change so many restless hopes and eager longings into assured and quiet bliss. Born in the same village, reared in the same fields, Carroll had often in their childhood slept in Lucy's lap when tired of play; Lucy had often, as a young girl, leaned on Carroll's arm as she returned from work. Lucy was the loveliest and most modest maiden in the land; Carroll the bravest and noblest lad in the village. They loved each other, and they could no more remember the day when their love began than they could recall the day when they were born.

But their marriage did not come, like their love, easily and as a matter of course. There were domestic interests to be consulted, family feuds, relations, obstacles. They were parted for a whole year; and Carroll suffered sadly far from Lucy, and Lucy wept bitter tears far from Carroll, before the dawn of that happy day which united them, thereafter never to suffer or to weep apart.

It was by saving her from great danger that Carroll finally won his Lucy. He heard cries from the woods one day; they were uttered by his Lucy, surprised by a brigand dreaded by all the mountain folk, and on the point of carrying her off to his den. Carroll boldly attacked this monster in human shape, who gave vent to strange growls like those of a wild beast. Yes, he attacked the wretch, whom none before had ventured to resist. Love lent him a lion’s strength. He rescued his beloved Lucy, restored her to her father, and her father gave her to her deliverer.

Now, the whole village made merry upon the day which united these two lovers. Lucy alone seemed depressed; and yet never had she gazed more tenderly at her dear Carroll. But her gaze was as sad as it was loving, and amid the universal rejoicing this was a subject for surprise. Every moment, as her husband’s happiness seemed to increase, her eyes expressed more and more love and despair.

“Oh, my Lucy,” said Carroll, when the sacred rites were over, “ the coming of that robber, a curse to the entire country, was the greatest blessing for me! “

She shook her head, and made no answer.

Night came; they were left alone in their new abode, and the sports and dancing on the village green went on more merrily than before, to celebrate the happiness of the bridal pair.

Next morning Carroll Stadt had vanished. A few words in his handwriting were brought to Lucy’s father by a hunter from the mountains of Kiölen, who met him before daylight wandering along the shore of the fjord.

Old Will Pelryhn showed the paper to his pastor and the mayor, and nothing was left of last night’s festival but Lucy’s gloom and dull despair.

This mysterious catastrophe dismayed the entire village, and vain efforts were made to explain it. Prayers for Carroll’s soul were said in the same church where but a few days before he himself sang hymns of thanksgiving for his happiness.

No one knew what kept Widow Stadt alive. At the end of nine months of solitary grief she brought into the world a son, and on the same day the village of Golyn was destroyed by the fall of the hanging cliff above it.

The birth of this son did not dissipate his mother’s deep depression. Gill Stadt showed no signs of resemblance to Carroll. His fierce, angry infancy seemed to prophecy a still more ferocious manhood. Sometimes a little wild man -whom those mountaineers who saw him from a distance asserted to be the famous Hans of Iceland- entered the lonely hut of Carroll’s widow, and the passersby would then hear a woman’s shrieks and what seemed the roar of a tiger. The man would carry off young Gill, and months would elapse; then he would restore him to his mother, more sombre and more terrible than before.

Widow Stadt felt a mixture of horror and affection for the child. Sometimes she would clasp him in her maternal arms, as the only tie which still bound her to earth; again she would repulse him with terror, calling upon Carroll, her dear Carroll. No one in the world knew what agitated her soul.

Gill reached his twenty-third year; he saw Guth Stersen, and loved her madly.

Guth Stersen was rich, and he was poor; therefore he set off for Roeraas and turned miner, in order to make money. His mother never heard from him again.

One night she sat at the wheel, by which she earned her daily bread; the lamp burned low as she worked and waited in her cabin, beneath those walls which had grown old like herself, in solitude and grief, the silent witnesses of her mysterious wedding-night. She thought anxiously of her son, whose presence, ardently desired as it was, would recall much sorrow, perhaps bring more in its train. The poor mother loved her son, ungrateful as he was. And how could she help loving him, she had suffered so much for him?

She rose and took from an antique wardrobe a crucifix thickly coated with dust. For an instant she looked at it imploringly; then suddenly casting it from her in horror, she cried: “ I pray! How can I pray? Your prayers can only be addressed to hell, poor woman! You belong to hell, and to hell alone.”

She had relapsed into her mournful revery, when there was a knock at the door.

This was a rare event with Widow Stadt. For many long years, in consequence of the strange incidents connected with her history, the whole village of Thoctree believed that she had dealings with evil spirits; no one therefore ever ventured near her hut, strange superstitions of that age and ignorant region! She owed to her misfortunes the same reputation for witchcraft that the keeper of the Spladgest owed to his learning.

“What if it were my son, if it were Gill! “ she exclaimed; and she rushed to the door.

Alas! it was not her son. It was a little monk clad in serge, his cowl covering all of his face but a black beard.

"Holy man," said the widow, " what would you have? You do not know the house to which you come."

"Yes, truly! " replied the hermit in a hoarse and all too familiar voice.

And tearing off his gloves, his black beard, and his cowl, he revealed a fierce countenance, a red beard, and a pair of hands armed with tremendous claws.

"Oh! " cried the widow, burying her head in her hands.

"Well," said the little man, " have you not in four -and- twenty years grown used to seeing the husband upon whom you must gaze through all eternity? "

"Through all eternity! " she repeated in a terrified whisper.

"Hark ye, Lucy Pelryhn, I bring you news of your son."

"My son! Where is he? Why does he not come? "

"He cannot."

"But you liuve news of him. I thank you. Alas! and can you bring me pleasure? "

"They are pleasant tidings indeed that I bring you," said the man in hollow tones; " for you are a weak woman, and I wonder that you could bring forth such a son. Rejoice and be glad. You feared that your son would follow in my footsteps; fear no longer."

"What! " cried the enraptured mother, " has my son, my beloved Gill, changed? "

The hermit watched her raptures with an ominous sneer.

"Oh, greatly changed!" said he.

"And why did he not fly to my arms? Where did you see him? What was he doing? "

"He was asleep."

In the excess of her joy, the widow did not notice the little man's ominous look, nor his horrible, and scoffing manner.

"Why did you not wake him? Why did not you say to him, ' Gill, come to your mother? "

"His sleep was too sound."

"Oh, when will he come? Tell me, I implore, if I shall see him soon."

The mock monk drew from beneath his gown a sort of cup of singular shape.

"There, widow," said he, " drink to your son's speedy return! "

The widow uttered a shriek of horror. It was a human skull. She waved it away in terror, and could not utter a word.

“No, no! “ abruptly exclaimed the man, in an awful voice, “ do not turn away your eyes, woman; look. You asked to see your son. Look, I say! for this is all that is left of him.”

And by the red light of the lamp, he offered the dry and fleshless skull of her son to the mother’s pale lips.

Too many waves of misfortune had passed over her soul for one misery the more to crush her. She gazed at the cruel monk with a fixed and meaningless stare.

“Dead! “ she whispered; “ dead! Then let me die.”

“Die, if you choose! But remember, Lucy Pelryhn, Thoctree woods; remember the day when the demon, taking possession of your body, gave your soul to hell! I am that demon, Lucy, and you are my wife forever! Now, die if you will.”

It is the belief in those superstitious regions that infernal spirits sometimes appear among men to lead lives of crime and calamity. In common with other noted criminals, Hans of Iceland enjoyed this fearful renown. It was also believed that a woman, who by seduction or by violence, became the prey of one of these monsters in human form, by that misfortune was doomed to be his companion in hell.

The events of which the hermit reminded the widow seemed to revive in her these thoughts.

“Alas! “ she sobbed, “ then I cannot escape from this wretched existence! And what have I done? for you know, my beloved Carroll, I am innocent. A young girl’s arm is without strength to resist the arm of a demon.”

She rambled on; her eyes were wild with delirium, and her incoherent words seemed born of the convulsive quiver of her lips.

“Yes, Carroll, since that day, though polluted, I am innocent; and the demon asks me if I remember that horrible day! Carroll, I never deceived you; you came too late. I was his before I was yours, alas! Alas! and I must be forever punished. No, I can never rejoin you, you for whom I weep. What would it avail me to die? I should follow this monster into a world as fearful as himself, the world of the damned! And what have I done? Must my misfortunes in this life become my crimes in the next? “

The little monk bent a look of triumph and command upon her face.

“Ah! “ she suddenly exclaimed, turning toward him; “ ah, tell me, is not this some fearful dream induced by your presence? For you know but too well, alas! that since the day of my ruin, every night that I am visited by your fatal spirit is marked by foul apparitions, awful dreams, and frightful visions.”

“Woman, woman, cease your raving; it is as true that you are wide awake as it is true that Gill is dead.’’

The memory of her past misfortunes had, as it were, blotted out all thought of her fresh grief; these words revived it.

“Oh, my son! my son! “ she moaned; and the tones of her voice would have moved any but the wicked being who heard it. “ No, he will return; he is not dead; I cannot believe that he is dead.”

“Well, go ask him of Roeraas rocks, which crushed out his life; of Throndhjem Fjord, which swallowed up his body.”

The widow fell upon her knees, crying convulsively, “ God! great God! “

“Be silent, servant of hell! “

The wretched woman was silent. He added: “Do not doubt your sou’s death; he was punished for the sins of his father. He let his granite heart melt in the sunlight of a woman’s eyes. I possessed you, but I never loved you. Your Carroll’s misfortune was also his. My son and yours was deceived by his betrothed, by her for whom he died.”

“Died! “ she repeated. “ died! Then it is really true? Oh, Gill, you were born of my misery; you were conceived in terror and born in sorrow; your lips lacerated my breast; as a child, you never returned my caresses or embraces; you always shunned and repulsed your mother, your lonely and forsaken mother! You never tried to make me forget my past distress, save by causing me fresh injury. You deserted me for the demon author of your existence and of my widowhood. Never, in long years, Gill, never did you procure me one thrill of pleasure; and yet to-day your death, my son, seems to me the most insupportable of all my afflictions. Your memory today seems to me to be twined with comfort and rapture. Alas .’ alas! “

She could not go on; she covered her head with her coarse black woollen veil, and sobbed bitterly.

“Weak woman! “ muttered the hermit; then he continued in a firm voice: “Control your grief; I laugh at mine. Listen, Lucy Pelryhn. While you still weep for your son, I have already begun to avenge him. it was for a soldier in the Monkholm regiment that his sweetheart betrayed him. The whole regiment shall perish by my hands. Look, Lucy Pelryhn!”

He had rolled up the sleeves of his gown, and showed the widow his misshapen arms stained with blood.

“Yes,” he said with a fierce roar, “ Gill’s spirit shall delight to haunt Urchtal Sands and Cascadthymore ravine. Come, woman, do you not see this blood? Be comforted! “

Then all at once, as if struck by a sudden thought, he interrupted himself: “Widow, did you not receive an iron casket from me? What! I sent you gold and I bring you blood, and you still weep. Are you not human? “

The widow, absorbed in her despair, was silent.

“What! “ said he, with a fierce laugh, “ motionless and mute. You are no woman, then, Lucy Pelryhn!” and he shook her by the arm to rouse her. “Did not a messenger bring you an iron casket? “

The widow, lending him a brief attention, shook her head, and relapsed into her gloomy revery.

“Ah, the wretch! “ cried the little man, “ the miserable traitor! Spiagudry, that gold shall cost you dear! “

And stripping off his gown, he rushed from the hut with the growl of a hyena that scents a corpse.

CHAPTER XVII THE RALLYING-CRY.

My lord, I braid my hair; I braid it with salt tears because you leave me alone, and because you go hence into the hills.
The Count’s Lady (Old Romance).

Ethel, meantime, had already reckoned four long and weary days since she was left to wander alone in the dark garden of Schleswig tower; alone in the oratory, the witness of so many tears, the confidant of so many longings; alone in the long gallery, where once upon a time she had failed to hear the midnight bell. Her aged father sometimes accompanied her, but she was none the less alone, for the true companion of her life was absent.

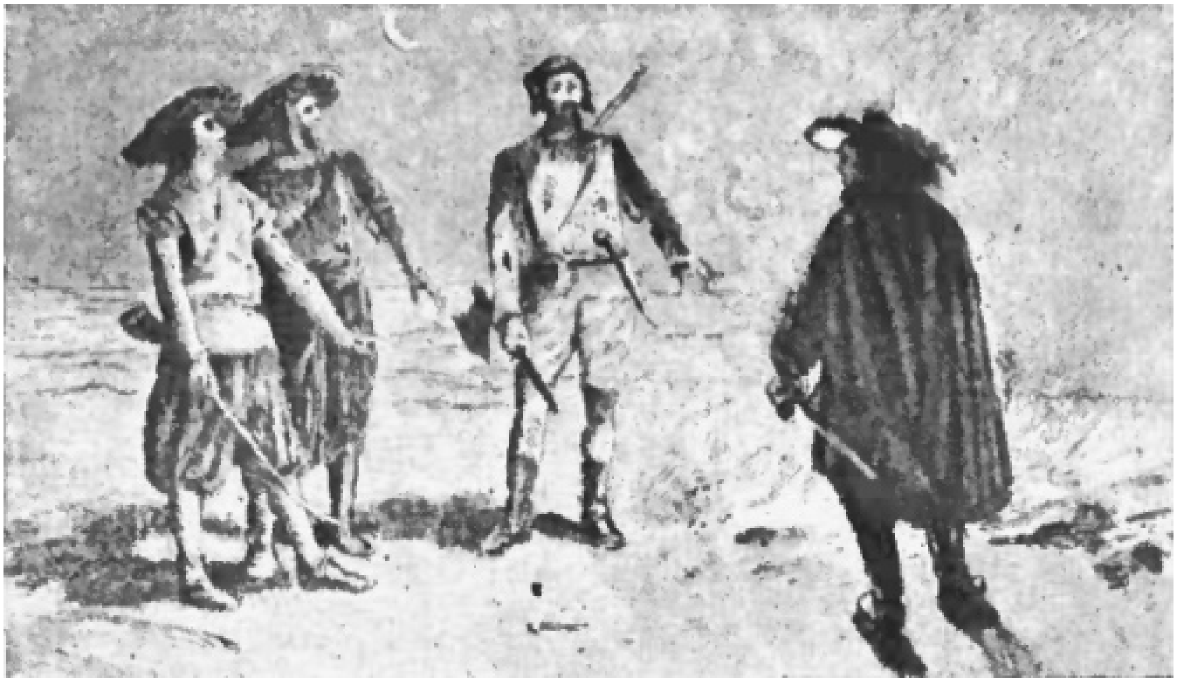
Unfortunate young girl! What had that pure young soul done that it should be thus early given over to so much sorrow? Taken from the world, from honors, riches, youthful delights, and from the triumphs of beauty, she was still in the cradle when she was already in a prison cell; a captive with her captive father, she had grown up watching his decay; and to complete her misery, that she might not be ignorant of any form of bondage, love had sought her out in prison.

Even then, could she but have kept her Ordener at her side, would liberty have tempted her? Would she ever have known that a world existed from which she was cut off? Moreover, would not her world, her heaven, have been with her in that narrow keep, within those gloomy towers bristling with soldiers, toward which the passer-by would still have cast a pitying glance?

But, alas! for the second time her Ordener was absent; and instead of spending all too brief but ever recurring hours with him in holy caresses and chaste embraces, she passed days and nights in bewailing his absence, and praying that he might be shielded from danger. For a maiden has only her prayers and her tears.

Sometimes she longed for the wings of the free swallow which came to her to be fed through her prison bars. Sometimes her thought escaped upon the cloud which a swift breeze drove northward through the sky; then suddenly she would turn away her head and cover her eyes, as if she dreaded to see a gigantic brigand appear and begin the unequal contest upon one of the distant mountains whose blue peaks hung on the horizon like a stationary cloud.

Oh, it is cruel to live when we are parted from the object of our love! Few hearts have known this pang in all its extent, because few hearts have known love in all its depth. Then, in some sort a stranger to our ordinary existence, we create for ourselves a melancholy waste, a vast solitude, and for the absent one some terrible world of peril, of monsters, and of deceit; the various faculties which make up our being are changed into and lost in an infinite longing for the missing one; everything about us seems utterly indifferent to us. And yet we still breathe, and move, and act, but without our own volition. Like a wandering planet which has lost its sun, the body moves at random; the soul is elsewhere.



It is he! It is Mr. Hacket!

CHAPTER XVIII THE PROMISED REWARDS.

On a vast buckler those relentless men
Terrified hell with fearful oaths;
And beside a black bull which they had slain,
All, bathing their hands in blood, swore to be revenged.
The Seven Chiefs before Thebes.

The coast of Norway abounds in narrow bays, in creeks, coves, reefs, lagoons, and little headlands so numerous as to weary the traveller’s memory and the topographer’s patience. Formerly, if we are to credit popular tradition, every isthmus was haunted by some demon, each bay inhabited by some fairy, each promontory protected by some saint; superstition mingles all beliefs to create for itself imaginary terrors. Upon Kelvel strand, some miles to the north of Walderhog cave, there was but a single spot, they said, which was free from all jurisdiction either of infernal, intermediary, or celestial spirits. It was the glade lying along the shore, overhung by a cliff, on the top of which could still be seen vestiges of the manor of Ralph, or Rudolf, the Giant. This little wild meadow, bordered on the west by the sea, and closely shut in by rocks clad with heather, owed its exemption solely to the name of that ancient Norwegian lord, its first possessor. For what fairy, what devil, or what angel would venture to become master or guest of a domain once occupied and guarded by Ralph the Giant?

It is true that the mere name of the much dreaded Ralph sufficed to give an alarming character to a region wild in itself. But after all, a memory is not so much to be feared as a spirit; and no fisher, belated in rough weather, and mooring his bark in Ralph’s creek, had ever seen the will -o’- the-wisp sport and dance upon the summit of a rock, or a fairy ride through the heather in her phosphorescent car drawn by glow- worms, or a saint ascend toward the moon, after his prayers were said.

And yet, if the angry waves and wind had allowed a wandering mariner to land in that hospitable harbor upon the night after the great storm, he might have been struck with superstitious fear at the sight of three men, who upon that same night sat around a huge fire, blazing in the middle of the meadow. Two of them wore the broad felt hat and loose trousers of royal miners. Their arms were bare to the shoulder, their feet were cased in fawncolored leather boots; a red sash held their crooked swords and heavy pistols; each had a hunter's horn slung about his neck. One was old, the other was young; the old man's thick beard and the young man's long hair lent a wild and barbarous look to their faces, which were naturally hard and stern.

By his bearskin cap, his tanned leather jacket, the musket slung across his back, his short, tight-fitting drawers, his bare knees, his bark shoes, and the glittering axe in his hand, it was easy to guess that the companion of the two miners was a mountaineer from the north of Norway.

Certainly, any one who saw from afar these three weird figures, upon which the flames, fanned by the salt breeze, cast a red, flickering light, might well have been frightened, even had he no faith in spectres and demons; it would have been enough that he believed in thieves and was somewhat richer than the ordinary poet.

The three men constantly turned their heads toward the winding path through the wood which fringes Ralph's meadow, and judging by such of their words as were not carried off by the wind, they were expecting a fourth person.

"I say, Kennybol, do you know that we should not be allowed to wait so peacefully for this envoy from Count Griffenfeld, if we were in the neighboring meadow, Goblin Tulbytilbet's meadow, or yonder in St. Cuthbert's bay?"

"Don't talk so loud, Jonas," replied the mountaineer; " blessed be Ralph the Giant, who protects us! Heaven save me from setting foot in Tulbytilbet's meadow! The other day I thought I was picking hawthorn there, and I gathered mandrake instead, which began to bleed and shriek, and nearly drove me mad."

The young miner laughed.

"Nearly, Kennybol? For my part, I think that the mandrake's shriek produced its full effect upon your feeble brains."

"Feeble brains yourself!" said the vexed mountaineer; "just see, Jonas, he jests at mandrake. He laughs like a lunatic playing with a death's-head."

"Hum! " answered Jonas. " Let him go to "Walderhog cave, where the heads of those whom Hans, the foul fiend of Iceland, has murdered, come back every night to dance about his bed of withered leaves, and gnash their teeth to lull him to sleep."

"That 's so,'' said the mountaineer.

"But," rejoined the young man, " did not Mr. Hacket, for whom we are waiting, promise us that Hans of Iceland would take the lead in our rebellion? "

"He did," replied Kennybol; " and with the help of that demon we are sure to conquer the green jackets of Throndhjem and Copenhagen."

"So much the better!" cried the old miner. " But I'm not the man to stand guard beside him at night."

At this moment the rustle of dead leaves beneath the tread of a man drew the attention of the speakers; they turned, and the firelight gleamed on the new-comer's face.

"It is he! it is Mr. Hacket! Welcome, Mr. Hacket; you have kept us waiting. We have been here this three quarters of an hour."

"Mr. Hacket " was a short, fat man, dressed in black, and his jovial countenance wore a forbidding expression.

"Well, friends," said he, " I was delayed by my ignorance of the road and the necessary precautions. I left Count Schumacker this morning; here are three purses of gold which he bade me give you."

The two old men flung themselves upon the gold with the eagerness common among the peasants of barren Norway. The young miner declined the purse which Hacket offered him.

"Keep your gold, Sir Envoy; I should lie if I said that I had joined the revolt for your Count Schumacker's sake. I rebel to free the miners from the guardianship of the crown; I rebel that my mother's bed may have a blanket less ragged than the coast of our good country, Norway."

Far from seeming disconcerted, Mr. Hacket answered smilingly, " Then I will send this money to your poor mother, my dear Norbith, so that she may have two new blankets to shield her from the cold wind this winter."

The young man assented with a nod, and the envoy, like a skilful orator, made haste to add:-

"But be careful not to repeat what you just now inconsiderately said, that you are not taking up arms in behalf of Schumacker, Count Griffenfeld."

"But but," muttered the two old men, "we know very well that the miners are oppressed, but we know nothing about this count, this prisoner of state."

"What! " sharply rejoined the envoy; " are you so ungrateful? You groan in your subterranean caves, deprived of light and air, robbed of all your property, slaves to the most onerous tutelage! Who came to your rescue?

Who revived your failing courage? Who gave you gold and arms? Was it not my illustrious master, noble Count Griffenfeld, more of a slave and more unfortunate even than you? And now, loaded with his favors, would you refuse to use them to acquire his liberty with your own? “

“You are right,” interrupted the young miner; “ that would be an ill deed.”

“Yes, Mr. Hacket,” said the two old men, “ we will fight for Count Schumacker.”

“Courage, my friends! Rise in his name; bear your benefactor’s name from one end of Norway to the other. Only listen; everything seconds your righteous enterprise; you are about to be freed from a formidable enemy, General Levin de Knud, governor of the province. The secret power of my noble master, Count Griffenfeld, will soon procure his recall to Bergen. Come, tell me, Kennybol, Jonas, and you, my dear Norbith, are all your comrades ready? “

“My brethren of Guldbrandsdal,” said Norbith, “ only await my signal. To-morrow, if you wish “

“To-morrow; so be it. The young miners under your leadership must be the first to raise the standard. And you, my brave Jonas? “

“Six hundred heroes from the Färöe Islands, who for three days have lived on chamois flesh and bear’s fat in Bennallag forest, only ask a blast from the horn of their old captain, Jonas of Loevig town.”

“Good! And you, Kennybol? “

“All those who carry an axe in the gorges of Kiölen, and climb the rocks with bare knees, are ready to join their brothers, the miners, when they need them.”

“Enough. Tell your comrades that they need not doubt their victory,” added the envoy, raising his voice; “ for Hans of Iceland will be their captain.”

“Is that certain? “ asked all three at once, in a voice of mingled hope and fear.

The envoy answered: “ I will meet you four days hence, at the same hour, with your united forces, in Apsyl-Corh mine, near Lake Miösen, on Blue Star plain. Hans of Iceland will be with ine.”

“We will be there,” said the three leaders. “ And may God not desert those whom the Devil aids! “

“Fear nothing from God,” said Hacket, with a sneer. “ Stay; you will find flags for your troops among the ruins of Crag. Do not forget the war-cry, ‘Long live Schumacker! We will rescue Schumacker! ‘ Now we must part; day will shortly break. But first, swear the most profound secrecy as to what has passed between us.”

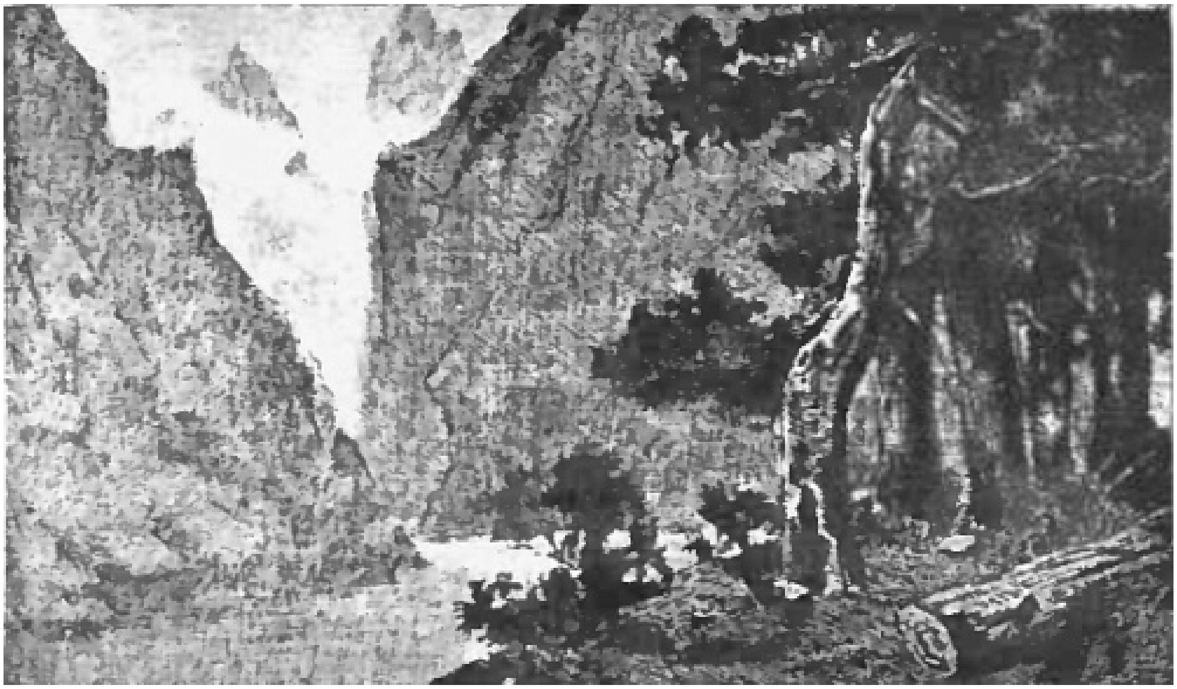
Without a word each of the three chiefs opened a vein in his left arm with the point of his sword; then, seizing the envoy’s hand, each let a few drops of blood trickle into it.

“You have our blood,” they said.

Then the young man exclaimed: “ May all my blood flow forth like that which I now shed; may a malicious spirit destroy my plans, as the hurricane does a straw; may my arm be of lead to avenge an insult; may my eyes dwell in my tomb; may I, still living, be haunted by the dead, and dead, be profaned by the living; may my eyes melt with tears like those of a woman, if ever I speak of what has occurred at this time in Ralph the Giant’s meadow. And may the blessed saints deign to hear this, my prayer! “

“Amen! “ repeated the two old men.

Then they parted, and nothing was left in the meadow but the smouldering fire, whose expiring embers burned up at intervals, and gleamed upon the summit of Ralph the Giant’s ruined and deserted towers.



The Shores of Lake Sparbo

CHAPTER XIX THE GOVERNOR’S PERPLEXITIES.

Theodore. Tristam, let us be gone.
Tristam. This is a strange disgrace.
Theodore. Did any one see us?
Tristam. I know not, but I fear they did.
Lope Da Vega: The Gardener’s Dog.

Benignus Spiagudry found it hard to guess the motives which led a youth of fine appearance, and apparently likely to live for many long years, to become the voluntary antagonist of the much-dreaded Hans of Iceland. He had frequently and with much ingenuity broached the question since they started on their travels; but the young adventurer preserved a stubborn silence as to the cause of his journey. Nor was the poor fellow any more successful in satisfying his curiosity concerning various other details as to his strange comrade. Once he ventured to ask a question about his young master’s family and his name. “ Call me Ordener,” was the reply; and this very unsatisfactory answer was given in a tone which forbade further question. He was forced to submit; every one has his secrets, and good Spiagudry himself carefully concealed in his wallet, under his cloak, a certain mysterious casket, any inquiry as to which he would certainly have considered very disagreeable and greatly out of place.

Four days had passed since they left Throndhjem, but they had made little progress, owing to the bad state of the roads after the storm, and the multiplicity of crosscuts and roundabout routes which the runaway keeper thought it prudent to take in order to avoid too thickly settled regions. Leaving Skongen on their right, toward evening of the fourth day they reached the shores of Lake Sparbo.

The vast stretch of water reflecting the last gleams of daylight and the first stars of coming night set in a frame of tall cliffs, black firs, and lofty oaks, presented a gloomy but magnificent picture. The sight of a lake at evening sometimes produces, at a certain distance, a peculiar optical illusion; it seems as if a vast abyss, cleaving the earth from side to side, revealed the heavens beneath our feet.

Ordener paused to contemplate the old Druidical forests, which cover the steep shores of the lake as with a garment, and the chalky huts of Sparbo, scattered over the slope like a stray flock of white goats. He listened to the distant clink of the forges, mingled with the dull roar of the weird forests, the intermittent cry of wild birds, and the solemn music of the waves. To the north a huge granite bowlder, still gilded by the rays of the sun, rose majestically above the little village of Oëlmœ, its summit bending beneath a mass of ruined towers, as if the giant were weary of his load.

When the soul is sad, it delights in melancholy scenes; it adds to them its own gloom. Let an unhappy man be thrown among wild, high mountains beside some black lake in the heart of a dark forest, at the close of day, and he will see this solemn scene through a funereal veil; he will not feel that the sun is setting, but that it is dying.

Ordener lingered, motionless and mute, until his companion exclaimed: “ Capital, sir! You do well to ponder thus beside the most miasma-laden lake in Norway.”

This remark and the gesture which accompanied it, would have brought a smile to the lips of any but a lover parted from his mistress perhaps never again to meet her. The learned keeper added:-

“And yet I must rouse you from your meditations to remind you that day is drawing to a close, and we must make haste if we would reach Oëlmœ village before twilight overtakes us.”

The observation was correct. Ordener resumed his journey, and Spiagudry followed him, continuing his unheeded reflections upon the botanic and physiologic phenomena which Lake Sparbo affords the naturalist.

“Mr. Ordener,” said he, “ if you will listen to your devoted guide, you will give up your fatal enterprise; yes, sir, and you will take up your abode upon the shores of this most curious lake, where we can devote ourselves to all sorts of learned research; for instance, to the study of the stclla canora pulustris, a singular plant, which many scholars consider to be fabulous, but which Bishop Arngrimmsson asserts that he both saw and heard on the shores of Lake Sparbo. Added to this, we shall have the satisfaction of feeling that we dwell upon soil which contains more gypsum than any other in Europe, and where the hired assassins of Throndhjem are least likely to find their way. Doesn’t it attract you, young master? Come, renounce your senseless journey; for, not to offend you, your scheme is dangerous, without being profitable, periculum sine pecunia; that is to say, senseless, and conceived at a moment when you might better have been thinking of other things.”

Ordener, who paid no attention to the poor man’s words, merely kept up the conversation by those occasional meaningless monosyllables which great talkers are ready to accept in lieu of answers. Thus they reached Oëlmœ village, where they found an unusual bustle and stir.

The inhabitants hunters,- fishers, and blacksmiths had left their houses, and hastily collected about a central mound occupied by a group of men, one of whom blew a horn and waved a small black-and-white banner over his head. “ Probably some quack doctor,” said Spiagudry, “ ambubaiarum collegia, pharmacopolæ; some scamp who turns gold into lead and wounds into sores. Let us see. What invention of the Evil One will he sell these poor rustics? It would be bad enough if these impostors confined themselves to kings, if they all imitated Borch the Dane and Borri of Milan, those alchemists who so completely duped our Frederic III.; but they are just as greedy for the peasant’s mite as for the prince’s million.”

Spiagudry was mistaken. As they approached the mound they recognized by his black gown and round, pointed cap, the mayor, surrounded by a number of bowmen. The man blowing the horn was the town crier.

The fugitive keeper, somewhat disturbed, muttered: “ Truly, Mr. Ordener, I did not expect to stumble upon the mayor when I came into this hamlet. Great Saint Hospitius, protect us! What does he say? “

His uncertainty was of brief duration, for the crier’s shrill voice was quickly raised, and religiously heeded by the little group of villagers.

“In the name of his Majesty and by order of his Excellency, General Levin de Knud, governor, the lord mayor of Throndhjem notifies the inhabitants of all cities, towns, and villages in the province, that a reward of one thousand crowns is offered for the head of Hans, a native of Klipstadur, in Iceland, a murderer and incendiary.”

A vague murmur ran through the crowd. The crier continued:-

“A reward of four crowns is offered for the head of Benignus Spiagudry, ex-keeper of the Spladgest at Throndhjem, accused of necromancy and sacrilege. This proclamation shall be published throughout the province by the mayors of all cities, towns, and villages, who will see that it is carried out.”

The mayor took the proclamation from the crier’s hands, and added in a lugubrious and solemn voice:

“The life of these men is offered to whosoever will take it.”

The reader will readily believe that this reading was not heard unmoved by our poor, unfortunate Spiagudry. No doubt, the unusual signs of terror which he showed would have roused the attention of the bystanders, had it not just then been wholly absorbed by the first clause of the proclamation.

“A reward for the head of Hans! “ cried an old fisherman, who had hastened to the spot, trailing his wet nets behind him. “They might as well, by Saint Usuph, set a price itpon the head of Beelzebub! “

“To keep up a proper balance between Hans and Beelzebub,” said a hunter, recognizable by his chamois-skin jerkin, “ they should only offer fifteen hundred crowns for the head and horns of the latter fiend.”

“Glory be to the holy mother of God!” cried an old woman, her bald head shaking as she twirled her distaff. “ I only wish I might see the head of that Hans, so that I might make sure if his eyes are really live coals, as they say.”

“Yes, to be sure,” replied another old woman; “ it was just by looking at it that he set Throndhjem cathedral on fire. Now I should like to see the monster whole, with his serpent’s tail, cloven foot, and broad wings like a bat.”

“Who told you such nonsense, good mother? “ broke in the hunter, with a self-satisfied air. “ I ‘ve seen this Hans of Iceland with my own eyes in the gorges of Medsyhath; he is a man like ourselves, only he is as tall as a forty-year- old poplar.”

“Indeed! “ said a voice from the crowd, with singular emphasis.

This voice, which made Spiagudry shudder, proceeded from a short man whose face was hidden by the broad felt hat of a miner, his body wrapped in rush matting and sealskin.

“Faith! “ cried, with a coarse laugh, a smith who wore his heavy hammer slung across his shoulder, “ they may offer one thousand or ten thousand crowns for his head, and he may be four or forty feet tall, but I’ll not offer to go in search of him.”

“Nor I,” said the fisherman.

“Nor I; nor I,” repeated every voice.

“And yet any one who may feel tempted,” rejoined the little man, “ will find Hans of Iceland tomorrow at the ruins of Arbar, near Lake Miösen; the day after that at Walderhog cave.”

“Are you sure, my good man? “

This question was asked at one and the same time by Ordener, who listened to this scene with an interest easily understood by any one but Spiagudry, and by another short and tolerably stout man, dressed in black, with a merry countenance, who had issued from the only inn which the village contained, at the first sound of the crier’s horn.

The little man with the broad-brimmed hat seemed to be studying them both for a moment, and then answered in hollow tones: “ Yes.”

“And how can you be so certain? “ asked Ordener.

“I know where Hans of Iceland is, just as well as I know where Benignus Spiagudry is; neither of them is far off at this instant.”

All the poor keeper’s terrors were revived, and he scarcely dared look at the mysterious little man. Fancying that his French periwig had failed to disguise him, he began to pluck at Ordener’s cloak and to whisper: “ Master, sir, in Heaven’s name, have mercy! have pity! let us be off! let us leave this accursed suburb of hell!”

Ordener, although equally surprised, carefully examined the little man, who, turning his back to the light, seemed anxious to conceal his face.

“I ‘ve seen that Benignus Spiagudry,” cried the fisherman, “ at Throndhjem Spladgest. He’s a tall fellow. They offer four crowns for him.”

The hunter burst out laughing.

“Four crowns! I shan’t go a-hunting for him. I can get more for the skin of a blue fox.”

This comparison, which at any other time would have greatly offended the learned keeper, now comforted him. Still, he was about to address another prayer to Ordener to persuade him to continue his journey, when the latter, having learned all that he wished to know, forestalled him by making his way out of the crowd, which was beginning to disperse.

Although when they entered Oëlmœ village they had intended passing the night there, they quitted it, as if by common consent, without even alluding to the motive for their abrupt departure. Ordener was moved by the hope of a more speedy meeting with the brigand, Spiagudry by a desire to get away from the archers as speedily as might be.

Ordener was in too serious a mood to laugh at his comrade’s misadventures. He broke the silence in kindly tones.

“Old man, what is the name of the ruin where Hans is to be found to-morrow, according to that little man who seemed to know everything? “

"I don't know; I didn't quite catch the name, noble master," replied Spiagudry, who uttered no falsehood in so saying.

"Then," continued the young man, " I must make up my mind not to meet him until the day after to-morrow at Walderhog cave."

"Walderhog cave, sir! Indeed, that is Hans of Iceland's favorite haunt."

"Let us take that road," said Ordener.

"We must turn to the left, behind Oëlmœ cliff. It will take us at least two days to get to Walderhog cave."

"Do you know, old man," cautiously observed Ordener, " who that odd fellow was, who seemed to be so well acquainted with you? "

This question again awakened Spiagudry's fears, which had been lulled to sleep as the village of Oëlmœ faded in the distance.

"No, truly, sir," he answered, in trembling accents. " But he had a very strange voice."

Ordener tried to encourage him.

"Fear nothing, old man; serve me well, and I will protect you. If I return victorious over Hans, I promise you not only a pardon, but I will also give you the thousand crowns reward offered by the officers of the law."

Honest Benignus dearly loved his life, but he also loved gold. Ordener's promises sounded like magic in his ears; they not only banished all his terrors, but they excited in him a kind of garrulous mirth, which found vent in lengthy discourses, queer gestures, and learned quotations.

"Mr. Ordener," said he, " if I should ever have occasion to discuss the subject with Over-Bilseuth, otherwise called 'the Babbler,' nothing shall prevent me from maintaining that you are a wise and honorable young man. What more worthy and more glorious, in fact, quid cithara, tuba, vel campana dignius, than nobly to risk your life to free your country from a monster, a brigand, a demon, in whom all demons, brigands, and monsters seem to be combined? Nobody need tell me that you are moved by mercenary motives. Noble Lord Ordener yields the price of his conflict to the companion of his journey, to the old man who only guided him within a mile of Walderhog cave; for I am sure, young master, that you will allow me to await the result of your illustrious enterprise at the village of Surb, situated in the forest within a mile of Walderhog, will you not? And when your glorious victory is made known, sir, all Norway will thrill with joy like that of Vermund the Refugee, when from the summit of this same Oëlmœ cliff, which we just now passed, he saw the great fire kindled by his brother Halfdan on Muukholm tower in token of his deliverance.”

At these words Ordener interrupted him eagerly.

“What! is Munkholm tower visible from the top of this rock? “

“Yes, sir; twelve miles to the south, between the mountains which our fathers called Frigga’s Footstools. At this hour you should be able to see the light in the tower distinctly.”

“Indeed! “ exclaimed Ordener, fired by the idea of another glimpse of the seat of all his happiness. “Old man, of course there is a path leading to the top of the rock, is there not? “

“Yes, to be sure; a path which begins in the wood that lies just before us, and rises by a gentle slope to the bare crown of the cliff, whence it is continued by steps cut in the rock by Vermund’s companions, as far as the castle, where it ends. Those are the ruins which you see in the moonlight,”

“Well, old man, you shall show me the path; we will spend the night in those ruins, in those ruins from which Munkholm tower is visible.”

“Can you really mean it, sir? “ asked Benignus. “ The fatigues of the day -

“Old man, I will support your steps; my footing was never more secure.”

“Sir, the brambles that block the path, which has long been deserted, the fallen stones, the darkness “

‘‘ I will take the lead.”

“There may be some savage beast, some unclean animal, some hideous monster “

“I did not undertake this journey to avoid monsters.”

The idea of halting so near Oëlmœ was very unpleasant to Spiagudry; the thought of seeing Munkholm light, and possibly the light in Ethel’s window, enraptured and transported Ordener.

“Young master,” urged Spiagudry, “ give up this scheme; take my advice. I have a presentiment that it will bring us bad luck.”

This plea was as nothing in the face of Ordener’s longing.

“Corne,” said he, impatiently, “ you must remember that you agreed to serve me faithfully. I insist upon your showing me the path; where is it?”

“We shall come across it directly,” said the keeper, forced to obey.

In fact, they soon saw the path. They entered it; but Spiagudry observed, with surprise mixed with fright, that the tall grass was broken and trampled, and that Vermund the Refugee’s old footpath seemed to have been recently trodden.

CHAPTER XX THE STRAY SHOT STRUCK HOME.

Leonardo. The king requires your presence.
Hcnrique, How so?
Lupe Da Vega: La Fuerza Lastinosa.

General Levin De Knud sat at his desk, which was covered with papers and open letters, apparently lost in thought. A secretary stood before him awaiting his orders. The general now struck the rich carpet beneath his feet with his spurs, and now absently toyed with the decoration of the Elephant, hanging about his neck from the collar of the order. Occasionally he opened his lips as if to speak, then stopped, rubbed his head, and cast another glance at the unsealed despatches littering the table.

“How the devil! “ he cried at last.

This conclusive exclamation was followed by a brief silence.

“Who would ever have imagined,” he resumed, “that those devilish miners would have gone so far? Of course they were secretly egged on to this revolt; but do you know, Wapherney, the thing looks serious? Do you know that five or six hundred scoundrels from the Färöe Islands, headed by a certain old thief named Jonas, have already quitted the mines; that a young fanatic called Norbith has also taken command of the Guldbrandsdal malcontents; that all the hot-heads in Sund-Moer, Hubfallo, and Kongsberg, who were only waiting the signal, may have risen already? Do you know that the mountaineers have joined the movement, and that they are headed by one of the boldest foxes of Kiölen, old Kennybol? And finally, do you know that according to popular report in northern Throndhjem, if we are to believe the lord mayor, who has written me, that notorious criminal, upon whose head we have set a price, the much-dreaded Hans, has taken chief command of the insurrection? What do you say to all this, my dear Wapherney? Ahem! “

“Your Excellency,” said Wapherney, “ knows what measures- “

“There is still another circumstance connected with this lamentable affair which I cannot explain; that is, how our prisoner Schumacker can be the author of the revolt, as they claim. This seems to surprise no one, but it surprises me more than anything else. It is hard to believe that a man whose company my faithful Ordener loves can be a traitor; and yet it is asserted that the miners have risen in his name, his name is their watchword. They even give him the titles of which the king deprived him. All this seems certain; but how does it happen that Countess d'Ahlefeld knew all these details a week ago, at a time when the first real symptoms of trouble had scarcely begun to appear in the mines? It is strange! No matter, I must provide for every emergency. Give me my seal, Wapherney."

The general wrote three letters, sealed them, and handed them to his secretary.

"See that this message is sent to Baron Vœthaün, colonel of musketeers, now garrisoned at Munkholm, so that his regiment may march at once to the seat of the revolt; this to the officer in command at Munkholm, an order to guard the ex-chancellor more closely than ever. I must see and question this Schumacker myself. Then despatch this letter to Skongen, to Major Wolhm, who is in command there, directing him to send forward a portion of the garrison to the centre of rebellion. Go, Wapherney, and see that these orders are executed at once."

The secretary went out, leaving the governor plunged in meditation.

"All this is very alarming," thought he. " These miners rebelling in one place, this chancellor intriguing in another, that crazy Ordener nobody knows where! He may be travelling in the very midst of all these rioters, leaving Schumacker here under my protection to conspire against the State, and his daughter, for whose safety I have been kind enough to remove the company of soldiers to which that Frederic d'Ahlefeld belongs, whom Ordener accuses of- Why, it seems to me that this very company might easily stop the advance columns of the insurgents; it is very well situated for that. Wahlstrom, where it is stationed, is near Lake Miösen and Arbar ruin. That is one of the places of which the rebels will be sure to take possession."

At this point in his revery, the general was interrupted by the sound of the opening door.

"Well, what do you want, Gustavus? "

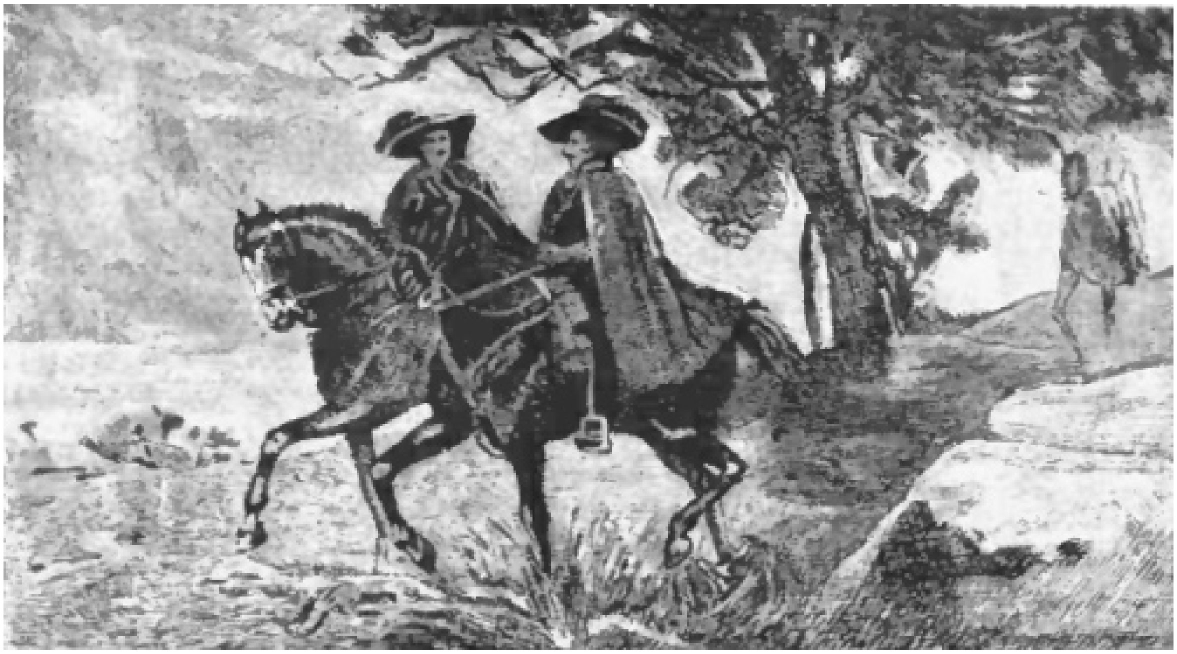
"General, a messenger asks to speak for a moment with your Excellency."

"Well, what is it now? What fresh disaster! Let the messenger come in."

The messenger entered, and handed a packet to the governor, saying, " From his highness the viceroy, your Excellency."

The general hurriedly tore open the despatch.

"By Saint George! " he cried, with a start of surprise, " I believe that they have all gone mad! If here is not the viceroy requesting me to proceed to Bergen. He says it is on urgent business, by order of the king. A fine time this to transact urgent business! ' The lord chancellor, now travelling in the province of Throndhjem, will take your place during your absence.' Here's a substitute in whom I have no confidence! ' The bishop will assist him-Keally, these are excellent governors that Frederic chooses for a country in a state of revolt, two gentlemen of the cloth, a chancellor, and a bishop! Well, no matter, the invitation is express; it is the order of the king. Needs must obey; but before I go I must see Schumacker and question him. I am sure that there is a plot to involve me in a network of intrigue; but I have one unerring compass, my- conscience."



Two Horsemen muffled in brown Cloaks

CHAPTER XXI HIS FEARS WERE MORE THAN REALIZED.

The voice of thy slain brother's blood cries out.
Even from the ground, unto the Lord!
Cain: A Mystery.

"Yes, Count; it was this very day, in Arbar ruin. that we were told he might be found. Countless circumstances lead me to believe in the truth of this valuable information which I accidentally picked up yesterday, as I told you, at Oëlmœ village."

"Are we far from this Arbar ruin? "

"It is close by Lake Miösen. The guide assures ine that we shall be there before noon."

These words were spoken by two horsemen muffled in brown cloaks, who early one morning were pursuing one of the many narrow, winding paths which run in every direction through the forest lying between Lakes Miösen and Sparbo. A mountain guide, provided with a huntinghorn and an axe, led the way upon his little gray pony, and behind the travellers rode four men armed to the teeth, toward whom these two persons occasionally turned, as if afraid of being overheard.

"If that Iceland thief is really lurking in Arbar ruin," said one rider, whose steed kept a respectful distance behind the other, " it is a great point gained; for the difficulty hitherto has been to find this mysterious being."

"Do you think so, Musdœmon? And suppose he declines our offers? "

"Impossible, your Grace! What brigand could resist gold and a free pardon?"

"But you know that this is no common scoundrel. Do not judge him by yourself. If he should refuse, how can you keep your promise of night before last to the three leaders of the insurrection? "

"Well, noble Count, in that case, which I regard as impossible if we are lucky enough to find our man, has your Grace forgotten that a false Hans of Iceland awaits me two days hence at the hour and place appointed for meeting the three chiefs, at Blue Star, a place, moreover, conveniently near Arbar ruin? "

“You are right, my dear Musdœmon, as usual,” said the count; and each resumed his own particular line of thought.

Musdœmon, whose interest it was to keep his master in good humor, for the purpose of diverting him, asked the guide a question.

“My good man, what is that ruined stone cross yonder, behind those young oaks? “

The guide, a man with fixed stare and stupid mien, turned his head and shook it several times, as he said: “ Oh, master, that is the oldest gallows in Norway; holy king Olaf had it built for a judge who made a compact with a robber.”

Musdœmon saw by his patron’s face that the guide’s artless words had produced an effect quite contrary to that which he hoped.

“It is a curious story,” the guide added; “ good Mother Osia told it to me. The robber was ordered to hang the judge.”

The poor guide, in his simplicity, did not suppose that the incident with which he meant to entertain his employers was almost an insult to them. Musdœmon stopped him.

“That will do,” said he; “ we have heard the story before.”

“Insolent fellow! “ muttered the count, “ he has heard the story before. Ah, Musdœmon, you shall pay for your impudence yet.”

“Did your Grace speak to me? “ obsequiously asked Musdœmon.

“I was thinking how I could obtain the Order of the Dannebrog for you. The marriage of my daughter Ulrica and Baron Ordener would be an excellent opportunity.”

Musdœmon was profuse in protestations and thanks.

“By the way,” added his Grace, “ let us talk business. Do you suppose that the temporary recall which we sent him has reached the Mecklenburger? “

The reader may remember that the count was in the habit of thus designating General Levin de Knud, who was indeed a native of Mecklenburg.

“Let us talk business! “ thought the injured Musdœmon; “ it seems that my affairs are not ‘ business.’ Count,” he replied aloud, “ I think that the viceroy’s messenger must be in Throndhjem by this time, and therefore General Levin must be getting ready to start.”

The count assumed a kindly tone.

“That recall, my dear fellow, was one of your masterstrokes, one of your best planned and most skilfully executed intrigues.”

“The credit belongs as much to your Grace as to me,” replied Musdœmon, careful, as we have already remarked, to mix the count in all his machinations.

The master understood this secret desire of his confidant, but chose to seem unconscious of it.

He smiled.

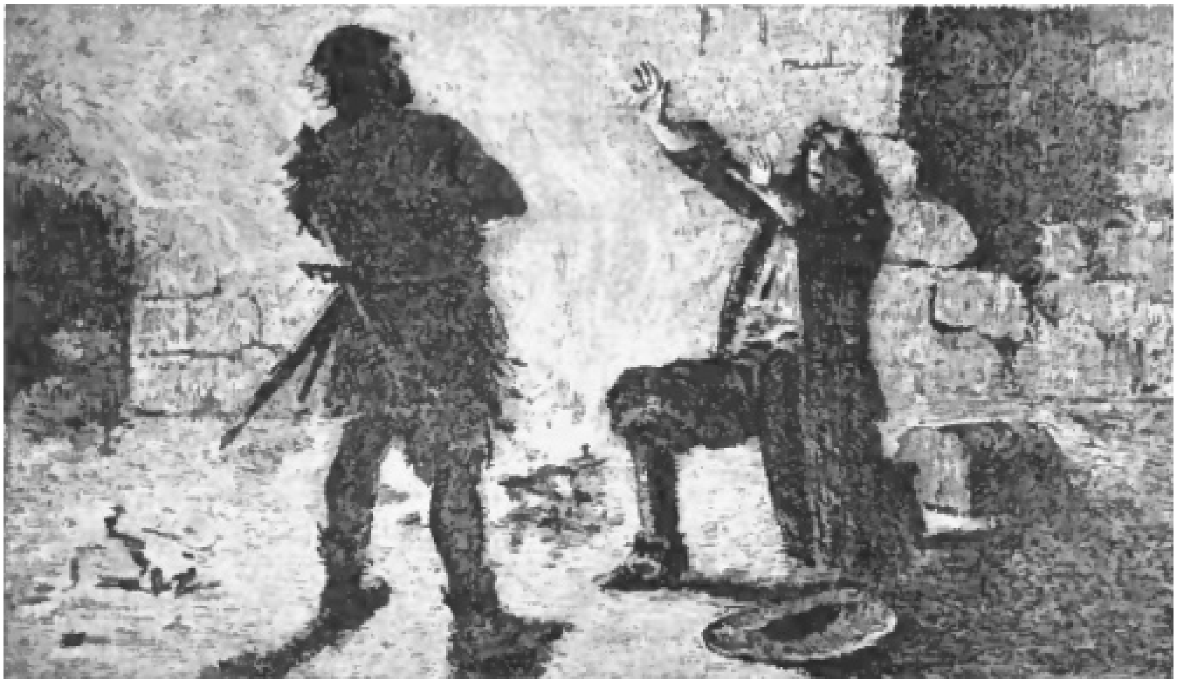
“My dear private secretary, you are always modest; but nothing can make me depreciate your most eminent services. Elphega’s presence and the Mecklenburger’s absence assure my triumph in Throndhjem. I am now at the head of the province; and if Hans of Iceland accepts the command of the rebels, which I intend to offer him in person, to me will fall, in the eyes of the king, the glory of putting down this distressing insurrection and capturing this terrible brigand.”

They were chatting thus in low voices when the guide rode back to them.

“Masters,” said he, “here on our left is the hillock upon which Biorn the Just had the double-tongued Vellon beheaded in the presence of his entire army, the traitor having driven off the king’s allies and summoned the enemy to the camp, that he might have the appearance of saving Biorn’s life.”

All these reminiscences of old Norway did not seem to be to Musdœmon’s taste, for he hurriedly interrupted the guide.

“Come, come, good man, be silent and go your way, without turning back so often. What do we care about the foolish stories of which these ruins and dead trees remind you? You annoy my master with your old wives’ tales.”



Mercy, Sir, Mercy!

CHAPTER XXII FRIENDSHIP HAS CLAIMS.

Now the hungry lion roars.
And the wolf behowls the moon;
While the heavy ploughman snores,
All with weary task foredone.
Now the wasted brands do glow,
Whilst the screech-owl, screeching loud,
Puts the wretch that lies in woe
In remembrance of a shroud.
Now it is the time of night,
That the graves, all gaping wide,
Every one lets forth his sprite,
In the church-way paths to glide.
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream.

Let us now retrace our steps. We left Ordener and Spiagudry struggling laboriously up the brow of Oëlmœ cliff by the light of the rising moon. This rock, bare of vegetation at the point where it begins to curve, is, from this peculiarity, called by the Norwegian peasants the Vulture's Neck, a name which gives an excellent idea of the aspect of this huge granite bowlder as seen from a distance.

As our travellers approached this part of the rock, the forest changed to heather. Grass gave place to moss; wild brier-roses, broom, and holly were substituted for oaks and beeches, a scantier growth, which in mountainous regions always shows that the summit is near, as it indicates the gradual diminution of the stratum of earth covering what may be termed the skeleton of the mountain.

"Mr. Ordener," said Spiagudry, whose lively mind seemed ever a prey to a varying world of ideas, " this is a very tiresome climb, and it takes all my devotion to follow you. But it seems to me that I see a superb convolrulus yonder to the right; how I should like to examine it. Why is it not broad daylight? Don't you think it was a great piece of impertinence to value a learned man like me at no more than four paltry crowns? 'T is true, the famous Phædrus was a slave, and Æsop, if we are to believe the learned Planudes, was sold at a fair like a beast of burden or household chattel. And who would not be proud to bear any sort of resemblance to the great Æsop? "

"Or to the celebrated Hans? " added Ordener, with a smile.

“By Saint Hospitius,” replied the keeper, “do not utter that name so lightly; I swear I could readily forego the latter comparison. But wouldn’t it be strange if Benignus Spiagudry, his companion in misfortune, should win the reward for his head? Mr. Ordener, you are more generous than Jason, for he did not give the golden fleece to the Argonaut pilot; and I am sure that your mission, although I do not clearly understand its object, is no less perilous than that of Jason.”

“Well,” said Ordener, “ since you know Hans of Iceland, tell me something about him. You say that he is by no means a giant, as is generally supposed.’’

Spiagudry interrupted him: “ Stop, master! Don’t you hear footsteps behind us? “

“Yes,” quietly answered the young man; “ don’t be alarmed; it is some animal frightened at our coming, and brushing against the bushes in its flight.”

“You are right, my young Cæsar; it is so long since these woods have seen the face of man! If we may judge by its heavy tread, it must be a good-sized animal. It may be an elk or a reindeer; this part of Norway abounds in these beasts. Wildcats are also found here; I saw one myself, which was brought to Copenhagen; he was monstrous big. I must give you a description of this ferocious animal.”

“My dear guide,” said Ordener, “ I would rather that you would give me a description of another and no less ferocious monster, the horrible Hans.”

“Speak lower, sir! How calmly you utter that name! You do not know-Good Heavens, sir! just hear that! “

As Spiagudry said this, he drew closer to Ordener, who did indeed distinctly hear a cry similar to the growl which, as the reader may remember, had so alarmed the timid keeper on the stormy night of their departure from Throndhjem.

“Did you hear that? “ he whispered, breathless with fright.

“To be sure I did” said Ordener; “ but I don’t see why you tremble so violently. It is the howl of some wild beast, possibly the cry of one of those very wildcats of which you were just talking. Did you expect to pass through such a place at this time of night without disturbing any of its inhabitants? I’ll warrant you, old man, they are far more frightened than you are.”

Spiagudry, seeing his young companion’s composure, was somewhat reassured.

“Well, it may be, sir, that you are right. But that yell sounded terribly like a voice that I- It was a very poor idea, let me tell you, sir, to insist upon climbing up to this Vermund’s castle. I fear we shall meet with some accident on the Vulture’s Neck.” “ Fear nothing while you are with me,” answered Ordener. “ Oh, nothing disturbs you; but, sir, nobody but the blessed Saint Paul can handle vipers without getting bitten. You did not even notice, when we struck into this confounded footpath, that it seemed to have been recently trodden, and that the grass had not had time to lift its head since it was trampled.”

“I confess that I did not pay much heed to it, and that my peace of mind is not dependent upon the state of a few blades of grass. See, we are now out of the thicket; we shall hear no more from the wild beasts; I need not therefore tell you, rny brave guide, to summon all your courage, but rather bid you muster all your strength, for this path, cut in the rock, will doubtless be even steeper than the one we have left.”

“It is not that it is steeper, sir, but the learned traveller, Snekson, says that it is often impeded by rocks or heavy stones too big to be handled, over which it is not easy to clamber. Among others, there is, just beyond the Maläer postern, which must be close at hand, a huge triangular granite bowlder, which I have always had the greatest desire to see. Schoenning asserts that he discovered the three primitive Runic characters on it.”

The travellers had for some time been climbing the face of the rock; they now reached a small, ruined tower, through which their path led, and to which Spiagudry drew Ordener’s attention.

“This is the Maläer postern, sir. This path hewn in the living rock contains several curious structures, which show the ancient style of fortification used in our Norwegian manor-houses. This postern, which was always guarded by four men- at- arms, was the first outwork of Vermund’s fort. Speaking of posterns, the monk Urensius makes an odd remark; he asks whether the word janua, derived from Janus, whose temple doors were so widely celebrated, has any connection with ‘ Janissary,’ a name applied to the troops who guard the sultan’s gate. It would be strange enough if the name of the mildest prince known to history should have passed to the most ferocious, soldiers upon earth.”

In the midst of all the keeper’s scientific twaddle, they journeyed laboriously along, over loose stones and sharp pebbles, mingled with the short, slippery grass which sometimes grows upon rocks. Ordener beguiled his weariness by thinking how delightful it would be to gaze once more upon distant Muukholm; all at once Spiagudry exclaimed: “ Oh, I see it I This sight alone repays me for all my trouble. I see it, sir, I see it! “

“See what?” said Ordener, who was just then thinking of Ethel.

“Why, sir, the three- sided pyramid described by Schoenning. I shall be the third scientific man, with Professor Schoenning and Bishop Isleif, to have the pleasure of studying it. Only it is a great pity that there is no moon.”

As they approached the famous bowlder, Spiagudry uttered an exclamation of horror and distress. Ordener, in surprise, asked with some interest the cause of this new emotion; but the archaeologist was for a time unable to reply.

“You thought,” said Ordener, “ that this rock blocked the path; on the contrary, you should be grateful to find that it leaves it entirely open.”

“And that is the very thing which provokes me,” said Benignus, in piteous accents.

“What do you mean? “ “Why, sir,” replied the keeper, “do you not see that the position of the pyramid has been changed; that the base, which rested on the path, is now uppermost; and that the bowlder stands upside down, upon the very side on which Schoenning discovered the primordial Runic letters? I am indeed unfortunate! “

“It is a pity,” said the young man.

“And besides,” hastily added Spiagudry, “ the overturning of this mass of stone proves the presence of some superhuman being. Unless it be the work of the Devil, there is but one man in Norway whose arm could

“My poor guide, there you are, giving way again to your foolish fears. Who knows but this stone has lain thus for more than a hundred years? “

“It is a hundred and fifty years, it is true,” said Spiagudry, more quietly, “ since the last scientific man observed it. But it seems to me to have been moved recently; the place which it formerly occupied is still damp. Look, sir.”

Ordener, impatient to reach the ruins, dragged his guide away from the marvellous pyramid, and succeeded, by gentle words, in removing the fresh fears with which this strange displacement inspired the aged scholar.

“See here, old man, you can take up your abode on the borders of this lake, and devote yourself to your important studies, when you get the thousand crowns reward for Hans’s head.”

“You are right, noble sir; but do not speak so lightly of so dubious a victory. I must give you one piece of advice which may help you to overcome the monster.”

Ordener drew eagerly toward Spiagudry. “ Advice! what is it? “

“The robber,” said the latter, in a low voice, casting uneasy glances around him, “ the robber wears at his belt a skull, from which he usually drinks. It is the skull of his son, of the mutilation of whose corpse I am accused.”

“Speak a little louder, and don’t be frightened; I can hardly hear you. Well, this skull? “

“This skull,” said Spiagudry, bending to whisper in the young man’s ear, “ you must try to obtain. The monster attaches a certain superstitious importance to its possession. His son’s skull once yours, you can do what you will with him.”

“That is all very well, my good fellow; but how am I to get this skull? “

“By some stratagem, sir. While the monster sleeps, perhaps.”

Ordener interrupted him: “ Enough. Your good advice is useless. I cannot be supposed to know when my enemy is asleep. My sword is the only weapon which I recognize.”

“Sir, sir! it has never been proved that the archangel Michael did not resort to stratagem to vanquish Satan.”

Here Spiagudry stopped short, and stretching out his hands, exclaimed in scarcely audible tones, “ Oh, heavens! Oh, heavens! What do I see? Look, master; is not that a short man walking before us in the path? “

“Faith,” said Ordener, raising his eyes, “ I see nothing.”

“Nothing, sir? To be sure, the path bends, and he has disappeared behind that rock. Go no farther, sir, I entreat you.”

“Surely, if the person whom you imagine that you saw disappeared so quickly, it shows that he has no idea of waiting for us; and if he chooses to run away, that is no reason why we should do the same.”

“Watch over us, holy Hospitius! “ ejaculated Spiagudry, who in all moments of danger remembered his favorite saint.

“You must,” added Ordener, “have taken the flickering shadow of some startled owl for a man.”

“And yet I really thought I saw a little man; to be sure, the moonlight often produces strange delusions. It was in the moonlight that Baldan, lord of Merueugh, took a white bed-curtain for his mother’s ghost; which led him to go next day and confess himself guilty of parricide before the judges of Christiania, who were about to condemn the dead woman’s innocent page. So we may say that the moonlight saved that page’s life.”

No one was ever more ready than Spiagudry to forget the present in the past. One anecdote from the vast storehouse of his memory was enough to banish all thought of the present. Thus the story of Baldan diverted his fears, and he added in a tranquil voice, “ It is quite possible that the moonlight deceived me too.”

Meantime, they gained the top of the Vulture’s Xeck, and began to get another glimpse of the ruins, which the steep slope of the rock had hidden from them as they ascended. The reader need not be surprised if we frequently encounter ruins on the topmost peak of Norwegian mountains. No one who has travelled among the mountains of Europe can have failed to notice the remains of fortresses and castles clinging to the top of the loftiest peaks, like the deserted nest of a vulture or the eyrie of some dead eagle. In Norway especially, at the period of which we write, the variety of these aerial structures was as amazing as their number. Sometimes they consisted of long dismantled walls, enclosing a rock, sometimes of slender pointed turrets, surmounting a sharp peak, like a crown; or upon the snowy summit of a lofty mountain might be seen great towers grouped about a massive donjon, looking in the distance like an antique diadem. Here were the graceful pointed arches of a Gothic cloister, side by side with the heavy Egyptian columns of a Saxon church; there, close by some pagan chieftain’s citadel with its square towers, stood the crenellated fortress of a Christian lord; or, again, a stronghold crumbling with age, neighbored by a monastery ravaged by war. Of all these edifices a strange medley of architectural styles, now almost forgotten, daringly constructed in apparently inaccessible spots but a few ruins remained to bear witness alike to the power and the impotence of man. Within their walls deeds were perhaps done far worthier of repetition than all the stories which are written now; but time passed; the eyes which witnessed them are closed; the tradition of them died with the lapse of years, like a fire which is not fed; and when that is lost, who can read the secret of the ages?

The manor-house of Vermund the Refugee, which our two travellers had now reached, was one of those places about which popular superstition has woven endless amazing histories and marvellous legends. By its walls composed of pebbles bedded in cement, now harder than stone it was easy to determine that it was built about the fifth or sixth century. But one of its five towers remained standing; the other four, more or less dilapidated, and strewing the top of the rock with broken fragments, were connected by a line of ruins, which also showed the ancient limits of the inner courts of the castle. It was very difficult to penetrate this enclosure, littered as it was with stones and shattered blocks of granite, and overgrown with weeds and brambles which, clambering from ruin to ruin, crowned the broken walls with verdure, or overhung the precipice with long, flexible branches. On these drooping tendrils, it was said, dim ghosts often swung in the moonlight, the guilty spirits of those who had wilfully drowned themselves in Lake Sparbo; and to these twigs, too, the water-sprite fastened the cloud which was to bear him home again at sunrise. Fearful mysteries were these, more than once witnessed by hardy fishermen, when, to take advantage of the time when dogfish sleep, they ventured to row as far as Oëlmœ cliff, which loomed up in the darkness over their heads like the broken arch of some huge bridge.

Our two adventurers climbed the manor wall, though not without some difficulty, and crept through a crevice, for the door was filled with fragments. The only tower which, as we have said, remained standing, was at the extreme edge of the rock. It was, Spiagudry told Ordener, from the top of this tower that Munkholm lighthouse could be seen. They went towards it, although the darkness was at that moment complete, the moon being hidden by a great black cloud. They were about to cross a breach in another wall, in order to enter what was once the second courtyard of the castle, when Benignus stopped short, and suddenly seized Ordener’s arm with such a trembling hand that the young man himself almost fell

“What now? “ asked Ordener in surprise.

Benignus, without answering, pressed his arm more firmly, as if begging him to be silent.

“Well “ said the young man.

Another pressure, accompanied by an ill-suppressed sigh, decided him to wait patiently until this fresh fright should cease.

At last Spiagudry asked, in a stifled voice: “ Well, master, what do you say now? “

“To what? “ said Ordener.

“Yes, sir,” added the other, in the same tone; “ I suppose you are sorry now that you came here? “

“No, indeed, my worthy guide; on the contrary, I hope to climb higher still. Why should you think that I am sorry? “

“What, sir, did you not see? “

“See! What? “

“You saw nothing? “ repeated the honest keeper, with ever-increasing terror.

“Truly I did not,” impatiently answered Ordener; “ I saw nothing, and I heard nothing but the sound of your teeth chattering with fright.”

“What! not behind that wall, in the shadow, those two flaming eyes, like comets, fixed directly upon us, did you not see them? “

“Upon my honor, I did not.”

“You did not see them move up and down, and then disappear among the ruins? “

“I don’t know what you are talking about. Besides, what if I did see them I “

“What! Mr. Ordener, don’t you know that there is but one man in Norway whose eyes gleam in that way in the dark? “

“Well, and what then? Who is this man with the eyes of a cat? Is it Hans, your much-dreaded Icelander? So much the better if he be here! It will spare us a journey to Walderhog.”

This “ so much the better “ was not to the taste of Spiagudry, who could not help betraying his secret thought by the involuntary ejaculation: “ Oh, sir, you promised to leave me at the village of Surb, a mile away from the battle.”

The generous and kindly Ordener understood, and smiled.

“You are right, old man; it would be unfair to make you share my danger; therefore fear nothing. You see this Hans of Iceland everywhere. May there not be some wildcat lurking among these ruins, whose eyes shine quite as fiercely as his do? “

Once more Spiagudry’s fears were set at rest, either because Ordener’s suggestion struck him as very plausible, or because his young companion’s composure proved contagious.

“Ah, sir,” said he, “ if it had not been for you I should have died a dozen deaths from fright as I climbed these rocks. To be sure, I should never have attempted such a task if it had not been for you.”

The moon, which now broke through the clouds, showed them the gateway to the highest tower, the foot of which they had already reached. They entered, after raising a thick curtain of vines, which showered them with drowsy lizards and old decayed bird’s-uests. The keeper picked up a couple of pebbles, and striking them together, produced a few sparks, by means of which he soon set fire to a heap of dead leaves and dry branches collected by Ordener. In a few moments a bright column of flame rose into the air, and banishing the darkness about them, permitted them to examine the interior of the tower.

Nothing was left but a circular wall, which was very thick, and was overgrown with moss and vines. The ceiling and floors of its four stories had crumbled away one after the other, and now formed a vast heap of rubbish upon the ground. A narrow spiral staircase, entirely without a railing, and broken in various places, was built in the wall, to the top of which it led. As the fire began to crackle cheerily, a swarm of owls and ospreys flew up heavily, with strange, weird cries, and huge bats now and then hovered above the flames, poised upon their ashen wings.

“Our hosts do not receive us very merrily,” said Ordener; “ but do not take fright again.”

“I, sir,” replied Spiagudry, seating himself close to the fire; “ I fear an owl or a bat! I have dwelt with corpses, and I do not fear vampires. Ah, I only dread the living! I am not brave, I admit; but at least I am not superstitious. Come, sir. take my advice; let us laugh at these ladies in black petticoats and with such hoarse voices, and let us be thinking of supper.”

Ordener thought of nothing but Munkholm.

“I have here a few provisions,” said Spiagudry, drawing his knapsack from under his cloak; “ but if your appetite be as good as mine, this black bread and mouldy cheese will not go far. I see that we shall have to observe the limits of the law laid down by the French king, Philip the Fair, Nemo audeat comedere prater duo fercula cum potagio. There must be nests of gulls or pheasants on the top of this tower; but how are we to get there by that dilapidated staircase, which does not look as if it would bear the weight of anything but a sylph? “

“Still,” answered Ordener, “ it must needs bear mine, for I shall certainly climb to the top of this tower.”

“What, master! to get a few gull’s-nests? Do not, for mercy’s sake, be so rash! It is not worth while to kill yourself for the sake of a better supper. Besides, suppose you should make a mistake and take the nests of these owls? “

“Much I care for your nests! Didn’t you tell me that I could see Munkholm light from the top of this tower? “

“So you can, young master; it lies to the south. I see that your desire to establish this point, so important to the science of geography, was your motive for taking this fatiguing journey to Vermund castle. But do consider, good Mr. Ordener, that it may sometimes be the duty of a zealous student to brave toil and hardship, but never to run into danger. I implore you, do not attempt that poor broken-down staircase, upon which even a crow would not venture to perch.”

Benignus was by no means anxious to be left alone in the tower. As he rose to take Ordener’s hand, his knapsack, which was lying across his knees, fell upon some stones, and gave forth a clear metallic ring.

“What have you in your wallet that rings so loudly? “ asked Ordener.

This was such a delicate question that Spiagudry lost all desire to restrain his young companion.

“Well,” said he, without answering the question, “ if, in spite of all my prayers, you persist in climbing to the top of this tower, at least beware of the broken places in the stairs.”

“But,” repeated Ordener, “ you have not told me what you have in your knapsack to make it sound so metallic.”

This indiscreet persistence was extremely unpleasant to the old keeper, who cursed the questioner from the bottom of his soul.

“Oh, noble master,” he replied, “ how can you show such curiosity about a paltry iron barber’s-basin, which clinked against a stone? If I cannot persuade you to change your mind,” he made haste to add, “ come back as soon as you can, and be careful to hold fast to the vines which cover the wall. You will see Munkholm lighthouse to the south, between Frigga’s Footstools.”

Spiagudry could not have said anything better calculated to drive every other idea out of the young man’s head. Ordener, throwing aside his mantle, sprang toward the staircase, up which the keeper followed him with his eyes until he could only see him move like a faint shadow upward to the top of the wall, dimly lighted by the flickering flames and the cold rays of the moon.

Then reseating himself and picking up his knapsack, he said: “ Now, my dear Benignus Spiagudry, while that young lynx cannot see you, and you are alone, make haste and break the cumbrous iron envelope which prevents you from taking possession, oculis et manu, of the treasure undoubtedly contained in this casket. When it is delivered from its prison, it will be lighter to carry and easier to conceal.”

Arming himself with a huge stone, he was about to break the lid of the box, when the firelight, falling on the iron lock, suddenly arrested the antiquarian.

“By Saint Willibrod the Numismatologist, I am not mistaken,” he exclaimed, eagerly rubbing the rusty lid; “those are indeed the arms of Griffenfeld. I came near doing a very foolish thing in breaking this lock. This may be the only perfect copy in existence of those famous armorial hearings destroyed in 1076 by the hangman’s hand. The devil! I will not touch this box. Whatever may be the value of its contents, unless, as seems scarcely probable, it should be coin of Palmyra or Carthaginian money, this is certainly still more precious. So here I am the sole owner of the now obsolete arms of Griffenfeld! Let me hide this treasure carefully, and I may some time discover the secret of opening the casket without committing an act of vandalism. The Griffenfeld arms! Oh, yes! here are the hand of Justice and the scales upon a gules ground. What luck! “

At each fresh heraldic discovery that he made as he polished the ancient coffer, he uttered a cry of admiration or an exclamation of content.

“By means of a solvent, I can open the box without breaking the lock. It probably contains the ex-chancellor’s treasure. If any one, tempted by the bait of the four crowns offered by the council for my head, should recognize me now and stop me, I can readily buy my freedom. So this blessed casket will save me.”

As he spoke, he looked up mechanically. All at once his grotesque features changed with lightning speed from an expression of intense delight to that of stupefied dismay; his limbs trembled convulsively, his eyes became fixed, his brow furrowed, his mouth gaped wide, and his voice stuck in his throat.

Before him, on the other side of the fire, stood a little man with folded arms. By his dress of blood-stained skins, his stone axe, his red beard, and the ravenous stare fastened on his face, the wretched keeper at once recognized the frightful character whose last visit he had received in the Spladgest at Throndhjem.

“It is I! “ said the little man, with terrible calmness. “ That casket will save you,” he added with a bitterly sarcastic smile. “ Spiagudry, is this the way to Thoctree? “

The unfortunate man tried to stammer a word of excuse.

“Thoctree! Sir My lord and master, I was

“You were going to Walderhog,” replied the other, in a voice of thunder.

The terrified Spiagudry mustered all his forces to deny the charge.

“You were guiding an enemy to my retreat. I thank you! ‘T will be one living man the less. Fear nothing, faithful guide; he shall follow you.”

The luckless keeper strove to shriek, but could with difficulty utter a feeble moan.

“Why are you so frightened at my presence? You were seeking me. Hark ye! Do not speak, or you are a dead man.”

The little man swung his stone axe above the keeper’s head. He added, in a voice which sounded like the roar of a mountain torrent as it bursts from some subterranean cave: “ You have betrayed me.”

“No, your Grace! No, your Excellency! “ gasped Benignus, scarcely able to articulate these words of apology and entreaty.

The other gave vent to a low growl.

“Ah! you would deceive me again! Hope not to succeed. Listen! I was on the roof of the Spladgest when you sealed your compact with that mad fool; twice you have heard my voice. It was my voice you heard amid the storm upon your road; it was I whom you met in Vygla tower; it was I who said, ‘ We shall meet again! “

The terrified keeper looked about him in despair, as if to summon help. The little man went on: “I could not let those soldiers who pursued you, escape my wrath; they belonged to the Muukholm regiment. I knew that I should not lose you. Spiagudry, it was I whom you saw again in Oëlmœ village beneath the miner’s hat; it was my footstep and my voice that you heard, and my eyes that you saw as you climbed to these ruins. It was I! “

Alas! the unfortunate man was but too well convinced of these dreadful truths. He rolled upon the ground at the feet of his fearful judge, crying in faint and agonizing accents, “ Mercy! “

The little man, his arms still folded, fixed upon him a murderous look, more scorching even than the flames upon the hearth.

“Ask that casket to save you, as you said it would do,” he said sarcastically. “ Mercy, sir, mercy! “ repeated the expiring victim.

“I warned you to be faithful and to be dumb. You have not been faithful; but in future I protest that you shall be dumb.”

The keeper, grasping the horrible meaning of these words, uttered a deep groan.

“Fear nothing,” said the man; “ I will not part you from your treasure.”

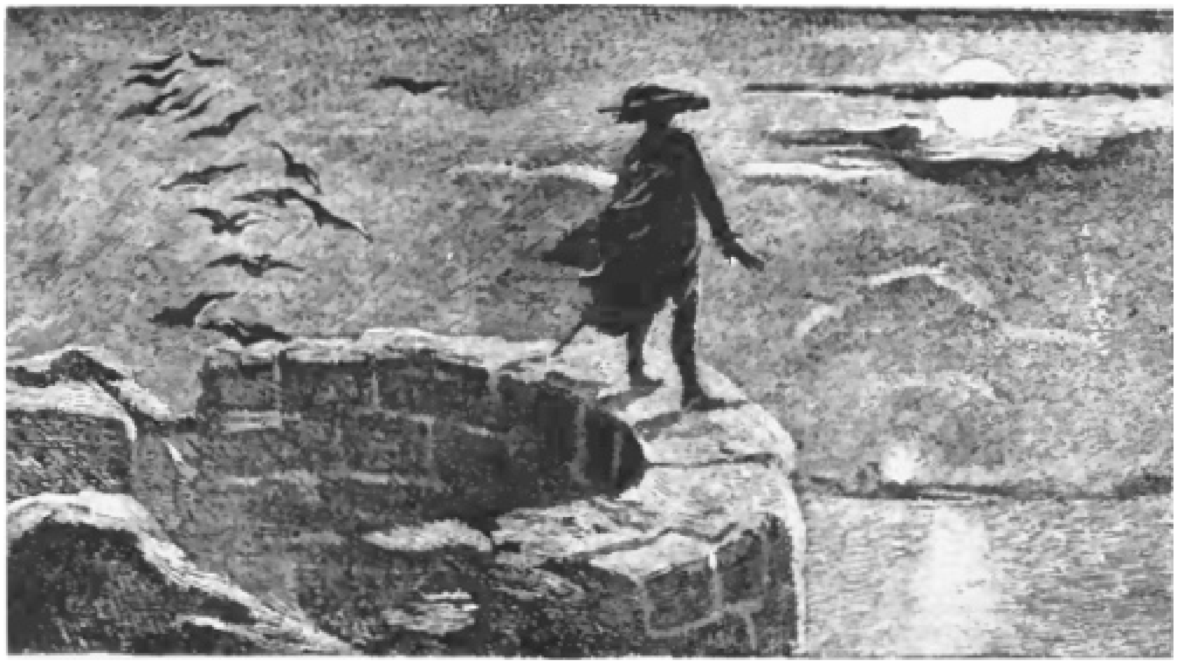
At these words, unfastening his leather belt, he passed it through a ring on the cover of the casket, and by this means hung it about Spiagudry’s neck, the poor fellow bending beneath its weight.

“Come!” rejoined the monster, “to what devil will you confide your soul? Make haste and summon him, lest another demon whom you do not care about, take possession of it before him.”

The desperate old man, past all power of speech, fell at the little man’s knees, making countless gestures of terror and entreaty.

“No, no! “ said his tormentor; “ my faithful Spiagudry, you need not be distressed at leaving your young companion without a guide. I promise you that he shall go where you go. Follow me; you do but show him the way. Come! ‘

With these words, seizing the wretched man in his powerful arms, he bore him from the tower as a tiger might carry off a writhing serpent, and a moment later a fearful shriek rang through the ruins, mingled with a. horrible burst of laughter.



Ordener reached the Top of the Tower

CHAPTER XXIII SWORD AND GOWN.

Yes, we may reveal to the faithful lover's tear-wet eye the distant object of his adoration. But alas! the moments of expectation, the farewells, the thoughts, the sweet and bitter memories, the enchanting dreams of two beings that love! Who can restore these?

Maturin: Bertram.

Meantime the venturesome Ordener, after a score or more of narrow escapes from a fall during his perilous ascent, reached the top of the thick, round tower wall. At his unexpected visit, dusky old owls abruptly aroused from their nests, flew up, staring at him as they sailed away, and loose stones, displaced by his tread, rolled into the abyss, rebounding from projections in the masonry with a remote, hollow roar.

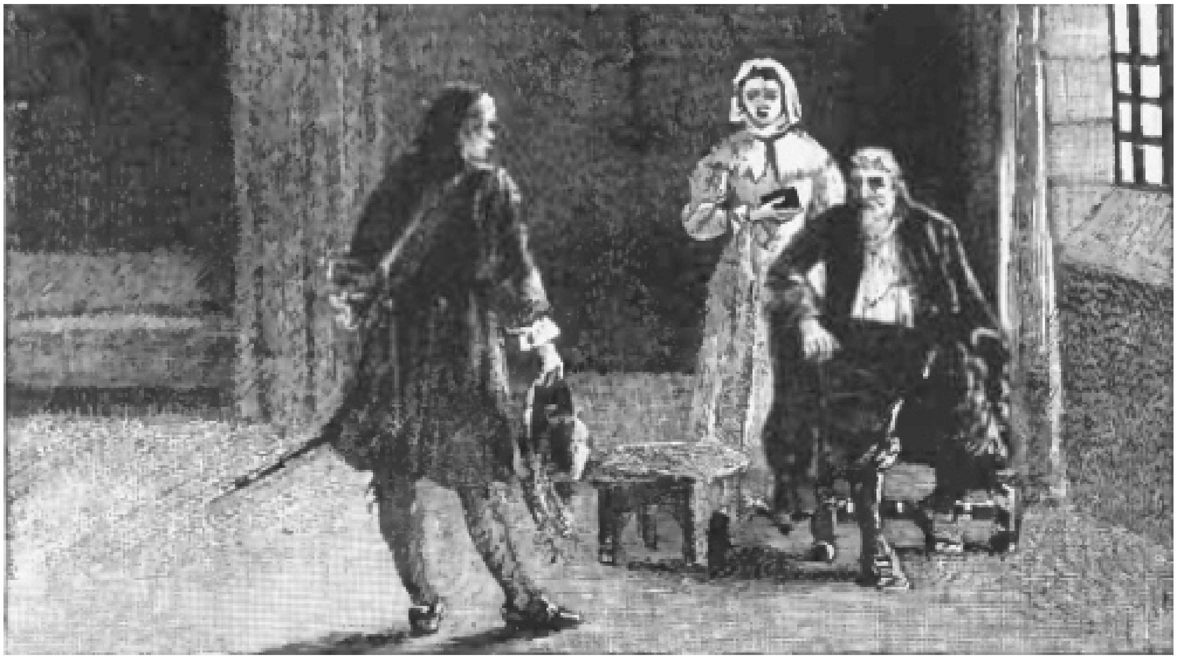
At any other time, Ordener's gaze would have roamed far and wide, and his mind would have dwelt upon the depth of the gulf yawning beneath him, which seemed even greater from the thick darkness of the night. His eye, taking in all the great masses of shadow on the horizon, their sombre outlines but half revealed by a nebulous moon, would have striven to distinguish between mist and rocks, between mountains and clouds; his imagination would have lent life to all the gigantic forms, the fantastic shapes with which moonlight clothes hills and vapors. He would have listened to the indistinct murmur of lake and woods blended with the shrill sough of the wind through the crevices in the stones and through the dried grass at his feet, and his fancy would have lent words to all those low voices through which material Nature speaks while man sleeps, in the silence of the night. But although the scene unconsciously acted upon his whole being, other thoughts filled his mind. Hardly had his foot touched the top of the wall, when his eye turned to the southern sky, and he thrilled with unspeakable rapture as he saw beyond and between two small mountains a point of light gleaming upon the horizon like a red star. It was Munkholm beacon.

None but those who have tasted the truest joys which life can give can understand the young man's happiness. His soul was filled with delight; his heart beat violently. Motionless, his eye fixed, he gazed at the star of hope and consolation. It seemed as if that beam of light traversing the darkness, and coming from the spot which held all that made life worth living, bore with it something of his Ethel. Ah! do not doubt it; one soul may sometimes hold mysterious communion with another, though widely parted by time and space. In vain the world of reality rears its barriers between two beings who love; inhabitants of an ideal world, they are present to each other in absence, they are united in death. What can mere bodily separation or physical distance avail if two hearts be indissolubly bound by a single thought and a common desire? True love may suffer, but it cannot die.

Who has not repeatedly lingered on a rainy night beneath some dimly lighted window? Who has not passed and repassed a certain door, rapturously wandered up and down before a certain house? Who has not abruptly retraced his steps, to follow, at evening, along some deserted, winding street, a floating skirt or a white veil suddenly recognized in the twilight? He who has never experienced these feelings may safely say that he has never loved.

As he gazed at the distant lighthouse, Ordener pondered. A sad and ironical contentment took the place of his first transports; a thousand varying thoughts and ideas crowded upon his agitated spirit. “ Yes,” said he, “ a man must labor long and painfully to win at last a ray of happiness in the vast night of existence. So she is there! She sleeps, she dreams, perhaps she thinks of me! But who will tell her that her Ordener even now hangs above an abyss, sad and lonely, surrounded by darkness, her Ordener, who retains nothing of her but a single ringlet pressed to his heart and a faint light upon the horizon! “ Then, looking at the ruddy glow of the huge fire burning in the tower beneath, and escaping through the crevices in the wall, he murmured: “ Perhaps from one of her prison windows she casts an indifferent glance at the far-off flame upon this hearth.”

All at once, a loud shriek and a prolonged burst of laughter rose from the brink of the precipice below; he turned abruptly, and saw that the interior of the tower was vacant. Alarmed for the safety of the old man, he hurriedly descended; but he had taken but a few steps when he heard a dull splash, as if a heavy body had been thrown into the deep waters of the lake.



His Excellency the Governor

CHAPTER XXIV BEELZEBUB HIMSELF.

Count Don Sancho Diaz, lord of Saldana, shed bitter tears in his prison cell. Full of despair, he sighed forth in solitude his complaints against King Alfonso: “Oh, sad moments, when my white locks remind me how many years I have already passed in this horrible prison!”

Old Spanish Romance.

The sun was setting, and its horizontal beams threw the dark shadow of the prison-bars upon Schumacker’s woollen gown and Ethel’s crape dress, as they sat by the high-arched casement, the old man in a great Gothic chair, the young girl upon a stool at his feet. The prisoner seemed to be brooding, in his favorite melancholy attitude. His bald, wrinkled brow rested on his hand, and his face was hidden save for the long white beard which hung down his breast in sad disorder.

“Father,” said Ethel, trying by every means to rouse him, “ my lord and father, I dreamed last night of a happy future. Look, dear father; raise your eyes, and see that bright, cloudless sky.”

“I can only see the sky,” the old man replied, “ through my prison-bars, as I can only see your future, Ethel, through my misfortunes.”

Then his head, for an instant lifted, fell back upon his hands, and both were silent.

“Father,” rejoined the young girl, a moment later, in a timid voice, “ are you thinking of Lord Ordener?”

“Ordener?” said the old man, as if striving to recall the name. “ Ah, I know whom you mean! What of him?”

“Do you think that he will soon return, father? He has been gone so long! this is the fourth day.”

The old man shook his head sadly.

“I think that when four years have passed, his return will be as close at hand as it is today.”

Ethel turned pale.

“Heavens! Then you think that he will not come back?”

Schmnacker made no answer. The young girl repeated her question in an anxious and beseeching tone.

“Did he not promise to return?” said the old man, curtly.

“Yes, to be sure!” eagerly answered Ethel.

"Well, how can you reckon upon his coming, then? Is he not a man? I believe that the vulture will return to a dead body, but I have no faith in the return of spring when the year is on the wane."

Ethel, seeing that her father had relapsed into his wonted melancholy, took courage; the voice of her young and virginal soul proudly denied the old man's morbid philosophy.

"Father," she said firmly, " Lord Ordener will return; he is not like other men."

"What do you know about it, girl?"

"What you know yourself, my lord and father."

"I know nothing," said the old man." I heard words from a man, and they promised the actions of a god." Then he added, with a bitter smile: " I have weighed them well, and I see that they are too beautiful to be true."

"And I, sir, believe them because they are so beautiful."

"Oh, girl, if you were what you should be, Countess of Tönsberg and Princess of Wollin, surrounded, as you would be, by a swarm of handsome traitors and selfish adorers, such credulity would be most dangerous."

"It is not credulity, my lord and father, but confidence."

"It is easy to see, Ethel, that there is French blood in your veins."

This idea led the old man, by an imperceptible transition, to a different train of thought, and he added, with a certain complacency:

"For those who degraded your father to a point lower yet than that from which he had raised himself, cannot deny that you are the daughter of Charlotte, Princess of Tarentum, or that one of your ancestresses was Adela (or Edila), Countess of Flanders, whose name you bear."

Ethel's mind was running on quite other things.

"Father, you misjudge the noble Ordener."

"Noble, my daughter! What do you mean by that? I have made men noble who proved themselves very vile."

"I do not mean, sir, that his nobility is of the kind conferred by man."

"Do you know that he is descended from some 'jarl' or ' hersa '?"

"I know as little of his descent as you do, father. He may be," she added, with downcast eyes, " the son of a vassal or a serf. Alas! crowns and lyres may be painted upon the velvet covering of a footstool. I only mean that, judged by your own standard, my revered sire, he has a noble heart."

Of all the men whom she had seen, Ordener was the one whom Ethel knew at once best and least. He had dawned upon her destiny, like one of those angels who visited the first men, wrapped alike in mystery and in radiant light. Their mere presence revealed their nature, and they were at once adored. Thus Ordener had shown Ethel what men usually conceal, his heart; he had been silent concerning that of which they usually make boast, his country and his family. His look was enough for Ethel, and she had faith in his words. She loved him, she had given him her life, she was intimate with his soul, and she did not know his name.

“A noble heart!” repeated the old man; a noble heart! Such nobility is higher than any in the gift of kings; it is the gift of God. He is less lavish with it than are they.”

The prisoner raised his eyes to his shattered escutcheon as he added:” And he never withdraws it.”

“Then, father,” said the girl, “ he who retains the one should be easily consoled for the loss of the other.”

These words startled her father and restored his courage. He replied in a firm voice:-

“You are right, girl. But you do not know that the disgrace held by the world to be unjust is sometimes confirmed by our secret conscience. Such is our poor nature; once unhappy, countless voices which slumbered in the time of our prosperity wake within us and accuse us of faults and errors before unnoted.”

“Say not so, illustrious father,” said Ethel, deeply moved; for by the old man’s altered voice, she felt that he had allowed the secret source of one of his greatest sorrows to escape him.

She raised her eyes to his face, and kissing his pallid, withered hand, she added gently:” You are severe in your judgment of two noble men, Lord Ordener and yourself, my revered father.”

“You decide lightly, Ethel. One would say that you did not know that life is a serious matter.”

“Am I wrong then, sir, to do justice to the generous Ordener?”

Schumacker frowned, with a dissatisfied air.

“I cannot approve, my daughter, of such admiration for a stranger whom you may never see again.”

“Oh,” said the young girl, upon whose soul these cold words fell like a heavy weight, “ do not believe it. We shall see him again. Was it not for your sake that he went forth to brave such danger?”

“Like yourself, I confess that I was at first deceived by his promises. But no; he will never go upon his mission, and therefore he will never return to us.”

“He did go, sir; he did go.”

The tone in which the young girl pronounced these words was almost that of one offended and insulted. She felt herself outraged in her Ordener’s person. Alas! she was only too sure in her own soul of the truth which she asserted.

The prisoner replied, seemingly unmoved:” Very well. If he has really gone to fight that brigand, if he has rushed into such danger, it comes to the same thing, he will never return.”

Poor Ethel! how often a word indifferently uttered, painfully galls the hidden wound in an anxious and tortured heart! She bent her pale face to hide from her father’s stern gaze the tears which, in spite of all her efforts, fell from her burning eyes.

“Oh, father,” she sighed, “ while you speak thus, this noble and unfortunate youth may be dying for your sake!”

The aged minister shook his head doubtfully.

“That I can neither believe nor wish. And even so, how am I to blame? I should merely show myself ungrateful to the young man, as so many others have shown themselves to me.”

A deep sigh was Ethel’s only answer; and Schumacker, turning to his table, tore up with an absent air a few leaves of “ Plutarch’s Lives,” which volume lay before him, already tattered in countless places, and covered with marginal notes. A moment later the door opened, and Schumacker, without looking up, cried out as usual: “ Do not enter! do not disturb me! I will see no one!”

“It is his Excellency the governor,” was the answer.

An elderly man dressed in the uniform of a general, with the collars of the Elephant, the Dannebrog, and the Golden Fleece about his neck, advanced toward Schumacker, who half rose, muttering,” The governor! the governor!” The general bowed respectfully to Ethel, as she stood at her father’s side, timidly and anxiously watching him.

Perhaps before proceeding further, it will be well briefly to recall the motives of General Levin’s visit to Munkholm. The reader will remember the unpleasant news which disturbed the old governor, in the twentieth chapter of this truthful narrative. On receiving it, he at once saw the importance of questioning Schumacker; but he was extremely reluctant to do so. The idea of tormenting a poor prisoner, already a prey to so much that was painful, and whom he had known in his days of power, of severely scanning the secrets of an unfortunate man, even if guilty, was most unpleasant to his kind and generous soul. Still, his duty to the king required it. He ought not to leave Throndhjem without such fresh light as might be gained by questioning the apparent author of the rebellion among the miners. Accordingly, the night before his departure, after a long and confidential talk with Countess d'Ahlefeld, the governor made up his mind to visit the prisoner. As he approached the fortress, thoughts of the interests of the State, of the advantage to which his many personal enemies might turn what they would style his negligence, and perhaps too the crafty words of the chancellor's wife, worked within him, and confirmed him in his purpose. He therefore climbed to the Lion of Schleswig tower with every intention to be severe; he resolved to bear himself toward Schumacker the conspirator as if he had never known Griffenfeld the chancellor, to cast aside all his memories, and even his natural disposition, and to speak as a firm judge to this former fellow-sharer in the royal favor.

So soon, however, as he entered the ex-chancellor's apartment, the old man's venerable though sombre face made a strong impression upon him; Ethel's sweet though dignified expression touched him; and with his first glance at the two prisoners, his stern intentions died within him.

He advanced toward the fallen minister, and involuntarily offered him his hand, saying, without remarking that his politeness met with no response:

"How are you, Count Griffenf- His old habit overcame him for the moment; then he corrected himself quickly "Mr. Schumacker?" With this he paused, satisfied and exhausted by such an effort.

Silence ensued. The general racked his brain to find words harsh enough to correspond with this brutal beginning.

"Well," Schumacker said at last, " are you the governor of the province of Throndhjem?"

The governor, somewhat surprised to find himself questioned by the man he had meant to question, bowed his head.

"Then," added the prisoner, " I have a complaint to lay before you."

"A complaint! What is it? what is it?" And the kind-hearted Levin's countenance assumed a look of interest.

Schumacker went on, in a tone of considerable annoyance: “ By order of the viceroy I am to be left free and undisturbed in this donjon.”

“I am aware of the order.”

“And yet, Governor, I am importuned and annoyed by visits.”

“Visits! and from whom?” cried the general; “ tell me who dares “

“You, Governor.”

These words, uttered in a haughtv tone, offended the general. He answered, in a somewhat irritated voice: “ You forget that my power knows no limits when it is a question of serving the king.”

“Unless,” said Schumacker, “ it were those of the respect due to misfortune. But men know nothing of that.”

The ex-chancellor said this as if speaking to himself.

The governor heard him.

“Yes, indeed! yes, indeed! I was wrong, Count Griff”- Mr. Schumacker, I should say; I should leave the privilege of anger to you, since the power is mine.”

Schumacker was silent for a moment. “ There is,” he resumed thoughtfully, “ something about your face and voice, Governor, which reminds me of a man I once knew. It was very long ago. No one but myself can remember those days. It was in the time of my prosperity. He was one Levin de Knud, of Mecklenburg. Did you ever know the foolish fellow?”

“I knew him,” quietly replied the general.

“Oh, you remember him! I thought it was only in adversity that we remembered.”

“Was he not a captain in the Royal Guards? “ added the governor.

“Yes, a mere captain, although the king loved him dearly. But he thought of nothing but pleasure, and seemed to have no ambition. He was a strange, mad fellow. Can you conceive that a favorite could be so moderate in his desires?”

“I can understand it.”

“I was fond of this Levin de Knud, because he never gave me any alarm. He was the king’s friend as he might have been the friend of any other man. It seemed as if he loved him for his own sake, and not for his position.”

The general would have interrupted Schumacker; but the latter persisted, either from a spirit of contradiction, or because the train of thought into which he had drifted really pleased him.

“Since you knew this Captain Levin, Governor, you probably know that he had a son who died young. But do you remember what happened at the birth of this son?”

“I can better recall what occurred at the time of his death,” said the general, covering his eyes with his hand, and in a faltering voice.

“But,” continued the heedless Schumacker, “ this fact was known to very few persons, and it will show you just how peculiar this Levin was. The king wished to be the child’s godfather; would you believe that Levin refused? He did more; he chose an old beggar who hung about the palace gates, to hold his son at the baptismal font. I never could understand the reason for such an act of lunacy.”

“I will tell you,” replied the general. “ In choosing a guardian for his son’s soul, this Captain Levin doubtless thought that a poor man had more influence with God than a king.”

Schumacker considered for a moment, then said: “ You are right.”

The governor again attempted to turn the conversation to the object of his visit. But Schumacker cut him short.

“Excuse me; if it be true that you know this Levin of Mecklenburg, let me talk of him. Of all the men whom I knew in the days of my grandeur, he is the only one whose memory does not inspire me with disgust or horror. Although he carried his peculiarity to the verge of folly, his noble qualities, none the less, made him one man in a thousand.”

“I do not agree with you. This Levin was no better than other men. In fact, there are many who are better.”

Schumacker folded his arms, and raised his eyes to heaven. “Yes, that is the way with them all. You cannot praise a worthy man in their presence, that they do not instantly seek to disparage him. They poison everything, even the pleasure of just praise, rare as it is.”

“If you knew me, you would not accuse me of disparaging Gener- I mean, Captain Levin.”

“Nonsense! nonsense,” said the prisoner;” for loyalty and generosity, there were never two men like this Levin de Knud, and to say a word to the contrary is both an outrageous slander and a flattery of this miserable human race.”

“I assure you,” returned the general, trying to assuage Schumacker’s wrath, “ that I have not the slightest intention of wronging Levin de Knud.”

“Do not say that. Although he was so foolish, the rest of mankind is anything but like him. They are a false, ungrateful, envious set of slanderers. Do you know that Levin de Knud gave more than half his income to the Copenhagen hospitals?”

“I did not know that you knew it.”

“There it is!” triumphantly exclaimed the old man. “ You thought that you could safely brand him, trusting to my ignorance of the poor fellow’s good deeds!”

“Not at all, not at all!”

“Do you suppose, too, that I don’t know that he persuaded the king to give the regiment which he intended for him, to an officer who had wounded him in a duel, because, he said, the other outranked him?”

“I thought that transaction was a secret.”

“Well, tell me, Governor of Throndhjem, does that make it any less beautiful? If Levin concealed his virtues, is that a reason for denying them? Oh, how much alike men are! How dare you compare the noble Levin with them, he who, when he could not save a soldier convicted of an attempt to murder him, settled a pension upon his murderer’s widow?”

“Pooh! who would not do as much? “ Here Schumacker exploded. “ Who? You! I! Any other man, Sir Governor! Because you wear the showy uniform of a general, and stars and crosses on your breast, do you think yourself a very meritorious person? You are a general, and poor Levin, I dare say, died a captain. True, he was a foolish fellow, and never thought of promotion.”

“If he did not think of it himself, the king in his goodness thought of it for him.”

“Goodness? Say, rather, justice, if there be such a thing as the justice of a king! Well, what signal reward did he receive? “

“Capital!” cried the aged minister, clapping his hands. ‘‘ A faithful captain is perhaps, after thirty years’ service, made a major; and this distinguished mark of favor offends you, noble general? The Persian proverb is true which says that the setting sun is jealous of the rising moon.”

Schumacker’s fury was so great that the general could scarcely get in the words: “ If you persist in interrupting me You will not let me explain “

“No, no!” continued the other; “ I thought at first sight, General, that I caught a certain likeness between you and my good Levin; but no! there is none.”

“Do but listen to me- “

“Listen to you! and hear you say that Levin de Knud is unworthy of some trifling reward?”

“I swear it is not “

“You will presently I know you men try to persuade me that he is a knave, a hypocrite, and a villain, like the rest of you.”

“No, indeed!”

“How do I know? Or perhaps that he betrayed a friend, persecuted a benefactor, as you all do; or poisoned his father, or murdered his mother?”

“You are mistaken. I have not the slightest desire

“Do you know that it was he who compelled Vice chancellor Wind, as well as Scheele, Vinding, and Justice Lasson, three of my judges, not to sentence me to death? And you would have me hear him calumniated, and not defend him! Yes, that is what he did for me, and yet I had always done him more harm than good; for I am like you, vile and wicked.”

The noble Levin was strangely moved by this singular interview. The object alike of the most direct insults and the sincerest praise, he knew not how to take such rough compliments and such flattering abuse. He was shocked and touched. Now he wanted to get into a passion, and now to thank Schumacker. Present and yet unknown, he loved to hear the fierce Schumacker defend in him, and against him, a friend and an absent man; only he would have preferred that his advocate should put a trifle less bitterness and acrimony into his panegyric. But in his innermost heart the exaggerated praise bestowed on Captain Levin pleased him even more than the insults addressed to the governor of Throndhjem wounded him. Fixing his kindly gaze upon the favorite in disgrace, he allowed him to vent his gratitude and his wrath; until at last, after a prolonged invective against human ingratitude, he sank exhausted upon an arm-chair, into the trembling Ethel’s arms, saying in a melancholy voice: “ Oh, men! what have I done that I should be forced to know you? “

The general had not yet been able to broach the important topic of his visit to Munkholm. All his reluctance to torment the captive by a series of questions, revived; to his pity and emotion were added two powerful motives: Schumacker’s present state of agitation made it improbable that he could answer satisfactorily; and, moreover, on considering the affair more closely, it did not seem to the trusting Levin that such a man could be a conspirator. Still, how could he leave Throndhjem without examining Schumacker? This disagreeable necessity of his position as governor once more overcame all his scruples, and he began as follows, softening his voice as much as possible:

"Pray, calm your excitement, Count Schumacker."

This compromise struck the good governor as a happy inspiration, well fitted to reconcile the respect due to the sentence pronounced against him, with a proper regard for the prisoner's misfortune, as it combined his noble title and his humble cognomen. He added: " It is my painful duty- "

"First," interrupted the prisoner, " allow me, Governor, to return to a subject which interests me far more than anything that your Excellency can have to say to me. You assured me just now that that madcap Levin had been rewarded for his services. I am most anxious to know in what way."

"His Majesty, my lord Griffenfeld, raised Levin to the rank of general, and for more than twenty years the foolish fellow has grown old in peace, honored with this military dignity and the favor of his king."

Schumacker's head drooped.

"Yes; that foolish Levin, who cared so little whether he ever lived to be more than a captain, will die a general; and the wise Schumacker, who expected to die Lord Chancellor, grows old a prisoner of State."

As he uttered these words, he hid his face in his hands and heaved a deep sigh. Ethel, who understood nothing of the conversation, save that it distressed her father, instantly strove to divert him.

"Look yonder, father, to the north; I see a gleam of light which I never noticed before."

In fact, the night, which had now closed in, revealed a faint and distant light upon the horizon, apparently coming from some far-off mountain. But Schumacker's mind and eye were not, like those of Ethel, ever bent on the north; therefore he made no reply. The general alone was struck by the young girl's remark.

"It may be," thought he, " a fire kindled by the rebels; " and this idea forcibly reminding him of the purpose of his visit, he thus addressed the prisoner: " Mr. Griffenfeld, I am sorry to distress you, but you must allow me- "

"I understand you, Governor; it is not enough to spend my days in this dungeon, to lead a lonely, disgraced existence, to have nothing left but bitter memories of past grandeur and power, you must also intrude upon my solitude, gaze upon my sorrow, and enjoy my misfortune. Since that noble Levin de Knud, whom some of yuur outward features recall to me, is a general like yourself, why was not he permitted to fill your post; for he would never, I swear, Sir Governor, have come to torture a miserable prisoner."

During the course of this strange interview the general had more than once been on the point of revealing himself, that he might bring it to a close. This indirect reproach made it impossible; it accorded so well with his secret feelings that it almost made him feel ashamed of himself. Still, he tried to answer Schumacker's injurious charge. Strange to say, from their mere difference of character, the two men had mutually changed their position; the judge was in some sort obliged to justify himself to the prisoner.

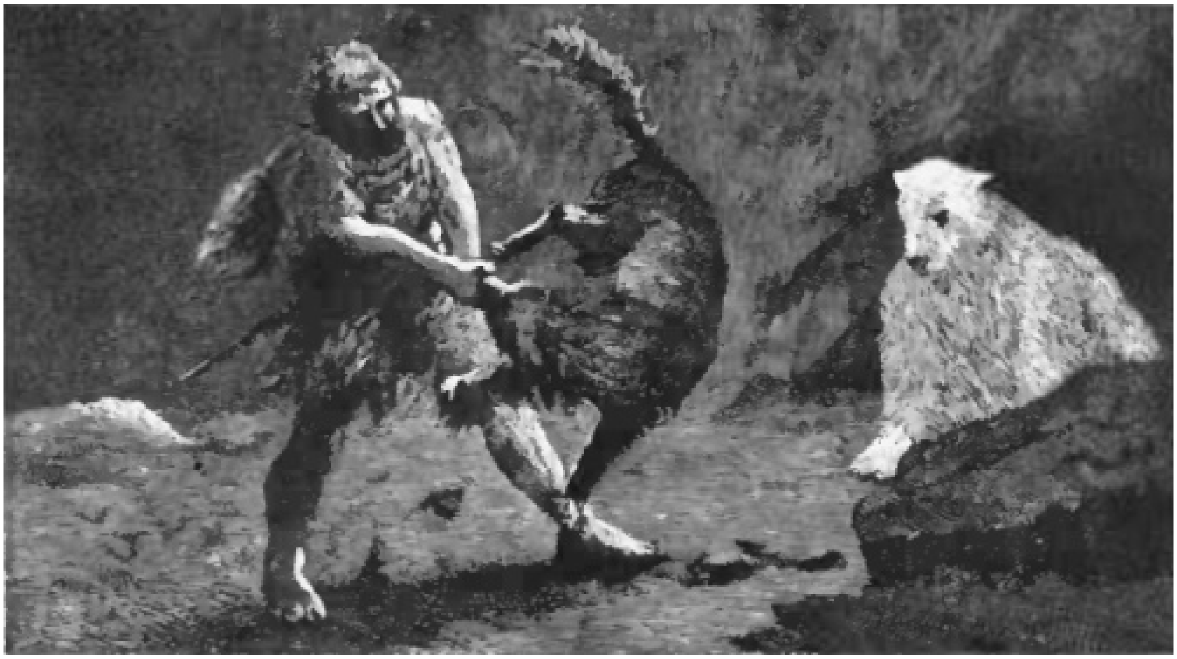
"But," said the general, "if his duty compelled him, do not doubt that Levin de Knud "

"I do doubt it, noble Governor," exclaimed Schumacker; "do not doubt in your turn that he would have rejected, with all the generous indignation of his soul, the office of spy, or of increasing the agony of a wretched prisoner! No, I know him better than you; he would never have accepted the duties of an executioner. Now, General, I am at your service; do what you consider your duty. What does your Excellency require of me?"

And the old minister fixed his haughty gaze upon the governor, all whose resolution was gone. His first reluctance had returned, and was not to be overcome.

"He is right," thought he; " why should I torture an unfortunate man upon mere suspicion? Let some one else undertake the task!"

The effect of these reflections was prompt; he walked up to the astonished Schumacker and pressed his hand. Then he hurriedly left the room, saying: " Count Schumacker, always preserve the same esteem for Levin de Knud."



The Wolf of Miösen

CHAPTER XXV THE DEMON AT BAY.

Lion (roaring). Oh-
Demetrius. Well roared, lion!
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night’s Dream.

The traveller of the present day who visits the snowclad mountains which surround Lake Miösen like a white girdle, will scarcely find a vestige of what Norwegians of the seventeenth century knew as Arbar ruin. No one was ever able to decide the architectural period or the purpose for which this ruin, if we may give it the name, was built. As you left the forest which covered the southern shore of the lake, after climbing a slope crowned with here and there a fragment of wall or a bit of masonry once a tower, you reached an arched opening leading into the side of the mountain. This entrance, now completely closed by landslips, led into a species of gallery cut in the living rock, and piercing the mountain from side to side.

This tunnel, dimly lighted by conical air-holes made in the arched roof at regular intervals, ended in an oval hall in part excavated from the rock, and terminating in a cyclopeau stone wall. Around this hall, in deep niches, were rude images carved from granite. Some of these mysterious figures, which had fallen from their pedestals, lay heaped in confusion on the ground with other shapeless rubbish, covered with grass and weeds, among which crawled lizards, spiders, and all the hideous vermin born of damp earth and ruins.

Daylight penetrated to this place only through a door opposite the mouth of the gallery. This door, viewed in a certain light, was seen to be of pointed construction, of no especial date, and evidently the work of the architect’s whim.

This door might as well have been styled a window, although it was on a level with the ground, for it opened upon a fearful precipice; and it was impossible to imagine whither a short flight of stairs which overhung the abyss could possibly lead.

The hall formed the interior of a huge turret which from a distance, seen from the other side of the precipice, looked like any high mountain peak. It stood alone, and, as has already been said, no one knew to what sort of structure it had belonged. Above it, however, upon a plateau inaccessible even to the boldest hunter, was a mass of masonry which might be taken, being so remote, either for a rounded rock or for the remains of a colossal arch. This turret and crumbling arch were known to the peasants as Arbar ruin, the origin of the name being fully as obscure as that of the buildings themselves.

On a stone in the centre of this oval hall sat a little man dressed in the skins of wild beasts, whom we have already had occasion to mention several times in the course of our story.

His back was turned to the light, or rather to the faint twilight which filtered into the gloomy turret when the sun reached high noon. This light, the strongest natural light which ever entered the tower, was not sufficient to reveal the nature of the object over which the little man was stooping. An occasional muffled groan was heard, and it seemed to proceed from this object, judging by the feeble movement which it now and then made. Sometimes the little man straightened himself, and raised to his lips a cup, by its form apparently a human skull, filled with steaming liquid of some indistinguishable hue, and drank deep draughts.

All at once he started up.

“I hear steps in the gallery, I believe; can it be the chancellor of the two kingdoms already?”

These words were followed by a horrible burst of laughter ending in a savage roar, which met with an instant response in a howl from the gallery.

“Oh, ho! “ rejoined the lord of Arbar ruin; “ it is not a man. But it is an enemy all the same; it is a wolf.”

In fact, a huge wolf suddenly emerged from the vaulted gallery, paused a moment, then advanced stealthily toward the man, crouching to the ground and fixing upon him burning eyes which gleamed through the darkness. The man stood with folded arms, and watched him.

“Ah! ‘t is the old gray wolf, the oldest wolf in Miösen woods! Good-morning, wolf; your eyes glitter; you are hungry, and the smell of dead bodies attracts you. You too shall soon attract other hungry wolves. “Welcome, wolf of Miösen; I have always longed to make your acquaintance. You are so old that they say you cannot die; they will not say so tomorrow.”

The animal answered with a frightful yell, sprang back, and then bounded upon the little man.

He did not budge an inch. As quick as a flash, with his right arm he grasped the body of the wolf, which, standing on two legs before him, had thrown his forepaws upon his shoulders; with his left hand he guarded his face from the gaping jaws of his enemy, seizing it by the throat with such force that the creature, compelled to raise his head, could scarcely utter a sound.

“Wolf of Miösen,” said the triumphant man, “you tear my jerkin, but your skin shall replace it.”

As he mingled with these words of victory a few words in a strange jargon, a convulsive movement made by the dying wolf caused him to stumble upon the stones which were thickly strewn over the floor. The two fell together, and the roars of the man were blended with the howls of the beast.

Obliged in his fall to relax his grasp of the wolfs throat, the man felt the sharp teeth buried in his shoulder, when, as they rolled over one another, the two combatants struck against an enormous shaggy white body lying in the darkest corner of the room. It was a bear, who waked from his heavy sleep with a growl.

No sooner were the drowsy eyes of this new-comer opened wide enough to see the fight, than he rushed furiously, not upon the man, but upon the wolf, just then victorious in his turn, seized him violently by the back, and thus freed the human combatant.

This latter, far from showing any gratitude for so great a service, rose, covered with blood, and springing upon the bear, gave him a vigorous kick, such as a master might bestow on a dog guilty of some misdemeanor.

“Friend, who called you? Why do you meddle?”

These words were interspersed with furious ejaculations and gnashing of teeth.

“Begone! “ he added with a roar.

The bear, who had received at one and the same time a kick from the man and a bite from the wolf, uttered a plaintive remonstrance; then, hanging his great head, he released the famished beast, who hurled himself upon the man with fresh fury.

While the struggle was renewed, the rebuffed bear went back to his couch, sat gravely down, and gazed indifferently at the two raging adversaries, preserving the utmost silence, and rubbing first one fore-paw and then the other across the tip of his white nose.

But the small man, as the leader of the Miösen wolves returned to the charge, seized his bloody snout; then, by an unparalleled exertion requiring both strength and skill, he managed to clasp his entire jaw in one hand. The wolf struggled frantically with rage and pain; foam dropped from his compressed lips, and his eyes, distended with rage, seemed starting from their sockets. Of the two foes, the one whose bones were shattered by sharp teeth, whose flesh was rent by cruel claws, was not the man but the wild beast; the one whose howl was most savage, whose expression was most fierce, was not the animal but the man.

Finally, the latter, collecting all his strength, exhausted by the aged wolf's prolonged resistance, squeezed his muzzle in both hands with such force that blood gushed from the creature's nose and mouth; his flaming eyes grew dim, and half closed; he tottered, and fell lifeless at his victor's feet. The feeble twitching of his tail and the convulsive and occasional shudder which shook his entire frame, alone showed that he was not yet quite dead.

All at once a final quiver ran through the expiring frame, and all signs of life ceased.

"There you lie, dead, old wolf," said the little man, kicking him contemptuously. " Did you think that you could live on after you had encountered me? You will hasten no more with muffled step across the snow, following the scent and the track of your prey; you are food for wolves or vultures now yourself; you have devoured many a lost traveller on the shores of Miösen during your long life of murder and carnage; now you yourself are dead, you will eat no more men. 'T is a pity!"

He took up a sharp stone, crouched beside the wolf's warm, palpitating body, broke the limbs at their joints, severed the head from the shoulders, slit the skin from head to heel, stripped it off, as he might remove his own waistcoat, and in the twinkling of an eye nothing was left of the much-dreaded wolf of Miösen but a bare and bleeding carcass. He flung his trophy over his shoulders, bruised with bites, turning inside out the skin, still reeking and stained with long streaks of blood.

"Needs must," he muttered, " dress in the skins of beasts; that of a man is too thin to keep out the cold."

As he thus talked to himself, more hideous than ever beneath his loathsome burden, the bear, tired no doubt of inaction, furtively approached the other object lying in the shadow, to which we referred in the beginning of this chapter, and a crunching of bones, mingled with faint, agonized moans, soon rose from this gloomy quarter of the hall. The small man turned.

“Friend! “ cried he in threatening tones; “ ah, you good-for-nothing Friend! Here, come here!”

And picking up a huge stone, he hurled it at the monster’s head. The creature, stunned by the blow, reluctantly tore himself from his prey, and crawled, licking his bloody chaps, to fall panting at the little man’s feet, lifting his huge head and wriggling, as if to ask pardon for his rash act.

Then ensued between the two monsters for we may well apply that name to the dweller in Arbar ruin an exchange of significant growls. Those of the man expressed anger and authority; those of the bear, entreaty and submission.

“There,” said the man at last, pointing with his crooked finger to the flayed body of the wolf, “ there is your victim; leave mine to me.”

The bear, after smelling at the wolfs carcass, shook his head discontentedly, and turned his eye toward the man who seemed to be his master.

“I understand,” said the latter; “ that is too dead for you, while there is still life in the other. You are refined in your pleasures, Friend, quite as much so as a man; you like to have your food retain its life until the instant when you tear it limb from limb; you love to feel the flesh expire beneath your teeth; you enjoy nothing unless it suffers. We are alike; for I am not a man, Friend; I am superior to that wretched race; I am a wild beast like you. How I wish that you could speak to me, comrade Friend, to tell me whether my joy equals that which thrills your bearish soul when you devour a man’s heart. But no; I should be loath to hear you speak, lest your voice should recall to me the human voice. Yes, growl at my feet with that growl which makes the stray goatherd tremble among the mountains; it pleases me as the voice of a friend, because it proclaims you his enemy. Look up, Friend, look up at me; lick my hands with that tongue which has drunk so often of human blood. Your teeth are white like mine: it is no fault of ours if they be not red as a new-made wound; but blood washes away blood. More than once from the depths of some dark cave I have seen the maidens of Kiölen or Oëlmœ bathe their bare feet in some mountain torrent, singing the while in sweet tones; but I prefer your hairy snout and your hoarse cries to those melodious voices and satin-smooth faces; for they terrify mankind.”

As he said this, he sat down and yielded his hand to the caresses of the monster, who, rolling on his back at his master's feet, lavished all sorts of endearments upon him, like a spaniel displaying his pretty tricks before the sofa of his mistress.

Stranger yet was the intelligent attention with which he seemed to follow his master's words. The singular monosyllables with which the latter interspersed them seemed particularly intelligible to his understanding; and he showed his comprehension by rearing his head suddenly, or by a vague rumbling noise in the back of his throat.

"Men say that I shun them," resumed the little man; " but it is they that shun me; they do through fear what I should do through hate. Still, you know, Friend, that I am always glad to come across a man when I am hungry or thirsty."

All at once he saw a red glow start into life in the depths of the gallery, growing brighter by degrees and faintly tinting the damp old walls.

"Here comes one now. Talk of the Devil and you see his horns. Hullo, Friend!" he added, turning to the bear;" hullo! get up!"

The animal instantly rose.

"Come, I must reward your obedience by gratifying your appetite."

With these words, the man stooped toward the object lying on the ground.

The cracking of bones broken by a hatchet was heard; but no sigh or groan was now blended with it.

"It seems," muttered the small man, " that there are but two of us left alive in Arbar hall. There, good Friend, finish the feast which you began.''

He flung toward the aforementioned outer door what he had detached from the object stretched at his feet. The bear threw himself upon his prey so rapidly that the swiftest eye could not have been sure that the fragment was indeed a human arm, clad in a bit of green stuff of the same shade as the uniform worn by the Munkholm musketeers.

"Some one is coming," said the little man, keeping his eye on the light, which was steadily advancing. " Comrade Friend, leave me alone for a moment. Ho there! Away with you!"

The obedient beast rushed to the door, backed down the steps outside, and disappeared, bearing off his disgusting booty with a satisfied howl.

At the same instant a tall man appeared at the mouth of the tunnel, whose sinuous depths still reflected a dim light. He was wrapped in a long brown cloak, and carried a dark-lantern, which he turned full on the small man's face.

The latter, still seated on his stone with folded arms, exclaimed: " Ill befall you, you who come hither guided by an idea, and not by instinct!"

But the stranger, making no reply, seemed studying him carefully.

"Look at me," he continued, raising his head;" an hour hence you may have no voice left with which to boast that you have seen me."

The new-comer, moving his light up and down the little man's person, seemed even more surprised than frightened.

"Well, what astonishes you so much?" rejoined the little man, with a laugh like the breaking of bones." I have legs and arms like your own; only my limbs will not like yours serve to feed wildcats and crows!"

The stranger at length replied, in a low but confident voice, as if he only feared being heard from without: " Hear me; I come, not as an enemy, but as a friend."

The other interrupted," Then why did you not strip off your human form?"

"It is my purpose to do you a service, if you be he whom I seek."

"You mean, to ask a service. Man, you waste your breath. I can do no service to any save those who are weary of life."

"By your words," replied the stranger," I am sure that you are the man I want; but your stature Hans of Iceland is a giant. You cannot be he."

"You are the first who ever doubted it to my face."

"What! can it be? " And the stranger approached the little man. " But I always heard that Hans of Iceland was of colossal height."

"Add my renown to my height, and you will see that I am taller than Mount Hecla."

"Indeed! Tell me, I pray, are you really Hans, a native of Klipstadur in Iceland?"

"It is not in words that I should answer that question." said the little man, rising; and the look which he cast at the rash stranger made him start back several paces.

"Confine yourself, I beg, to answering it by that glance," he replied in a voice of entreaty, casting a look toward the exit, which showed his regret that he had ever entered; " I came here in your interests alone."

Upon entering the hall, the new-corner, having but a glimpse of the person whom he accosted, had retained his self-possession; but when the master of Arbar rose, with his tigerish visage, his thick-set limbs, his bloody shoulders, but half concealed by a skin still green, his huge hands armed with claws, and his fiery eyes, the bold stranger shuddered, like an ignorant traveller who thinks he is handling an eel and feels the sting of a viper.

“My interests? “ repeated the monster.” Have you come to tell me of some spring which I may poison, some village I may burn, or some Munkholm musketeer I may slaughter?”

“Perhaps. Listen: The miners of Norway are in a state of revolt. You know what disaster follows in the train of revolt.”

“Yes,- murder, rape, sacrilege, fire, and pillage.”

“All these I offer you.”

The little man laughed.

“I should not wait for you to offer them.”

The brutal sneer accompanying these words made the stranger again shudder. He went on, however:

“In the name of the miners, I offer you the command of the insurrection.”

The small man was silent for an instant. All at once his dark countenance assumed an expression of infernal malice.

“Does the offer really come from them?” said he.

This question seemed to embarrass the new-comer; but as he was sure that he was unknown to his terrible interlocutor, he readily recovered himself.

“Why have the miners rebelled?”

“To throw off the burden of the royal protectorate.”

“Only for that?” replied the other in the same mocking tone.

“They also wish to free the prisoner of Munkholm.”

“Is this the sole purpose of the movement?” repeated the small man in a voice which confused the stranger.

“I know of no other,” he stammered.

“Oh, you know of no other!”

These words were pronounced in the same sarcastic tone. The stranger, to hide the embarrassment which they caused him, hastily drew from beneath his cloak a heavy purse which he flung at the monster’s feet.

“Here is your pay as commander-in-chief.”

The small man spurned the purse with his foot.

“I will not have it. Do you imagine that if I wanted your gold or your blood I should wait for your permission to gratify my desire?”

The stranger made a gesture of surprise, almost of terror.

“It is a present from the royal miners.”

“I will not have it, I tell you. Gold is useless to me. Men will sell their soul, but they do not sell their life. That must be taken by force.”

“Then I may tell the miners that the terrible Hans of Iceland accepts their leadership, but not their gold?”

“I do not accept it.”

These words, uttered in curt tones, seemed to strike the pretended envoy from the rebellious miners very unpleasantly.

“What? “ he asked.

“No!” repeated the other.

“You refuse to take part in an expedition which presents so many advantages?”

“I am quite able to pillage farms, lay waste villages, and massacre peasants or soldiers, single-handed.”

“But consider that by accepting the offer of the miners you are assured of a free pardon.”

“Does this offer also come from the miners?” asked the other, with a laugh.

“I will not disguise from you the fact,” replied the stranger, with an air of mystery, “that it comes from an important personage who is deeply interested in the insurrection.”

“And is this important personage so sure that he will himself escape hanging?”

“If you knew who he is, you would not shake your head so significantly.”

“Indeed! Well, who is he?”

“I may not tell you.”

The small man stepped forward and clapped the stranger on the shoulder, still with the same sardonic sneer.

“Shall I tell you?”

The man wrapped in the cloak gave a start; it was a start of both fright and wounded pride. He was prepared for neither the monster’s abrupt proposal, nor for his savage familiarity.

“I am only laughing at you,” added the brigand. “ You little guess that I know all. This important personage is the Lord High Chancellor of Norway and Denmark; and you yourself are the Lord High Chancellor of Norway and Denmark.”

It was indeed he. On reaching Arbar ruin, toward which we left him journeying with Musdœmon, he had been unwilling to intrust to any one else the task of securing the brigand, by whom he was far from supposing himself known and expected. Never, even after years had elapsed, did Count d’Ahlefeld, with all his power and all his diplomacy, discover how Hans of Iceland acquired his information. Was it through Musdœmon’s treachery? True, it was Musdœmon who suggested to the noble count that it would be well to see the brigand in person; but what profit could he derive from his perfidy? Had the bandit captured upon some one of his numerous victims, papers relating to the chancellor’s schemes? But Frederic d’Ahlefeld was, with the sole exception of Musdœmon, the only living being acquainted with his father’s plans, and frivolous as he was, he was not quite so senseless as to expose such a secret. Moreover, he was in garrison at Munkholm, at least so the chancellor supposed. Those who read the close of this scene, without being any better able to solve the problem than was Count d’Ahlefeld, will see how much truth there was in this latter hypothesis.

One of Count d’Ahlefeld’s most marked characteristics was his great presence of mind. When he heard himself so abruptly named, he could not repress an exclamation of surprise; but in the twinkling of an eye, his pale, proud features lost their expression of fear and astonishment, and recovered their usual calm composure.

“Well, yes,” said he, “I will be frank with you; I am indeed the chancellor. But I hope you will be equally frank with me.”

A burst of laughter interrupted him.

“Have I waited to be urged to tell you my name, or to tell you your own?”

“Tell me with the same sincerity how you found me out?”

“Have you never heard that Hans of Iceland can see through mountains?”

The count tried to insist.

“Consider me as a friend.”

"Your hand, Count d'Ahlefeld," said the little man, with brutal familiarity. Then he stared the minister in the face, exclaiming: " Could our two souls escape from our bodies at this moment, I fancy that Satan would hesitate to decide which of the two belonged to the monster."

The haughty noble bit his lip; but between his fear of the robber and his desire to secure him as his tool, he managed to disguise his resentment.

"Do not imperil your own interests; accept the command of the rebellion, and trust to my gratitude."

"Chancellor of Norway, you count on the success of your schemes, like an old woman who dreams of the gown which she will spin from stolen hemp, while the cat's claws tangle her spindle."

"Reflect once more, before you reject my offers."

"Once more, I, the brigand, say to you, Lord Chancellor of both kingdoms, No!"

"I expected a different answer, after the eminent service which you have already rendered me."

"What service? " asked the robber.

"Was it not you who murdered Captain Dispolsen?" replied the chancellor.

"That may be, Count d'Ahlefeld; I do not know him. Who is he?"

"What! did not the iron casket which he had in charge fall to your share?"

This question seemed to sharpen the robber's memory.

"Stay!" said he; "I do remember that man and his iron casket. It was on Urchtal Sands."

"At least," rejoined the chancellor, " if you could restore that casket to me, my gratitude would be unbounded. Tell me what has become of that casket, for I am sure it is in your possession."

The noble minister laid such stress upon this request that the brigand was struck by it.

"So, then, that iron casket is of the utmost importance to your Grace, my Lord Chancellor?"

"Yes."

"What shall my reward be if I tell you where it is?"

"Anything that you may desire, my dear Hans."

"Well, I will not tell you."

"Pooh! you are joking! Think what a service you can do me."

“That is exactly what I am thinking.”

“I will insure you a vast fortune; I will ask your pardon from the king.”

“You had better beg your own from me,” said the bandit. “ Look you, Lord Chancellor of Norway and Denmark, the tiger does not devour the hyena. I will permit you to leave my presence with your life, because you are a scoundrel, and every instant that you live, every thought of your heart, causes fresh misery for mankind and fresh crime for yourself. But return not, or I may teach you that my hatred spares no one, not even a villain. As for your captain, do not flatter yourself that it was on your account I slaughtered him; it was his uniform which doomed him, as it did this other wretch, whom I did not murder to gratify you either, I assure you.”

With these words, he seized the noble count by the arm and dragged him toward the body lying in the shadow. As he finished his protestations, the light from the lantern fell upon this object. It was a mutilated corpse, and was indeed dressed in the uniform of an officer of the Munkholm Musketeers. The chancellor approached it with a sense of horror. All at once his eye rested on the pallid, blood-stained face of the dead. The livid, half-parted lips, the bristling hair, the discolored cheeks, and lustreless eyes could not disguise that countenance from him. He uttered a fearful shriek:” My God! Frederic! My son.’”

Doubt not that hearts seemingly the most hardened still conceal in their innermost recesses some trace of affection unknown even to themselves, apparently hidden by vice and passion, like a mysterious witness and a future avenger. It may be said to exist, that it may some day make crime acquainted with grief. It silently bides its time. The wicked man bears it in his bosom and is unconscious of it, because no ordinary affection is sufficient to pierce the thick crust of selfishness and iniquity which covers it; but let one of the rare and genuine sorrows of life appear unawares, and it plunges a sharp-edged sword into the dark regions of that soul and probes its lowest depths. Then the unknown sentiment of love is revealed to the wretched criminal, all the more violent for its long repression, all the more painful from his lack of sensibility, because the sting of misfortune was forced to stab the heart more deeply in order to reach it. Nature wakes and casts aside her chains; she delivers the miscreant to unwonted despair, to unheard-of torments; he feels, compressed into a single instant, all the sufferings which he has defied for years. The most various pangs rend him simultaneously. His heart, burdened by dull amazement, revolts to find itself a prey to convulsive agony. He seems to experience the pains of hell while still in this life, and something beyond despair is made clear to him.

Count d’Ahlefeld loved his son without knowing it. We say his son, because, being unaware of his wife’s guilt, as such he regarded Frederic, the direct heir to his name. Supposing him still at Munkholm, he was far from prepared to meet him in Arbar tower, and to find him dead! But there he lay, bruised and bleeding; it was he, impossible to doubt it. His emotions may be imagined when a realizing sense of his love for his son unexpectedly pierced his soul, together with the assurance that he was lost to him forever. All the sensations so inadequately described in these pages burst upon his heart at once like so many claps of thunder. Stunned, as it were, by surprise, terror, and despair, he cast himself upon the ground, and wrung his hands, repeating in woful accents:” My son! my son!”

The brigand laughed. It was horrible to hear such laughter mingled with the groans of a father looking upon the dead body of his son.

“By my ancestor Ingulf! you may call, Count d’Ahlefeld, but you cannot wake him.”

All at once his cruel face darkened, and he said in a melancholy voice:” Weep for your son, if you will; I avenge mine.”

The sound of footsteps hurrying along the gallery interrupted the words upon his lips; and as he turned in surprise, four tall men, with drawn swords, rushed into the room; a fifth, short and stout, followed, bearing a torch in one hand and a sword in the other. He was wrapped in a brown cloak, like that worn by the chancellor.

“My lord,” he exclaimed, “ we heard your voice, and hastened to your assistance.”

The reader has doubtless recognized Musdœmon and the four armed retainers who formed the count’s escort.

As the torchlight filled the room with its ruddy glow, the five new-comers paused in horror-stricken dismay; and it was indeed an awful sight. On the one hand, the bloody remains of the wolf, the disfigured body of the young officer; on the other, the father, with his wild eyes and frantic shrieks; and beside him the fearful monster, turning on his assailants a hideous front, indicative of dauntless surprise.

At the sight of this unlooked for reinforcement the idea of vengeance took possession of the count, and roused him from his despair.

“Death to that brigand!” he cried, drawing his sword; “ he has murdered my son! Kill him! kill him.’”

“Has he murdered Mr. Frederic?” said Musdœmon: and the torch in his hand did not reveal the slightest change in his countenance.

“Kill him! kill him!” repeated the frantic count.

And the whole six rushed upon the robber. He, surprised by this sudden attack, retreated toward the opening which overhung the precipice, with a fierce roar, expressive rather of rage than fear.

Six swords were directed against him, and his eyes flamed forth greater fury, while his features wore a more menacing expression than those of any of his aggressors. He had grasped his stone axe, and, forced by the number of his assailants to confine himself to defensive action, whirled it round and round in his hand so rapidly that the circle described, covered him like a shield. A myriad sparks flashed from the point of his assailants’ swords as they clashed against the edge of the hatchet; but not a single blade touched him. And yet, exhausted by his recent battle with the wolf, he lost ground imperceptibly, and soon found himself driven close against the door opening upon the abyss.

“Courage, friends!” shouted the count;” let us hurl the monster over this precipice.”

“Before I fall, the stars themselves shall fall,” replied the brigand.

But the aggressors redoubled their ardor and their assurance as they saw that the small man was compelled to descend one step of the flight which overhung the abyss.

“Good! one effort more! “ cried the lord chancellor; “ he needs must fall; push your advantage! Wretch, you have committed your last crime. Courage, men!”

While with his right hand he continued his fearful evolutions with the axe, the brigand, without deigning a reply, with his left hand grasped a horn which hung at his belt, and raising it to his lips, again and again blew a long, hoarse blast, which was answered suddenly by a roar from the gulf beneath.

A few instants later, as the count and his followers, still pressing the little man hard, rejoiced that they had driven him down a second step, the huge head of a white bear appeared at the broken end of the staircase. Struck dumb with amazement and fright, they shrank back. The bear climbed the stairs with a lumbering gait, showing his bloody jaws and sharp teeth as he did so.

"Thanks, good Friend!" cried the brigand. And taking advantage of his enemy's surprise, he sprang upon the back of his bear, who slowly descended the stairs backwards, still keeping his threatening front turned upon his master's foes.

Soon, recovering from their first astonishment, they beheld the bear, carrying the brigand beyond their reach, descend into the abyss, probably in the same way that he ascended, by clinging to the trunks of trees and to projecting rocks. They tried to roll great bowlders down upon him; but before they could detach a single one of those ancient granite fragments which had slumbered there so long, the brigand and his strange steed had vanished in a cave.

CHAPTER XXVI DEVOURED ALIVE.

No, no, laugh no more. Look you, that which I thought so humorous has its serious side as well, a very serious side, like everything in this world! Believe me, that word, chance, is blasphemy; nothing beneath the sun is the work of chance; and do you not see herein the purpose marked out by Providence?

-Lessing: Emilia Galotti.

Yes, a deep design often lies at the root of what men call chance. There seems to be a mysterious hand which marks the cause and purpose of events. We inveigh against fickle fortune, against the strange accidents of our lot, and lo! chaos is made clear by a fearful flash of lightning or a marvellous beam of light, and human wisdom is humbled by the great lessons of fate.

If, for instance, when Frederic d'Ahlefeld displayed his magnificent attire, his foolish complacency, and his presumptuous pride, in some sumptuous apartment, to the ladies of Copenhagen; if some man, endowed with the gift of second sight, had troubled his frivolous thoughts by gloomy revelations; if he had told him that one day the brilliant uniform of which he boasted should cause his death; that a monster in human shape should drink his blood as greedily as he, careless epicure that he was, drank the wines of France and Bohemia; that the locks upon which he could not lavish too many essences and perfumes should sweep the dust of a cave haunted by wild beasts; that the arm which he so gracefully offered to the fair ladies of Charlottenburg should be flung to a bear like a half-gnawed chicken-bone, how would Frederic have answered these dismal prophecies? With a laugh and a pirouette; and, more frightful still, most sensible men would have applauded his reckless conduct.

Let us consider his destiny more closely. Is it not strange to find that the crime of Count and Countess d'Ahlefeld met with such fitting punishment? They wove an infamous plot against the daughter of a prisoner; this unfortunate girl by a mere chance found a protector, who saw fit to remove their son, charged by them to carry out their abominable scheme. This son, their only hope, was sent far from the scene of his purposed villany; and hardly had he reached his destination, when another avenging chance caused his death. Thus in their attempt to bring dishonor upon an innocent yet detested young girl, they plunged their own guilty yet adored son into the oblivion of the grave. The wretched pair were made miserable by their own hands.

CHAPTER XXVII THE RASH INTRUDER.

Ah, here comes our lovely countess! Forgive me, Madam, if I may not have the honor of a visit from you today. I am busy. Another time, dear Countess, another time; but to-day I will not detain you longer.-

The Prince and Orsina.

The day after his visit to Munkholm, the governor of Throndhjem ordered his travelling carriage to be made ready very early in the morning, hoping to start off before Countess d’Ahlefeld was awake; but we have already observed that her slumbers were light.

The general had just signed his final instructions to the bishop, into whose hands the government was to be committed during his absence. He rose, put on his fur-lined coat, and was about to leave the room, when the usher announced the chancellor’s wife.

This piece of ill luck confused the old soldier, who could laugh at the fiery rain of a hundred guns, but not at the artifices of a woman. However, he took leave of the wicked creature with a tolerably good grace, and disguised his annoyance until she whispered in his ear with that crafty look which would fain seem confidential,

“Well, noble General, what did he say?”

“Who,- Poël? He said that the carriage was ready.”

“I mean the prisoner of Munkholm, General.”

“Oh! “

“Did he answer your questions satisfactorily?”

“Why Yes, to be sure, Countess,” said the much embarrassed governor.

“Did you find proofs that he was concerned in the conspiracy among the miners?”

The general involuntarily exclaimed, “ Noble lady, he is innocent.”

He stopped short, for he knew that he had uttered the conviction of his heart, not of his head.

“He is innocent!” repeated the countess, with a look of consternation and incredulity; for she trembled lest Schumacker had really proved to the governor the innocence which it was so much to the chancellor’s interest to deny.

The governor had had time to reflect; he answered the persistent gentlewoman in a tone which quieted her fears, for it revealed his doubt and anxiety.

“Innocent Yes, if you choose “

“If I choose, General!” And the wicked woman laughed aloud.

Her laughter offended the governor, who said, “ By your leave, Countess, I will report my interview with the ex-chancellor to the viceroy.” Then he bowed low, and went down to the courtyard, where his carriage awaited him.

“Yes,” said Countess d’Ahlefeld, as she returned to her rooms; “ go, my knight-errant, for your absence rids us of the protector of our enemies. Go; for your departure is the signal for my Frederic’s return. I wonder how you dared to send the handsomest young man in Copenhagen to those horrid mountains! Luckily, it will be easy enough now for me to have him recalled.”

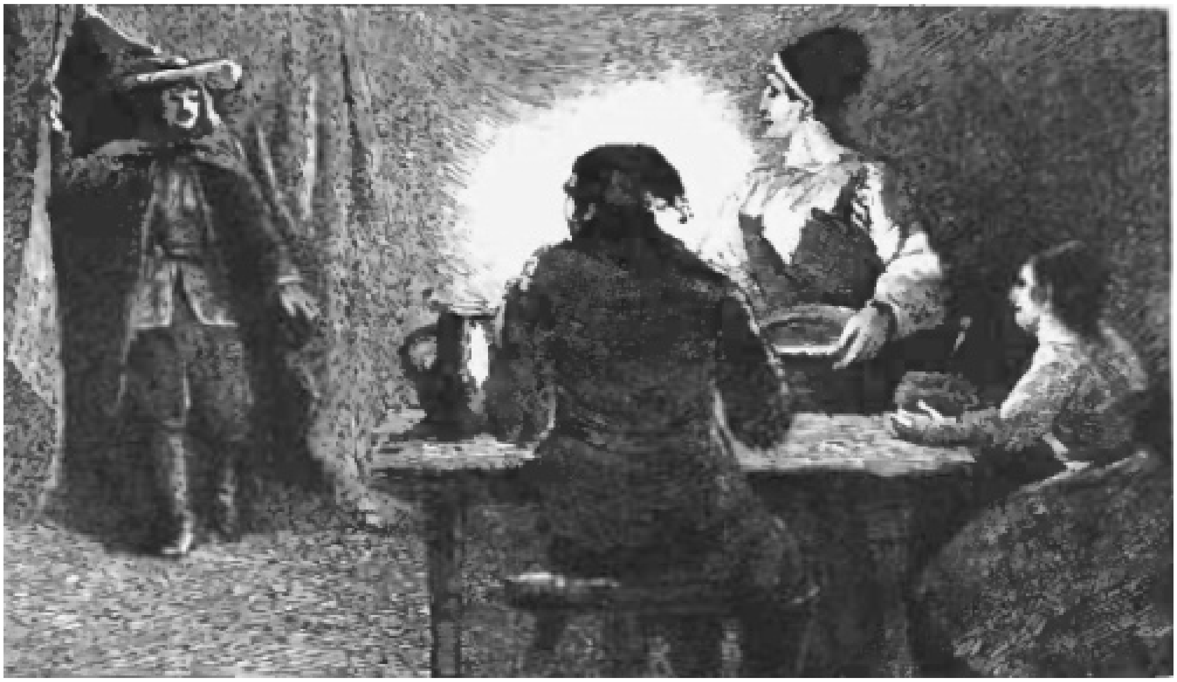
At this thought she turned to her favorite attendant.

“Lisbeth, my dear, send to Bergen for two dozen of those little combs which our elegant young men are wearing in their hair, inquire for the famous Scudéry’s last novel, and see that my dear Frederic’s monkey is washed in rose-water every morning, without fail.”

“What! my gracious mistress,” asked Lisbeth, “ is there a chance that Mr. Frederic will come back?”

“Yes, indeed; and we must do everything that he wishes, so that he may be glad to see me again. I must arrange a surprise for him.”

Poor mother!



As Ordener crossed the Threshold, the Fisherman and his Wife-arose

CHAPTER XXVIII THE CREDULOUS HUNTER.

Bernard hurries along the shores of the Arlanza. He is like a lion rushing from his den, seeking the hunters, and resolved to conquer them or die. The brave and resolute Spaniard sets forth. With a quick step, in his hand a heavy spear, in which he puts his trust, Bernard traverses the ruins of Arlanza.-

Old Spanish Romance.

On descending from the tower from whose summit he had seen Munkholm light, Ordener looked in every direction, until he was exhausted, for his poor guide, Benignus Spiagudry. He called him repeatedly, but only echo answered. Surprised but not alarmed by this inexplicable disappearance, he attributed it to some panic which had seized upon the timid keeper, and after generously blaming himself for having left him, even for a few moments, he decided to spend the night upon the cliff, in order to give him time to return. Then he ate something, and wrapping himself in his mantle, laid down by the dying embers, kissed Ethel's ringlet, and soon fell asleep; for an anxious heart cannot keep awake a man whose conscience is clear.

At sunrise he rose, but found no trace of Spiagudry except his wallet and cloak, which had been left in the tower, showing that his flight had been very hasty. Then, despairing of his return, at least to Oëlmœ Cliff, Ordener resolved to set off without him, for it was on the next day that he hoped to meet Hans of Iceland at Walderhog.

It has been stated in the earlier chapters of this story that Ordener had accustomed himself to the hardships incident to a roving and adventurous life. Having already travelled through northern Norway several times, he did not need a guide, now that he knew where to find the robber. He accordingly turned his lonely steps toward the northwest, no longer having Benignus Spiagudry at his side to tell him just how much quartz or spar each hill contained, what traditions were connected with every ruin, and whether this or that gaping chasm was caused by an ancient flood or by some volcanic action. He walked a whole day through those mountains which, proceeding at intervals like foot-hills from the principal chain traversing the length of Norway, slope gradually down to the sea; so that the coast of that country is a mere succession of promontories and fjords, while inland it is nothing but a series of mountains and valleys, a strange conformation, which has caused Norway to be compared to the skeleton of a great fish.

It was no easy matter to travel in such a region. Sometimes he was forced to follow the stony bed of a dry stream, sometimes to cross, by an unsteady bridge made of a tree-trunk, over a road which torrents born but the day before had chosen for their bed.

Sometimes, too, Ordener would journey for hours without seeing any sign of the presence of man in these wild places, save an occasional glimpse of the sails of a windmill upon the top of a hill, or the sound of a distant forge, whose smoke blew hither and thither like a black plume, as the wind shifted this way and that.

Now and again he met a peasant mounted on a little gray pony, its head down, and scarcely more untamed than its master; or a dealer in furs and skins, seated in his sledge, drawn by reindeer, a long rope fastened behind, the end covered with knots, meant to frighten away wolves, as it rebounded from the pebbles in the road.

If Ordener asked this trader the way to Walderhog cave, the travelling merchant, familiar only with the names and positions of the places to which his business took him, would answer indifferently: “ Keep to the northwest till you come to Hervalyn village, then cross Dodlysax ravine, and by night you will reach Surb, which is only two miles from Walderhog.”

If Ordener put the same question to the peasant, the latter, deeply imbued with the traditions of the country and the fireside tales, would shake his head again and again, and stop his gray horse, as he said:” Walderhog! Walderhog cave! There the stones sing, the dry bones dance, and the demon of Iceland dwells; it cannot be to Walderhog cave that your worship wishes to go?”

“Yes, indeed,” Ordener would reply. “ Has your worship lost your mother, or has fire destroyed your farm, or has one of your neighbors stolen your fat pig?”

“No, truly,” the young man would answer.

“Then some magician must have cast a spell over your worship’s senses.”

“My friend, I asked you to tell me the way to Walderhog.”

“I am trying to answer your question, sir. Farewell. Keep to the north! I can tell you how to go there, but I do not know how you will get back.”

And the peasant would ride off, crossing himself as he went.

To the gloomy monotony of the road was added the inconvenience of a fine, penetrating rain, which took possession of the sky toward noonday, and increased the difficulties of the way. No song-bird dared venture forth; and Ordener, chilled to the bone beneath his cloak, saw only the goshawk and the falcon hover above his head, or the kingfisher fly up from the reeds of a pond with a fish in its claws, startled by his tread.

It was after dark when the young traveller, after making his way through the forest of aspens and beeches which lies close to Dodlysax ravine, reached the village of Surb, where (as the reader may remember) Spiagudry had asked leave to establish his headquarters. The smell of tar and the charcoal smoke told Ordener that he was approaching a seafaring population. He advanced to the first hut which he could see through the darkness. According to Norwegian custom, the low, narrow entrance was closed by a large, transparent fish-skin, tinged at this moment by the flickering red light of the fire. He knocked on the wooden doorpost, saying, “Come in, come in,” answered a voice from within.

“It is a traveller!”

At the same instant an eager hand raised the fish-skin, and Ordener was admitted to the cone-shaped home of a Norwegian ‘longshore fisherman. It was a sort of circular tent made of wood and earth, in the centre of which blazed a fire, where the purple glow of turf was mixed with the white light of the pine. Beside this fire the fisherman, his wife, and two children dressed in rags were seated at a table set with wooden plates and earthen cups. On the opposite side of the fire was a pile of nets and oars; a couple of reindeer were asleep on a bed of dried leaves and skins, which by its ample size seemed intended also as a resting-place for the family and any guests whom it might please Heaven to send them. It took more than one glance to make out the arrangement of the hut; for a thick, pungent smoke, which found but scanty outlet through a hole in the pointed roof, wrapped everything in a misty but almost impenetrable veil.

As soon as Ordener crossed the threshold, the fisherman and his wife rose, and returned his greeting in a frank and friendly manner. Norwegian peasants welcome travellers perhaps as much from a lively feeling of curiosity inherent in their nature as from their native inclination to hospitality.

“Sir,” said the fisherman, “ you must be cold and hungry; here are fire to dry your cloak and excellent bark bread to satisfy your appetite. Afterward your worship may be willing to tell us who you are, where you come from, where you are going, and what stories the gossips relate in your native place.”

“Yes, sir,” added his wife;” and you might add to that bark bread which, as my husband says, is excellent a delicious bit of salt fish, seasoned with whale oil. Sit down, stranger.”

“And if your worship does not like Saint Usuph’s fare,” added the man, “ and will have patience for a few moments, I can promise you a splendid piece of venison, or at least a pheasant’s wing. We are expecting a visit from the best hunter in the three provinces. Isn’t that so, good Maase?”

“Maase,’’ the name which the fisherman gave his wife, is a Norwegian word meaning “ sea-gull.” The wife did not seem in the least offended, either because it was really her name, or because she took it as a term of endearment.

“The best hunter! I should say so,” she answered with great emphasis. “ He means my brother, the famous Kennybol. God bless all his undertakings! He has come to spend a few days with us, and you shall drink a mug of good beer with him. He is a traveller like you.”

“Many thanks, my kind hostess,” said Ordener, with a smile;” but I must be content with your tempting salt fish and a bit of this bark bread. I have not time to wait for your brother, the mighty hunter. I must set off again immediately.”

Good Maase, flattered by the stranger’s praises of her fish and her brother, and vexed at his hasty departure, exclaimed: “ You are very kind, sir. But why should you leave us so soon?”

“I must.”

“Must you venture among these mountains at this hour and in such weather? “

“My business is important.”

These answers roused the native curiosity of the young man’s entertainers as much as they excited their surprise.

The fisherman rose, and said:” You are in the house of Christopher Buldus Braal, fisherman, of the village of Surb.”

The woman added: “ Maase Kennybol is his wife and servant.”

When Norwegian peasants wish to ask a stranger's name in polite style, it is their custom to tell him their own.

Ordener answered: " And I am a traveller, who is neither sure of the name he bears nor of the road he travels."

This strange reply did not seem to satisfy fisher Braal.

"By the crown of Gorman the Old," said he, " I did not suppose there was more than one man in Norway just now who was not sure of his name. I mean the noble Baron Thorwick. who is to change his name, thev say to Count Danneskiold, on account of his famous marriage to the chancellor's daughter. At least, dear Maase, that 's the latest news from Throndhjem. I congratulate you, stranger, upon this likeness between you and the son of the viceroy, the great Count Guldenlew."

"As your worship," added the wife, her face beaming with curiosity, " does not seem able to tell us anything about yourself, can you not tell us something about what is going on just now, for instance, something about this wonderful marriage of which my husband speaks?"

"Yes," rejoined her husband, with a self-important air, " that's the very latest news. Within a month the viceroy's son will marry the chancellor's daughter."

"I doubt it," said Ordener.

"You doubt it, sir! I assure you that the thing is certain. I have it on the best authority. The fellow who told me had it from Mr. Poël, the favorite servant of the noble Baron Thorwick, that is, the noble Count Danneskiold. Can any storm have troubled the waters within the week? Has this grand match been broken oft'? "

"I think so," replied the young man, smiling.

"If that is so, sir, I am wrong. Never light the fire to fry the fish before it is in the net. But have they really quarrelled? Who told you so?"

"Nobody," said Ordener. " I merely imagined so."

At this frank confession the fisherman could not help transgressing the laws of Norwegian courtesy by a loud burst of laughter.

"A thousand pardons, sir. But it is easy to see that you are indeed a traveller, and probably a stranger. Do you fancy that things will turn out as you happen to wish, and that the sky will be clear or cloudy at your caprice? "

Here the fisherman, well versed in the affairs of the nation, as all Norse peasants are, began to explain to Ordener why this marriage could not fail to take place: it was essential to the interests of the d'Ahlefeld family; the viceroy could not refuse the king, who desired it; besides, it was said that the future husband and wife were very much in love. In a word, fisher Braal could not doubt that the match would come off; he only wished he was as sure of killing next day that confounded dogfish which infested Master-Bick pond.

Ordener was little inclined to carry on a political discussion with so uncouth a statesman, and was delighted when the arrival of another guest relieved him of all embarrassment.

"It is he; it is my brother!" cried old Maase.

And no less event than the arrival of her brother could have diverted her from the rapt admiration with which she listened to her husband's lengthy discourse.

The latter, while the two children threw themselves noisily upon their uncle's neck, quietly offered him his hand, saying,

"Welcome, brother."

Then, turning to Ordener:" Sir, this is our brother, the famous hunter Kennybol, from the mountains of Kiölen."

"A hearty greeting to you all," said the mountaineer, taking off his bearskin cap. " Brother, I 've had as bad luck in hunting upon your coast as you would probably have had if you had gone fishing in our mountains. I think I could sooner fill my game-bag if I chased elves and goblins in the misty forests of Queen Mab. Sister Maase, you are the first sea-mew whom I have caught sight of to-day. Here, friends, God keep you! but this wretched grouse is all that the best hunter in the province of Throndhjem has got in a whole day's tramp through the heather in this weather."

With these words he drew from his pouch and laid on the table a white ptarmigan, declaring that it was not worth a shot.

"But," he muttered between his teeth, " my faithful arquebuse, you shall soon hunt far bigger game. If you can bring down no more chamois or elk skins, you shall make holes in green jackets and red jerkins."

These words, but half heard, struck the curious Maase.

"Eh!" asked she; " what did you say, brother?"

"I said that there was always a goblin dancing under a woman's tongue."

"You are right, brother Kennybol," cried the fisherman. " Eve's daughters are all curious, like their mother. Weren't you talking of green jackets?"

"Brother Braal," replied the hunter, with some spirit, " I trust my secrets to no one but my musket, because I am sure that then they will never be repeated."

"There's talk in the village," boldly continued the fisherman, " of a revolt among the miners. Do you know anything about it, brother?"

The mountaineer picked up his cap and pulled it over his eyes, with a sidelong look at the stranger; then he bent toward the fisherman and said in a low, stern tone:" Silence!"

The fisherman shook his head several times.

"Brother Kennybol, the fish may be silent, but it falls into the net all the same."

There was a short pause. The two brothers exchanged meaning glances; the children picked the feathers from the ptarmigan as it lay on the table; the good wife listened, and hoped to guess more than was actually said; and Ordener studied them all.

"If you have but meagre fare to-day," suddenly observed the hunter, evidently anxious to change the subject, " it shall not be so to-morrow. Brother Braal, catch the king of fish, if you can, for I promise you plenty of bear's grease to dress it."

"Bear's grease! " cried Maase. " Has any one seen a bear in the neighborhood? Patrick, Regner, my boys, I forbid you to leave the house. A bear!"

"Make yourself easy, sister; you will have nothing to fear from him after tomorrow. Yes, it was really a bear that I saw about two miles away from Surb, a white bear. He seemed to be carrying off a man, or rather an animal. But no, it may have been a goatherd, for goatherds dress in the skins of animals; however, I was not near enough to tell. What amazed me, was that he carried his prey on his back, and not in his teeth."

"Really, brother? "

"Yes; and the creature must have been dead, for it made no attempt to defend itself."

"But," sagely inquired the fisherman, "if it were dead, how did it stay on the bear's back?"

"That 's more than I can say. Never mind; it shall be the bear's last meal. As I entered the village I engaged six strong companions, and to-morrow, sister Maase, I will bring you the handsomest white fur that ever ran over mountain snow."

“Take care, brother,” said the woman; “ you have seen strange things, truly. That bear may be the Devil.”

“Are you mad? “ interrupted the mountaineer, with a laugh;” the Devil change himself into a bear, indeed! Into a cat or a monkey, I grant you; but to a bear! Oh, by Saint Eldon the exorciser, you’re worse than any child or old woman, with your superstition!”

The poor woman hung her head.

“Brother, you were my lord and master before my revered husband cast his eyes upon me; do as your guardian angel bids you.”

“But,” the fisherman asked the mountaineer, “ where did you meet with this bear?”

“Between Lake Miösen and Walderhog.”

“Walderhog!” said the woman, crossing herself.

“Walderhog!” repeated Ordener.

“But, brother,” rejoined the fisherman;” I hope you were not travelling toward Walderhog.” q” I! Heaven forbid; it was the bear.”

“Shall you go there tomorrow in search of him?” broke in the terrified Maase.

“No, truly; how can you suppose, friends, that even a bear would venture to take refuse in a cave where “

He stopped short, and all three made the sign of the cross.

“You are right,” replied the fisherman;” wild beasts would be warned away by their instinct.”

“My good friends,” said Ordener, “ what is there so frightful about this Walderhog cave?”

They looked at one another in stupid surprise, as if they could not understand such a question.

“Is that where King Walder’s tomb is?” added the young man.

“Yes,” replied the woman;” a stone tomb which sings.”

“And that’s not all,” said the fisherman.

“No,” she added;” the bones of the dead dance there by night.”

“And that ‘s not all,” said the mountaineer.

All were silent, as if they dared not go on.

“Well,” asked Ordener, “ what else is there that is supernatural?”

“Young man,” said the mountaineer, gravely,” you should not speak so lightly; when you see an old gray wolf like me, shudder.”

The young man answered, with a gentle smile:” Still, I should like to know all the marvels which occur in this Walderhog cave; for that is exactly where I am going.”

These words seemed to turn his three hearers into stone.

“To Walderhog! Heavens! are you going to Wnlclerhog?”

“And he says that,” rejoined the fisherman, “just as I might say I’m going to Loevig to sell my codfish, or to Ralph’s meadow for herring. To Walderhog! Great Heavens!”

“Poor young man!” cried the wife;” were you born without a guardian angel? Have you no patron saint? Alas! it must be so; for you do not even seem to know your own name.”

“And what motive,” broke in the mountaineer, “can lead your worship to that fearful spot?”

“I have a question to ask,” answered Ordener.

The astonishment of his hosts grew with their curiosity.

“See here, stranger; you do not seem to be familiar with this part of the country. Your worship is doubtless mistaken; it cannot be to Walderhog that you wish to go.”

“Besides,” added the mountaineer,” if you want to speak with any human being, you will find none there.”

“None but the demon,” rejoined the woman.

“The demon! What demon?”

“Yes,” she added; “the one for whom the tomb sings and the dead dance.”

“Then you do not know, sir,” said the fisherman, dropping his voice and approaching Ordener, “you do not know that Walderhog cave is the favorite abode of “

The woman stopped him.

“Husband, do not speak that name; it brings ill luck.”

“Whose abode?” asked Ordener.

“That of Beelzebub incarnate,” said Kennybol.

“Really, my kind hosts, I know not what you mean.

I was surely told that Walderhog was the haunt of Hans of Iceland.”

A triple cry of terror arose.

“Well! Then you do know! He is the demon we mean!”

The woman drew her woollen kerchief over her face, and called on all the saints to witness that it was not she who uttered that name.

When the fisherman had somewhat recovered from his surprise, he looked steadily at Ordener, as if there were something about that young man which he could not comprehend.

“I did not expect, stranger, that even if I lived still longer than my father, who died at the age of one hundred and twenty, I should ever have to show the road to Walderhog to any human being possessed of his senses and believing in God.”

“Surely not,” cried Maase;” your worship will not go to that accursed cave; for if one only step foot inside, he must make a compact with the Devil;”

“I must go, my kind hosts, and the greatest service that you can do me is to show me the shortest road there.”

“The shortest way to reach the place where you wish to go,” said the fisherman, “ is to throw yourself from the top of the nearest rock into the next torrent.”

“Should I reach the same end,” quietly asked Ordener, “by preferring a useless death to a profitable danger?”

Braal shook his head, while his brother looked scrutinizingly at the young adventurer.

“I understand,” suddenly exclaimed the fisherman; ‘‘ you want to earn the thousand crowns reward which the lord mayor offers for the head of this Iceland demon.”

Ordener smiled.

“Young sir,” added the fisherman, with deep emotion, “take my advice; give up your scheme. I am old and poor, and I would not sell the remnant of my life for a thousand crowns if I had but one day left.”

The woman, with a beseeching, compassionate look, watched the effect of her husband’s entreaties. Ordener made haste to reply:” It is a much higher motive which leads me to seek this robber whom you call a demon; it is for the sake of others, not my own-”

The mountaineer, who had not taken his eyes from Ordener, interrupted him.

“I understand you now. I know why you seek the demon of Iceland.”

“I wish to force him to fight,” said the young man.

“That’s it,” said Kennybol;” you are intrusted with important interests, are you not?”

“So I just said.”

The mountaineer approached the young man with an air of great intelligence, and to his utter amazement whispered in his ear;” You come from Count Schumacker, from Griffenfeld, do you not?”

“Good man, he exclaimed,” how did you know that?”

And, indeed, it was hard for him to guess how a Norwegian mountaineer came to know a secret which he had confided to no one, not even to General Levin,

Kennybol leaned toward him.

“I wish you success,” he observed in the same mysterious whisper.” You are a noble young man to labor thus for the oppressed.”

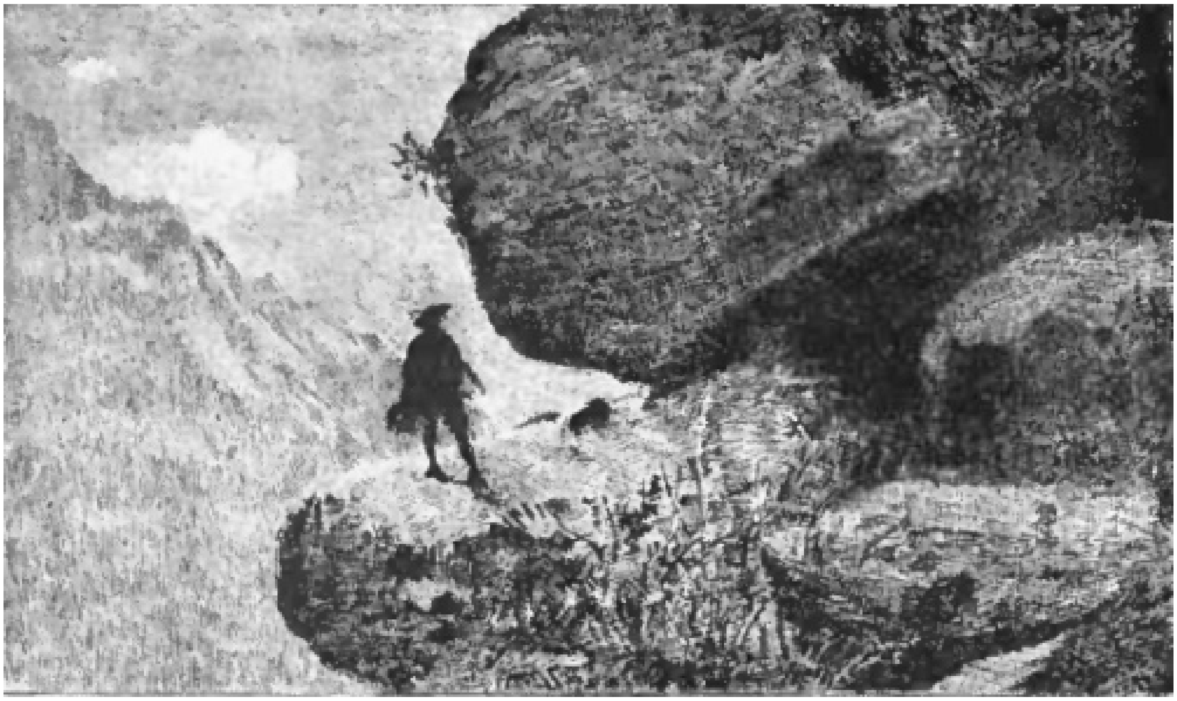
Ordener’s surprise was so great that he could scarcely find words to inquire how the mountaineer had learned the purpose of his journey.

“Silence!” said Kennybol, putting his finger to his lip. “ I hope that you may gain all that you desire from the dweller in Walderhog; my arm, like yours, is loyal to the prisoner of Munkholm.”

Then, raising his voice, before Ordener could answer, he added:” Brother, dear sister Maase, regard this worthy youth as another brother. Come, I think supper is ready.”

“What!” interrupted Maase,” have you persuaded his worship to give up his plan for visiting the demon?”

“Sister, pray that no harm may come to him. He is a noble and worthy young man. Come, brave sir, take some food and a little rest beneath our roof; tomorrow I will show you your road, and we will set out in search, you of the Devil, and I of my bear.”



A Figure disappeared beneath the Roof of the Cavern . . .

CHAPTER XXIX THE ASTROLOGER’S PAPERS.

Comrade, ah! comrade, what comrade’s son art thou? From what race canst thou have sprung to dare attack Fafnir thus?-
Edda

The first rays of the rising sun were just reddening the highest peak of the rocks upon the seacoast, when the fisherman, who had come before the dawn to cast his nets off the shore opposite the mouth of Walderhog cave, saw a figure wrapped in a cloak or shroud descend from the rocks, and disappear beneath the much-dreaded arched roof of the cavern. Struck with terror, he commended his boat and his soul to Saint Usuph, and ran to tell his frightened family that he had seen one of the ghosts which dwell in the palace of Hans of Iceland return to the cave at daybreak.

This ghost, thenceforth the theme and dread of many a long winter evening, was no other than Ordener, the noble son of the Norwegian viceroy, who, while both kingdoms fancied him absorbed in paying tender attentions to his haughty betrothed, had come alone and unknown to risk his life for her to whom he had given his heart and his future, for the daughter of a proscribed man.

Evil omens, sad forebodings, had thus far accompanied him. He had left the fisherman and his family, and as they parted, good Maase knelt and prayed for him. Kennybol and his six comrades, who had pointed out the right road, quitted him within half a mile of Walderhog, and those dauntless hunters who sallied forth to face a bear with a laugh on their lips, gazed in terror upon the fearless traveller as he followed that unhallowed path.

The young man entered Walderhog cave as he might have entered a long-wished-for haven. He felt a transport of delight as he thought that he was about to accomplish the object of his life, and that in a few moments he might perhaps shed his last drop of blood for his Ethel. About to attack a brigand dreaded by an entire province, it might be a monster, a very demon, it was not that frightful image which filled his fancy; he saw only the figure of the sweet captive maid, praying perhaps for him before her prison altar. Had the object of his devotion been any other than it was, he might have weighed for an instant, only to scorn them, the dangers in search of which he had journeyed so far; but what room is there for reflection in a youthful heart throbbing with the double stimulus of heroic sacrifice and noble love?

He advanced proudly into the vaulted cavern, which echoed and re-echoed the sound of his footsteps, not deigning even a glance at the stalactites and the century-old columns of basalt which towered above him amid mosses, lichen, and ivy, a confused medley of weird forms, from which the superstitious credulity of the Norwegian country folk had more than once created hosts of evil spirits or long processions of ghosts.

With the same indifference he passed the tomb of King “Walder, to which so many mournful legends cling, and he heard no voice save the long-drawn sigh of the north wind through those gloomy galleries.

He traversed winding passages, dimly lighted by crevices half stopped with grass and heather. Ever and anon he stumbled over strange objects, which rolled from beneath his foot with a hollow sound, and assumed in the darkness the shape of broken skulls or long rows of white teeth with fleshless gums.

But his soul was undismayed. He was only surprised that he had not yet encountered the much-dreaded inhabitant of this horrible cave.

He reached a sort of circular hall, hewn from the rock. Here the subterranean road which he had thus far followed came to an end, and the rocky walls were without exit, save for a few wide fissures, through which he saw the mountains and woods outside.

Amazed that he should have thus traversed the fatal cavern in vain, he began to despair of finding the brigand. A singular monument in the middle of the underground hall caught his attention. Three long, massive bowlders, standing upright, supported a fourth, broad and square, as three pillars might uphold a roof. Beneath this gigantic tripod was an altar, also formed of a single block of granite, with a round hole in the middle of its upper surface. Ordener recognized it as one of those colossal Druidic structures which he had often seen in travelling through Norway, the most amazing instances being found in France, at Lokmariaker and Carnac, wondrous fabrics which have grown old, resting upon the earth like tents pitched for a day, and made solid by their mere weight.

The young man, lost in thought, leaned mechanically against this altar, whose stone lips were stained dark brown, so deep had they drunk of the blood of human victims.

All at once he started. A voice, apparently proceeding from the stone, fell upon his ear " Young man, you come to this place with feet which touch the tomb."

He rose quickly, and his hand sought his sword, while an echo, clear but faint as the voice of a dying man, repeated: " Young man, you come to this place with feet which touch the tomb." At this instant a hideous face appeared on the other side of the Druid altar, a face crowned with red hair, and disfigured by a brutal sneer.

"Young man," it again repeated. " you come to this place with feet which touch the tomb."

"And with a hand which touches a sword," calmly responded Ordener.

The monster emerged from beneath the altar, revealing his thick-set, muscular limbs, his wild, blood-stained dress, his hooked hands, and his heavy stone axe.

"It is I," he cried, with a growl like that of a wild beast.

"And I," answered Ordener.

"I expected you."

"I did more," replied the bold young man; " I sought you out."

The brigand folded his arms.

"Do you know who I am? "

"Yes."

"And you are not frightened? "

"Not now-"

"Then you were afraid to come here?" And the monster tossed his head with a look of triumph.

"Afraid I might not find you."

"You bid me defiance, and your feet have trampled on dead bodies!"

"Tomorrow they may tread upon your own."

The little man quivered with rage. Ordener stood motionless, in an attitude of haughty calm.

"Take care ' " muttered the brigand; " I will burst upon you and rend you as Norwegian hailstones do a lady's parasol."

"Such a shield would be all-sufficient for me."

Something in Ordener's eye seemed to daunt the monster. He plucked the hairs from his mantle, as a tiger might devour grass before it springs upon its prey.

"You teach me what pity means," he said.

“And you teach me what it is to scorn.”

“Child, your voice is soft, your face is fair, like the voice and the face of a girl; what death will you choose?”

“Your own.”

The small man laughed.

“Know you not that I am a demon, that my spirit is the spirit of Ingulf the Destroyer?”

“I know that you are a robber, that you commit murder for the love of gold.”

“You are wrong,” broke in the monster;” it is for love of blood.”

“Were you not paid by the d’Ahlefelds to slay Captain Dispolsen?”

“What are you talking about? What names are these?”

“Do you not know Captain Dispolsen, whom you killed on Urchtal Sands?”

“That may be, but I have forgotten him, as I shall forget you three days hence.”

“Do you not know Count d’Ahlefeld, who paid you to steal an iron casket from the captain?”

“D’Ahlefeld! Stay; yes, I know him. I drank his son’s blood only yesterday, from my son’s skull.”

Ordener shuddered with horror.

“Were you not content with your wages?”

“What wages?” asked the brigand.

“Hark ye; the sight of you offends me; I must have done. You stole, a week since, an iron casket from one of your victims, a Munkholm officer, did you not?”

At the word “ Munkholm “ the brigand started.

“An officer from Munkholm?” he muttered. Then he asked, with a look of surprise, “Are you too an officer from Munkholm? “

“No,” said Ordener.

“So much the worse!” and his face clouded.

“Enough of this,” rejoined the persistent Ordener; “ where is the casket that you stole from the captain?”

The little man meditated for a moment.

“By Ingulf! here’s a paltry iron box that occupies many minds. I will promise you there’ll not be so much search for that which holds your bones, if ever they be collected in a coffin.”

These words, as they showed Ordener that the robber knew the casket to which he referred, revived his hope of obtaining it.

“Tell me what you did with that casket. Is it in Count d’Ahlefeld’s possession?”

“No.”

“You lie, for you laugh.”

“Believe what you will. What matters it to me?”

The monster had assumed a mocking air which awakened Ordener’s suspicions. He saw that there was nothing to be done but to rouse him to fury if possible, or to intimidate him.

“Hear me,” said he, raising his voice;” you must give me that casket.”

The other answered with a savage sneer.

“You must give it to me!” the young man repeated in tones of thunder.

“Are you accustomed to issuing orders to buffaloes and bears?” replied the monster, still sneering.

“I would give this command to the very Devil in hell.”

“You may do so ere long, if you like.”

Ordener drew his sword, which gleamed in the darkness like a flash of lightning.

“Obey me!”

“Nay,” cried Hans, brandishing his axe;” I might have broken your bones and sucked your blood when you first appeared, but I restrained my wrath; I was curious to see the sparrow attack the vulture.”

“Wretch,” exclaimed Ordener,” defend yourself!”

“‘T is the first time I was ever told to do so,” muttered the brigand, gnashing his teeth.

With these words, he sprang upon the granite altar and gathered himself together, like a leopard awaiting the hunter on a high cliff, ready to spring upon him unawares.

From this vantage-ground he glared at the young man, apparently seeking the best side from which to attack him. All would have been over with Ordener had he hesitated an instant. But he gave the brigand no time to consider, and threw himself violently upon him, aiming the point of his sword at his face.

Then began the most fearful fight which imagination can picture. The little man, standing upon the altar, like a statue on its pedestal, looked like one of those horrid idols which, in barbarous ages, received in that same spot impious sacrifices and sacrilegious offerings.

His movements were so rapid that upon whatever side Ordener attacked him, he always met the monster face to face, and encountered his blade. He would have been hewn in pieces at the first onslaught, had he not had the lucky forethought to wrap his mantle loosely around his left arm, so that the greater part of his furious opponent's blows were foiled by this floating shield. Thus for some moments both made useless though tremendous efforts to wound each other. The small man's fiery gray eyes seemed starting from their sockets. Surprised to meet with such vigorous and bold resistance from a foe apparently so feeble, his savage sneers changed to silent rage. The brutal immobility of the monster's features, and Ordener's dauntless composure contrasted strangely with the swiftness of their motions and the vigor of their attack. Not a sound was heard but the clash of weapons, the young man's quick steps, and the hurried breathing of both adversaries, when the little man uttered a fearful roar. The blade of his axe had caught in the folds of the cloak. He braced himself; he shook his arm frantically, but only succeeded in entangling the handle with the blade in the clinging stuff, which, with every fresh effort, wound itself closer and closer about it.

The dreadful brigand felt the young man's steel upon his breast.

"Once more I ask you," said the triumphant Ordener, " will you give me that iron casket which you stole like a coward?"

The small man was silent for an instant; then he said, with a roar:" Curse you, no!"

Ordener rejoined, still retaining his victorious and threatening attitude:" Consider!"

"No; I tell you no!" repeated the brigand.

The noble youth lowered his sword.

"Well," said he, "release your axe from the folds of my mantle, and let us fight it out."

"With a disdainful laugh, the monster answered:

"Child, you play the generous man, as if I wanted your indulgence!"

Before the astonished Ordener could turn his head, the brigand had placed his foot on the shoulder of his loyal victor, and at one bound stood twelve paces away from him. With another leap he sprang at Ordener, and hung his entire weight upon him, as the panther hangs with teeth and claws to the flanks of the royal lion. His nails dug deep into the young man’s shoulders, his bony knees were pressed into his flesh, while his fierce face showed Ordener a bloody mouth and cruel teeth ready to tear him limb from limb. He ceased to speak; no human words issued from his heaving chest; a low roar mingled with hoarse, passionate yells alone expressed his rage. He was more hideous than a wild beast, more monstrous than a demon; he was a man deprived of all semblance of humanity.

Ordener tottered beneath the small man’s onslaught, and would have fallen at the unexpected shock, had not one of the heavy pillars of the Druid monument happened to be just behind to sustain him. He stood therefore half overthrown and gasping beneath the weight of his fearful foe. To gain any idea of the horrible spectacle offered at this moment, it must be remembered that all which we have described occurred in far less time than is required to write it.

As we said, the noble youth tottered, but he did not quake. He hastily addressed a farewell thought to Ethel. The thought of his love was like a prayer; it restored his strength. He threw his arms about the monster; then seizing his sword by the middle of the hlade, he pressed the point straight down upon his spine. The wounded brigand uttered a fearful scream, and with a sudden leap, which shook off Ordener, freed himself from his bold adversary’s arms, and fell back some paces, taking in his teeth a fragment of the green cloak, which he had bitten in his fury.

He leaped up, supple and agile as a young deer, and the battle began again, for the third time, more terrible than ever. By chance there was, close by, a pile of huge stones over which moss and weeds had grown for centuries undisturbed. Two ordinary men could scarcely have lifted the smallest of these rocks. Hans seized one in both arms and raised it above his head, poising it toward Ordener. His expression was frightful. The stone, Hung with great violence, moved heavily through the air; the young man had just time to spring aside. The granite bowlder broke to fragments against the subterranean wall with a tremendous noise, which was echoed back for many moments from the depths of the cavern.

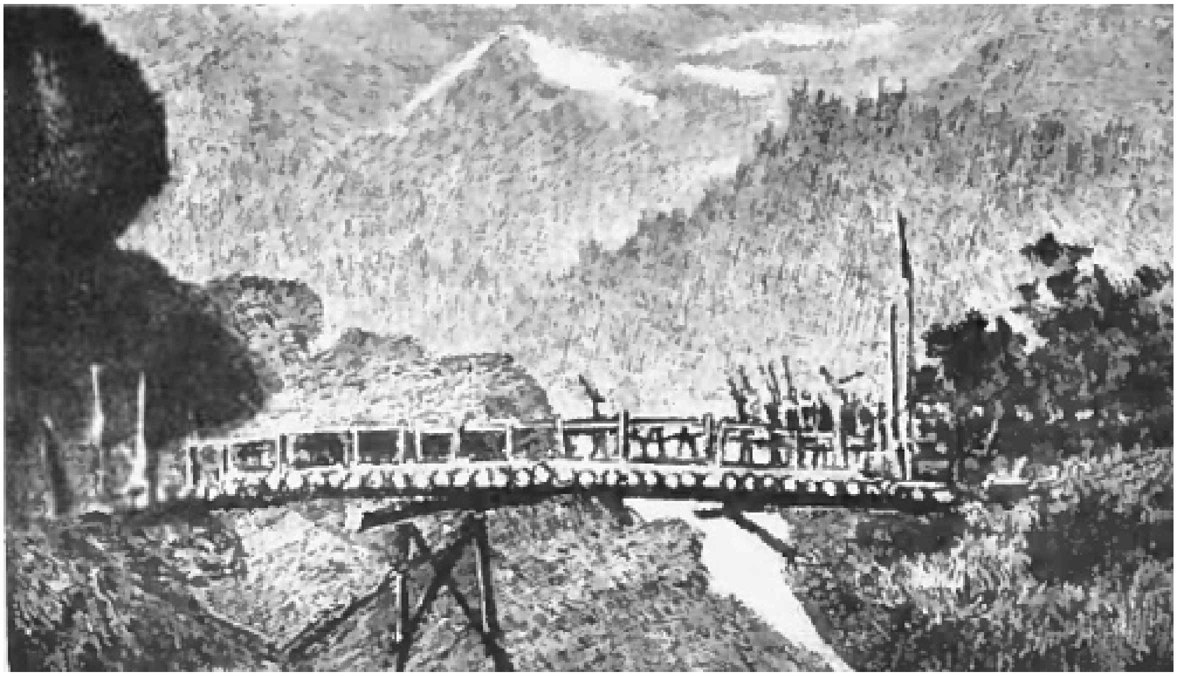
Ordener, stunned and amazed, had barely time to recover before a second mass of stone was poised in the brigand’s grasp. Vexed that he should seem to stand like a coward to be pelted, he rushed toward the small man, with uplifted sword, to change this mode of warfare; but the fearful missile, launched like a thunderbolt, as it moved through the dense, dark air of the cave encountered the bare and slender blade; the steel was dashed to pieces like a bit of glass, and the monster’s fierce laugh rang out. Ordener was disarmed.

“Have you,” cried the monster, “ aught to say to God or the Devil ere you die?”

And his eye darted flame, and all his muscles swelled with rage and joy, and he flung himself with a thrill of impatience upon his axe, which, wrapped in the cloak, lay upon the ground. Poor Ethel!

All at once a distant roar was heard outside. The monster paused. The noise increased; shouts of men were mingled with the plaintive moan of a bear. The brigand listened. The cries of pain continued. He hastily seized his axe, and sprang, not toward Ordener, but toward one of the crevices in the rock. Ordener, overwhelmed with surprise to find himself thus unnoticed, hurried in his turn to one of these natural doors, and saw in a neighboring glade a large white bear at bay, surrounded by seven hunters, among whom he thought he recognized Kennybol, whose words had made such an impression upon him the night before.

He turned back. The brigand had left the cave, and a fearful voice outside shouted:” Friend! Friend! I am here! I am here!”



The Regiment of Musketeers on the March

CHAPTER XXX THE CAUSE OF FREEDOM.

Peter, good fellow, has lost his all at dice.
Régnier.

The regiment of musketeers from Munkholm was on the march through the narrow passes lying between Throndhjem and Skongen. Sometimes it moved along the brink of a torrent, and the long line of bayonets crept through the ravine like a huge serpent with glittering scales; sometimes it wound around a mountain, making it look like one of those triumphal columns about which curves an army of heroes in bronze.

The soldiers marched with trailing weapons and cloaks dragging in the dust, looking surly and tired, for these noble fellows are averse to anything but battle or inaction. The coarse banter and threadbare jests which delighted them but yesterday had lost their savor. The air was chill, the sky clouded. Nothing would raise a laugh in the ranks, unless one of the sutler-women should get an awkward tumble from her little Barbary horse, or a tin saucepan should happen to roll over the precipice and rebound from rock to rock.

To while away the monotony of the journey, Lieutenant Randmer, a young Danish baron, accosted old Captain Lory, who had risen from the ranks. The captain, moody and silent, moved with a heavy but confident step; the lieutenant, light and agile, played with a twig which he had plucked from the bushes that lined the road.

“Well, Captain, what ails you? You seem depressed.”

“And I should say I had good cause,” replied the old officer, without raising his eyes.

“Come, come, no regrets! Look at me. Am I depressed? And yet I would wager that I have quite as much cause as you.”

“I doubt it, Baron Randmer; I have lost all I possessed; I have lost everything I loved.”

“Captain Lory, our misfortunes are precisely the same. It is not a fortnight since Lieutenant Alberick won my castle and estate at a single deal of the cards. I am ruined; but am I the less gay?”

The captain answered in a very melancholy tone: “ Lieutenant, you have only lost your castle; but I have lest my dog.”

At this answer the light-minded baron seemed uncertain whether to laugh or sympathize; but he said: “ Be comforted, Captain. Only think, I, who have lost my castle “

The captain broke in upon his words:

“What of that? Besides, you may win back another castle.”

“Aud you may find another dog “

The old man shook his head.

“I may find another dog, but I shall never find my poor Drake.”

He paused; great tears gathered in his eyes and rolled one by one down his hard, stern face.

“He was all I ever had to love,” he added;” I never knew my parents. God grant them peace, and my poor Drake too! Lieutenant Randmer, he saved my life in the Pomeranian war. I called him Drake in honor of the famous admiral. My good dog! He never changed, as did my fortunes. After the battle of Oholfen, the great General Schack patted him, and said: ‘You ‘ve a fine dog there, Sergeant Lory! ‘ for I was only a sergeant then.”

“All!” interrupted the young baron, slashing his switch, “ how queer it must seem to be a sergeant.”

The old soldier of fortune did not hear him; he appeared to be talking to himself, and Randmer could only catch a word here and there.

“Poor Drake! After surviving so many breaches and trenches, to be drowned like a blind kitten in that confounded Throndhjem fjord! My poor dog! my trusty friend! You deserved to die on the field of battle, as I hope to do.”

“Come, come, Captain!” cried the lieutenant, “ how can you be so despondent? We may get a chance to fight to-morrow.”

“Yes,” contemptuously answered the old captain, “ with a pretty enemy!”

“What! do you despise those rascally miners, those devilish mountaineers?”

“Stone-cutters, highwaymen, fellows who don’t know the first rudiments of warfare! A fine set of blackguards to face a man like me, who has served in all the wars in Pomerania and Holstein, in the campaigns of Scania and Dalecarlia; who fought under the glorious General Schack and the brave Count Guldeulew!”

“But don’t you know,” interrupted Randmer, “ that these fellows are led by a formidable chief, a giant as big and as brutal as Goliath, a rascal who drinks nothing but human blood, a very Satan incarnate?”

"And who may he be? " asked the captain.

"Why, the famous Hans of Iceland!"

"Pooh! I'll wager that this great general does not know how to shoulder a musket or handle a carbine properly."

Randmer laughed.

"Yes, you may laugh," continued the captain. " It will be very funny, no doubt, to cross swords with scurvy pickaxes, and pikes with pitchforks! Here are worthy foes indeed! My brave Drake would have scorned to snap at their heels!"

The captain was still giving free vent to his indignation, when he was interrupted by the arrival of an officer, who ran up to them all out of breath,

"Captain Lory! my dear Randmer!"

"Well? " asked both at once.

"My friends, I am faint with horror! D'Ahlefeld, Lieutenant d'Ahlefeld, the lord chancellor's son! You know, my dear Randmer, that Frederic such a dandy! such a fop!"

"Yes," replied the young baron, " a great dandy! Still, at the last ball at Charlottenburg my costume was in much better taste than his. But what has happened to him?"

"I know whom you mean," said Lory; "you mean Frederic d'Ahlefeld, lieutenant of Company Three. The men wear blue facings. He neglects his duty sadly."

"You will not have to complain of him again, Captain Lory."

"Why not?" said Randmer.

"He is garrisoned at Wahlstrom," coldly added the old officer.

"Exactly," said the new-comer; " the colonel has just received a message. Poor Frederic!"

"But what lias happened? Captain Bollar, you alarm me."

Old Lory added: " Nonsense! The popinjay was absent from roll-call, I suppose, and the captain has sent the lord chancellor's son to prison: that is the misfortune which distresses you so sadly; I am sure it is."

Bollar clapped him on the shoulder.

"Captain Lory, Lieutenant d'Ahlefeld has been devoured alive."

The two captains looked each other in the face; and Randmer, startled for an instant, suddenly burst out laughing.

"Oh, Captain Bollar, I see you are as fond of a joke as ever! But you can't fool me in that way, I warn you."

And the lieutenant, folding his arms, gave way to mirth, swearing that what amused him the most was to see how readily Lory swallowed all Bollar’s ridiculous stories. As for the story, he said it was a capital one; and it was a most clever idea to pretend that Frederic, who took such dainty, such absurd care of his complexion, had been swallowed raw.

“Randmer,” said Bollar, seriously, “ you act like a fool. I tell you d’Ahlefeld is dead; I have it from the colonel, -dead!”

“Oh, how well you play your part!” rejoined the baron, still laughing;” what a funny fellow you are!”

Bollar shrugged his shoulders, and turned to old Lory, who quietly asked the particulars.

“Oh, yes, my dear Captain Bollar,” added the irrepressible mocker;” tell us who ate the poor devil. Did he serve as breakfast for a wolf, or supper for a bear?”

“The colonel,” said Bollar, “ received a despatch just now, informing him, in the first place, that the “Wahlstrom garrison is retreating toward us, driven back by a large party of rebels.”

Old Lory frowned.

“In the second place,” resumed Bollar, “that Lieutenant Frederic d’Ahlefeld, having gone into the mountains three days since to hunt, was captured near Arbar ruins by a monster, who carried him to his lair and there devoured him.”

At this, Lieutenant Randmer’s merriment increased.

“Oh, how our good Lory swallows your stories! That’s right; keep up a sober face, Bollar. You are wonderfully amusing; but you don’t tell us what this monster, this ogre, this vampire was, that carried off and ate up the lieutenant like a week-old kid!”

“I will not tell you,” impatiently answered Bollar; “but I will tell Lory, who is not such an incredulous fool. Lory, my dear fellow, the monster who drank Frederic’s blood was Hans of Iceland.”

“The leader of the rebels!” exclaimed the old officer.

“Well, Lory,” rejoined the scoffer,” do you think a man who handles his jaw so ably needs to know how to shoulder a musket “

“Baron Randmer,” said Bollar, “you are very like d’Ahlefeld in character; beware lest you meet with the same fate.”

“I declare,” cried Randmer, “ that Captain Bollar’s immovable gravity amuses me beyond expression.”

“And Lieutenant Randmer’s inexhaustible laughter alarms me more than I can say.”

At this moment a group of officers, engaged in eager conversation, approached our three speakers.

“Zounds!” cried Randmer, “ I must amuse them with Bollar’s story.”

“Comrades,” he added, advancing to meet them;” have you heard the news? Poor Frederic d’Ahlefeld has been eaten alive by the barbarous Hans of Iceland.”

As he said these words, he could not repress a burst of laughter, which, to his great surprise, was received by the new-comers almost with shouts of indignation.

“What! can you laugh? I did not think, Randmer, that you would repeat such a dreadful piece of news so lightly. How can you laugh at such a misfortune?”

“What!” said Raudmer, much confused;” is it really true?”

“Why, you just told us of it yourself!” was the general cry. “ Don’t you believe your own words?”

“But I thought it was one of Bollar’s jokes.”

An old officer interposed.

“Such a joke would be in very bad taste; but unfortunately it is no joke. Baron Vœthaün, our colonel, has just received the sad news.”

“A fearful affair! It is really awful “ repeated a dozen voices.

“So we are to fight wolves and bears with human faces,” said one.

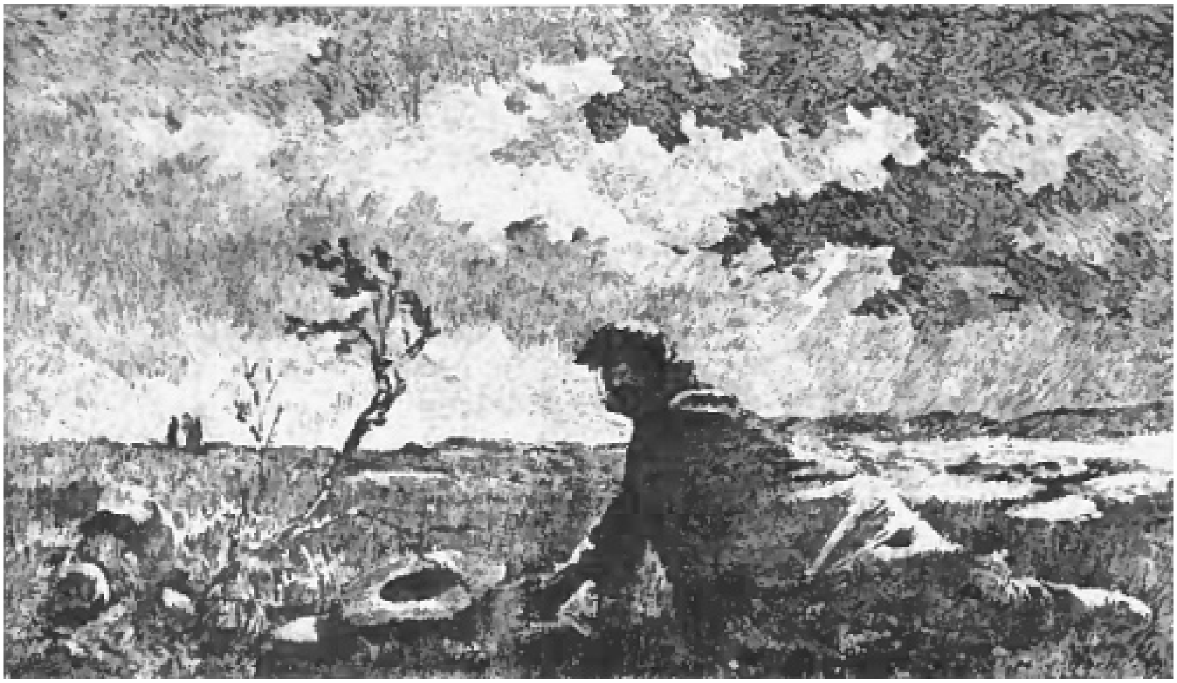
“We are to be shot down,” said another, “ without knowing whence the bullet comes; we are to be picked off one by one, like birds in a cage.”

“D’Ahlefeld’s death,” said Bollar, in a solemn tone, “ makes me shudder. Our regiment is unlucky. Dispolsen’s murder, that of those poor soldiers found dead at Cascadthymore, d’Ahlefeld’s awful fate, here are three tragic events in a very short space of time.”

Young Baron Randmer, who had been silent, looked up.

“It is incredible,” said he;” Frederic, who danced so well!”

And after this weighty remark he relapsed into silence, while Captain Lory declared that he was greatly distressed at the young lieutenant’s death, and drew the attention of private Toric-Belfast to the fact that the brass clasp of his shoulder-belt was not so bright as usual.



He saw the weird Forms sink into the Earth

CHAPTER XXXI NO QUARTER GIVEN.

"Hush, hush! here comes a man climbing down a ladder."

"Oh. yes; he is a spy."

"Heaven could grant me no greater favor than to let me offer you my life. I am yours; but tell me, for mercy's sake, to whom does this army belong?"

"To a count from Barcelona."

"What count?"

"What is it?"

"General, one of the enemy's spies."

"Whence come you?"

"I came here, little dreaming what I should find; little thinking what I should see."-

Lope De Vega: La Fuerza Lastimosa.

There is something desolate and forbidding in the aspect of a bare, fiat region when the sun lias set, when one is alone; when, as he walks, he tramples the dry grass beneath his feet, the dead brown leaves drop rustling from the trees, he hears the monotonous cry of the cricket, and sees huge, shapeless clouds sink slowly on the horizon like dead ghosts.

Such were Ordener's gloomy reflections on the night of his vain encounter with the Iceland robber. Startled by his abrupt disappearance, he at first tried to pursue him; but he lost his way in the heather, and wandered all day through a wild and uncultivated country, where he found no trace of man. At nightfall he was in a vast plain stretching to the horizon on every side, where there seemed no hope of shelter for the young traveller exhausted by fatigue and hunger.

It would have been a slight relief if his bodily suffering had not been aggravated by mental distress; but all was over. He had reached his journey's end without accomplishing his purpose. He could not even cherish those foolish illusions of hope which had urged him to pursue the monster; and now that nothing was left to sustain his courage, countless discouraging thoughts, for which he had hitherto had no room, assailed him. What could he do? How could he return to Schumacker unless he could take with him Ethel's salvation? What was the frightful nature of the misfortune which the possession of the fatal casket would prevent, and what of his marriage to Ulrica d'Ahlefeld? If he could only free his Ethel from her undeserved captivity; if he could fly with her, and enjoy uninterrupted happiness in some distant exile!

He wrapped himself in his mantle, and threw himself upon the ground. The sky was dark; a tempestuous light ever and anon appeared in the clouds as if through a veil of crape and then vanished; a cold wind swept across the plain. The young man scarcely heeded these signs of an immediate and violent storm; and besides, even could he have found shelter from the tempest and a place to rest from his fatigues, could he have found a spot where he might avoid his misery or rest from thought?

All at once confused sounds of men's voices fell upon his ear. In surprise, he rose upon his elbow, and perceived at some distance a number of shadowy forms moving through the darkness. He looked again; a light shone in the midst of the mysterious group, and Ordener, with astonishment which may easily be imagined, saw the weird forms sink one after the other into the centre of the earth, until all had disappeared.

Ordener was above the superstitions of his age and country. His serious and mature mind knew none of those vain beliefs, those strange terrors, which torture the childhood of a race as well as the childhood of a man. And yet there was something supernatural about this singular vision which filled him with devout distrust against his better judgment; for who can tell whether the spirits of the dead may not sometimes return to earth?

He rose, made the sign of the cross, and walked toward the spot where the apparition vanished.

Big drops of rain now began to fall; his cloak filled like a sail, and the feather in his cap, beaten by the wind, flapped in his face.

He stopped suddenly. A flash of lightning revealed just at his feet a large, round well, into which he must inevitably have fallen headlong had it not have been for this friendly warning. He approached the abyss. A faint light was visible at a fearful depth, and cast a red glow over the bottom of this huge opening in the bowels of the earth. The light, which seemed like a magic fire kindled by elves, only increased the immeasurable darkness which the eye was forced to pierce before reaching it.

The dauntless youth leaned over the abyss and listened. A distant murmur of voices rose to his ear. He no longer doubted that the beings who had so strangely appeared and disappeared before his very eyes had plunged into this gulf, and he felt an unconquerable desire, doubtless because it was so fated, to follow them, even should he pursue spectres to the mouth of hell. Moreover, the tempest now burst with fury, and this hole would afford him a shelter; but how was he to descend? What road had those he longed to follow taken, if indeed they were not phantoms? A second flash came to his aid, and showed him at his feet a ladder leading into the depths of the well. It consisted of a strong upright beam, crossed at regular intervals by short iron bars for the hands and feet of those who might venture into the gulf below.

Ordener did not hesitate. He swung himself boldly down upon the dreadful ladder, and plunged into the abyss without knowing whether it reached the bottom or not, without reflecting that he might never again see the sun. Soon he could only distinguish the sky from the darkness overhead by the bluish flashes which lit it up at brief intervals; soon the rain pouring in torrents upon the surface of the earth, reached him merely as a fine, vaporous mist. Then the whirlwind, rushing violently into the well, was lost above him in a prolonged moan. He went down and down, and yet seemed scarcely nearer to the subterranean light. He went on without losing heart, never looking below lest he should become dizzy and fall.

However, the air becoming more and more Stifling, the sound of voices more and more distinct, and the purplish glow which began to tinge the walls of the pit, warned him that he was not far from the bottom. He descended a few more rounds, and saw plainly at the foot of the ladder the entrance to an underground passage lighted by a flickering red flame, while his ear caught words which won his entire attention.

“Kennybol does not come,” said an impatient voice.

“What can detain him? “ repeated the same voice, after a brief pause.

“No one knows, Mr. Hacket,” was the reply.

“He intended to spend the night with his sister, Maase Braal, in the village of Surb,” added a different voice.

“You see,” rejoined the first speaker, “ I keep my promises. I agreed to bring Hans of Iceland for your leader. I have brought him.”

An indistinct murmur followed these words. Ordener’s curiosity, already aroused by the name of Kennybol, who had so astonished him the night before, was redoubled at the name of Hans of Iceland.

The same voice continued:

“My friends, Jonas, Norbith, what matters it if Kennybol is late? There are enough of us; we need fear nothing. Did you find your standards at Crag ruins?”

“Yes, Mr. Hacket,” replied several voices.

“Well, raise your banners; it is high time! Here is gold! Here is your invincible chief! Courage! March to the rescue of the noble Schumacker, the unfortunate Count Griffenfeld!”

“Hurrah! hurrah for Schumacker!” repeated many voices; and the name of Schumacker echoed and reechoed from the subterranean arches.

Ordener, more and more curious, more and more amazed, listened, hardly daring to breathe. He could neither believe nor understand what he heard. Schumacker connected with Kennybol and Hans of Iceland! What was this dark drama, one scene in which he, an unsuspected spectator, had witnessed? Whose life did they wish to shield? Whose head was at stake?

“In me,” continued the same voice, “ you see the friend and confidant of the noble Count Griffenfeld.”

The voice was wholly unfamiliar to Ordener. It went on:” Put implicit trust in me, as he does. Friends, everything is in your favor; you will reach Throndhjem without meeting an enemy.”

“Let us be oft”, Mr. Hacket,” interrupted a voice. “Peters told me that he saw the whole regiment from Munkholm marching through the mountain-passes to attack us.”

“He deceived you,” replied the other, in authoritative tones. “ The government as yet knows nothing of your revolt, and it is so wholly unsuspicious that the man who rejected your just complaints your oppressor, the oppressor of the illustrious and unfortunate Schumacker, General Levin de Knud has left Throndhjem for the capital, to join in the festivities on the occasion of the marriage of his ward, Ordener Guldenlew, and Ulrica d’Ahlefeld.”

Ordener’s feelings may be imagined. To hear all these names which interested him so deeply, and even his own, uttered by unknown voices in this wild, desolate region, in this mysterious tunnel! A frightful thought pierced his soul Could it be true? Was it indeed an agent of Count Griffenfeld whose voice he heard? What! could Schumacker, that venerable old man, his noble Ethel’s noble father, revolt against his royal master, hire brigands, and kindle a civil war? And it was for this hypocrite, this rebel, that he, the son of the Norwegian viceroy, the pupil of General Levin, had compromised his future and risked his life! It was for his sake that he had sought and fought with that Iceland bandit with whom Schumacker seemed to be in league, since he placed him at the head of these scoundrels! Who knows but that casket for which he, Ordener, was on the point of shedding his lifeblood. contained some of the base secrets of this vile plot? Or had the revengeful prisoner of Munkholm made a fool of him? Perhaps he had found out his name; perhaps and this thought was painful indeed to the generous youth he wished to ruin the son of an enemy by urging him to this fatal journey!

Alas ‘ when we have long loved and revered the name of an unfortunate man, when in our secret sonl we have vowed everlasting devotion to his misfortunes, it is bitter to be repaid with ingratitude, to feel that we are forever disenchanted with generosity, and that we must renounce the pure, sweet joys of loyal self-sacrifice. We grow old in an instant with the most melancholy form of old age: we grow old in experience, and we lose the most beautiful illusion of a life whose only beauty lies in its illusions.

Such were the dispiriting thoughts that crowded confusedly upon Ordener’s mind. The noble youth longed to die at that instant; he felt that his happiness had vanished. True, there were many things in the assertions of the man who described himself as Griffenfeld’s envoy which struck him as false or doubtful; but these statements, being only meant to deceive a set of poor rustics, Schumacker was but the more guilty in his eyes; and this same Schumacker was his Ethel’s father!

These reflections agitated him the more violently because they all thronged upon him at once. He reeled against the rounds of the ladder on which he stood, and listened still; for we sometimes wait with inexplicable impatience and fearful eagerness for the misfortunes which we dread the most.

“Yes,” added the voice of the envoy,” you are to be commanded by the much-dreaded Hans of Iceland. Who will dare resist you? You fight for your wives and your children, basely despoiled of their inheritance; for a noble and unfortunate man, who for twenty years has languished unjustly in an infamous prison. Come, for Schumacker and liberty await you. Death to tyrants!”

“Death! “ repeated a thousand voices; and the clash of arms rang through the winding cave, mingled with the hoarse note of the mountaineer’s horn.

“Stop!’’ cried Ordener.

He hurriedly descended the remainder of the ladder; f’or the idea that he might save Schumacker from committing a crime and spare his country untold misery had taken entire possession of him. But as he stood at the mouth of the cave, fear lest he might destroy his Ethel’s father, and perhaps his Ethel herself, by rash invectives, took the place of every other consideration, and he remained rooted to the spot, pale, and casting an amazed glance at the singular scene before him.

It was like a vast square in some underground city, whose limits were lost amid endless columns supporting the vaulted roof. These pillars glittered like crystal in the rays of countless torches borne by a multitude of men, armed with strange weapons, and scattered in confusion about the cave. From all these points of light and all these fearful figures straying among the shadows, it might have passed for one of the legendary gatherings described by ancient chroniclers, an assembly of wizards and demons, bearing stars for torches, and illuminating antique groves and ruined castles by night.

A prolonged shout arose.

“A stranger! Kill him! kill him!’’

A hundred arms were raised to strike Ordener down. He put his hand to his side in search of his sword. Noble youth! In his generous ardor he had forgotten that he was alone and unarmed.

“Stay! stay!” cried a voice, the voice of one whom Ordener recognized as Schumacker’s envoy.

He was a short, stout man, dressed in black, with a deceitful smile. He advanced toward Ordener, saying:

“Who are you?”

Ordener made no answer; he was threatened on every side, and there was not an inch of his breast uncovered by a sword-point or the mouth of a pistol.

“Are you afraid?” asked the little man, with a sneer.

“If your hand were upon my heart, instead of these swords,” coldly answered Ordener, “you would see that it beats no faster than your own, if indeed you have a heart.”

“Ah, ha!” said the little man; “so you defy us! Well, then let him die!’’ And he turned his back.

“Give me death,” returned Ordener;” it is the only thing that I would accept from you.”

“One moment, Mr. Hacket,” said an old man, with a thick beard, who stood leaning on a long musket. “ You are my guests, and I alone have the right to send this fellow to tell the dead what lie has seen.”

Mr. Hacket laughed.

"Faith, my dear Jonas, let it be as you please! It matters little to me who judges this spy, so long as he is condemned."

The old man turned to Ordener.

"Come, tell us who you are, since you are so boldly curious to know who we are."

Ordener was silent. Surrounded by the strange allies of that Schumacker for whom he would so willingly have shed his blood, he felt only an infinite longing to die.

"His worship will not answer," said the old man.

"When the fox is caught, he cries no more. Kill him!"

"My brave Jonas," rejoined Hacket, " let this man's death be Hans of Iceland's first exploit among you."

"Yes, yes!" cried many voices. Ordener, astounded, but still undaunted, looked about him for Hans of Iceland, with whom he had so valiantly disputed his life that very morning, and saw with increased surprise a man of colossal size, dressed in the garb of the mountaineers. This giant stared at Ordener with brutal stupidity, and called for an axe.

"You are not Hans of Iceland!" emphatically ex- claimed Ordener.

"Kill him! kill him!" cried Hacket, angrily.

Ordener saw that he must die. He put his hand in his bosom to draw out his Ethel's hair and give it one last kiss. As he did so, a paper fell from his belt.

"What is that paper?" asked Hacket. " Norbith, seize that paper."

Norbith was a young man, whose stern, dark features bore the stamp of true nobility. He picked up the paper and unfolded it. "Good God! "he exclaimed, " it is the passport of my poor friend, Christopher Nedlam, that unfortunate fellow who was beheaded not a week ago in Skongen market-place, for coining counterfeit money."

"Well;' said Hacket, in a disappointed tone, " you may keep the bit of paper. I thought it was something more important. Come, my dear Hans, despatch your man."

Young Norbith threw himself before Ordener, crying: " This man is under my protection. My head shall fall before you touch a hair of his. I will not suffer the safeconduct of my friend Christopher Nedlam to be violated."

Ordener, so miraculously preserved, hung his head and felt humiliated; for he remembered how contemptuously he had inwardly received Chaplain

Athanasius Munder’s touching prayer,” May the gift of the dying benefit the traveller!”

“Pooh! pooh!” said Hacket, “ you talk nonsense, good Norbith. The man is a spy; he must die.”

“Give me my axe,” repeated the giant.

“He shall not die!” cried Norbith. “ What would the spirit of my poor Nedlam say, whom they hung in such cowardly fashion? I tell you he shall not die; for Nedlam will not let him die!”

“As far as that goes,” said old Jonas, “ Norbith is right. Why should we kill this stranger, Mr. Hacket? He has Christopher Nedlam’s pass.”

“But he is a spy, a spy!” repeated Hacket.

The old man took his stand with the young one at Ordener’s side, and both said quietly:” He has the pass of Christopher Nedlam, who was hung at Skongen.”

Hacket saw that he must needs submit; for all the others began to murmur, and to say that this stranger should not die, as he had the safe-conduct of Nedlam the counterfeiter.

“Very well,” he hissed through his teeth with concentrated rage; “ then let him live. After all, it is your business, and not mine.”

“If he were the Devil himself I would not kill him,” said the triumphant Norbith.

With these words he turned to Ordener.

“Look here,” he added, “ you must be a good fellow as you have my poor friend Nedlam’s pass. We are the royal miners. We have rebelled to rid ourselves of the protectorate of the Crown. Mr. Haeket, here, says that we have taken up arms for a certain Count Schumacker; but I for one know nothing about him. Stranger, our cause is just. Hear me, and answer as if you were answering your patron saint. Will you join us?”

An idea flashed through Ordener’s mind.

“Yes,” replied he.

Norbith offered him a sword, which Ordener silently accepted.

“Brother.’’ said the youthful leader;” if you mean to betray us, begin by killing me.”

At this instant the sound of the horn rang through the arched galleries of the mine, and distant voices were heard exclaiming, “Here comes Kennybol!”

CHAPTER XXXII THE WILD-CAT IN THE THICKET.

There are thoughts as high as heaven.
Old Spanish Romance.

The soul sometimes has sudden inspirations, brilliant flashes whose extent can no more be expressed, whose depth can no more be sounded by an entire vol- ume of thoughts and reflections, than the brightness of a thousand torches can reproduce the intense, swift radiance of a flash of lightningr

We will not, therefore, try to analyze the overwhelming and secret impulse which upon young Norbith’s proposal led the noble son of the Norwegian viceroy to join a party of bandits who had risen in revolt to defend a proscribed man. It was doubtless a generous desire to fathom this dark scheme at any cost, mixed with a bitter loathing for life, a reckless indifference to the future; perhaps some vague doubt of Schumacker’s guilt, inspired by all the various incidents which struck the young man as equivocal and false, by a strange instinct for the truth, and above all by his love for Ethel. In short, it was certainly a secret sense of the help which a clear-sighted friend, in the midst of his blind partisans, might render Schumacker.

CHAPTER XXXIII TREACHERY AND VENGEANCE.

Is that the chief? His look alarms me; I dare not speak to him.
Maturin: Bertram.

On hearing the shouts which announced the arrival of the famous hunter Kennybol, Hacket sprang forward to meet him, leaving Ordener with the two other leaders.

“Here you are at last, my dear Kennybol! Come, let me present you to your much-dreaded commander, Hans of Iceland.”

At this name, Kennybol, pale, breathless, his hair standing on end, his face bathed in perspiration, and his hands stained with blood, started back.

“Hans of Iceland! “

“Come,” said Hacket, “ don’t be alarmed! He is here to help you. You must look upon him as a friend and comrade.”

Kennybol did not heed him.

“Hans of Iceland here!” he repeated.

“To be sure,” said Hacket, with ill-suppressed laughter; “ are you afraid of him?”

“What!” for the third time interrupted the hunter; “ do you really mean it, is Hans of Iceland here, in this mine?”

Hacket turned to the bystanders: “ Has our brave Kennybol lost his wits?”

Then, addressing Kennybol:” I see that it was your dread of Hans of Iceland which made you so late.”

Kennybol raised his hands to heaven.

“By Ethelreda, the holy Norwegian saint and martyr, it was not fear of Hans of Iceland, but Hans of Iceland himself, I swear, that delayed me so long.”

These words caused a murmur of surprise to run through the crowd of miners and mountaineers surrounding the two speakers, and clouded Hacket’s face as the sight and the rescue of Ordener had but a moment before.

“What! What do you mean?” he asked, dropping his voice.

"I mean, Mr. Hacket, that but for your confounded Hans of Iceland I should have been here before the owl's first hoot."

"Indeed! and what did he do to you?"

"Oh, do not ask me. I only hope that my beard may turn as white as an ermine's skin in a single day if I am ever caught again hunting a white bear, since I escaped this time with my life."

"Did you come near being eaten by a bear?"

Kennybol shrugged his shoulders contemptuously.

"A bear! a terrible foe that would be! Kennybol eaten by a bear! For what do you take me, Mr. Hacket?"

"Oh, pardon me!" said Hacket, with a smile.

"If you knew what had happened to me, good sir," interrupted the old hunter, in a low voice, "you would not persist in telling me that Hans of Iceland is here."

Hacket again seemed embarrassed. He seized Kennybol abruptly by the arm, as if he feared lest he should approach the spot where the giant's huge head now loomed up above those of the miners.

"My dear Kennybol," said he, solemnly," tell me, I entreat you, what caused your delay. You must understand that at this time anything may be of the utmost importance."

"That is true," said Kennybol, after a brief pause.

Then, yielding to Hacket's repeated requests, he told him how that very morning, aided by six comrades, he had pursued a white bear into the immediate vicinity of Walderhog cave, without noticing, in the excitement of the chase, that they were so near that dreadful place; how the growls of the bear at bay had attracted a little man, a monster, or demon, who, armed with a stone axe, had rushed upon them to defend the bear. The appearance of this devil, who could be no other than Hans, the demon of Iceland, had petrified all seven of them with terror. Finally, his six companions had fallen victims to the two monsters, and he, Kennybol, only owed his safety to speedy flight, assisted by his own nimbleness, Hans of Iceland's fatigue, and above all, by the protection of that blessed patron saint of hunters, Saint Sylvester.

"You see, Mr. Hacket," he concluded his tale, which was still somewhat incoherent from fright, and adorned with all the flowers of the mountain dialect, " you see that if I am late you should not blame me, and that it is impossible for the demon of Iceland, whom I left this morning with his bear wreaking their fury upon the corpses of my six poor friends on Walderhog heath, to be here now in the guise of a friend. I protest that it cannot be. I know him now, that fiend incarnate; I have seen him!”

Hacket, who had listened attentively, said gravely: “ My brave friend Kennybol, nothing is impossible to Hans or to the Devil; I knew all this before.”

The savage features of the old hunter from the mountains of Kiölen assumed an expression of extreme amazement and childlike credulity. “ What!” he exclaimed.

“Yes,” added Hacket, in whose face a more skilful observer might have read grim triumph;” I knew it all, except that you were the hero of this unfortunate adventure. Hans of Iceland told me the whole story on our way here.”

“Really!” said Kennybol; and he gazed at Hacket with respect and awe.

Hacket continued with the same perfect composure: “To be sure. But now calm yourself; I will present you to this dreadful Hans of Iceland.”

Kennybol uttered an exclamation of fright.

“Be calm, I say,” repeated Hacket. “ Consider him as your friend and leader; but be careful not to remind him in any way of what occurred this morning. Do you understand?”

Resistance was useless; but it was not without a severe mental struggle that he agreed to be presented to the demon. They advanced to the group where Ordener stood with Jonas and Norbith.

“May God guard you, good Jonas, dear Norbith!” said Kennybol.

“We need his protection, Kennybol,” said Jonas.

At this instant Kennybol’s eye met that of Ordener, who was trying to attract his attention.

“Ah! there you are, young man,” said he, going up to him eagerly and offering him his hard, wrinkled hand; “ welcome! It seems that your courage met with its reward.”

Ordener, who could not imagine how this mountaineer happened to understand him so well, was about to ask an explanation, when Norbith exclaimed: “ Then you know this stranger, Kennybol?”

“By my patron saint, I do! I love and esteem him. He is devoted, like ourselves, to the good cause which we all serve.”

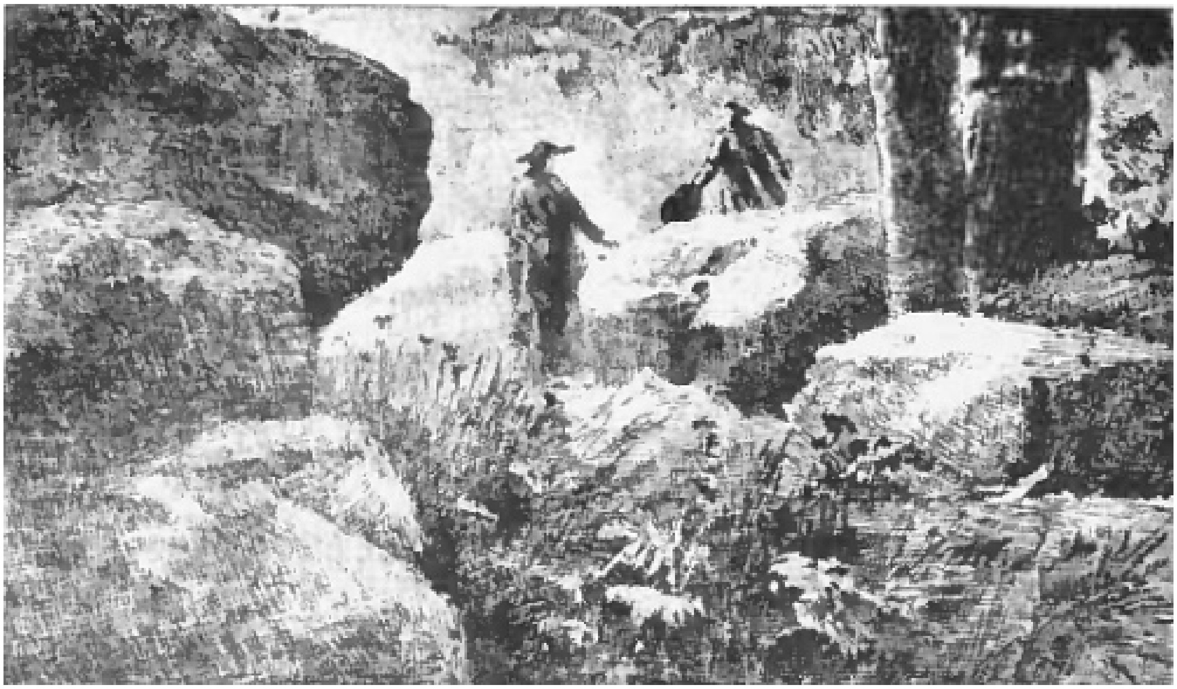
And he cast another meaning look at Ordener, which the latter was on the point of answering, when Hacket, who had gone in search of his giant, whose company all the insurgents seemed to avoid, came up to our four friends, saying: “Kennybol, my valiant hunter, here is your leader, the famous Hans of Klipstadur!”

Kennybol glanced at the huge brigand with more surprise than terror, and whispered in Hacket’s ear:” Mr. Hacket, the Hans of Iceland whom I met this morning was a short man.”

Hacket answered in low tones: “ You forget, Kennybol; he is a demon!”

“True,” said the credulous hunter; “ I suppose he has changed his shape.”

And he turned aside with a shudder to cross himself secretly.



A short Man approached another Man

CHAPTER XXXIV THE BLACK STICK IN WAITING.

The mask approaches; it is Angolo himself. The rascal knows his business well; he must be sure of his facts.-

Lessing

In a dark grove of old oaks, whose dense leaves the pale light of dawn can scarcely penetrate, a short man approaches another man who is alone, and seems to be waiting for him. The following conversation begins in low tones:

“Your worship must excuse me for keeping you waiting; several things detained me.”

“Such as what? “

“The leader of the mountain men, Kennybol, did not reach the appointed place until midnight; and we were also disturbed by an unlooked-for witness.”

“Who? “

“A fellow who thrust himself like a fool into the mine in the midst of our secret meeting. At first I took him for a spy, and would have put him to death; but he turned out to be the bearer of a safe-conduct from some gallows-bird held in great respect by our miners, and they instantly took him under their protection. When I came to consider the matter, I made up my mind that he was probably a curious traveller or a learned fool. At any rate, I have taken all necessary precautions in regard to him.”

“Is everything else going well?”

“Very well. The miners from Guldsbrandsdal and the Färöe Islands, led by young Norbith and old Jonas, with the mountain men from Kiölen, under Kennybol, are probably on the march at this moment. Four miles from Blue Star, their comrades from Hubfallo and Suud-Moer will join them; those from Kongsberg and the iron-workers from Lake Miösen, who have already compelled the Wahlstrom garrison to retreat, as your lordship knows, will await them a few miles farther on; and finally, my dear and honored master, these combined forces will halt for the night some two miles away from Skongen, in the gorges of Black Pillar.”

“But how did they receive your Hans of Iceland?”

“With perfect confidence.”

“Would that I could avenge my son’s death on that monster! What a pity that he should escape us!”

“My noble lord, first use Hans of Iceland’s name to wreak your revenge upon Schumacker; then it will be time enough to think of vengeance against Hans himself.

The insurgents will march all day, and halt tonight in Black Pillar Pass, two miles from Skongen.”

“What! can you venture to let so large a force advance so close to Skongen? Musdœmon, take care!”

“You are suspicious, noble Count. Your worship may send a messenger at once to Colonel Vcethalin, whose regiment is probably at Skongen now; inform him that the rebel forces will encamp to-night in Black Pillar Pass, and have no misgivings. The place seems made purposely for ambuscades.”

“I understand you; but why, my dear fellow, did you muster the rebels in such numbers?”

“The greater the insurrection, sir, the greater will be Schumacker’s crime and your merit. Besides, it is important that it should be crushed at a single blow.”

“Very good; but why did you order them to halt so near Skongen?”

“Because it is the only spot in the mountains where all resistance is impossible. None will ever leave it alive but those whom we select to appear before the court.”

“Capital! Something tells me, Musdœmon, to finish this business quickly. If all looks well in this quarter, it looks stormy in another. You know that we have been making secret search at Copenhagen for the papers which we feared had fallen into the possession of Dispolsen? “

“Well, sir? “

“Well, I have just discovered that the scheming fellow had mysterious relations with that accursed astrologer, Cumbysulsum.”

“Who died recently? “

“Yes; and that the old sorcerer delivered certain papers to Schumacker’s agent before he died.”

“Damnation 1 He had letters of mine, a statement of our plot!”

“Your plot, Musdœmon!”

“A thousand pardons, noble Count! But why did your worship put yourself in the power of such a humbug as Cumbysulsum? the old traitor!”

“You see, Musdœmon, I am not a sceptic and unbeliever, like you. It is not without good reason, my dear fellow, that I have always put my trust in old Curnbysulsum’s magic skill.”

“I wish your worship had had as much doubt of his loyalty as you had trust in his skill. However, let us not take fright too soon, noble master. Dispolsen is dead, his papers are lost; in a few days we shall be safely rid of those whom they might benefit.”

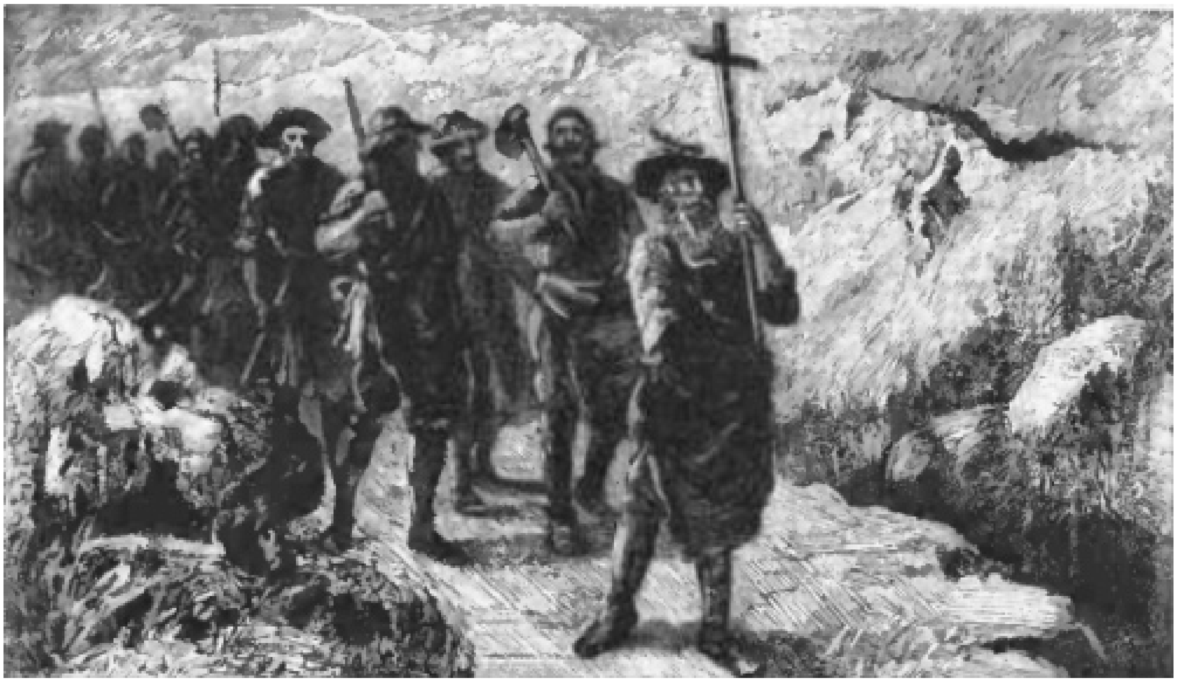
“In any event, what charge could be brought against me?”

“Or me, protected as I am by your Grace?”

“Oh, yes, my dear fellow, of course you can count upon me; but let us bring this business to a head. I will send the messenger to the colonel. Come, my people are waiting for me behind those bushes, and we must return to Throndhjem, which the Mecklen- burger must have left ere now. Continue to serve me faithfully, and in spite of all the Cumbysulsums and Dispolsens upon earth, you can count on me in life and death!”

“I beg your Grace to believe- The Devil!”

Here they plunged into the thicket, among whose branches their voices gradually died away; and soon after, no sound was heard save the tread of their departing steeds.



The Advance of the Rebels

CHAPTER XXXV THE FATHER OF THE FAMILY.

Beat the drums! They come, they come! They have all sworn, and all the same oath, never to return to Castile without the captive count, their lord.

They have his marble statue in a chariot, and are resolved never to turn back until they see the statue itself turn back. And in token that the first man who retraces his steps will be regarded as a traitor, they have all raised their right hand and taken an oath.

And they marched toward Arlançon as swiftly as the oxen which drag the chariot could go; they tarry no more than does the sun.

Burgos is deserted; only the women and children remain behind; and so too in the suburbs. They talk, as they go, of horses and falcons, and question whether they should free Castile from the tribute she pays Leon.

And before they enter Navarre, they meet upon the frontier. . . .

Old Spanish Romance.

While the preceding conversation was going on in one of the forests on the outskirts of Lake Miösen, the rebels, divided into three columns, left Apsyl-Corh lead-mine by the chief entrance, which opens, on a level with the ground, in a deep ravine.

Ordener, who, in spite of his desire for a closer acquaintance with Kennybol, had been placed under Norbith’s command, at first saw nothing but a long line of torches, whose beams, vying with the early light of dawn, were reflected back from hatchets, pitchforks, mattocks, clubs with iron heads, huge hammers, pickaxes, crowbars, and all the rude implements which could be borrowed from their daily toil, mingled with genuine weapons of warfare, such as muskets, pikes, swords, carbines, and guns, which showed that this revolt was a conspiracy. When the sun rose, and the glow of the torches was no more than smoke, he could better observe the aspect of this strange army, which advanced in disorder, with hoarse songs and fierce shouts, like a band of hungry wolves in pursuit of a dead body. It was divided into three parts. First came the mountaineers from Kiölen, under command of Kennybol, whom they all resembled in their dress of wild beasts’ skins, and in their bold, savage mien. Then followed the young miners led by Norbith, and the older ones under Jonas, with their broad-brimmed hats, loose trousers, bare arms, and blackened faces, gazing at the sun in mute surprise. Above this noisy band floated a confused sea of scarlet banners, bearing various mottoes, such as, “ Long live Schumacker!” “Let us free our Deliverer!” “Freedom for Miners!” “Liberty for Count Griffenfeld!” “Death to Guldenlew!” “Death to all Oppressors!” “ Death to d’ Ahlefeld!” The rebels seemed to regard these standards rather in the light of a burden than an ornament, and they were passed frequently from hand to hand when the colorbearers were tired, or desired to mingle the discordant notes of their horns with the psalm-singing and shouts of their comrades.

The rear-guard of this strange army consisted of ten or a dozen carts drawn by reindeer and strong mules, doubtless meant to carry ammunition; and the vanguard, of the giant, escorted by Hacket, who marched alone, armed with a mace and an axe, followed at a considerable distance, with no small terror, by the men under command of Kennybol, who never took his eyes from him, as if anxious not to lose sight of his diabolical leader during the various transformations which he might be pleased to undergo.

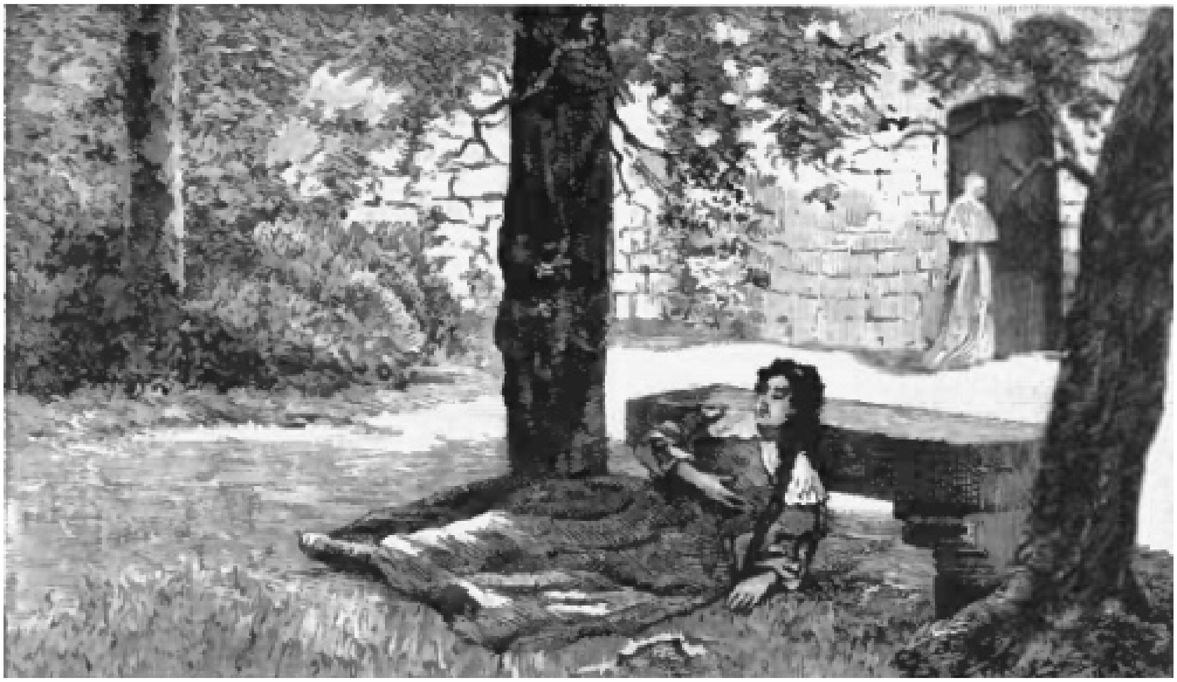
This stream of insurgents poured down the mountainside with many confused noises, filling the pine woods with the sound of their horns. Their numbers were soon swelled by various reinforcements from Sund-Moer, Hubfallo, Kongsberg, and a troop of iron-workers from Lake Miösen, who presented a singular contrast to the rest of the rebels. They were tall, powerful men, armed with hammers and tongs, their broad leather aprons being their only shield, a huge wooden cross their only standard, as they marched soberly and rhythmically, with a regular tread more religious than military, their only war-song being Biblical psalms and canticles. They had no leader but their cross-bearer, who walked before them unarmed.

The rebel troop met not a single human being on their road. As they approached, the goat-herd drove his flocks into a cave, and the peasant forsook his village; for the inhabitant of the valley and plain is everywhere alike, he fears the bandit’s horn as much as the bowman’s blast.

Thus they traversed hills and forests, with here and there a small settlement, followed winding roads where traces of wild beasts were more frequent than the footprint of man, skirted lakes, crossed torrents, ravines, and marshes. Ordener recognized none of these places. Once only his eye, as he looked up, caught upon the horizon the dim, blue outline of a great sloping rock. He turned to one of his rude companions, and asked, “My friend, what is that rock to the south, on our right? “

“That is the Vulture’s Neck, Oëlmœ Cliff,” was the reply.

Ordener sighed heavily.



Ethel fell fainting on the Ground

CHAPTER XXXVI THEY JUDGED HIM AS THEMSELVES.

God keep and bless you, my daughter.
Régnier

Monkey, paroquets, combs, and ribbons, all were ready to receive Lieutenant Frederic. His mother had sent, at great expense, for the famous Scudéry's latest novel. By her order it had been richly bound, with silvergilt clasps, and placed, with the bottles of perfume and boxes of patches, upon the elegant toilet-table, with gilded feet, and richly inlaid, with which she had furnished her dear son Frederic's future sitting-room. When she had thus fulfilled the careful round of petty maternal cares which had for a moment caused her to forget her hate, she remembered that she had now nothing else to do but to injure Schumacker and Ethel. General Levin's departure left them at her mercy.

So many things had happened recently at Munkholm of which she could learn but little! Who was the serf, vassal, or peasant, who, if she was to credit Frederic's very ambiguous and embarrassed phrases, had won the love of the exchancellor's daughter? What were Baron Ordener's relations with the prisoners of Munkholm? What were the incomprehensible motives for Ordener's most peculiar absence at a time when both kingdoms were given over to preparations for his marriage to that Ulrica d'Ahlefeld whom he seemed to disdain? And lastly, what had occurred between Levin de Knud and Schumacker? The countess was lost in conjectures. She finally resolved, in order to clear up all these mysteries, to risk a descent upon Munkholm, a step to which she was counselled both by her curiosity as a woman and her interests as an enemy.

One evening, as Ethel, alone in the donjon garden, had just written, for the sixth time, with a diamond ring, some mysterious monogram upon the dusty window in the postern gate through which her Ordener had disappeared, it opened. The young girl started. It was the first time that this gate had been opened since it closed upon him.

A tall, pale woman, dressed in white, stood before her. She gave Ethel a smile as sweet as poisoned honey, and behind her mask of quiet friendliness there lurked an expression of hatred, spite, and involuntary admiration.

Ethel looked at her in astonishment, almost fear. Except her old nurse, who had died in her arms, this was the first woman she had seen within the gloomy walls of Muukholm.

“My child,” gently asked the stranger, “ are you the daughter of the prisoner of Muukholm?”

Ethel could not help turning away her head; she instinctively shrank from the stranger, and she felt as if there were venom in the breath which uttered such sweet tones. She answered:” I am Ethel Schumacker. My father tells me that in my cradle I was called Countess of Tönsberg and Princess of “Wollin.”

“Your father tells you so!” exclaimed the tall woman, with a sneer which she at once repressed. Then she added:” You have had many misfortunes!”

“Misfortune received me, at my birth, in its cruel arms;” replied the youthful captive; “ my noble father says that it will never leave me while I live.”

A smile flitted across the lips of the stranger, as she rejoined in a pitying tone:” And do you never murmur against those who flung you into this cell? Do you not curse the authors of your misery?”

“No, for fear that our curse might draw down upon their heads evils like those which they make us endure.”

“And,” continued the pale woman, with unmoved face, “do you know the authors of these evils of which you complain? “

Ethel considered a moment, and said: “ All that has happened to us is by the will of Heaven.”

“Does your father never speak to you of the king?”

“The king? I pray for him every morning and evening, although I do not know him.”

Ethel did not understand why the stranger bit her lip at this reply.

“Does your unhappy father never, in his anger, mention his relentless foes, General Arensdorf, Bishop Spolleyson, and Chancellor d’Ahlefeld?”

“I don’t know whom you mean.”

“And do you know the name of Levin de Knud?”

The recollection of the scene which had occurred but two days before, between Schumacker and the governor of Throndhjem, was so fresh in Ethel’s mind that she could not but be struck by the name of Levin de Knud.

“Levin de Knud?” said she;” I think that he is the man for whom my father feels so much esteem, almost affection.”

"What!" cried the tall woman.

"Yes," resumed the girl; " it was Levin de Knud whom my father defended so warmly, day before yesterday, against the governor of Throndhjem."

These words increased her hearer's surprise.

"Against the governor of Throndhjem! Do not trifle with me, girl. I am here in your interests. Your father took General Levin de Knud's part against the governor of Throndhjem, you say?"

"General! I thought he was a captain. But no; you are right. My father," added Ethel, "seemed to feel as much attachment for this General Levin de Knud as dislike for the governor of Throndhjem."

"Here is a strange mystery indeed!" thought the tall, pale woman, whose curiosity increased momentarily. "My dear child, what happened between your father and the governor?"

All these questions wearied poor Ethel, who looked fixedly at the tall woman, saying: " Am I a criminal, that you should cross-examine me thus?"

At these simple words the stranger seemed thunderstruck, as if she saw the reward of her skill slipping through her fingers. She replied, nevertheless, in a tremulous voice:" You would not speak to me so if you knew why and for whom I come."

"What: " said Ethel; " do you come from him? Do you bring me a message from him?" And all the blood in her body rushed to her fair face; her heart throbbed in her bosom with impatience and alarm.

"From whom?" asked the stranger.

The young girl hesitated as she was about to utter the adored name. She saw a flash of wicked joy gleam in the stranger's eye like a ray from hell. She said sadly:-

"You do not know the person whom I mean."

An expression of disappointment again appeared upon the stranger's apparently friendly face.

"Poor young girl " she cried;" what can I do to help you?"

Ethel did not hear her. Her thoughts were beyond the mountains of the North, in quest of the daring traveller. Her head sank upon her breast, and her hands were unconsciously clasped.

"Does your father hope to escape from this prison?"

This question, twice repeated by the stranger, brought Ethel to herself.

“Yes,” said she, and tears sparkled on her cheek.

The stranger’s eves flashed.

“He does! Tell me how; by what means; when!”

“He hopes to escape from this prison because he hopes ere long to die.”

There is sometimes a power in the very simplicity of a gentle young spirit which outwits the artitices of a heart grown old in wickedness. This thought seemed to occur to the great lady, for her expression suddenly changed, and laying her cold hand on Ethel’s arm, she said in a tone which was almost sincere: “ Tell me, have you heard that your father’s life is again threatened by a fresh judicial inquiry? That he is suspected of having stirred up a revolt among the miners of the North?”

The words “ revolt . “ and “inquiry” conveyed no clear idea to Ethel’s mind. She raised her great dark eyes to the stranger’s face as she asked:” What do you mean “

“That your father is conspiring against the State; that his crime is all but discovered; that this crime will be punished with death.”

“Death! crime!’’ cried the poor girl.

“Crime and death,” said the strange lady, seriously.

“My father! my noble father!” continued Ethel. “ Alas! he spends his days in hearing me read the Edda and the Gospel! He conspire! What has he done to you?”

“Do not look at me so fiercely. I tell you again I am not your enemy. Your father is suspected of a grave crime; I am here to warn you of it. Perhaps, instead of such a show of dislike, I might lay claim to your gratitude.”

This reproach touched Ethel. “ Oh, forgive me, noble lady, forgive me! What human being have I ever seen who was not an enemy? I have doubted you. You will forgive me, will you not?”

The stranger smiled.

“What, my girl! have you never met a friend until today?”

A hot blush mantled Ethel’s brow. She hesitated an instant.

“Yes. God knows the truth, we have found a friend, noble lady, one only!”

“One only!” said the great lady, hastily. “ His name, I implore. You do not know how important it is; it is for your father’s safety. Who is this friend?”

“I do not know,” said Ethel.

The stranger turned pale.

“Is it because I wish to serve you that you trifle with me? Consider that your father’s life is at stake. Tell me, who is this friend of whom you speak?”

“Heaven knows, noble lady, that I know nothing of him but his name, which is Ordener.”

Ethel uttered these words with that difficulty which we all feel in pronouncing before an indifferent person the sacred name which wakes within us every emotion of love.

“Ordener! Ordener! “repeated the stranger, with singular agitation, while her hands crumpled the white embroideries of her veil. “ And what is his father’s name? “she asked in a troubled voice.

“I do not know,” replied the girl. “ What are his family and his father to me? This Ordener, noble lady, is the most generous of men.”

Alas! the accent with which these words were spoken revealed Ethel’s secret to the sharp-sighted stranger.

She assumed an air of calm composure, and asked, without taking her eyes from the girl’s face: “ Have you heard of the approaching marriage of the viceroy’s son to the daughter of the present lord chancellor, d’Ahlefeld?”

She was obliged to repeat her question before Ethel’s mind could grasp an idea which did not interest her.

“I believe I have,” was her answer.

Her calmness, and her indifferent manner, seemed to surprise the stranger.

“Well, what do you think of this marriage?”

It was impossible to note the slightest change in Ethel’s large eyes as she replied:” Nothing, truly. May their union be a happy one!”

“Counts Guldenlcw and d’Ahlefeld, the fathers of the young couple, are both bitter enemies of your father.”

“May their marriage be blessed!” gently repeated Ethel.

“I have an idea,” continued the crafty stranger. “If your father’s life be really threatened, you might obtain his pardon through the viceroy’s son upon the occasion of this great marriage.”

“May the saints reward you for your kind thought for us, noble lady; but how should my petition reach the viceroy’s son?”

These words were spoken in such good faith that they drew a gesture of surprise from the stranger.

“What! do you not know him?”

“That powerful lord!” cried Ethel. “You forget that I have never been outside the walls of this fortress.”

“Truly,” muttered the tall woman between her teeth. “ What did that old fool of a Levin tell me? She does not know him. Still, that is impossible,” said she; then, raising her voice: “ You must have seen the viceroy’s son; he has been here.”

“That may be, noble lady; of all the men who have been here, I have never seen but one, my Ordener.”

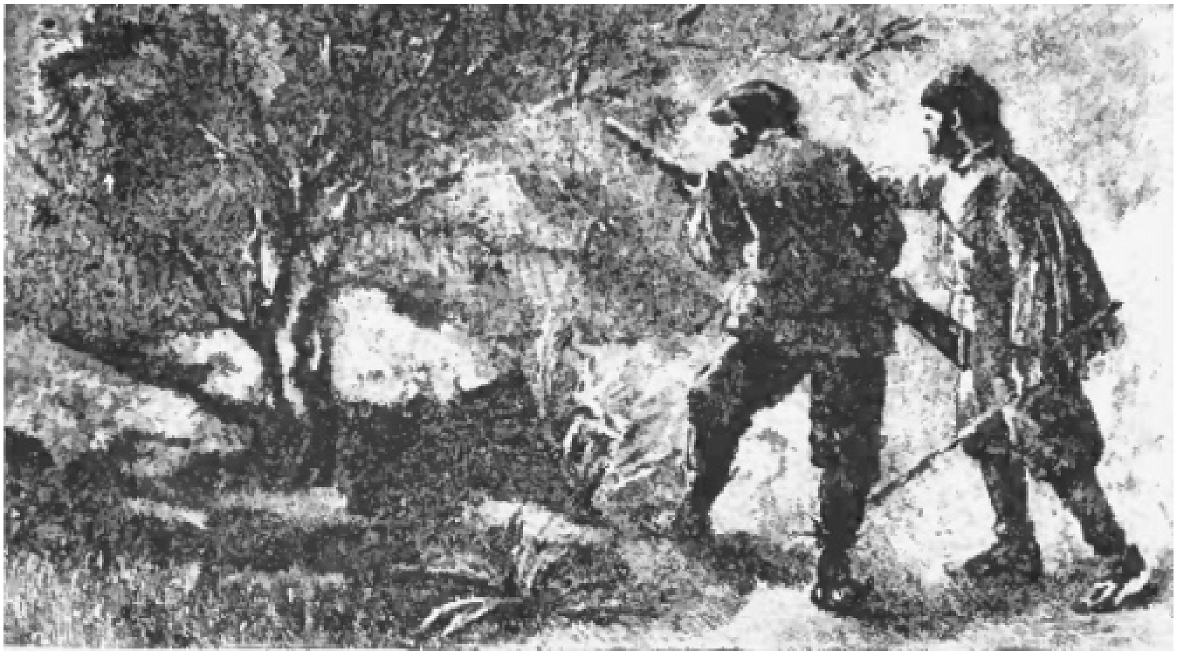
“Oh! “cried poor Ethel, “that is he; it is my betrothed, my adored Ordener! Where did you meet him? He told you that he loved me, did he not? He told you that he has my whole heart. Alas! a poor prisoner has nothing but her love to give. My noble friend! It was but a week ago, I can see him still on this very spot, with his green mantle, beneath which beats so generous a heart, and that black plume, which waved so gracefully above his broad brow.”

She did not finish her sentence. The tall stranger tottered, turned pale, then red, and cried in her ears in tones of thunder: “Wretched girl, you love Ordener Guldenlew, the betrothed of Ulrica d’Ahlefeld, the son of your father’s deadly foe, the viceroy of Norway!” Ethel fell fainting on the ground.



The Shot was fired

Caupolican. Walk so cautiously that the earth itself may not catch your footfall. Redouble your precautions, friends. If we arrive unheard, I will answer for the victory.

Lupe Da Vega: The Conquest of Arauco.

I say, Guldon Stayper, old fellow, the evening breeze is beginning to blow my hairy cap about my head rather vigorously."

These words were spoken by Kennybol, as his eyes wandered for a moment from the giant who marched at the head of the insurgents, and half turned toward a mountaineer whom the accident of a disorderly progress had placed beside him.

His friend shook his head and shifted his banner from one shoulder to the other, with a deep sigh of fatigue, as he answered:-

"Hum! I fancy, Captain, that in these confounded Black Pillar gorges, through which the wind rushes like a torrent let loose, we shall not be as warm tonight as if we were flames dancing on the hearth."

"We must make such rousing fires that the old owls will be scared from their nests among the rocks in their ruined palace. I can't endure owls. On that horrid night when I saw the fairy Ubfem she took the shape of an owl."

"By Saint Sylvester!" interrupted Guldon Stayper, turning his head, " the angel of the storm beats his wings most furiously! Take my advice, Captain Kennybol, and set fire to all the pine-trees on the mountain. It would be a fine sight to see an army warm itself with a whole forest."

"Heaven forbid, my dear Guldon! Think of the deer, and the gerfalcons, and the pheasants! Roast the game, if you will, but do not burn it alive." Old Guldon laughed:" Oh, Captain, you are the same devil of a Kennybol, the wolf of deer, the bear of wolves, and the buffalo of bears!"

"Are we far from Black Pillar?" asked a voice from the huntsmen.

"Comrade," replied Kennybol, " we shall enter the gorge at nightfall; we shall reach the Four Crosses directly."

There was a brief silence, during which nothing was heard but the tramp of many feet, the moaning of the wind, and the distant song of the regiment of iron-workers from Lake Miösen.

“Friend Guldon Stayper,” resumed Kennybol, when he had whistled an old hunting-song, “you have just passed a few days at Throndhjem, have you not?”

“Yes, Captain; my brother George, the fisherman, was ill, and I took his place in the boat for a short time, so that his poor family might not starve while he was ill.”

“Well, as you come from Throndhjem, did you happen to see this count, the prisoner Schumacker Gleffenhem what is his name, now? I mean that man in whose behalf we have rebelled against the royal protectorate, and whose arms I suppose you have on that big red flag.”

“It is heavy enough, I can tell you!” said Guldon. “Do you mean the prisoner in Munkholm fortress, the count, if you choose to call him so; and how do you suppose, Captain, that I should see him? I should have needed,” he added, lowering his voice, “ the eyes of that demon marching in front of us, though he does not leave a smell of brimstone behind him; of that Hans of Iceland, who can see through stone walls; or the ring of Queen Mab, who passes through keyholes. There is but one man among us now, I am sure, who ever saw the count, the prisoner to whom you refer.”

“But one? Ah! Mr. Hacket? But this Hacket is no longer with us; he left us to-day to return to

“I do not mean Mr. Hacket, Captain.”

“And who then?”

“That young man in the green mantle, with the black plume, who burst into our midst last night.’’

“Well?”

“Well!” said Guldon, drawing closer to Kennybol: “ he knows the count, this famous count, as well as I know you, Captain Kennybol.”

Kennybol looked at Guldon, winked his left eye, smacked his lips, and clapped his friend on the shoulder with that triumphant exclamation which so often escapes us when we are satisfied with our own penetration, “I thought as much!”

“Yes, Captain,” continued Guldon Stayper, changing his flame-colored banner to the other shoulder; “I assure you that the young man in green has seen Count I don’t know what you call him, the one for whom we are fighting in Munkholm keep; and he seemed to think no more of walking into that prison than you or I would of shooting in a royal park.”

“And how happen you to know this, brother Guldon?”

The old mountaineer seized Kennybol by the arm, and half opening his otter-skin waistcoat with a caution which was almost suspicious, he said, “Look there!”

“By my most holy patron saint!” exclaimed Keunybol; “ it glitters like diamonds!”

It was indeed a superb diamond buckle, which fastened Guldon Stayper’s rough belt.

“And they are real diamonds,” he replied, closing his waistcoat. “I am just as sure of it as I am that the moon is two days’ journey from the earth, and that my belt is made of buffalo leather.”

Kennybol’s lace clouded, and his expression changed from surprise to distress. He cast down his eyes, and said with savage sternness: “ Guldon Stayper, of Chol-Sœ village, in the Kiölen mountains, your father, Medprath Stayper, died at the age of one hundred and two, without reproach; for it was no crime to kill one of the king’s deer or elk by mistake. Guldon Stayper, fifty-seven good years have passed over your gray head, which cannot be called youth except for an owl. Guldon Stayper, old friend, I would rather for your sake that the diamonds in that buckle were grains of millet, if you did not come by them honestly, as honestly as a royal pheasant comes by a leaden bullet.”

As he pronounced this strange sermon, the mountaineer’s tone was both impressive and menacing.

“As truly as Captain Kennybol is the boldest hunter in Kiölen,” replied Guldon, unmoved, “ and as truly as these diamonds are diamonds, they are my lawful property.”

“Indeed!” said Kennybol, in accents which wavered between confidence and doubt.

“God and my patron saint know,” replied Guldon, “that one evening, just as I was pointing out the Throndhjem Spladgest to some sons of our good mother Norway, who were carrying thither the body of an officer found dead on Urchtal Sands, this was about a week ago, a young man stepped up to my boat. ‘ To Munkholm!’ says he to me. I was not at all anxious to obey. Captain; a free bird never likes to fly into the neighborhood of a cage. But the young gentleman had a haughty, lordly manner; he was followed by a servant leading two horses; he leaped into my boat with an air of authority; I took up my oars, that is to say, my brother’s oars. It was my good angel that willed me to do so. When we reached the fortress, my young passenger, after exchanging a few words with the officer on guard, flung me in payment as God hears me, he did, Captain this diamond buckle which I showed you, and which would have belonged to my brother George, and not to me, if at the time that the traveller Heaven help him! engaged me, the day’s work which I was doing for George had not been done. This is the truth, Captain Kennybol.”

“Very good.”

Little by little the captain’s features had cleared as much as their naturally hard and gloomy expression would permit, and he asked Guldon in -a softened voice:” And are you sure, old fellow, that this young man is the same who is now behind us with Norbith’s followers?”

“Sure! I could not mistake among a thousand faces the face of him who made my fortune; besides, it is the same cloak, the same black plume.”

“I believe you, Guldon!”

“And it is clear that he went there to see the famous prisoner; for if he were not bound on some very mysterious errand, he would never have rewarded so handsomely the boatman who rowed hirn over and besides, now that he has joined us

“You are right”

“And I imagine, Captain, that this young stranger may have far greater influence with the count whom we are about to set free than Mr. Hacket, who strikes me, by my soul! as only fit to mew like a wildcat.”

Kennybol nodded his head expressively.

“Comrade, you have said just what I meant to say. I should be much more inclined in this whole matter to obey that young gentleman than the envoy Hacket. Saint Sylvester and Saint Olaf help me! but if the Iceland demon be our commander, I believe, friend Guldon, that we owe it far less to that magpie Hacket than to this stranger.”

“Really, Captain?” inquired Guldon.

Kennybol opened his mouth to answer, when he felt a hand on his shoulder; it was Norbith.

“Kennybol, we are betrayed! Gormon Woëstrœm has just come from the South. The entire regiment of musketeers is marching against us. The Schleswig lancers are at Sparbo; three companies of Danish dragoons await the cavalry at Loevig. All along the road he saw as many green jackets as there were bushes. Let us hasten toward Skongen; let us not pause until we reach that point. There, at least, we can defend ourselves. One thing more; Gormon thinks that he saw the gleam of muskets among the briers as he came through the defiles of Black Pillar."

The young leader was pale and agitated; but his face and voice still showed courage and resolution.

"Impossible!" cried Kennybol.

"It is certain! certain!" said Norbith.

"But Mr. Hacket- "

"Is a traitor or a coward. Depend on what I say, friend Kennybol. "Where is this Hacket?"

At this moment old Jonas approached the two chiefs. By the deep discouragement stamped upon his features it was easily seen that he had learned the fatal news.

The eyes of the two elder men, Jonas and Kennybol, met, and they shook their heads with one accord.

"Well, Jonas! Well, Kenuybol! " said Norbith. But the aged leader of the Färöe miners slowly passed his hand across his wrinkled brow, and in a low voice answered the appealing look of the aged leader of the Kiölen mountaineers:" Yes, it is but too true; it is but too certain. Gormon Wöestrœm saw them."

"If it be so," said Kennybol," what is to be done?"

"What is to be done?" answered Jonas.

"I consider, friend Jonas, that we should do well to halt."

"And better still, brother Kennybol, to retreat."

"Halt! retreat!" exclaimed Norbith; "we must push forward."

The two elders looked at the young man in cold surprise.

"Push forward!" said Kennybol; " and how about the Munkholm musketeers?"

"And the Schleswig lancers? " added Jonas. ' And the Danish dragoons?" continued Kennybol.

Norbith stamped his foot.

"And the royal protectorate; and my mother dying of cold and hunger?"

"The devil, the royal protectorate!" said the miner Jonas, with a shudder.

"Never mind!" said Kennybol.

Jonas took Kennybol by the hand, saying:” Old fellow, you have not the honor to be a ward of our glorious sovereign, Christian IV. May the blessed king Olaf, in heaven, deliver us from the protectorate!”

“You had better trust to your sword for that benefit!” said Norbith, in a fierce tone.

“Bold words are easy to a young man, friend Norbith,” answered Kennybol; “ but consider that if we advance, all these green jackets

“I think that it would be useless for us to return to our mountains, like foxes running from wolves, for our names and our revolt are known; and if we needs must die, I prefer a musket-ball to the hangman’s rope.”

Jonas nodded assent.

“The devil! the protectorate for our brothers, the gallows lor us! Norbith may be right, after all.”

“Give me your hand, good Norbith,” said Kennybol; “ there is danger in either course. We may as well march straight to the edge of the precipice as fall over it, backwards.”

“Come on’. come on! “ cried old Jonas, striking his sword-hilt.

Norbith grasped them by the hand.

“Listen, brothers! Be bold, like me; I will be prudent, like you. Let us not pause until we reach Skongen; the garrison is weak, and we will overwhelm it. Let us pass, since we must, through the defiles of Black Pillar, but in utter silence. We must traverse them, even if they be guarded by the enemy.”

“I do not think that the musketeers have come so far as Ordals bridge, beyond Skongen; but it matters not. Silence!”

“Silence! so be it! “ repeated Kennybol.

“Now, Jonas,” said Norbith, “ let us return to our posts. Tomorrow we may be at Throndhjem in spite of musketeers, lancers, dragoons, and all the green jerkins of the South.”

The three chiefs parted. Soon the watchword, “Silence! “ passed from rank to rank, and the insurgents, a moment before so tumultuous, looked, in those waste places darkened by approaching night, like a band of mute ghosts roaming noiselessly through the winding paths of a cemetery.

But their road became narrower every moment, and seemed by degrees to dive between two walls of rock which grew steeper and steeper. As the red moon rose among a mass of cold clouds hovering about her with weird inconstancy, Kennybol turned to Guldon Stayper, saying, ““We are about to enter Black Pillar Pass. Silence!”

In fact, they already heard the roar of the torrent which follows every turn of the road between the two mountains, and they saw, to the south, the huge granite pyramid known as the Black Pillar, outlined against the gray sky and the surrounding snow-capped mountains; while the western horizon, veiled in mists, was bounded by the extreme verge of Sparbo forest, and by huge piles of rocks, terraced as if a stairway for giants.

The rebels, forced to stretch their columns over this crooked road compressed between two mountains, continned their march. They penetrated those dark valleys without lighting a torch, without uttering a sound. The very sound of their footsteps was unheard amid the deafening crash of waterfalls and the roar of a furious blast which bowed the Druidical woods, and drove the clouds in eddying whirls about tall peaks clad in snow and ice. Lost in the dark depths of the gorge, the light of the moon, which was veiled now and again, did not reach the heads of their pikes, and the white eagles flying overhead did not guess that so vast a multitude of men was troubling their solitude.

Once old Guldon Stayper touched Kennybol’s shoulder with the butt-end of his carbine, saying, “ Captain, Captain, something glimmers behind that tuft of holly and broom.”

“So it does,” replied the mountain chief;” it is the water of the stream reflecting the clouds.” And they passed on.

Again Guldon grasped his leader, quickly by the arm.

“Look!” he said;” are not those muskets, shining yonder in the shadow of that rock?” Kennybol shook his head; then, after looking attentively, he said, “ never fear, brother Guldon; it is a moonbeam falling on an icy peak.”

No further cause for alarm appeared, and the various bands, as they marched quietly through the winding gorge, insensibly forgot all the danger of their position.

After two hours of often painful progress, over the treetrunks and granite bowlders which blocked the road, the vanguard entered the mountainous group of pine-trees at the end of Black Pillar Pass, overhung by high, black, moss-grown cliffs.

Guldon Stayper approached Kennybol, declaring that he was delighted that they were at last almost out of this cursed cut-throat place, and that they must render thanks to Saint Sylvester that the Black Pillar had not been fatal to them.

Kennybol laughed, swearing that he had never shared such old-womanish fears; for with most men, when danger is over it ceases to exist, and they try to prove by their incredulity the courage which they perhaps failed to display before.

At this moment two small round lights, like two live coals, moving in the thick underwood, attracted his attention.

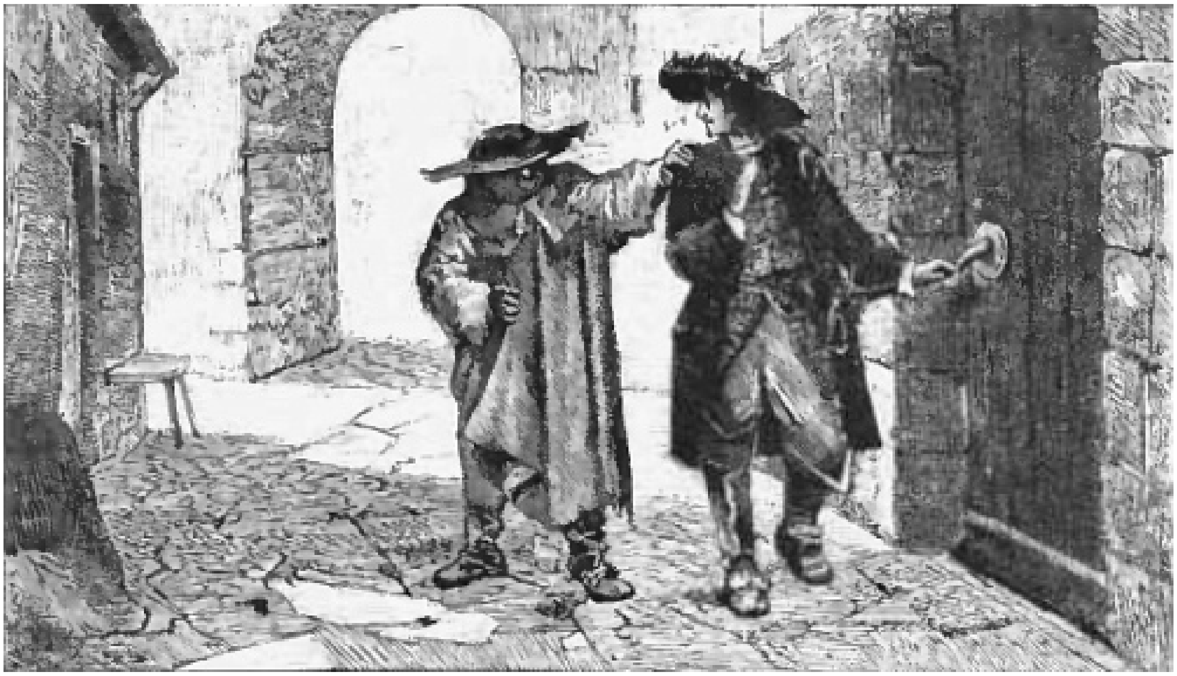
“By my soul’s salvation!” he whispered, pulling Guldon’s arm, “ see; those two blazing eyes must surely belong to the fiercest wildcat that ever mewed in a thicket.”

“You are right,” replied old Stayper; “ and if he were not marching in front of us, I should rather think that they were the wicked eyes of the demon of Ice “

“Hush!” cried Kennybol. Then, seizing his carbine, he added, “ Truly, it shall not be said that such fine game passed before Kennybol in vain.”

The shot was fired before Guldon Stayper, who threw himself upon the rash hunter, could prevent it. It was not the shrill cry of a wildcat that answered the dis- charge of the gun; it was the fearful howl of a tiger, followed by a burst of human laughter more frightful still.

No one heard the report as its dying echoes were prolonged from rock to rock; for the flash of the powder had no sooner lighted up the darkness, the fatal crack of the gun had no sooner burst upon the silence, than a thousand terrible voices rang out unexpectedly from mountain, valley, and forest; a shout of “ Long live the king! “ loud as the rolling thunder, swept over the heads of the rebels, close beside them, behind and before them, and the mur- derous light of a dreadful volley of musketry, bursting from every hand, and striking them down, at the same time disclosed, amid red clouds of smoke, a battalion behind every rock, and a soldier behind every tree.



A heavy Hand was placed on his Shoulder

CHAPTER XXXVIII TILL DEATH US DOTH SEVER.

To arms! to arms! ye captains!
The Prisoner of Ochali.

We must now ask the reader to retrace with us the day which has just passed, and to return to Skongen, where, while the insurgents were leaving Apsyl-Corh lead-mine, the regiment of musketeers, which we saw on the march in an earlier chapter of this very truthful tale, had just arrived.

After giving a few orders in regard to billeting the soldiers under his command, Baron Vœthaün, colonel of the musketeers, was about to enter the house assigned to him, near the city gate, when a heavy hand was placed familiarly upon his shoulder. He turned and saw a short man, whose face was almost wholly hidden by a broad-brimmed straw hat. He had a bushy red beard, and was closely wrapped in the folds of a gray serge cloak, which, by the tattered cowl still hanging from it, seemed once to have been a hermit’s gown. His hands were covered with thick gloves.

“Well, my good man,” asked the colonel, sharply, “ what the deuce do you want?”

“Colonel of the Munkholm musketeers,” replied the fellow, with an odd look, “ follow me for a moment; I have news for you.”

At this singular request, the baron paused for a moment in silent surprise.

“Important news, Colonel!” repeated the man with the thick gloves.

This persistence decided Baron Vœthaün. At such a crisis, and with such a mission as his, no information was to be despised. “ So be it,” said he.

The little man preceded him, and as soon as they were outside the town, he stopped. “ Colonel, would you really like to destroy all the insurgents at a single blow?”

The colonel laughed, saying, “Why, that would not be a bad way to open the campaign.”

“Very well! Then station your men in ambush this very day, in Black Pillar Pass, two miles distant from the town; the rebels are to encamp there to-night. When you see their first fire blaze, fall upon them with your troops. Victory will be easy.”

“Excellent advice, my good man, and I thank you for it; but how did you learn all this?”

“If you knew me, Colonel, you would rather ask me how I could fail to know it.”

“Who are you, then?”

The man stamped his foot. “ I did not come here to answer such questions.”

“Fear nothing. Whoever you may be, the service which you have done us must be your safeguard. Perhaps you were one of the rebels?”

“I refused to join them.”

“Then why conceal your name, if you are a loyal subject of the king?”

“What is that to you?”

The colonel made another attempt to gain a little information as to this singular giver of advice. “ Tell me. is it true that the insurgents are under command of the famous Hans of Iceland?”

“Hans of Iceland!” repeated the little man, with peculiar emphasis.

The baron repeated his question. A burst of laughter, which might have passed for the roar of a wild beast, was the only answer which he could obtain. He ventured a few more questions as to the number and the leaders of the miners; the little man silenced him.

“Colonel of the Munkholm musketeers, I have told you all that I have to tell. Lie in wait today in Black Pillar Pass with your entire regiment, and you may destroy the whole rebel force.”

“You will not tell me who you are; you thus prevent the king from proving his gratitude; but it is only right that I should reward you for the service which you have done me.”

The colonel threw his purse at the small man’s feet.

“Keep your gold, Colonel,” said he;” I do not need it. And,” he added, pointing to a large bag which hung from his rope girdle, “ if you wish pay for killing these men, I have money enough, Colonel, to give you for their blood.”

Before the colonel could recover from the surprise caused by this mysterious being’s inexplicable words, he had vanished.

Baron Vœthaün slowly retraced his steps, wondering whether he should place any faith in the fellow’s news. As he entered his quarters, he was handed a letter, sealed with the lord chancellor’s arms. It contained a message from Count d’Ahlefeld, which the colonel found, with amazement that may be readily imagined, consisted of the same piece of news and the same advice just given him outside the city gate by the incomprehensible character with the straw hat and the thick gloves.

CHAPTER XXXIX THE MONSTER IN HIS TRUE COLORS.

All must perish!
The sword cleaveth the helmet;
The strong armor is pierced by the lance;
Fire devoureth the dwelling of princes;
Engines break down the fences of the battle.
All must perish!
The race of Hengist is gone
The name of Horsa is no more!
Shrink not then from your doom, sons of the sword!
Let your blades drink blood like wine;
Feast ye in the banquet of slaughter,
By the light of the blazing halls!
Strong be your swords while your blood is warm,
And spare neither for pity nor fear,
For vengeance hath but an hour;
Strong hate itself shall expire!
I also must perish!
Walter Scott

We will not try to describe the fearful confusion which broke the already straggling ranks of the rebels, when the fatal defile suddenly revealed to them all its steep and bristling peaks, all its caverns peopled with unlooked-for foes. It would be hard to say whether the prolonged shout, made up of a thousand shrieks, which rose from the columns of men thus unexpectedly mowed down, was a yell of despair, of terror, or of rage. The dreadful fire vomited against them from every side by the now unmasked platoons of the royal troops, grew hotter every moment; and before another shot from their lines followed Kennybol’s unfortunate volley, they were wrapped in a stifling cloud of burning smoke, through which death flew blindly, where each man, shut off from his friends, could but dimly distinguish the musketeers, lancers, and dragoons, moving vaguely among the cliffs and upon the edge of the thickets, like demons in a redhot furnace.

The insurgents, thus scattered over a distance of a mile, upon a narrow, winding road, bordered on one side by a deep torrent, on the other by a rocky wall, which made it impossible for them to turn and fall back, were like a serpent destroyed by a blow on the back, when he has unwound all his spirals, and, though cut to pieces, still tries to turn and coil, striving to unite his separate fragments.

When their first surprise was past, a common despair seemed to animate all these men, naturally fierce and intrepid. Frantic with rage to be thus overwhelmed without the possibility of defence, the rebels uttered a simultaneous shout, a shout which in an instant drowned the clamor of their triumphant foes; and when the latter saw these men, without leaders, in dire disorder, almost destitute of weapons, climbing perpendicular cliffs, under a terrible fire, clinging with tooth and nail to the bushes growing on the verge of the precipice, brandishing hammers and pitchforks, the well-armed troops, well-drilled, securely posted as they were, although they had not yet lost a single man, could not resist a moment of involuntary panic.

Several times these barbarians clambered over a bridge of dead bodies, or upon the shoulders of their comrades planted against the rock like a living ladder, to the heights held by their assailants; but they had scarcely cried, “ Liberty!” had scarcely lifted their hatchets or their knotted clubs, they had scarcely showed their blackened faces, foaming with convulsive rage, ere they were hurled into the abyss, dragging with them such of their rash companions as they encountered in their fall, hanging to some bush or hugging some cliff.

The efforts of these unfortunates to fly and to defend themselves were fruitless. Every outlet was guarded; every accessible point swarmed with soldiers. The greater part of the luckless rebels bit the dust, perishing when they had shattered scythe or cutlass upon some granite fragment; some, folding their arms, their eyes fixed upon the ground, sat by the roadside, silently waiting for a ball to hurl them into the torrent below; those whom Hacket’s forethought had provided with, wretched muskets, fired a few chance shots at the summit of the cliffs and the mouth of the caves, from which a ceaseless rain of shot fell upon their heads. A tremendous uproar, in which the furious shouts of the rebel leaders and the quiet commands of the king’s officers were plainly distinguishable, was mingled with the intermittent and frequent din of musketry, while a bloody vapor rose and floated above the scene of carnage, veiling the face of the mountains in tremulous mists; and the stream, white with foam, flowed like an enemy between the two bodies of hostile men, bearing away upon its bosom its prey of corpses.

In the earlier stage of the action, or rather of the slaughter, the Kiölen mountaineers, under the brave and reckless Kennybol, were the greatest sufferers. It will be remembered that they formed the advance-guard of the rebel army, and that they had entered the pine wood at the head of the pass. The ill-fated Kennybol had no sooner fired his gun, than the forest, peopled as by magic with hostile sharpshooters, surrounded them with a ring of fire; while from a level height, commanded by a number of huge bowlders, an entire battalion of the Munkholm regiment, formed in a hollow square, battered them unceasingly with a fearful musketry. In this horrible emergency, Kennybol, distracted and aghast, gazed at the mysterious giant, his only hope of safety lying in some superhuman power such as that of Hans of Iceland; but, alas! the awful demon did not suddenly unfold broad wings and soar above the combatants, spitting forth fire and brimstone upon the musketeers; he did not grow and grow until he reached the clouds, and overthrow a mountain upon the foe, or stamp upon the earth and open a yawning gulf to swallow up the ambushed army. The dreadful Hans of Iceland shrank like Kennybol from the first volley of shot, and approaching him, with troubled countenance asked for a carbine, because, he said, in a very commonplace tone, at such a time his axe was quite as useless as any old woman’s spindle.

Kennybol, amazed, but still credulous, offered his own musket to the giant with a terror which almost made him forget his fear of the balls showering about him. Still expecting a miracle, he looked to see his fatal weapon become as big as a cannon in the hands of Hans of Iceland, or to see it change into a winged dragon darting fire from eyes, mouth, and nostrils. Nothing of the sort occurred, and the poor hunter’s astonishment reached its climax when he saw the demon load the gun with ordinary powder and shot, just as he himself might have done, take aim like himself, and fire, though with far less skill than he would have shown. He stared at him in stupid surprise, as this purely mechanical act was repeated again and again; and convinced at last that all hope of a miracle must be abandoned, he turned his thoughts to rescuing his companions and himself from their evil predicament by some human means. Already his poor old friend Guldon Stayper lay beside him, riddled with bullets; already his followers, terrified and unable to escape, surrounded on every hand, huddled together without a thought of defence, uttering distressing cries. Kennybol saw what an easy target this mass of men afforded the enemy’s guns, each discharge destroying a score of the insurgents. He ordered his unfortunate companions to scatter, to take refuge in the bushes along the road, much thicker and larger at this point than anywhere else in Black Pillar Pass, to hide in the underbrush, and to reply as best they could to the more and more murderous fire from the sharpshooters and the Munkholm battalion. The mountaineers, for the most part well armed, being all hunters, carried out their leader's order with a readiness which they might not have displayed at a less critical moment; for in the face of danger men usually lose their head, and obey willingly any one who has presence of mind and self-possession to act for all.

Still, this wise measure was far from insuring victory, or even safety. More mountaineers lay stretched upon the ground than still lived, and in spite of the example and encouragement offered them by their leader and the giant, several of them, leaning on their useless guns or prostrate with the wounded, obstinately persisted in waiting to be killed without taking the trouble to kill others in return. It may seem amazing that these men, in the habit of exposing their life every day in their expeditions over the glaciers in pursuit of wild beasts, should lose heart so soon; but let no one forget that in vulgar hearts courage is purely local. A man may laugh at shot and shell, and shiver in the dark or on the edge of a precipice; a man may face fierce animals daily, leap across fearful abysses, and yet run from a volley of artillery. Fearlessness is often only a habit; and one who has ceased to fear death under certain forms, dreads it none the less.

Kennybol, surrounded by heaps of dying friends, began himself to despair, although as yet he had received only a slight scratch on his left arm, and the diabolical giant still kept up his fire with the most comforting composure. All at once he saw an extraordinary confusion in the fatal battalion posted on the heights, which could not be caused by the slight damage inflicted by the very feeble resistance of his followers. He heard fearful shrieks of agony, the curses of the dying, exclamations of terror, rise from the victors.

Soon their fire slackened, the smoke cleared away, and he distinctly saw huge masses of granite falling upon the Munkholm musketeers from the top of the high cliff overlooking the level height upon which they were stationed. These bowlders succeeded one another with awful rapidity; they crashed one upon the other, and rebounded among the soldiers, who breaking their lines rushed in dire disorder down the hill, and fled in every direction.

At this unexpected aid, Kennybol turned; but the giant was still there! The mountaineer was dumfounded; for he supposed that Hans of Iceland had at last found his wings and taken his place upon the cliff, from which he overwhelmed the enemy. He looked up to the spot whence those fearful masses fell, and saw nothing. He could therefore only suppose that a party of rebels had succeeded in reaching this dangerous position, although he saw no glitter of weapons, and heard no shouts of triumph.

However, the fire from the plateau had wholly ceased; the trees hid the remnant of the royal troops, who were probably rallying their forces at the foot of the hill. The musketry from the sharpshooters also became less frequent. Kennybol, like a skilful leader, took advantage of this unexpected interval; he encouraged his men, and showed them, by the sombre light which reddened the scene of slaughter, the pile of corpses heaped upon the height, and the bowlders which still fell at intervals.

Then the mountaineers in their turn answered the enemy’s groans with shouts of victory. They formed in line, and although still harassed by sharpshooters scattered among the bushes, they resolved, filled with fresh courage, to force their way out of this ill-omened defile.

The column thus formed was about to move; Kennybol had already given the signal with his horn, amid loud cries of “ Liberty! liberty! No more protectorate!” when the notes of trumpet and drum sounding a charge were heard directly in front of them. Then the rest of the battalion from the height, strengthened by reinforcements of fresh troops, appeared within gunshot at a turn in the road, displaying a bristling line of pikes and bayonets upheld by rank upon rank as far as the eye could reach. Arriving thus unexpectedly in sight of Kennybol’s division, the troops halted, and a man, who seemed to be the commanding officer, stepped forward, waving a white flag and escorted by a trumpeter.

The unforeseen appearance of this troop did not dismay Kennybol. In time of danger there is a point where surprise and fear become impossible.

At the first sound of trumpet and drum the old fox of Kiölen halted his men. As the royal troops drew up before him in line of battle, he ordered every gun to be loaded, and formed his mountaineers in double ranks, so that they might not offer so broad a mark for the enemy’s fire. He placed himself at the head, the giant at his side. as in the heat of action, for he began to feel quite familiar with him, and observed that his eyes did not flame quite so brightly as a smithy's forge, and that his pretended claws were by no means as unlike ordinary human fingernails as was claimed for them.

When the officer in command of the musketeers stepped forward as if to surrender, and the sharpshooters ceased firing, although their loud shouts, ringing out on every hand, declared them still ambushed in the forests, he suspended his preparations for defence. Meantime, the officer with the white flag had reached the centre of the space between the two hostile columns; here he paused, and the trumpeter accompanying him blew three loud blasts. The officer then cried in a loud voice, distinctly heard by the mountaineers, in spite of the ever increasing tumult of the battle raging behind them in the mountain gorges: " In the king's name! The king graciously pardons all those rebels who throw down their arms and surrender their leaders to his Majesty's supreme justice!"

The bearer of the flag of truce had scarcely pronounced those words, when a shot was fired from a neighboring thicket. The officer staggered, took a few steps forward, raising his flag above his head, and fell, exclaiming: " Treason!"

No one knew whose hand had fired the fatal shot.

"Treason! Cowardly treason!" repeated the royal troops, with a thrill of indignation.

And a fearful volley of musketry overwhelmed the mountaineers.

"Treason!" replied the mountaineers in their turn, made furious as they saw their brothers fall.

And a general discharge answered the unexpected attack from the royal troops.

"At them, comrades! Death to those vile cowards! Death!" cried the officers of the musketeers.

And both parties rushed forward with drawn swords, the two contending columns meeting directly over the body of the unfortunate officer, with a fearful din of arms.

The broken ranks were soon inextricably confounded. Rebel chiefs, king's officers, soldiers, mountaineers, all pell-mell ran their heads together, seized one another, grappled like two bands of famished tigers meeting in the desert. Their long pikes, bayonets, and partisans were now useless; swords and hatchets alone gleamed above their heads, and many of the combatants, in their hand- to- hand struggle, could use no other weapon than their dagger or their teeth.

The same rage and fury inspired both mountaineers and musketeers; the common cry of “ Treason! Vengeance!” sprang from every mouth. The fray had reached a point when every heart was full of brutal ferocity, when men walked with utter indifference over heaps of wounded and dead, amid which the dying revive only to make one last attack on him who tramples them under foot.

At this moment a short man, whom several combatants, amid the smoke and streaming blood, took for a wild beast, in his dress of skins, flung himself into the thick of the carnage, with awful laughter and yells of joy. None knew whence he came, nor upon which side he fought; for his stone axe did not choose its victims, but smote alike the skull of a rebel and the head of a musketeer. He seemed, however, to prefer slaying the Munkholrn troops. All gave way before him; he rushed through the fray like a disembodied spirit; and his bloody axe whirled about him without a pause, scattering fragments of flesh, lacerated limbs, and shattered bones on every side.

He shrieked “Vengeance!” as did all the rest, and uttered strange words, the name of “ Gill “ recurring frequently. This fearful stranger seemed to regard the slaughter as a feast.

A mountaineer upon whom his murderous glance fell threw himself at the feet of the giant in whom Kennybol had placed such vain trust, crying:” Hans of Iceland, save me!”

“Hans of Iceland!” repeated the little man.

He approached the giant.

“Are you Hans of Iceland?” he asked.

The giant, by way of answer, raised his axe. The small man sprang back, and the blade, as it fell, was buried in the skull of the wretch who had implored his aid.

The unknown laughed aloud.

“Ho! ho! by Ingulf! I thought Hans of Iceland was more skilful”

“It is thus that Hans of Iceland saves those who pray to him for help!” said the giant.

“You are right.”

The two dreadful champions attacked each other madly.

Stone axe and steel axe met; they clashed so fiercely that both blades flew in fragments, with a myriad sparks.

Quicker than thought, the little man, finding himself disarmed, seized a heavy wooden club, dropped by some dying man, and evading the giant, who stooped to grasp him in his arms, dealt a furious blow with both hands on the broad brow of his colossal antagonist.

The giant uttered a stifled shriek, and fell. The little man trampled him under foot in triumph, foaming with joy, and exclaiming, “You bore a name too heavy for you!” and brandishing his victorious mace, he rushed in search of fresh victims.

The giant was not dead. The force of the blow had stunned him, and he dropped senseless, but soon opened his eyes, and gave faint signs of returning life. A musketeer, seeing him through the uproar, threw himself upon him, shouting, “ Hans of Iceland is taken! Victory!”

“Hans of Iceland is taken!” repeated every voice, whether in tones of triumph or distress.

The little man had vanished.

For some time the mountaineers had realized that they must perforce submit to superior numbers; for the Munkholm musketeers had been joined by the sharpshooters from the forest, and by detachments of lancers and foot dragoons, who poured in from deep gorges, where the surrender of many of the rebel leaders had put a stop to slaughter. Brave Kennybol, wounded early in the fight, was made a prisoner. Hans of Iceland’s capture deprived the mountaineers of such courage as they still possessed, and they threw down their arms.

When the first beams of the rising sun gilded the sharp peaks of lofty glaciers still half submerged in darkness, mournful peace and fearful silence reigned in Black Pillar Pass, broken only by feeble moans borne away by the chill breeze.

Black clouds of crows flocked to those fatal gorges from every quarter of the horizon; and a few poor goat-herds, who passed the cliffs at twilight, hastened home in terror, declaring that they had seen an animal with the face of a man in Black Pillar Pass, seated on a heap of slain, drinking their blood.

CHAPTER XL THE MOTLEY DRESS.

Let him who will, burn beneath these smouldering fires.
Brantome

“Open” the window, daughter; those panes are very dirty, and I would fain see the day.” “ See the day, father! It will soon be night.” “The sun still lies on the hills along the fjord. I long to breathe the free air through my prison bars. The sky is so clear!”

“Father, a storm is at hand.”

“A storm, Ethel! Where do you see it?”

“It is because the sky is clear, father, that I foresee a storm.”

The old man looked at his daughter in surprise.

“Had I reasoned thus in my youth, I should not be here.” Then he added in a firmer tone: “ What you say is correct, but it is not a common inference for one of your age. I do not understand why your youthful reasoning should be so like my aged experience.”

Ethel’s eyes fell, as if she were troubled by this serious and simple remark. She clasped her hands sadly, and a deep sigh heaved her breast.

“Daughter.” said the aged prisoner, “for some days you have looked pale, as if life had never warmed the blood in your veins. For several mornings you have approached me with red and swollen lids, with eyes that have wept and watched. I have passed several days in silence, Ethel, with no effort on your part to rouse me from my gloomy meditations on the past. You sit beside me more melancholy even than myself; and yet you are not, like your father, weighed down by the burden of a whole lifetime of empty inaction. Morning clouds vanish quickly. You are at that period of existence when you can choose in dreams a future independent of the present, be it what it may. What troubles you, my daughter? Thanks to your constant captivity, you are sheltered from all sudden calamity. “What error have you committed? I cannot think that you are grieving for me; you must by this time be accustomed to my incurable misfortunes. Hope, to be sure, can no longer be the subject of my discourse; but that is no reason why I should read despair in your eyes.”

As he spoke these words, the prisoner’s stern voice melted with paternal love. Ethel stood silently before him. All at once she turned away with an almost convulsive motion, fell upon her knees on the stone floor, and hid her face in her hands, as if to stifle the tears and sobs which burst from her.

Too much woe filled full the wretched girl’s heart. “What had she done to that fatal stranger, that she should reveal to her the secret that was eating away her very life? Alas! since she had known her Ordener’s true name, the poor child had not closed her eyes, nor had her soul known rest. Night brought her no alleviation, save that then she could weep freely and unseen. All was over! He was not hers, he who was hers by all her memories, by all her pangs, by all her prayers, he whose wife she had held herself to be upon the faith of her dreams. For the evening when Ordener had clasped her so tenderly in his arms was no more than a dream to her now. And in truth that sweet dream had been repeated nightly in her sleep. Was it a guilty love which she still cherished for that absent friend, struggle against it as she might? Her Ordener was betrothed to another! And who can tell what that virginal heart endured when the strange and unknown sentiment of jealousy found entrance there like a poisonous viper? When she tossed for long sleepless hours upon her fevered bed, picturing her Ordener, perhaps even then, in the arms of another, fairer, richer, nobler than herself? For, thought she, I was mad indeed to suppose that he would brave death for me. Ordener is the son of a viceroy, of a great lord, and I am nothing but a poor prisoner, nothing but the daughter of a proscribed and exiled man. He has left me, for he is free; and left me, no doubt, to wed his lovely betrothed, the daughter of a chancellor, a minister, a haughty count! Has my Ordener deceived me, then? Oh, God! who would have thought that such a voice was capable of deceit?

And the wretched Ethel wept and wept again, and saw her Ordener before her, the man whom she had made the unwitting divinity of her whole being, that Ordener adorned with all the splendor of his rank, advancing to the altar amid festal preparations, and gazing upon her rival with the smile that had once been her delight.

However, in spite of her unspeakable agony, she never for an instant forgot her filial affection. The weak girl made the most heroic efforts to conceal her distress from her unfortunate father; for there is nothing more painful than to repress all outward signs of grief, and tears unshed are far more bitter than those that flow. Several days had passed before the silent old man observed the change in his Ethel, and at his affectionate questions her long repressed grief had at last burst forth.

For some time he watched her emotion with a bitter smile and a shake of the head; but at last he said: “Ethel, you do not live among men; why do you weep?”

He had scarcely finished these words, when the sweet and noble girl rose. By a great effort she checked her tears, and dried her eyes with her scarf, saying: “ Father, forgive me; it was a momentary weakness.” And she looked at him with an attempt to smile.

She went to the back of the room, found the Edda, seated herself by her taciturn father, and opened the book at random; then, mastering her voice, she began to read. But her useless task was unheeded by her and by the old man, who waved his hand.

“Enough, enough, my daughter!”

She closed her book.

“Ethel,” added Schumacker, “ do you ever think of Ordener?”

The young girl started in confusion.

“Yes,” he continued, “ of that Ordener who went-”

“Father,” interrupted Ethel, “why should we trouble ourselves about him? I think as you do, that he left us, never to return.” “ Never to return, my daughter! I cannot have said such a, thing. On the contrary, I have a strange presentiment that he will come back.”

“That was not your opinion, father, when you spoke so distrustingly of the young man.”

“Did I speak distrustfully of him?”

“Yes, father, and I agree with you; I think that he deceived us.”

“That he deceived us, daughter! If I judged him thus, I acted like most men who condemn without proof. I have received nothing but professions of devotion from this Ordener.”

“And how do you know, father, that those cordial words did not hide treacherous thoughts?”

“Usually men disregard misfortune and disgrace. If this Ordener were not attached to me, he would not have visited my prison without a purpose.”

“Are you sure,” replied Ethel, feebly, “that he had no purpose in coming here?”

“What could it be? “ eagerly asked the old man.

Ethel was silent.

It was too great an effort for her to continue to accuse her beloved Ordener, whom she had formerly defended against her father.

“I am no longer Count Griffenfeld,” he resumed. “ I am no longer lord chancellor of Denmark and Norway, the favored dispenser of royal bounty, the all-powerful minister. I am a miserable prisoner of State, a proscribed man, to be shunned like one stricken with the plague. It shows courage even to mention my name without execration to the men whom I overwhelmed with honors and wealth , it shows devotion for a man to cross the threshold of this dungeon unless he be a jailer or an executioner; it shows heroism, my girl, for a man to cross it and call himself my friend. No; I will not be ungrateful, like the rest of humanity. That young man merits my gratitude, were it only for letting me see a kindly face and hear a consoling voice.”

Ethel listened in agony to these words, which would have charmed her a few days earlier, when this Ordener was still cherished as her Ordener. The old man, after a brief pause, resumed in a solemn tone: “ Listen to me, my daughter; for what I have to say to you is serious. I feel that I am fading slowly; my life is ebbing. Yes, daughter, my end is at hand.”

Ethel interrupted him with a stifled groan.

“Oh God, father, say not so! For mercy’s sake, spare your poor daughter! Alas! would you forsake me? What would become of me, alone in the world, if I were deprived of your protection?”

“The protection of a proscribed man! “ said her father, shaking his head. “However, that is the very thing of which I have been thinking. Yes, your future happiness occupies me even more than my past misfortunes; hear me, therefore, and do not interrupt me again. This Ordener does not deserve that you should judge him so severely, my daughter, and I had not hitherto thought that you felt such dislike to him His appearance is frank and noble, which proves nothing, truly; but I must say that he does not strike me as without merit, although it is enough that he has a human soul, for it to contain the seeds of every vice and every crime. There is no flame without smoke.”

The old man again paused, and fixing his eyes upon his daughter, added: “ Warned from within of approaching death, I have pondered much, Ethel , and if he return, as I hope he may, I shall make him your protector and husband.”

Ethel trembled and turned pale , at the very moment when her dream of happiness had fled forever, her father strove to realize it. The bitter reflection, “ I might have been happy!” revived all the violence of her despair. For some moments she was unable to speak, lest the burning tears which filled her eyes should flow afresh.

Her father waited for her answer.

“What!” she said at last in a faint voice, “ would you have chosen him for my husband, father, without knowing his birth, his family, his name?”

“I not only chose him, my daughter, I choose him still.”

The old man’s tone was almost imperious. Ethel sighed.

“I choose him for you, I say; and what is his birth to me? I do not care to know his family, since I know him. Think of it; he is the only anchor of salvation left to you. Fortunately, I believe that he does not feel the same aversion for you which you show for him.”

The poor girl raised her eyes to heaven.

“You hear me, Ethel! I repeat, what is his birth to me? He is doubtless of obscure rank, for those born in palaces are not taught to frequent prisons. Do not show such proud regret, my daughter; do not forget that Ethel Schumacker is no longer Princess of Wollin and Countess of Tönsberg. You have fallen lower than the point from which your father rose by his own efforts. Consider yourself happy if this man accept your hand, be his family what it may. If he be of humble birth, so much the better, my daughter; at least your days will be sheltered from the storms which have tormented your father. Far from the envy and hatred of men, under some unknown name, you will lead a modest existence, very different from mine, for its end will be better than its beginning.”

Ethel fell on her knees.

“Oh, father, have mercy!”

He opened his arms to her in amazement.

“What do you mean, my daughter!?”

“In Heaven’s name, do not describe a happiness which is not for me!”

“Ethel,” sternly answered the old man, “do not risk your whole life. I refused the hand of a princess of the blood royal, a princess of Holstein Augustenburg, do you hear that? and my pride was cruelly punished. You despise an obscure but loyal man; tremble lest yours be as sadly chastised.”

“Would to Heaven,” sighed Ethel, “that he were an obscure and loyal man!”

The old man rose, and paced the room in agitation. “ My daughter,” said he, “ your poor father implores and commands you. Do not let me die uncertain as to your future; promise me that you will accept this stranger as your husband."

"I will obey you always, father; but do not hope that he will return."

"I have weighed the probabilities, and I think from the tone in which Ordener uttered your name

"That he loves me!" bitterly interrupted Ethel. " Oh, no; do not believe it."

The father answered coldly:" I do not know whether, to use your girlish expression, he loves you; but I know that he will return."

"Give up that idea, father; besides, you would not wish him for your son-in-law if you knew who he is."

"Ethel, he shall be my son-in-law, be his name and rank what they may."

"Well!" she replied, "how if this young man, whom you regard as your solace, whom you consider as your daughter's support, be the son of one of your mortal foes, of the viceroy of Norway, Count Guldenlew?"

Schumacker started back.

"Heavens! what do you say? Ordener! that Ordener! It is impossible!"

The look of unutterable hatred which flashed from the old man's faded eyes froze Ethel's trembling heart, and she vainly repented the rash words which she had uttered.

The blow was struck. For a few moments Schumacker stood motionless, with folded arms; his whole body quivered as if laid upon live coals; his flaming eyes started from their sockets; and his gaze, riveted to the pavement, seemed as if it would pierce the stones. At last these words issued from his livid lips in a voice as faint as that of a man who dreams." Ordener! Yes, it must be so; Ordener Guldenlew! It is well. Come, Schumacker, old fool, open your arms to him; the loyal youth has come to stab you to the heart."

Suddenly he stamped upon the ground, and went on in tones of thunder: " So they send their whole infamous race to insult me in my disgrace and captivity! I have already seen a d'Ahlefeld; I almost smiled upon a Guldenlew! Monsters! Who would ever have thought that this Ordener possessed such a soul and bore such a name? Wretched me! Wretched he!"

Then he fell exhausted into his chair, and while his breast heaved with sighs, poor Ethel, trembling with fright, wept at his feet.

"Do not weep, my daughter," said he, in gloomy tones; " come, oh, come to my heart!"

And he clasped her in his arms.

Ethel knew not how to explain this caress at a moment of rage, but he resumed: “ At least, girl, you were more clear-sighted than your old father. You were not deceived by that serpent with gentle but venomous eyes. Come! let me thank you for the hatred which you have shown me that you feel for that contemptible Ordener.”

She shuddered at these praises, alas! so ill-deserved.

“Father; ‘ said she, “ be calm!”

“Promise me,” added Schumacker, “ that you will always retain the same feeling for the son of Guldeulew. Swear it!”

“God forbids us to swear, father.”

“Swear, swear, girl!” vehemently repeated Schumacker.

“Will you always retain the same feeling for Ordener Guldenlew?”

Ethel had scarcely strength to falter, “ Always.”

The old man drew her to his heart.

“It is well, my daughter! Let me at least bequeath to you my hate, if I cannot leave you the wealth and honors of which I was robbed. Listen! they deprived your old father of rank and glory; they dragged him in irons to the gallows, as if to stain him with every infamy and make him endure every torment. Wretches! Oh, may heaven and hell hear me, and may they be cursed in this life and cursed in their posterity!”

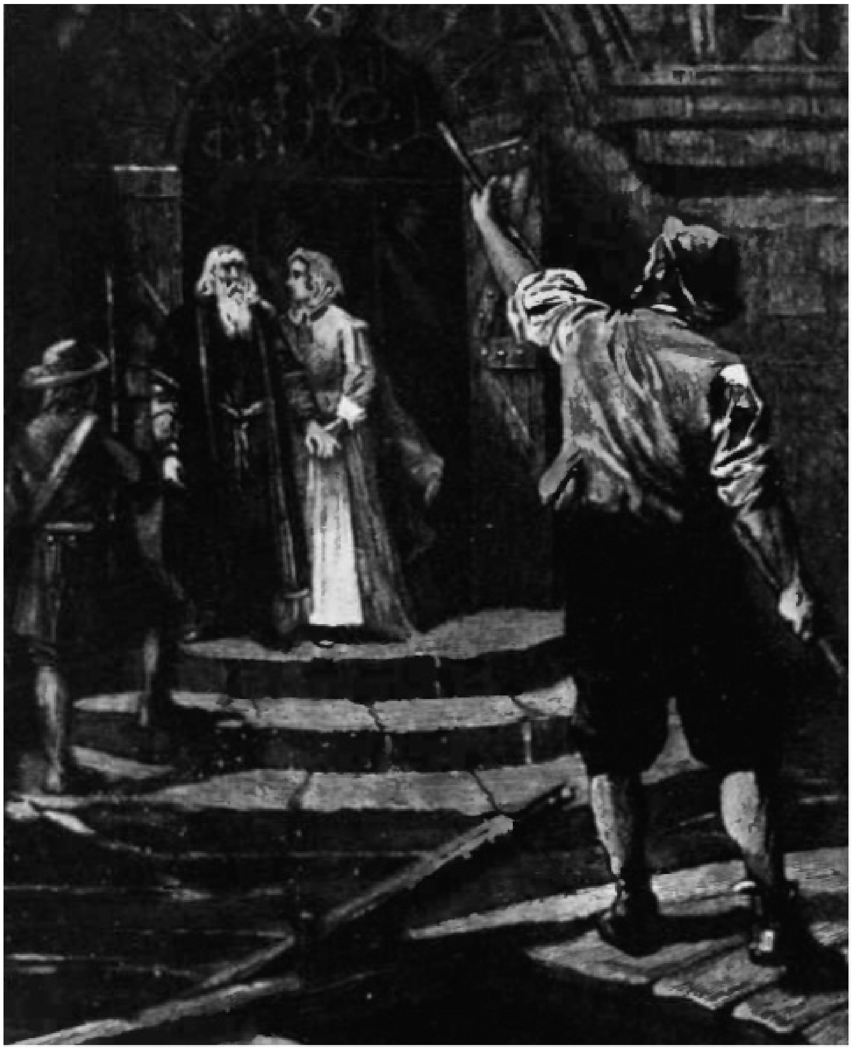
He was silent for a moment; then, embracing his poor daughter, terrified by his curses: “ But Ethel, my only glory and my only treasure, tell me, how was your instinct so much more skilful than mine? How did you discover that this traitor bears one of the abhorred names inscribed upon my heart in gall? How did you penetrate his secret?”

She was summoning all her strength to answer, when the door opened.

A man dressed in black, carrying in his hand an ebony wand, and wearing about his neck a chain of unpolished steel, appeared upon the threshold, escorted by halberdiers also dressed in black.

“What do you want?’’ asked the captive, sharply, and in astonishment.

The man, without replying or looking at him, unrolled a long parchment, to which was fastened by silken threads a seal of green wax, and read aloud: “ In the name of his



They followed their dismal Escort

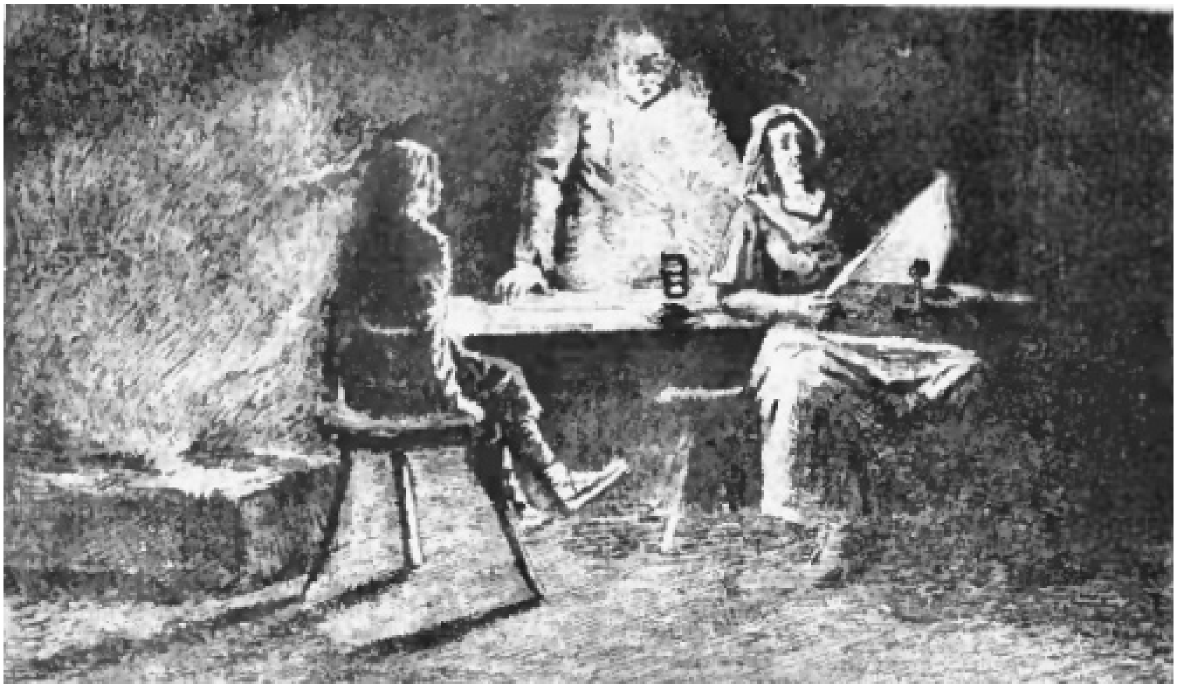
Majesty, our most gracious sovereign and lord, Christian the king. Schumacker, prisoner of State in the royal fortress of Munkholm, and his daughter, are commanded to follow the bearer of the said command."

Schumacker repeated his question: " What do you want?"

The man in black, still immovable, prepared to re-read the document.

"That will do," said the old man.

Then, rising, he signed to the surprised and startled Ethel to follow with him this dismal escort.



The Woman took the Parchment and read aloud

CHAPTER XLI LIKE MEETS LIKE AND SHUDDERS.

A doleful signal was given, an abject minister of justice knocked at his door and informed him that he was wanted.-

Joseph De Maistre

Night had fallen; a cold wind whistled around the Cursed Tower, and the doors of Vygla ruin rattled on their hinges, as if the same hand had shaken all of them at once.

The wild inhabitants of the tower, the hangman and his family, had gathered about the fire lighted in the middle of the room on the first floor, which cast a fitful glow upon their dark faces and scarlet garments. The children's features were fierce as their father's laughter and haggard as their mother's gaze. Their eyes, as well as those of Becky were fixed on Orugix, who, seated on a wooden stool, seemed to be recovering his breath, his feet covered with dust, showing that he had but just returned from some distant trip.

"Wife, listen; listen, children. I 've not been gone two whole days merely to bring back bad news. If I am not made executioner to the king before another month is out, I wish I may never tie another slip-noose or handle an axe again. Rejoice, my little wolf-cubs; your father may leave you the Copenhagen scaffold by way of an inheritance, after all."

"Nychol," asked Becky, " what has happened?"

"And you, my old gypsy," rejoined Nychol, with his boisterous laugh, " rejoice too! You can buy any number of blue glass necklaces to adorn your long, skinny neck. Our agreement will soon be up; but never fear, in a month, when you see me chief hangman of both kingdoms, you will not refuse to break another jug with me."

"What is it, what is it, father?" asked the children, the older of whom was playing with a bloody rack, while the little one amused himself by plucking alive a young bird which he had stolen from the nest.

"What is it, children?- Kill that bird, Haspar; it makes as much noise as a rusty saw; and besides, you should never be cruel. Kill it. What is it, you say? Nothing, a trifle, truly; nothing, dame Becky, save that within a week from this time ex-chancellor Schumacker, who is a prisoner at Muukholm, after looking me so closely in the face at Copenhagen, and the famous brigand of Iceland, Hans of Klipstadur, may perhaps both pass through my hands at once."

The red woman's wandering eye assumed an expression of surprised curiosity.

"Schumacker! Hans of Iceland! How is that, Nychol?"

"I'll tell you. all about it. Yesterday morning, on the road to Skongen, at Ordals bridge, I met the whole regiment of musketeers from Munkholm marching back to Throndhjem with a very victorious air. I questioned one of the soldiers, who condescended to answer, probably because he did not know why my jerkin and my cart were red. I learned that the musketeers were returning from Black Pillar Pass, where they had cut to pieces various bands of brigands, that is to say, insurgent miners. Now, you must know, gypsy Becky, that these rebels revolted in Schumacker's name, and were commanded by Hans of Iceland. You must know that his uprising renders Hans of Iceland guilty of the crime of insurrection against royal authority, and Schumacker guilty of high treason, which will naturally lead those two honorable gentlemen to the scaffold or the block. Add to these two superb executions, which cannot fail to bring me in at least fifteen gold ducats each, and to entitle me to the greatest honor in both kingdoms, several other though less important ones

"But do tell me," interrupted Becky, "has Hans of Iceland been captured?"

"Why do you interrupt your lord and master, miserable woman?" said the hangman. " Yes, to be sure, the famous, the impregnable Hans of Iceland is a prisoner, together with several other leaders of the brigands, his lieutenants, who will also bring me in twelve crowns apiece, to say nothing of the sale of their bodies. He was captured, I tell you; and I saw him, if you must know all the particulars, march by between a double file of soldiers."

The woman and children crowded eagerly about Orugix.

"What! did you really see him, father? " asked the children.

"Be quiet, boys. You shriek like a rogue protesting his innocence. I saw him; he is a giant. His hands were tied behind his back, and his forehead was bandaged. I suppose he was wounded in the head. But never fear, I will soon heal his hurt for him." Accompanying these brutal words with a brutal gesture, the hangman added: " There were four of his comrades behind him, prisoners too and wounded, like him, who were being taken, like him, to Throndhjem, where they are to be tried with exchancellor Schumacker by a court of justice presided over by the lord mayor and the present chancellor.”

“Father, what did the other prisoners look like?”

“The first two were a couple of old men, one of whom wore a miner’s broad felt hat, and the other a mountaineer’s cap; both seemed utterly disheartened. Of the other two, one was a young miner, who marched along with head up, whistling; the other, do you remember, Becky, those travellers who came to this tower some ten days ago, on the night of that terrible storm?”

“As Satan remembers the day of his fall,” replied the woman.

“Did you notice a young man in company with that crazy old doctor with the big periwig, a young fellow, I say, who wore a great green cloak, and a cap with a black leather?”

“Yes, indeed; I can see him now, saying: Woman, we have plenty of gold!”

“Well, old woman, I hope I may never wring the neck of anything worse than a grouse, if the fourth prisoner was not that young man. His face, to be sure, was entirely hidden by his feather, his cap, his hair, and his cloak; besides, he hung his head. But it was the very same dress, the same boots, the same manner. I’ll swallow the stone gallows at Skongen at a single mouthful if it be not the same man! What do you say to that, Becky? Wouldn’t it be a joke if after I had given him something to sustain life he should also receive from me something to cut it short, and should exercise my skill after having tasted my hospitality?”

The hangman’s coarse laughter was loud and long; then he resumed: “ Come, make merry, all of you, and let us drink. Yes, Becky, give me a glass of that beer which scrapes a man’s throat as if he were drinking files, and let me drain it to my future advancement. Come, here’s to the health and prosperity of Nychol Orugix, executioner royal that is to be! I will confess, you old sinner, that I found it hard work to go to Nœs village to hang a contemptible clown for stealing cabbage and chicory. Still, when I thought it over, I felt that thirty-two escalins were not to be sneezed at, and that my hands would not be degraded by turning off mere thieves and riff-raff of that kind until after they had actually beheaded the noble count and echancellor, and the famous demon of Iceland.

I therefore resigned myself, while waiting for my certificate as hangman to the king, to despatch the poor wretch at Nœs village. And here,” he added, drawing a leather purse from his wallet, “ are the thirty-two escalins for you, old girl.”

At this moment three blasts from a horn were heard outside.

“Woman,” cried Orugix, “ those are the bowmen of the lord mayor.”

With these words he hurried downstairs.

An instant later he reappeared, carrying a large parch- ment, of which he had broken the seal.

“There,” said he to his wife, “ there’s what the lord mayor has sent me. Do you decipher it; for you can read Satan’s scrawl. Perhaps it is my promotion already; for since the court is to have a chancellor to preside over it and a chancellor as prisoner at the bar, it is only proper that the man who carries out the sentence should be an executioner royal.”

The woman took the parchment, and after studying it for some time, read aloud, while the children stared at her in stupid wonder: “ In the name of the Council of the province of Throndhjem, Nychol Orugix, hangman for the province, is hereby ordered to repair at once to Throndhjem, and to carry with him his best axe, block, and black hangings.”

“Is that all?” asked the hangman, in a dissatisfied tone.

“That is all,” replied Becky.

“Hangman for the province!” muttered Orugix.

He cast an angry glance at the official document, but at last exclaimed: “ Well, I must obey and be off. After all, they tell me to bring my best axe and the black hangings. Take care, Becky, that you rub off the spots of rust which have dimmed my axe, and see that the hangings are not stained with blood. We must not be discouraged; perhaps they mean to promote me in payment for this fine execution. So much the worse for the prisoners; they will not have the satisfaction of dying by the hand of an executioner royal.”

D’Ahlefeld, dragging behind him an ample robe of black satin lined with ermine, his head and shoulders concealed by a large judicial wig, his breast covered with stars and decorations, among which were the collars of the Royal Orders of the Elephant and the Dannebrog, clad, in a word, in the complete costume of the lord chancellor of Denmark and Norway, paced with an anxious air up and clown the apartment of Countess d’Ahlefeld, who was alone with him at the moment.

“Come, it is nine o’clock; the court is about to open; it must not be kept waiting, for sentence must be pronounced to-night, so that it may be carried out by tomorrow morning at latest. The mayor assures me that the hangman will be here before dawn. Elphega. did you order the boat to take me to Munkholm?”

“My lord, it has been waiting for you at least half an hour,” replied the countess, rising from her seat.

“And is my litter at the door?”

“Yes, my lord.”

“Good! So you say, Elphega,” added the count, clapping his hand to his head, “that there is a love affair between Ordener Guldenlew and Schumacker’s daughter?”

“A very serious one, I assure you,” replied the countess, with a smile of anger and contempt.

“Who would ever have imagined it? And yet I tell you that I suspected it.”

“And so did I,” said the countess. “ This is a trick played upon us by that confounded Levin.”

“Old scamp of a Mecklenburger!” muttered the chancellor; “ never fear, I’ll recommend you to Areusdorf. If I could only succeed in disgracing him! Ah! see here, Elphega, I have an inspiration.”

“What is it? “

"You know that the persons whom we are to try at Munkholm Castle are six in number, Schumacker, whom I hope I shall have no further cause to fear, tomorrow, at this hour; the colossal mountaineer, our false Hans of Iceland, who has sworn to sustain his character to the end, in the hope that Musdœmon, from whom he has already received large sums of money, will help him to escape, that Musdœmon really has the most devilish ideas! The other four prisoners are the three rebel chiefs, and a certain unknown character, who stumbled, no one knows how, into the midst of the assembly at Apsyl- Corh, and whom Musdœmon's precautions have thrown into our hands. Musdœmon thinks that the fellow is a spy of Levin de Knud. And indeed, when brought here a prisoner, his first words were to ask for the general; and when he learned of the Mecklenburger's absence, he seemed dumfounded. Moreover, he has refused to answer any of Musdœmon's questions."

"My dear lord," interrupted the countess, " why have you not questioned him yourself? "

"Really, Elphega, how could I, in the midst of all the business which has overwhelmed me since my arrival? I trusted the affair to Musdœmon, whom it interests as much as it does me. Besides, my dear, the fellow is not of the slightest consequence in himself; he is merely some poor vagabond. We can only turn him to account by representing him to be an agent of Levin de Knud, and as he was captured in the rebel ranks, it would go to prove a guilty connivance between Schumacker and the Mecklenburger, which will suffice to bring about, if not the arraignment, at least the disgrace, of that confounded Levin."

The countess meditated for a moment. " You are right, my lord. But how about this fatal passion of Baron Thorwick for Ethel Schumacker?"

The chancellor again rubbed his head. Then, shrugging his shoulders, he said: " See here, Elphega; neither you nor I are young novices, and we ought to understand men. When Schumacker has been condemned for high treason for the second time; when he has undergone an infamous death on the gallows; when his daughter, reduced to the lowest ranks of society, is forever publicly disgraced by her father's shame, do you suppose, Elphega, that Ordener Guldenlew will then recall for a single instant this childish flirtation which you call passion, judging it by the extravagant talk of a crazy girl, or that he will hesitate a single day between the dishonored daughter of a wretched criminal and the illustrious daughter of a great chancellor? We must judge others by ourselves; where do you find that the human heart is so constituted?”

“I trust that you may be right. But I think you will not disapprove of my request to the mayor that Schumacker’s daughter might be present at her father’s trial, and might be placed in the same gallery with me. I am curious to study the creature.”

“All that can throw light upon the affair is valuable,” said the chancellor, calmly. “ But tell me, does anybody know where Ordener is at present? “

“No one knows; he is the worthy pupil of that old Levin, a knight-errant like him. I believe that he is visiting Wardhus just now.”

“Well, well, our Ulrica will settle him. But come, I forget that the court is waiting for me.”

The countess detained the chancellor. “ One word more, my lord. I asked you yesterday, but your mind was full of other things, and I could not get an answer, where is my Frederic?”

“Frederic!” said the count, with a melancholy expression, and hiding his face with his hand.

“Yes, answer me; my Frederic? His regiment has returned to Throndhjem without him. Swear to me that Frederic was not in that horrible affair at Black Pillar Pass. Why do you change color at his name? I am in mortal terror.”

The chancellor’s features resumed their wonted composure. “ Make yourself easy, Elphega. I swear that he was not at Black Pillar Pass. Besides, the list of officers killed or wounded in that skirmish has been published.”

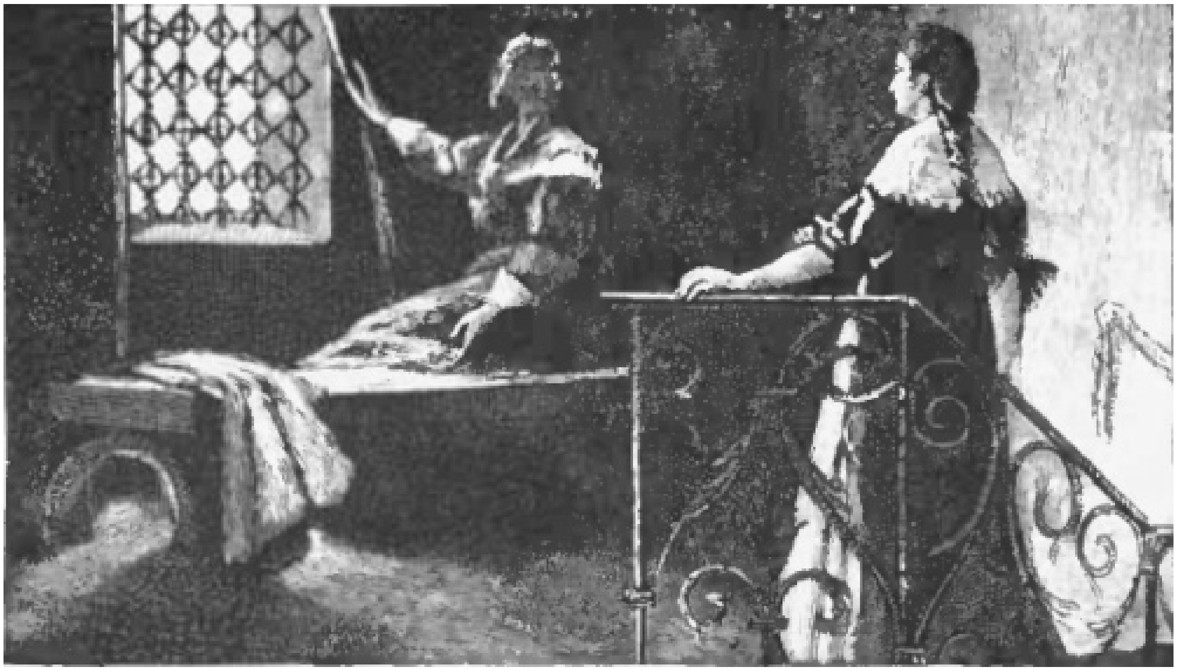
“Yes,” said the countess, growing calmer,” you reassure me. Only two officers were killed, Captain Lory and that young Baron Randmer, who played so many mad pranks with my poor Frederic at the Copenhagen balls. Oh, I have read and re-read the list, I assure you. But tell me, my lord, did my boy remain at Wahlstrom?”

“He did,” replied the count.

“Well, my friend,” said the mother, with a smile which she tried to render affectionate,” I have but one favor to ask of you, that is, to recall Frederic as soon as may be from that frightful region.”

The chancellor broke from her suppliant arms, saying, “ Madam, the court waits. Farewell. What you ask does not depend on my will.” And he quitted the room abruptly.

The countess was left in a sad and pensive mood. “ It does not depend upon his will!” said she;” and he has but to utter a word to restore my son to my arms! I always thought that man was genuinely bad.”



Ethel and the Countess at the Trial

CHAPTER XLIII GHASTLY TROPHIES.

Is it thus you treat a man in my position? Is it thus you forget the respect due to justice?-
Calderon: Louis Perez of Galicia.

The trembling Ethel, separated from her father by the guards upon leaving the Lion of Schleswig tower, was conducted through dim passages, hitherto unknown to her, to a small, dark cell, which was closed as soon as she had entered it. In the wall opposite the door was a large grated opening, through which came the light of links and torches. Before this opening was a bench, upon which sat a woman, veiled and dressed in black, who signed to her to be seated beside her. Ethel obeyed in silent dismay. She looked through the grated window and saw a solemn and imposing scene.

At the farther end of a room hung with black and dimly lighted by copper lamps suspended from the vaulted roof, was a black platform in the shape of a horseshoe, occupied by seven judges in black gowns, one of whom, placed in the centre upon a higher seat, wore on his breast glittering diamond chains and gold medals. The judge on his right differed from the others in the wearing of a white girdle and an ermine mantle, showing him to be the lord mayor of the province. To the right of the bench was a platform covered with a dais, upon which sat an old man, in bishop’s dress; to the left, a table covered with papers, behind which stood a short man with a huge wig, and enveloped in a long black gown.

Opposite the judges was a wooden bench, surrounded by halberdiers holding torches, whose light, reflected back from a forest of pikes, muskets, and partisans, shed a faint glimmer upon the tumultuous heads of a mob of spectators, crowded against the iron railing dividing them from the court-room.

Ethel looked at this spectacle as she might have beheld some waking dream; yet she was far from feeling indifferent to what was about to happen. A secret voice warned her to listen well, because a crisis in her life was at hand. Her heart was a prey to contending emotions; she longed to know instantly what interest she had in the scene before her, or never to know it at all. For some days, the idea that her Ordener was forever lost to her had inspired her with a desperate desire to be done with existence once for all, and to read the book of her fate at a single glance. Therefore, realizing that this was a decisive hour, she watched the sombre picture before her, not so much with aversion as with a sort of impatient melancholy joy.

She saw the president rise and proclaim in the king’s name that the court was opened.

She heard the short, dark man to the left of the bench read, in a low, rapid voice, a long discourse in which her father’s name, mixed with the words “conspiracy,” “revolt in the mines,” and “ high treason,” frequently recurred. Then she remembered what the dread stranger had told her, in the donjon garden, of the charges against her father; and she shuddered as she heard the man in the black robe conclude his speech with the word “ death,” pronounced with great emphasis. She turned in terror to the veiled lady, from whom she shrank with unaccountable fear.” Where are we? What does all this mean?” she timidly asked.

A gesture from her mysterious companion commanded her to be silent and attentive. She again turned her eyes to the court-room. The venerable bishop rose, and Ethel caught these words: “ In the name of omnipotent and most merciful God, I, Pamphilus-Luther, bishop of the royal province and town of Throndhjem, do greet the worthy court assembled here in the name of the king, our lord, under God.

“And I say, that having observed that the prisoners brought to this bar are men and Christians, and that they have no counsel, I declare to the worthy judges that it is my purpose to aid them with my poor strength in the cruel position in which it has pleased Heaven to place them.

“Praying that God will deign to strengthen my great weakness, and enlighten my great blindness, I, bishop of this royal diocese, greet this wise and worthy court.”

So saying, the bishop stepped from his episcopal throne, and took his seat upon the prisoners’ bench, amid a murmur of applause from the people.

The president then rose, and said in dry tones,” Halberdiers, command silence! My lord bishop, the court thanks your reverence, in the name of the prisoners. Inhabitants of the province of Throndhjem, pay good heed to the king’s justice; there can be no appeal from the sentence of the court. Bowmen, bring in the prisoners.”

There was an expectant and terrified hush; the heads of the crowd swayed to and fro in the darkness like the waves of a stormy sea, upon which the thunder is about to burst.

Soon Ethel heard a dull sound and a strange stir below her, in the gloomy aisles of the court; the audience moved aside with a thrill of impatient curiosity there was a noise of many feet; halberds and muskets gleamed, and six men, chained and surrounded by guards, entered the room bareheaded. Ethel had eyes for the first of the six alone, a white-headed old man in a black gown. It was her father.

She leaned, almost fainting, against the stone balustrade in front of her; everything swam before her in a confused cloud, and it seemed as if her heart were in her throat. She said in a feeble voice, “ God! help me!”

The veiled woman bent over her and gave her salts to smell, which roused her from her lethargy.

“Noble lady,” said she, reviving, “ for mercy’s sake, speak but one word to convince me that I am not the sport of spirits from hell.”

The stranger, deaf to her entreaty, again turned her head toward the court; and poor Ethel, who had somewhat recovered her strength, resigned herself to do the same in silence.

The president rose, and said in slow, solemn tones, “ Prisoners, you are brought before us that we may decide whether or not you are guilty of high treason, conspiracy, and armed rebellion against the authority of the king, our sovereign lord. Examine your consciences well, for the charge of leze-majesty rests upon your heads.”

At this moment a gleam of light fell upon the face of one of the six prisoners, a young man who held his head down, as if to veil his features with his long hair. Ethel started, and a cold sweat oozed from every pore. She thought she recognized- But no; it was a cruel illusion. The room was but dimly lighted, and men moved about it like shadows; the great polished ebony Christ hanging over the president’s chair was scarcely visible.

And yet that young man was wrapped in a mantle which at this distance seemed to be green; his disordered hair was chestnut, and the unexpected gleam which revealed his features- But no; it was not true. It could not be! It was some horrid delusion!

The prisoners were seated on the bench beside the bishop. Schumacker took his place at one end; he was separated from the chestnut-haired young man by his four companions in misfortune, who wore coarse clothes, and among whom was one of gigantic stature. The bishop sat at the other end of the bench.

Ethel saw the president turn to her father, saying in a stern voice: “Old man, tell us your name, and who you are.”

The old man raised his venerable head.

“Once,” he replied, looking steadily at the president, “ I was Count Griffenfeld and Tönsberg, Prince of Wollin, Prince of the Holy German Empire, Knight of the Royal Orders of the Elephant and the Dannebrog, Knight of the Golden Fleece in Germany and of the Garter in England, Prime Minister, Lord Rector of all our Universities, Lord High Chancellor of Denmark, and “

The president interrupted him: “ Prisoner, the court does not ask who you were, nor what your name once was, but who you are and what it now is.”

“Well,” answered the old man, quickly, “ my name is John Schumacker no; I am sixty-nine years old, and I am nothing but your former benefactor, Chancellor d’Ahlefeld.”

The president seemed confused.

“I recognized you, Count,” added the exchancellor, “and as I thought you did not know me, I took the liberty to remind your Grace that we are old acquaintances.”

“Schumacker,” said the president, in a voice trembling with concentrated fury, “do not trifle with the court.”

The aged prisoner again interrupted him: “We have changed places, noble Chancellor; I used to call you ‘d’Ahlefeld,’ and you addressed me as ‘Count.’”

“Prisoner,” replied the president, “you only injure your cause by recalling the infamous decree which already brands your name.”

“If that sentence entailed infamy on any one, Count d’Ahlefeld, it was not on me.”

The old man half rose as he spoke these words with great emphasis.

The president waved his hand.

“Sit down. Do not insult, in the presence of the court, the judges who condemned you, and the king who surrendered you to those judges. Recollect that his Majesty deigned to grant you your life, and confine yourself to defending it.”

Schumacker’s only answer was a shrug of the shoulders.

“Have you,” asked the president, “anything to say in regard to the charges preferred against you?”

Seeing that Schumacker was silent, the president repeated his question.

“Are you speaking to me?” said the exchancellor. “ I supposed, noble Count d’Ahlefeld, that you were speaking to yourself. Of what crime do you accuse me? Did I ever give a Judas kiss to a friend? Have I imprisoned, condemned, and dishonored a benefactor, robbed him to whom I owed everything? In truth, my lord chancellor, I know not why I am brought here. Doubtless it is to judge of your skill in lopping off innocent heads. Indeed, I shall not be sorry to see whether you find it as easy to ruin me as to ruin the kingdom, and whether a single comma will be a sufficient pretext for my death, as one letter of the alphabet was enough for you to bring on a war with Sweden.”

He had scarcely uttered this bitter jest, when the man seated at the table to the left of the bench arose.

“My lord president,” said he, bowing low,” my lord judges, I move that John Schumacker be forbidden to speak, if he continue to insult his Grace, the president of this worshipful court.”

The calm voice of the bishop answered: “Mr. Private Secretary, no prisoner can be deprived of the right to speak.”

“True, Reverend Bishop,” hastily exclaimed the president. “We propose to allow the defence the utmost liberty. I would merely advise the prisoner to moderate his expressions if he understands his own interest.”

Schumacker shook his head, and said coldly:” It seems that Count d’Ahlefeld is more sure of his game than he was in 1677.”

“Silence!” said the president; and instantly addressing the prisoner next to the old man, he asked his name.

A mountaineer of colossal stature, whose forehead was swathed in bandages, rose, saying, “ I am Hans, from Klipstadur, in Iceland.”

A shudder of horror ran through the crowd, and Schumacker, lifting his head, which had sunk upon his breast, cast a sudden glance at his dreadful neighbor, from whom all his other fellow-prisoners shrank.

“Hans of Iceland,” asked the president, when the confusion ceased, “ what have you to say for yourself?”

Ethel was as much startled as any of the spectators by the appearance of the famous brigand, who had so long played a prominent part in all her visions of alarm. She fixed her eyes with timid dread upon the monstrous giant, with whom her Ordener had possibly fought, whose victim he perhaps was. This idea again took possession of her soul in all its painful shapes. Thus, wholly absorbed by countless heart-rending emotions, she hardly heeded the coarse, blundering answer of this Hans of Iceland, whom she regarded almost as her Ordener's murderer. She only understood that the brigand declared himself to be the leader of the rebel forces.

"Was it of your own free will," asked the president, "or by the suggestion of others, that you took command of the insurgents?"

The brigand answered: ‘‘It was not of my own free will."

"Who persuaded you to commit such a crime?"

"A man named Hacket."

"Who was this Hacket?"

"An agent of Schumacker, whom he also called Count Griffenfeld."

The president turned to Schumacker:" Schumacker, do you know this Hacket?"

"You have forestalled me, Count d'Ahlefeld," rejoined the old man: - I was about to ask you the same question."

"John Schumaeker," said the president, - your hatred is ill advised. The court will put the proper value upon your system of defence."

The bishop then said, turning to the short man, who seemed to fill the office of recorder and prosecutor:- Mr. Private Secretary, is this Hacket one of your clients?"

"No. your reverence," replied the secretary.

"Does any one know what has become of him?"

"He was not captured; he has disappeared."

It seemed as if the private secretary tried to steady his voice as he said this.

"I rather think that he has vanished altogether," said Schumacker.

The bishop continued: -"Mr. Secretary, is any one in pursuit of this Hacket? Has any one a description of him?"

Before the private secretary could answer, one of the prisoners rose. He was a young miner, with a stern, proud face.

"He is easily described," said he, in a firm voice. "This contemtible Hacket, Schumacker's agent is a man of low stature, with an open countenance, like the mouth of hell Stay, Mr Bishop; his voice is very like that of the gentleman writing at the table over there, whom your reverence calls, I believe, ‘ private secretary.' And truly , if the room were not so dark, and the private secretary had less hair to hide his face, I could almost swear that he looked very much like the traitor Hacket."

"Our brother speaks truly," cried the prisoners on either side of the young miner.

"Indeed!" muttered Schumacker, with a look of triumph.

The secretary involuntarily started, whether from fear, or from the indignation which he felt at being compared to Hacket. The president, who himself seemed disturbed, hurriedly exclaimed: "Prisoners, remember that you are only to speak in answer to a question from the court; and do not insult the officers of the law by unworthy comparisons."

"But, Mr. President," said the bishop, " this is a mere matter of description. If the guilty Hacket has points of resemblance to your secretary, it may be useful to- "

The president cut him short.

"Hans of Iceland, you, who have had such frequent intercourse with Hacket, tell us, to satisfy the worthy bishop, whether the fellow really resembles our honorable private secretary."

"Not at all, sir." unhesitatingly answered the giant.

"You see, my lord bishop," added the president.

The bishop acknowledged his satisfaction by a bow, and the president, addressing another prisoner, pronounced the usual formula: "What is your name?"

"Wilfred Kennybol, from the Kiölen Mountains."

"Were you among the insurgents?"

"Yes, sir; the truth at all costs. I was captured in the cursed defile of Black Pillar. I was the chief of the mountaineers."

"Who urged you to the crime of rebellion?"

"Our brothers the miners complained of the royal protectorate; and that was very natural, was it not, your worship? If you had nothing but a mud hut and a couple of paltry fox-skins, you would not like to have them taken from you. The government would not listen to their petitions. Then, sir, they made up their minds to rebel, and begged us to help them. Such a slight favor could not be refused by brothers who say the same prayers and worship the same saints. That 's the whole story."

"Did nobody," said the president, " excite, encourage, and direct your insurrection? "

"There was a Mr. Hacket, who was forever talking to us about rescuing a count who was imprisoned at Munkholm, whose messenger he said he was.

We promised to do as he asked, because it was nothing to us to set one more captive free."

"Was not this count's name Schumacker or Griffenfeld, fellow?"

"Exactly so, your worship."

"Did you never see him?"

"No, sir; but if he be that old man who told you that he had so many names just now, I must confess-"

"What?" interrupted the president.

"That he has a very beautiful white beard, sir; almost as handsome a one as my sister Maase's husband's father, of the village of Surb; and he lived to be one hundred and twenty years old."

The darkness of the room prevented any one from seeing whether the president looked disappointed at the mountaineer's simple answer. He ordered the archers to produce certain scarlet flags.

"Wilfred Kennybol," he asked, " do you recognize these flags?"

"Yes, your Grace; they were given to us by Hacket in Count Schumacker's name. The count also distributed arms to the miners; for we did not need them, we mountaineers, who live by our gun and game-bag. And I myself, sir, such as you see me, trussed as I am like a miserable fowl to be roasted, have more than once, in one of our deep valleys, brought down an old eagle flying so high that it looked like a lark or a thrush."

"You hear, judges," remarked the private secretary; "the prisoner Schumacker distributed arms and banners to the rebels, through Hacket."

"Kennybol, asked the president, " have you anything more to say?"

"Nothing, your Grace, except that I do not deserve death. I only lent a hand in brotherly love to the miners, and I'll venture to say before all your worships that my bullet, old hunter as I am, never touched one of the king's deer."

The president, without answering this plea, cross-examined Kennybol's two companions; they were the leaders of the miners. The older of the two, who slated that his name was Jonas, repeated Kennybol's testimony in slightly different words. The other, the same young man who had noticed such a strong resemblance between the private secretary and the treacherous Hacket, called himself Norbith, and proudly avowed his share in the rebellion, but refused to reveal anything regarding Hacket and Schumacker, saying that he had sworn secrecy, and had forgotten everything but that oath. In vain the president tried threats and entreaties; the obstinate youth was not to be moved. Moreover, he insisted that he had not rebelled on Schumacker’s account, but simply because his old mother was cold and hungry. He did not deny that he might deserve to die; but he declared that it would be unjust to kill him, because in killing him they would also kill his poor mother, who had done nothing to merit punishment.

When Norbith ceased speaking, the private secretary briefly summed up the heavy charges against the prisoners, and more especially against Schumacker. He read some of the seditious mottoes on the flags, and showed how the general agreement of the answers of the exchancellor’s accomplices, and even the silence of Norbith bound by a fanatical oath, tended to inculpate him. “There now remains,” he said in close, “but a single prisoner to be examined, and we have strong reasons for thinking him the secret agent of the authority who has ill protected the peace of the province of Throndhjem. This authority has favored, if not by his guilty connivance, at least by his fatal negligence, the outbreak of the revolt which must destroy all these unhappy men, and restore Schumacker to the scaffold from which the king’s clemency so generously preserved him.”

Ethel, whose fears for Ordener were now converted into cruel apprehensions for her father, shuddered at these ominous words, and wept floods of tears when her father rose and said quietly: “Chancellor d’Ahlefeld, I admire your skill. Have you summoned the hangman?”

The unfortunate girl thought her cup of bitterness was full: she was mistaken.

The sixth prisoner now stood up. With a superb gesture he swept back the hair which covered his face, and replied to the president’s questions in a clear, firm voice: “ My name is Ordener Guldenlew, Baron Thorwick, Knight of the Dannebrog.”

An exclamation of surprise escaped the secretary:” The viceroy’s son!”

“The viceroy’s son!” repeated every voice, as if the words were taken up by countless echoes.

The president shrank back in his seat; the judges, hitherto motionless upon the bench, bent toward one another in confusion, like trees beaten by opposing winds. The commotion was even greater in the audience. The spectacors climbed upon stone cornices and iron rails; the entire assembly spoke through a single mouth; and the guards, forgetting to insist upon silence, added their ejaculations to the general uproar.

Only those accustomed to sudden emotions can imagine Ethel’s feelings. Who could describe that unwonted mixture of agonizing joy and delicious grief; that anxious expectation, which was alike fear and hope, and yet not quite either? He stood before her, but he could not see her. There was her beloved Ordener, her Ordener, whom she had believed dead, whom she knew was lost to her; her friend who had deceived her, and whom she adored with renewed adoration. He was there; yes, he was there. She was not the victim of a vain dream. Oh, it was really he, that Ordener, alas! whom she had seen in dreams more often than in reality. But did he appear within these gloomy precincts as an angel of deliverance, or a spirit of evil? Was she to hope in him, or to tremble for him? A thousand conjectures crowded upon her at once, and oppressed her mind like a flame choked by too much fuel; all the ideas and sensations which we have suggested Hashed through her brain as the son of the Norwegian viceroy pronounced his name. She was the first to recognize him, and before any one else had recognized him, she had fainted.

She soon recovered her senses for the second time, thanks to the attentions of her mysterious neighbor. “With pale cheeks, she again opened her eyes, in which the tears had been suddenly dried. She cast an eager glance at the young man still standing unmoved amid the general confusion; and after all agitation had ceased in the court and among the people, Ordener Guldenlew’s name still rang in her ears. With painful alarm she observed that he wore his arm in a sling, and that his wrists were chained; she noticed that his mantle was torn in several places, and that his faithful sword no longer hung at his side. Nothing escaped her solicitude, for the eye of a lover is like that of a mother. Her whole soul flew to the rescue of him whom she could not shield with her body; and, be it said to the glory and the shame of love, in that room, which contained her father and her father’s persecutors, Ethel saw but one man.

Silence was gradually restored. The president resumed his examination of the viceroy’s son. “ My lord Baron,” said he, in a tremulous voice.

“I am not ‘ my lord Baron ‘ here,” firmly answered Ordener. “ I am Ordener Guldenlew, just as he who was once Count Griffenfeld is John Schumacker here.”

The president hesitated for a moment, then went on: “ Well, Ordener Guldenlew, it is doubtless by some unlucky accident that you are brought before us. The rebels must have captured you while you were travelling, and forced you to join them, and it is probably in this way that you were found in their ranks."

The secretary rose: "Noble judges, the mere name of the viceroy's son is a sufficient plea for him. Baron Ordener Guldenlew cannot by any possibility be a rebel. Our illustrious president has given a clear explanation of his unfortunate arrest among the rebels. The noble prisoner's only error is in not sooner revealing his name. We request that he may be set free at once, abandoning all charges against him, and only regretting that he should have been seated upon a bench degraded by the criminal Schumacker and his accomplices."

"What would you do?" cried Ordener.

"The private secretary," said the president, " withdraws the charges against you."

"He is wrong," replied Ordener, in a loud, clear voice; " I alone of all here should be accused, judged, and condemned." He paused a moment, and added in a less resolute tone, " For I alone am guilty."

"You alone guilty!" exclaimed the president.

"You alone guilty!" repeated the secretary.

A fresh burst of astonishment was heard in the audience. The wretched Ethel shuddered; she did not reflect that this declaration from her lover would save her father. She thought only of her Ordener's death.

"Silence in the court! " said the president, possibly taking advantage of this brief tumult to collect his thoughts and recover his self-possession. " Ordener Gul- denlew," he resumed, " explain yourself."

The young man mused an instant, then sighed heavily, and uttered these words in a tone of calm submission: " Yes, I know that an infamous death awaits me; I know that my life might have been bright and fair. But God reads my heart; God alone! I am about to accomplish the most urgent duty of my life. I am about to sacrifice to it my blood, perhaps my honor; but I feel that I shall die without regret or remorse. Do not be surprised at my words, judges; there are mysteries in the soul and in the destiny of man which men cannot penetrate, and which are judged in heaven alone. Hear me, therefore, and act toward me as your conscience may dictate when you have pardoned these unfortunate men, and more especially the much injured Schumacker, who has already, in his long captivity, expiated many more crimes than any one man could ever commit. Yes, I am guilty, noble judges, and I alone. Schumacker is innocent; these other unhappy men were merely led astray. I am the author of the insurrection among the miners."

"You! " exclaimed the president and his private secretary, with a singular look upon their faces.

"I! and do not interrupt me again, gentlemen. I am in haste to finish; for by accusing myself I exonerate these poor prisoners. I excited the miners in Schumacker's name; I distributed those banners to the rebels: I sent them money and arms in the name of the prisoner of Munkholm. Hacket was my agent."

At the name of Hacket, the private secretary made a gesture of stupefied amazement.

Ordener continued: " I will not trespass on your time, gentlemen. I was captured among the miners, whom I persuaded to revolt. I alone did everything. Now judge me. If I have proved my guilt, I have also proved the innocence of Schumacker and the poor wretches whom you deem his accomplices."

The young man spoke these words, his eyes raised to heaven. Ethel, almost lifeless, scarcely breathed; but it seemed to her that Ordener, although he exculpated her father, pronounced his name most bitterly. The young man's language terrified and amazed her, although she could not comprehend it. Of all she heard, she grasped nothing but misery.

A sentiment of similar nature seemed to engross the president. He was scarcely able to believe his ears. Nevertheless, he asked the viceroy's son: "If you are indeed the sole author of this revolt, what was your object in instigating it?"

"I cannot tell you."

Ethel shivered when she heard the president reply in a somewhat angry tone: " Had you not an intrigue with Schumacker's daughter?"

But Ordener, though in chains, advanced toward the bench, and exclaimed, in accents of indignation: "Chan- cellor d'Ahlefeld, content yourself with my life, which I place in your hands; respect a noble and innocent girl. Do not a second time attempt to dishonor her."

Ethel, who felt the blood rise to her face, did not comprehend the meaning of the words, " a second time," upon which her defender laid such emphasis; but by the rage expressed in the president's features, it seemed that he understood them.

"Ordener Guldenlew, do not forget the respect due to the king's justice and the officers of the law. I reprimand you in the name of the court. I now summon you anew to declare your purpose in committing the crime of which you accuse yourself."

"I repeat that I cannot tell you."

"Was it not to deliver Schumacker?" inquired the secretary.

Ordener was silent.

"Do not persist in silence, prisoner," said the president; " it is proved that you have been in communication with Schumacker, and your confession of guilt rather implicates than exonerates the prisoner of Munkholm. You have paid frequent visits to Munkholm, and your motive was surely more than mere curiosity. Let this diamond buckle bear witness."

The president took from the table a diamond buckle.'

"Do you recognize it as your property?"'

"Yes. By what chance?"

"Well! One of the rebels gave it, before he died, to our private secretary, averring that he received it from you in payment for rowing you across from Throndhjem to Munkholm fortress. Now I ask you, judges, if such a price paid to a common sailor does not prove the importance laid by the prisoner, Ordener Guldeulew, upon his reaching that prison, which is the one where Schumacker was confined?"

"Ah! " exclaimed the prisoner Kennybol, " what your grace says is true; I recognize the buckle. It is the same story which our poor brother Guldon Stayper told me."

"Silence," said the president; " let Ordener Guldenlew answer."

"I will not deny," replied Ordener, " that I desired to see Schumacker. But this buckle has no significance. It is forbidden to enter the fort wearing diamonds. The sailor who rowed me across complained of his poverty during our passage. I flung him this buckle, which I was not allowed to wear."

"Pardon me, your Grace," interrupted the private secretary, " the rule does not include the viceroy's son. You could therefore

"I did not wish to give my name."

"Why not?" asked the president.

"I cannot tell you."

"Your relations with Schumacker and his daughter prove that the object of your conspiracy was to set them free."

Schumacker, who had hitherto shown no sign of attention save an occasional scornful shrug of the shoulders, rose:” To set me free! The object of this infernal plot was to compromise and ruin me, as it still is. Do you think that Ordener Guldenlew would confess his share in this crime unless he had been captured among the rebels?

Oh, I see that he inherits his father’s hatred of me! And as for the relations which you suppose exist between him and myself and my daughter, let him know, that accursed Guldenlew, that my daughter also inherits my loathing for him, for the whole race of Guldenlews and d’Ahlefelds!”

Ordener sighed deeply, while Ethel in her heart disclaimed her father’s assertion; and he fell back upon his bench, quivering with wrath.

“The court will decide for itself,” said the president.

Ordener, who, at Schumacker’s words, had silently cast down his eyes, seemed to awake:” Oh, hear me, noble judges! You are about to examine your consciences; do not forget that Ordener Gulclenlew is alone guilty; Schumacker is innocent. These other unfortunate men were deceived by my agent, Hacket. I did everything else.”

Kennybol interrupted him:” His worship says truly, judges, for it was he who undertook to bring Hans of Iceland to us; I only hope that name may not bring me ill luck. I know that it was this young man who ventured to seek him out in Walderhog cave, to persuade him to be our leader. He confided the secret of his undertaking to me in Surb village, at the house of my brother Braal. And for the rest, too, the young gentleman says truly; we were deceived by that confounded Hacket, whence it follows that we do not deserve death.”

“Mr. Secretary,” said the president, “ the hearing is ended. What are your conclusions?”

The secretary rose, bowed several times to the court, passed his finger under the folds of his lace band, without taking his eyes from the president’s face. At last he pronounced the following words in a dull, measured voice: “ Mr. President, most worthy judges! It is a true bill. Ordener Guldenlew, who has forever tarnished the glory of an illustrious name, has only succeeded in establishing his own guilt without proving the innocence of exchancellor Schumacker and his accomplices, Hans of Iceland, Wilfred Kennybol, Jonas, and Norbith. I require the court to declare the six prisoners guilty of the crime of high treason in the first degree.”

A vague murmur rose from the crowd. The president was about to dismiss the court, when the bishop asked for a brief hearing.

"Learned judges, it is proper that the prisoners' defence should be heard last. I could wish that they had a better advocate, for I am old and feeble, and have no other strength than that which proceeds from God. I am confounded at the secretary's severe sentence. There is no proof of my client Schumacker's crime. There is no evidence that he has had any direct share in the insurrection; and since my other client, Ordener Guldenlew, confesses that he made unlawful use of Schumacker's name, and moreover that he is the sole author of this damnable sedition, all evidence against Schumacker disappears; you should therefore acquit him. I recommend to your Christian indulgence the other prisoners, who were only led astray like the Good Shepherd's sheep; and even young Ordener Guldenlew, who has at least the merit, very great in the sight of God, of confessing his crime. Reflect, judges, that he is still at the age when a man may err, and even fall; but God does not refuse to support or to raise him up. Ordener Guldenlew bears scarce a fourth the burden of years which weigh down my head. Place in the balance of your judgment his youth and inexperience, and do not so soon deprive him of the life which the Lord has but lately given him."

The old man ceased, and took his place beside Ordener, who smiled; while at the invitation of the president, the judges rose from the bench, and silently crossed the threshold of the dread scene of their deliberations.

While a handful of men were deciding the fate of six fellow-beings within that terrible sanctuary, the prisoners remained motionless upon their seat between two files of halberdiers. Schumacker, his head on his breast, seemed absorbed in meditation. The giant stared to the right and left with stupid assurance; Jonas and Kennybol, with clasped hands, prayed in low tones, while their comrade, Norbith. stamped his foot or shook his chains with a convulsive start. Between him and the venerable bishop, who was reading the penitential psalms, sat Ordener, with folded arms and eyes lifted to heaven.

Behind them was the noise of the crowd, which swelled high when the judges left the room. The famous prisoner of Munkholm, the much-dreaded demon of Iceland, and above all the viceroy's son, were the objects of every thought, every speech, and every glance. The uproar, mingled with groans, laughter, and confused cries, rose and fell like a flame flickering in the wind.

Thus passed several hours of anxious expectation, so long that every one was astonished that they could be contained in a single night. From time to time a glance was cast toward the door of the anteroom; but there was nothing to be seen, save the two soldiers pacing to and fro with their glittering partisans before the fatal entrance, like two silent ghosts.

At last the lamps and torches began to burn dim, and the first pale rays of dawn were piercing the narrow windows of the room when the awful door opened. Profound silence instantly, and as if by magic, took the place of all the confusion; and the only sounds heard were the hurried breathing and the vague slight stir of the multitude in suspense.

The judges, proceeding slowly from the anteroom, resumed their places on the bench, the president at their head.

The private secretary, who had seemed absorbed in thought during their absence, bowed and said: "Mr. President, what sentence does the court, from whose decision there is no appeal, pronounce in the king's name? We are ready to hear it with religious respect,"

The judge, seated at the president's right hand, rose, holding a roll of parchment: " His Grace, our illustrious president, exhausted by the length of this session, has deigned to commission me, lord mayor of the province of Throndhjem, and the natural president of this worshipful court, to read in his stead the sentence pronounced in the name of the king. I am about to fulfil this honorable but painful duty, requesting the audience to hear the king's impeccable justice in silence."

The lord mayor's voice then assumed a grave and solemn intonation, and every heart beat faster.

"In the name of our revered master and lawful sovereign, King Christian, we, the judges of the Supreme Court of the province of Throndhjem, summoned to decide in the cases of John Schumacker, prisoner of the State; Wilfred Kennybol, native of the Kiölen Mountains; Jonas, royal miner; Norbith, royal miner; Hans of Klipstadur, in Iceland; and Ordener Guldenlew, Baron Thorwick, Knight of the Dannebrog, all accused of high treason and leze-majesty in the first degree (Hans of Iceland being moreover charged with the crimes of murder, arson, and robbery), do find:-

"I. That John Schumacker is not guilty;

"II. That Wilfred Kennybol, Jonas, and Norbith are guilty, but are recommended to mercy, because they were led astray;

"III. That Hans of Iceland is guilty of all the crimes laid to his charge;

“IV. That Ordener Guldeulew is guilty of high treason and leze-majesty in the first degree,”

The judge paused an instant as if to take breath. Ordener fixed upon him a look of celestial joy.

“John Schumacker,” resumed the judge, “ the court acquits you and remands you to prison;

“Kennybol, Jonas, and Norbith, the court commutes the penalty which you have incurred, to imprisonment for life, and a fine of one thousand crowns each;

“Hans of Klipstadur, murderer and incendiary, you will be taken this night to Munkholm parade-ground, and hanged by the neck until you are dead, dead, dead!

“Ordener Guldenlew, traitor, after having been stripped of your titles in presence of this court, you will be conducted this very night to the same place, with a lighted torch in your hand, and there your head shall be hewn off, your body burned, your ashes strewn to the winds, and your head exposed upon a stake. Let all withdraw. Such is the sentence rendered by the king’s justice.”

The lord mayor had scarcely ended these fatal words, when a shriek rang through the room. This shriek horrified the spectators even more than did the fearful terms of the death sentence; this shriek for a brief moment turned the calm and radiant face of the condemned Ordener pale.

CHAPTER XLIV BROTHERLY LOVE.

Misfortune made them equals.-
Charles Nodier.

All was over now; Ordener’s work was done. He had saved the father of the woman he loved; he had saved her too by preserving her father to protect her. The young man’s noble plot to save Schumacker’s life had succeeded; nothing else mattered now; it only remained for him to die.

Let those who deem him guilty or foolish judge the generous Ordener now, as he judges himself in his own soul with holy rapture. For it had been his one thought, when he entered the rebel ranks, that if he could not prevent Schumacker from carrying out his guilty purpose, he might at least help him to escape punishment by drawing it upon his own head.

“Alas! “he thought, “ Schumacker is undoubtedly guilty; but embittered as he is by misfortune and imprisonment, his crime is excusable. He sighs to be set free; he struggles to acquire his liberty, even by rebellion. Besides, what would become of my Ethel if her father were taken from her; if she should lose him by the gallows, if fresh disgrace should blast his name, what would become of her, helpless and unprotected, alone in her cell or roaming through a world of foes?” This thought determined him to make the sacrifice, and he joyfully prepared for it. It is a lover’s greatest happiness to lay down his life, I do not say for the life, but for a smile or a tear, of the loved object.

He was accordingly captured with the rebels, was dragged before the judges assembled to condemn Schumacker, his generous falsehood was uttered, he was sentenced, he must die a cruel death, suffer shameful torments, leave behind him a stained name; but what cared the noble youth? He had saved his Ethel’s father.

He sat chained in a damp dungeon, where light and air never entered save through dark holes; beside him was a supply of food for the remnant of his existence, a loaf of black bread and a jug of water; an iron collar weighed down his neck; iron fetters were about his hands and feet. Every hour that passed robbed him of a greater portion of his life than a year would bear away from other mortals. He was lost in a delicious dream.

"Perhaps my memory will not die with me, at least in one human heart. Perhaps she will deign to shed a tear in return for the blood I so freely shed for her; perhaps she will sometimes heave a sigh for him who sacrificed his life for her; perhaps in her virgin thoughts the dim image of her friend may sometimes appear. And who knows what lies behind the veil of death? Who knows if our souls, freed from their material prison, may not sometimes return to watch over the souls of those they love, and hold mysterious communion with those sweet companions still prisoned in the flesh, and in secret bring them angelic comfort and heavenly bliss?"

And yet bitter reflections would sometimes mingle with these consoling meditations. The hatred which Schumacker had expressed for him at the very moment of his self-sacrifice oppressed him. The agonized shriek which he had heard at the same instant with his death sentence had moved him deeply; for he alone, of all the assembly, recognized that voice and understood that misery. And should he never again see his Ethel? Must his last moments be passed within the self-same walls that contained her, and he be still unable to touch her soft hand once more, once more to hear the gentle voice of her for whom he was about to die?

He had yielded thus to those vague, sad musings which are to the mind what sleep is to the body, when the hoarse creak of rusty bolts struck harshly on his ear, already attuned to the music of the sphere to which he was so soon to take his flight. The heavy iron door grated upon its hinges. The young prisoner rose calmly, almost gladly, for he thought that the executioner had come for him, and he had already cast aside his life like the cloak beneath his feet.

He was mistaken. A slender white figure stood upon the threshold, like a radiant vision. Ordener doubted his own eyes, and wondered if he were not already in heaven. It was she; it was his Ethel."

The girl fell into his fettered embrac; she covered his hands with tears, and dried them with her long black hair. Kissing his chains, she bruised her pure lips upon those infamous irons; she did not speak, but her whole heart seemed ready to burst forth in the first word which might break through her sobs.

He felt the most celestial joy which he had known since his birth. He gently pressed his Ethel to his breast, and the combined powers of earth and hell could not at that moment have loosed the arms which encircled her. The knowledge of his approaching death lent a certain solemnity to his rapture; and he held his Ethel as close as if he had already taken possession of her for all eternity.

He did not ask this angel how she had gained access to him. She was there: could he waste a thought on anything else? Nor was he surprised. He never asked how this proscribed, feeble, lonely girl, in spite of triple doors of iron and triple ranks of soldiers, had contrived to open her own prison and that of her lover; it seemed to him quite simple; he had a perfect appreciation of the power of love.

Why speak with the voice when the soul can speak as readily? Why not allow the body to listen silently to the mysterious language of the spirit? Both were silent, because there are certain emotions which can find expression in silence only.

At last the young girl lifted her head from her lover's throbbing heart. "Ordener," said she, "I am here to save you;" and she uttered these words of hope with a pang.

Ordener smiled, and shook his head.

"To save me, Ethel! You deceive yourself; escape is impossible."

"Alas! I am but too well aware of that. This castle is crowded with soldiers, and every door is guarded by archers and jailers who never sleep." She added with an effort: " But I bring you another means of safety."

"No, no; your hope is vain. Do not delude yourself with idle fancies, Ethel; a few hours hence the axe will cruelly dispel them."

"Oh, do not say so, Ordener! You shall not die. Oh, spare me that dreadful thought! Or rather, no; let me behold it in all its horror, to give me strength to save you and sacrifice myself."

There was a strange expression in the young girl's voice.

Ordener gazed at her tenderly. "Sacrifice yourself! What do you mean?"

She hid her face in her hands, and sobbed almost inarticulately, "Oh, God!"

The struggle was brief; she overcame her emotion; her eyes sparkled, her lips wore a smile. She was as beautiful as an angel ascending from hell to heaven.

"Listen, my own Ordener: your scaffold shall never be reared. If you will but promise to marry Ulrica d'Ahlefeld, you may live."

"Ulrica d'Ahlefeld! That name from your lips, my Ethel!"

"Do not interrupt me,'' she continued, with the cairn of a martyr undergoing the last pang; "' I am sent here by Countess d'Ahlefeld. She promises to gain your pardon from the king, if in return you will agree to bestow your hand upon her daughter. I am here to obtain your oath to marry Ulrica and live for her. She chose me as her messenger because she thought that my voice might have some influence over you."

"Ethel," said the condemned man, in icy tones, " farewell! When you leave this cell, bid the hangman hasten his coming."

She rose, stood before him one moment, pale and trembling, then her knees gave way beneath her, and she sank to the stone floor with clasped hands.

"What have I done to him?" she muttered faintly.

Ordener silently fixed his eyes upon the flags.

"My lord," she said, dragging herself to him on her knees, " you do not answer me. Will you not speak to me once more? Then there is nothing left for me but to die."

A tear stood in the young man's eye.

"Ethel, you no longer love me."

"Oh, God!" cried the poor girl, clasping his knees. "No longer love you! You say that I no longer love yon, Ordener I did you really say those words?"

"You no longer love me, for you despise me."

He repented these cruel words as soon as he had uttered them; for Ethel's tone was heart-rending, as she threw her adored arms around his neck, and exclaimed in a voice broken by tears: "Forgive me, my beloved Ordener; forgive me as I forgive you. I despise you! Great heavens! Are you not my pride, my idol, my all? Tell me, was there aught in my words but deep love and ardent adoration? Alas! your stern language wounds me sorely, when I came here to save you, my idolized Ordener, by sacrificing my whole life for yours."

"Well," replied the young man, softened by her tears, and kissing them away, " was it not a want of esteem to suppose that I would buy my life by forsaking you, by basely renouncing my oaths, by sacrificing my love?" He added, fixing his eye on Ethel: "My love, for which I am about to shed my blood! "

Ethel uttered a deep groan as she answered: " Hear me, Ordener, before you judge me so rashly. Perhaps I have more strength than usually falls to the lot of a weak woman. From our lofty prison window I saw them build your scaffold on the parade. Ordener, you do not know what fearful agony it is to see the slow preparations for the death of one whose life is an indissoluble part of your own! Countess d'Ahlefeld, at whose side I sat when I heard the judge pronounce your death sentence, came to the cell to which I had returned with my father. She asked me if I would save you; she proposed this hateful means. Ordener, my poor happiness must perish; I must give you up, renounce you forever; yield to another my Ordener, poor lonely Ethel's only joy, or deliver you to the executioner. They bid me choose between my own misery and your death. I cannot hesitate."

He kissed this angel's hand with respectful worship.

"Neither do I hesitate, Ethel. You would not offer me life with Ulrica d'Ahlefeld's hand if you knew why I die."

"What? What secret mystery -"

"Let me keep this one secret from you, my beloved Ethel. I must die without letting you know whether you owe me gratitude or hatred for my death."

"You must die! Must you then die? Oh, God! it is but too true, and the scaffold stands ready even now; and no human power can save my Ordener, whom they will slay! Tell me, cast one look upon your slave, your wife, and tell me, promise me, beloved Ordener, that you will listen to me without anger. Are you very sure answer me as you would answer to God that you could not be happy with that woman, that Ulrica d'Ahlefeld? Are you very sure, Ordener? Perhaps she is, she surely is, handsome, amiable, virtuous. She is far superior to her for whom you perish. Do not turn away your head, dear friend, dear Ordener. You are so noble and so young to mount the scaffold. Think! you might live with her in some gay city where you would lose all memory of this fatal dungeon; your days would flow by peacefully, without a thought of me. I consent, you may drive me from your heart, erase my image from your thoughts, Ordener. Only live! Leave me here alone: let me be the one to die. And believe me, when I know that you are in the arms of another, you need not fear for me; I shall not suffer long."

She paused; her voice was drowned in tears. Still her grief-stricken countenance was radiant with her longing to win the ill-omened victory which must be her death.

Ordener said: " No more of this, Ethel. Let no name but yours and mine pass our lips at such a moment."

"Alas! alas!" she replied, " then you persist in dying?"

"I must. I shall go to the scaffold gladly for your sake; I should go to the altar with any other woman with horror and aversion. Say no more; you wound and distress me."

She wept, and murmured: "He will die, oh, God, a death of infamy!"

The condemned man answered with a smile: "Believe me, Ethel, there is less dishonor in my death than in such a life as you propose."

At this instant his eye, glancing away from his weeping Ethel, observed an old man in clerical dress standing in the shadow under the low, arched door. " What do you want? " said he, hastily.

"My lord, I came with the Countess d'Ahlefeld's messenger. You did not see me, and I waited silently until you should notice me."

In fact, Ordener had eyes for Ethel only; and she, at the sight of Ordener, had forgotten her companion.

"I am," continued the old man, " the minister whose duty it is "

"I understand," said the young man; " I am ready."

The minister advanced toward him.

"God is also ready to receive you, my son."

"Sir," said Ortdener, " your face is not unknown to mine; I must have seen you elsewhere."

The minister bowed. "I too recognize you, my son; we met in Vygla tower. We both proved upon that occasion the fallibility of human words. You promised me the pardon of twelve unhappy prisoners, and I put no faith in your promise, being unable to guess that you were the viceroy's son; and you, my lord, who reckoned upon your power and your rank when you made me that promise "

Ordener finished the thought which Athanasius Munder dared not put into words.

"Cannot now obtain pardon even for myself. You are right, sir. I had too little reverence for the future, it has punished me by showing me that its power is greater than mine."

The minister bent his head. "God is great!" said he.

Then he raised his kind eyes to Ordener, adding, "God is good!"

Ordener, who seemed preoccupied, exclaimed, after a brief pause:" Listen, sir; I will keep the promise which I made you in Vygla tower. When I am dead, go to Bergen, seek out my father, the viceroy of Norway, and tell him that the last favor which his son asks of him is to pardon your twelve protégés. He will grant it, I am sure."

A tear of emotion moistened the wrinkled cheek of Athanasius.

“My son, your soul must be filled with noble thoughts, if in the self-same hour you can reject your own pardon and generously implore that of others. For I heard your refusal; and although I blame such dangerous and inordinate affection, I was deeply touched by it. Now I ask myself, unde scelus? how could a man who approaches so near to the model of true justice soil his conscience with the crime for which you are condemned?”

“Father, I did not tell my secret to this angel; I cannot reveal it to you. But believe that I am not condemned for any crime of mine.”

“What? Explain yourself, my son!”

“Do not urge me,” firmly answered the young man. “ Let me take my secret with me to the grave.”

“This man cannot be guilty,” muttered the minister.

Then drawing from his breast a black crucifix, he placed it on a sort of altar rudely shaped from a granite slab resting against the damp prison wall. Beside the crucifix he laid a small lighted lamp which he had brought with him, and an open Bible. “My son, meditate and pray; I will return a few hours hence. Come,” he added, turning to Ethel, who during this conversation had preserved a solemn silence, “we must leave the prisoner. Our time has passed.”

She rose, calm and radiant; a divine spark flashed from her eyes as she said: “ Sir, I cannot go yet; you must first unite Ethel Schumacker to her husband, Ordener Guldenlew.”

She looked at Ordener.

“If you were still free, happy, and powerful, my Ordener, I should weep, and I should shrink from linking my fatal destiny with yours. But now that you need no longer dread the contagion of my misfortune; that you, like me, are a captive, disgraced and oppressed; now that you are about to die, I come to you, hoping that you will at least deign, Ordener, my lord and husband, to allow her who could never have shared your life, to be your companion in death; for you love me too much, do you not, to doubt for an instant that I shall die with you?”

The prisoner fell at her feet, and kissed the hem of her gown.

“You, old man,” she resumed, “ must take the place of family and parents. This cell shall be our temple, this stone our altar. Here is my ring; we kneel before God and before you. Bless us, and pronounce the sacred words which shall unite Ethel Schumacker and Ordener Guldenlew, her lord.”

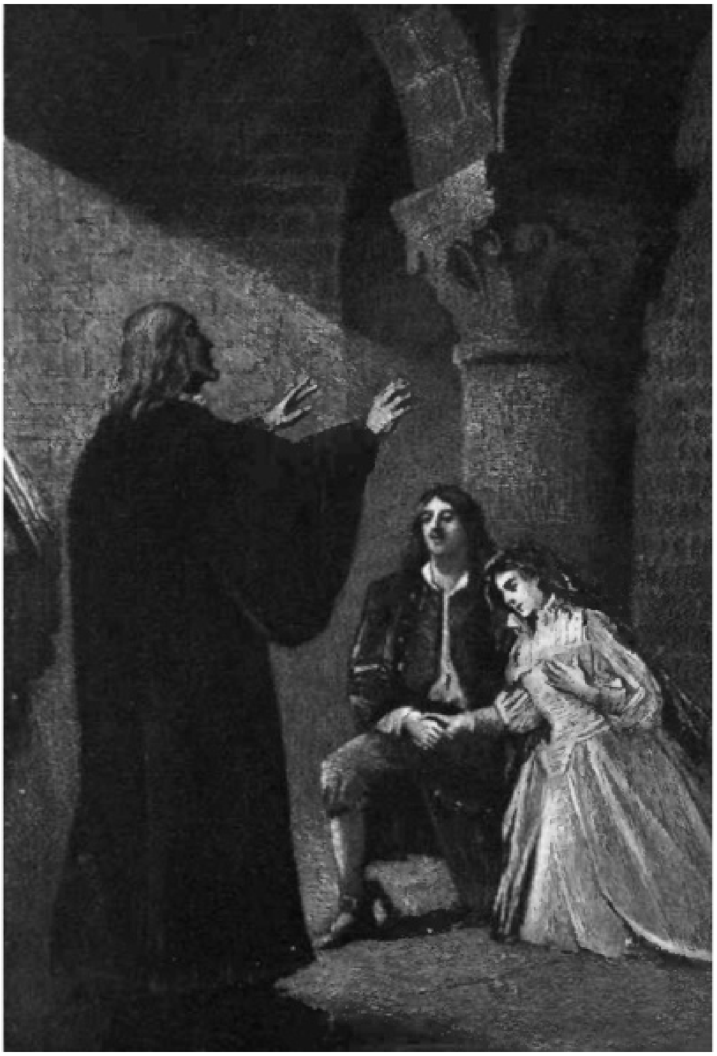
And they knelt together before the priest, who regarded them with mingled astonishment and pity.

“How, my children! What would you do?”

“Father,” said the girl, “time presses. God and death wait for us.”

In this life we sometimes meet with irresistible powers, supreme wills to which we yield instantly as if they were more than human. The priest raised his eyes, sighing: “ May the Lord forgive me if I do wrong! You love each other; you have but little time to love on earth. I do not think I shall fail in my allegiance to God if I legalize your love.”

The sweet and solemn ceremony was performed. With the final blessing of the priest, they rose a wedded pair.



They rose a wedded Pair

The prisoner’s face beamed with painful joy; he seemed for the first time conscious of the bitterness of death, now that he realized the sweetness of life. The features of his companion were sublime in their expression of grandeur and simplicity; she still felt the modesty of a maiden, and already exulted as a young wife.

“Hear me, Ordener,” said she: “is it not fortunate that we must die, since we could never have been united in life? Do you know, love, what I will do? I will stand at the window of my cell, where I can see you mount the scaffold, so that our spirits may wing their flight to heaven together. If I should die before the axe falls, I will wait for you; for we are husband and wife, niy adored Ordener, and this night our coffin shall be our bridal bed.”

He pressed her to his throbbing heart, and could only utter these words, which for him summed up all human happiness: “Ethel, you are mine!”

“My children,” said the chaplain, in a broken voice, “say farewell; it is time.”

“Alas! “ cried Ethel.

All her angelic strength returned, and she knelt before the prisoner: “Farewell, my beloved Ordener! My lord, give me your blessing.”

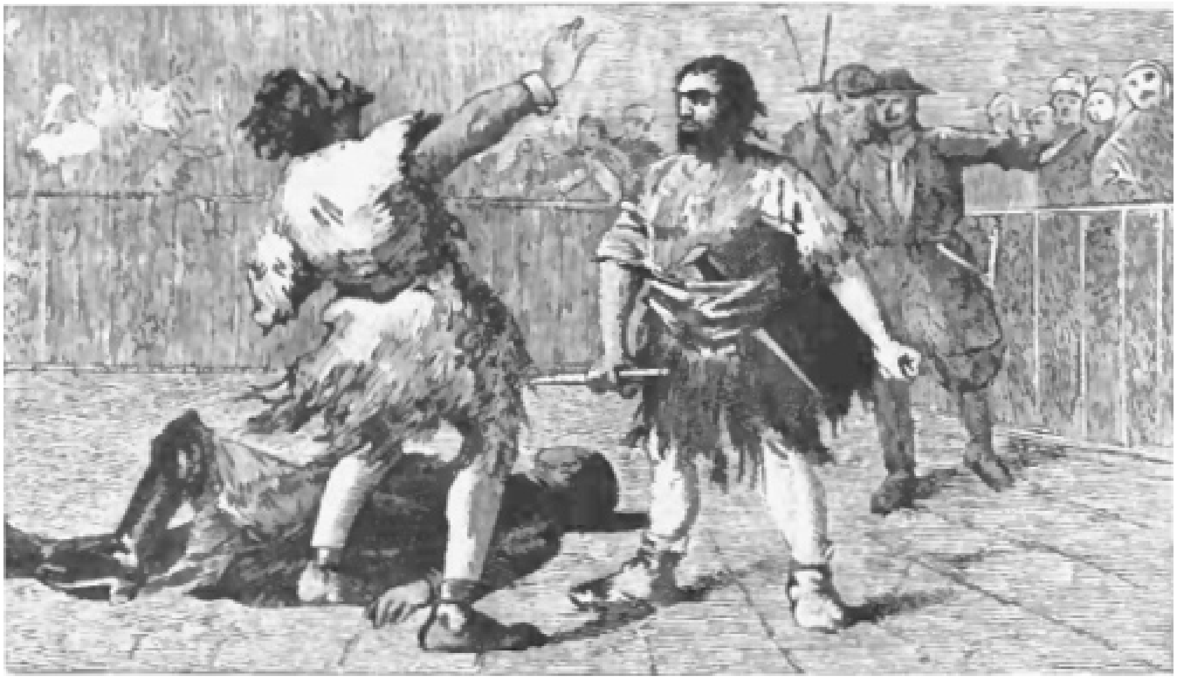
The prisoner yielded to this touching request, then turned to take leave of the venerable Athanasius Munder. The old man was kneeling at his feet.

“What do you wish, father? “ he asked in surprise.

The old man gazed at him with sweet humility: “Your blessing, my son.”

“May Heaven bless you, and grant you all the happiness which your prayers call down upon your brother men!” replied Ordener, in touched and solemn tones.

Soon the sepulchral arches heard their last kisses and their last farewells; soon the rude bolts creaked noisily into place, and the iron door separated the youthful pair who were to die, only to meet again in eternity.



He plunged a Dagger in the Soldier’s Heart

CHAPTER XLV STRICT JUSTICE.

I will give two thousand crowns to any man who shall deliver over to me Louis Perez, dead or alive.-Calderon: Louis Perez of Galicia.

Baron Vœthaün, colonel of the Munkholm musketeers, which of the men who fought under your command at Black Pillar Pass took Hans of Iceland prisoner? Name him to the court, that he may receive the thousand crowns reward offered for the capture.”

The president of the court thus addressed the colonel of musketeers. The court was in session; for according to old Norwegian custom, a court from whose sentence there is no appeal cannot adjourn until the sentence has been carried out. Before the judges stood the giant, who had just been led in again, with the rope round his neck from which he was soon to hang.

The colonel, seated at the table with the private secretary, rose and bowed to the court and to the bishop, who had reascended his throne.

“My lord judges, the soldier who captured Hans of Iceland is present. His name is Toric-Belfast, second musketeer of my regiment.”

“Let him stand forth,” replied the president, “ and receive the promised reward.”

A young soldier in the Munkholm uniform stepped forward.

“You are Toric-Belfast?” asked the president.

“Yes, your worship.”

“It was you who took Hans of Iceland prisoner?”

“Yes, by the aid of Saint Beelzebub, I did, please your worship.”

A heavy bag of money was placed before the bench.

“Do you recognize this man as the famous Hans of Iceland?” added the president, pointing to the fettered giant.

“I am better acquainted with my Kitty’s pretty face than with that of Hans of Iceland; but I declare, by the halo of Saint Belphegor, that if Hans of Iceland be anywhere, it is in the shape of that big devil.”

“Advance, Toric-Belfast,” said the president. “Here are the thousand crowns offered by the lord mayor.”

The soldier hurried toward the bench, when a voice rose from the crowd: “Munkholm musketeer, you never captured Hans of Iceland.”

“By all the blessed devils!” cried the soldier, turning around, “I own nothing but my pipe and the moment of time in which I speak; but still I promise to give ten thousand gold crowns to the man who says that, if he can prove his words.”

And folding his arms, he cast an assured glance over the audience: “Well! let the man who spoke, show himself.”

“It is I!” said a small man, elbowing his way through the crowd.

The new-comer was wrapped in sealskin, like a Greenlander, his outlandish garb hanging stiffly about him. His beard was black; and thick hair of the same color, falling over his red eyebrows, concealed a hideous face. Neither his hands nor his arms were visible.

“Oh, it is you, is it?” said the soldier, with a loud laugh. “And who, then, do you say it was, my fine gentleman, that had the honor of capturing that infernal giant?”

The little man shook his head, and said with a malicious smile:” It was I.”

At this instant Baron Vœthaün fancied that he recognized the mysterious being who had warned him at Skongen of the arrival of the rebels; Chancellor d’ Ahlefeld thought he recognized his host at Arbar ruin; and the private secretary, a certain peasant from Oëlmœ, who wore a similar dress, and who had pointed out the lair of Hans of Iceland. But the three being separated, they could not impart to one another this fleeting impression, which the differences ot feature and costume, afterward observed, must have soon dissipated.

“Indeed! it was you, was it? “ ironically observed the soldier. “ If it were not for your Greenland seal’s costume, by the look which you cast at me, I should be tempted to take you for another ridiculous dwarf, who tried to pick a quarrel with me at the Spladgest, a fortnight or so ago. It was the very day that they brought in the body of Gill Stadt, the miner.” “ Gill Stadt! “ broke in the little man, with a shudder. “ Yes, Gill Stadt!” repeated the soldier, with an air of indifference, “ the rejected lover of a girl who was sweetheart to a comrade of mine, and for whose sake he died, like the fool that he was.”

The little man said in hollow tones: “Was there not also the body of an officer of your regiment at the Spladgest? “

“Exactly; I shall remember that day as long as I live. I forgot that it was the hour for the tattoo, and I was arrested when I got back to the fort. That officer was Captain Dispolsen.”

At this name the private secretary rose.

“These two fellows abuse the patience of the court. We beg the president to cut short this idle chatter.”

“By my Kitty’s good name ‘I ask nothing better,” said Toric-Belfast, “ provided your worships will give me the thousand crowns offered for the head of Hans, for it was I who took him prisoner.”

“You lie! “cried the little man.

The soldier clapped his hand to his sword: “It is very lucky for you, you rascal, that we are in the presence of the court, where a soldier, even a Munkholm musketeer, must never resort to force.”

“The reward,” coldly observed the little man, “belongs to me; for if it were not for me, you would never have won Hans of Iceland’s head.”

The indignant soldier swore that it was he who captured Hans of Iceland, when, wounded on the field of battle, he was just beginning to revive.

“Well,” said his opponent, “you may have captured him, but it was I who struck him down. If it had not been for me, you could never have taken him prisoner; therefore the thousand crowns are mine.”

“It is false,” replied the soldier. “ It was not you who struck him down; it was an evil spirit, clad in the skins of wild beasts.”

“It was I”

“No, no!”

The president ordered both parties to be silent; then, again asking Colonel Vœthaün whether it was really Toric- Belfast who brought Hans of Iceland into camp a prisoner, at his assent he declared that the prize belonged to the soldier.

The small man gnashed his teeth, and the musketeer greedily stretched out his hands for the sack. “ One moment!” cried the little man. “Mr. President, that money, according to the lord mayor’s proclamation, was to be given to him who took Hans of Iceland.”

“Well “ said the judge.

The little man turned to the giant: “That man is not Hans of Iceland.”

A murmur of surprise ran through the room. The president and private secretary moved uneasily in their chairs.

“No!” emphatically reiterated the small man, “ the money does not belong to the cursed musketeer of Munkholm, for that man is not Hans of Iceland.”

“Halberdiers,” said the president, “remove this madman; he has lost his senses.”

The bishop interposed: “ Will you allow me, most worthy President, to remark that you may, by refusing to hear this man, destroy the prisoner’s last chance? I demand that he be confronted with the stranger.”

“Reverend Bishop, the court will grant your request,” replied the president; and addressing the giant: “ You have declared yourself to be Hans of Iceland; do you persist in that statement?”

The prisoner answered: “I do; I am Hans of Iceland.”

“You hear, Bishop?”

The little man shouted in the same breath with the president: “You lie, mountaineer of Kiölen! you lie! Do not persist in bearing a name which must crush you; remember that it has been fatal to you already.”

“I am Hans from Klipstadur, in Iceland,” repeated the giant, his eye riveted on the private secretary.

The small man approached the Munkholm soldier, who, like the rest of the audience, had watched this scene with eager curiosity.

“Mountaineer of Kiölen,” he cried, “they say that Hans of Iceland drinks human blood. If you be he, drink. Here it is.”

And scarcely were the words out of his mouth, when, tossing his sealskin mantle over his shoulder, he plunged a dagger into the soldier’s heart, and flung his dead body at the giant’s feet.

A cry of fright and horror followed; the soldiers guarding the giant started back. The small man, swift as lightning, rushed upon the defenceless mountaineer, and with another blow of his dagger, laid him upon the first corpse. Then flinging off his cloak, his false hair, and black beard, he revealed his wiry limbs, hideously attired in the skins of wild beasts, and a face which inspired the beholders with even greater horror than did the bloody dagger which he brandished aloft, reeking with a double murder.

“Ha! judges, where is Hans of Iceland now?”

“Guards, seize that monster! “ cried the startled judge.

Hans hurled his dagger into the centre of the room.

“It is useless to me if there are no more Munkholm soldiers here.”

With these words, he yielded unresistingly to the halberdiers and bowmen who surrounded him, prepared to lay siege to him, as to a city. They chained the monster to the prisoner’s bench; and a litter bore away his victims, one of whom, the mountaineer, still breathed.

It is impossible to describe the various emotions of terror, astonishment, and indignation which, during this fearful scene, agitated the people, the guards, and the judges. When the brigand had taken his place, calm and unmoved, upon the fatal bench, a feeling of curiosity overcame every other impression, and breathless attention restored quiet.

The venerable bishop rose: “My lord judges”

The bandit interrupted him: “Bishop of Throndhjem, I am Hans of Iceland do not take the trouble to plead for me.”

The private secretary rose: “ Noble President -

The monster cut him short: “Private Secretary, I am Hans of Iceland; do not take the pains to accuse me.”

Then, his feet in a pool of blood, he ran his bold, fierce eye over the court, the bowmen, and the crowd; and it seemed as if each of them trembled witli fear at the glance of that one man, unarmed, chained, and alone.

“Listen, judges; expect no long speeches from me. I am the demon of Klipstadur. My mother was old Iceland, the land of volcanoes. Once that land was but one huge mountain; it was crushed by the hand of a giant, who fell from heaven, and rested on its highest peak. I need not speak of myself. I am a descendant of Ingulf the Destroyer, and I bear his spirit within me. I have committed more murders and kindled more fires than all of you put together ever uttered unjust sentences in your lives. I have secrets in common with Chancellor d’Ahlefeld. I could drink every drop of blood that flows in your veins with delight. It is my nature to hate mankind, my mission to harm them. Colonel of the Munkholin musketeers, it was I who warned you of the march of the miners through Black Pillar Pass, sure that you would kill numbers of men in those gorges; it was I who destroyed a whole battalion of your regiment by hurling granite bowlders upon their heads. I did it to avenge my son. Now, judges, my son is dead; I came here in search of death. The soul of Ingulf oppresses me, because I must bear it alone, and can never transmit it to an heir. I am tired of life, since it can no longer be an example and a lesson to a successor. I have drunk enough blood; my thirst is quenched. Now, here I am; you may drink mine.”

He was silent, and every voice repeated his awful words.

The bishop said: “My son, what was your object in committing so many crimes?”

The brigand laughed: “I’ faith, I swear, reverend Bishop it was not like your brother, the bishop of Borglum, with a view to enrich myself. There was something in me which drove me to it.” God does not always dwell in his ministers,” meekly replied the saintly old man. “ You would insult me, but I only wish I could defend you.”

Your reverence wastes his breath. Go ask your other brother, the bishop of Scalholt in Iceland, to defend me. By Ingulf! it is a strange thing that two bishops should protect me,- one in my cradle, the other at my tomb. Bishop, you are an old fool.

“My son, do you believe in God?”

“Why not? There must be a God for us to blaspheme.”

“Cease unhappy man! You are about to die, and will not kiss the feet of Christ-”

Hans of Iceland shrugged his shoulders.

“If I did so, it would be after the fashion of the constable of Roll, who pulled the king over as he kissed his foot.”

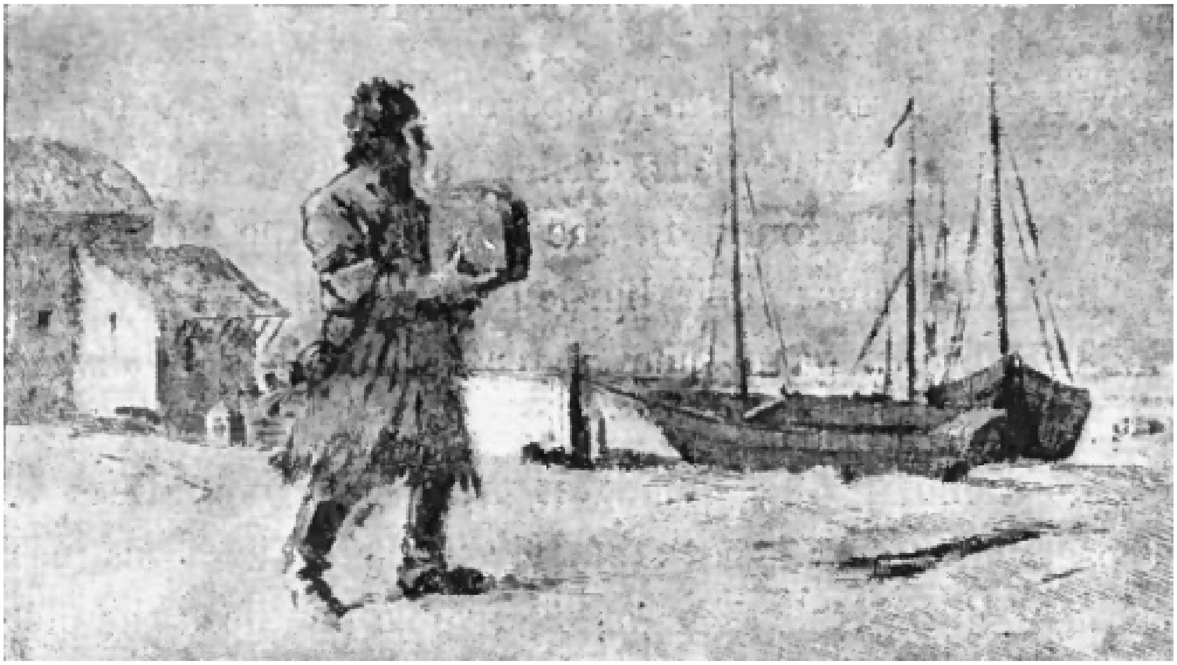
The bishop seated himself, deeply moved.

“Come, judges,” continued Hans of Iceland, “ why this delay? If I were in your place and you in mine, I would not keep you waiting so long for your death sentence.”

The court withdrew. After a brief deliberation they returned, and the president read aloud the sentence, which declared that Hans of Iceland was to be “ hung by the neck until he was dead, dead, dead.”

“That’s good,” said the brigand. “Chancellor d’Ahlefeld, I know enough about you to obtain a like sentence for you. But live, since you do naught but injure men. Oh, I am sure now that I shall not go to Nistheim! “ The private secretary ordered the guards who led him away to place him in the Lion of Schleswig tower, until a dungeon could be prepared for him in the quarters of the Munkholm regiment, where he might await his execution.

“In the quarters of the Munkholm musketeers!” repeated the monster, with a growl of pleasure.



Oglypiglap taking the Box to the Bishop

CHAPTER XLVI THOUGH LOST TO SIGHT, TO MEMORY DEAR.

However, the corpse of Ponce de Leon, which had remained beside the fountain, having been disfigured by the sun, the Moors of Alpuxares took possession of it and bore it to Grenada.-
É. H.: The Captive of Ochali.

Before dawn of the day so many of whose events we have already traced, at the very hour when Ordener’s sentence was pronounced at Munkholm, the new keeper of the Throndhjem Spladgest, Benignus Spiagudry’s former assistant and present successor, Oglypiglap, was abruptly aroused from his mattress by a violent series of raps, which fairly shook the building. He rose reluc- tantly, took his copper lamp, whose dim light dazzled his drowsy eyes, and went, swearing at the dampness of the dead-house, to open to those who waked him so early from his sleep.

They were fishers from Sparbo, who carried upon a litter, strewed with reeds, rushes, and seaweed, a corpse which they had found in the waters of the lake.

They laid down their burden within the gloomy walls, and Oglypiglap gave them a receipt for it, so that they might claim their fee.

Left alone in the Spladgest, he began to undress the corpse, which was remarkable for its length and leanness. The first thing which caught his eye as he raised the cloth which covered it was a vast periwig.

“Why, really,” said he, “ this outlandish wig has passed through my hands before; it belonged to that young French dandy. . . . And,” he added, continuing his investigations, “ here are the high boots of poor postilion Cramner, who was killed by his horses, and- What the devil does this mean? the full black suit of Professor Syngramtax, that learned old fogy, who drowned himself not long ago! Who can this new-comer be that comes here clad in the cast-off apparel of all my ancient acquaintance?”

He examined the face of the dead by the light of his lamp, but in vain; the features, already decomposed, had lost their original shape and color. He felt in the pockets, and drew out some scraps of parchment soaked with water and stained with mud; he wiped them carefully on his leather apron, and succeeded in deciphering on one of them these disconnected and half-effaced phrases:” Rudbeck, Saxon the grammarian. Arngrimmsson, bishop of Holum.- There are but two counties in Norway, Larvig and Jarlsberg, and but one barony.- Silver mines exist only at Kongsberg; loadstone and asbestos, at Sund-Moer; amethyst, at Guldbrandsdal; chalcedony, agate, and jasper, at the Färöe Islands. At Noukahiva, in time of famine, men eat their wives and children.- Thormodr Torfusson; Isleif, bishop of Scalholt, first historian of Iceland. Mercury played at chess with the Moon, and won the seventy-second part of a day. Maëlstrom, whirlpool.- Hirundo, hirudo.- Cicero, chick pea; glory. The learned Frode. Odin consulted the head of Mimer, the wise. (Mahomet and his dove, Sertorius and his hind.) The more the soil- the less gypsum it contains “

“I can scarcely believe my eyes!” he cried, dropping the parchment; “ it is the writing of my old master, Beniguus Spiagudry!”

Then, examining the corpse afresh, he recognized the long lean hands, the scanty hair, and the whole build of the unfortunate man.

“They were not so much out of the way, after all,” thought he, shaking his head, “ who charged him with sacrilege and necromancy. The Devil carried him off to drown him in Lake Sparbo. What poor fools we mortals be! Who would ever have thought that Dr. Spiagudry, after taking so many people to board in his hostelry of the dead, would come here at last from afar to be cared for himself!”

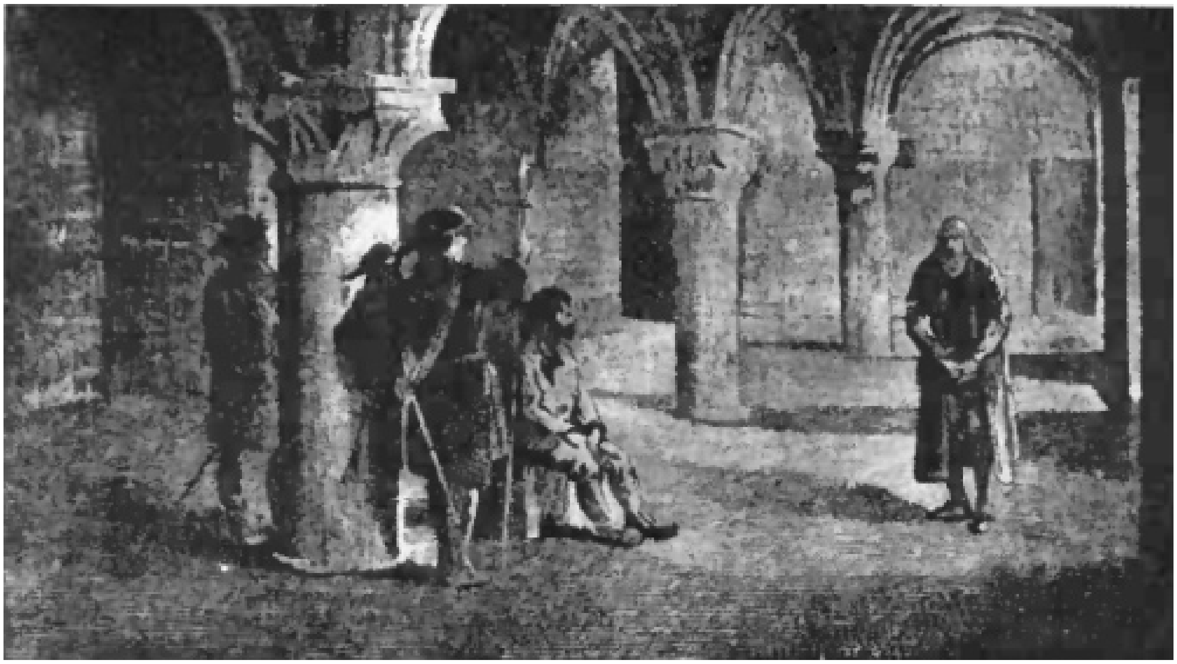
The little Lapp philosopher lifted the body, to remove it to one of his six granite beds, when he found that something heavy was fastened about the unhappy Spiagudry’s neck by a leather cord.

“Probably the stone with which the Devil pitched him into the lake,” he muttered.

He was mistaken; it was a small iron box, upon which, on examining it closely, after wiping it carefully, he discovered a large shield-shaped padlock.

“Of course there is some deviltry in this box,” said he; “ the man was a sacrilegious sorcerer. I will hand it over to the bishop; it may contain an evil spirit.”

Then, taking it from the corpse, which he placed in the inner room, he hurried away to the bishop’s palace, muttering a prayer as he went, as a charm against the dreadful box under his arm.



Schumacker and Hans of Iceland in Prison

CHAPTER XLVII

Is it a man or an infernal spirit that speaks thus? What mischievous spirit torments thee thus? Show me the relentless foe who inhabits thy heart.

Maturin.

Hans of Iceland and Schumacker were in the same cell in the Schleswig tower. The acquitted exchancellor paced slowly to and fro, his eyes heavy with bitter tears; the condemned brigand laughed at his chains, though surrounded by guards.

The two prisoners studied each other long and silently; it seemed as if both felt themselves and mutually recognized each other as enemies of mankind.

“Who are you?” at length asked the exchancellor.

“I will tell you my name,” replied the bandit, “to make you shun me. I am Hans of Iceland.”

Schumacker advanced toward him.

“Take my hand,” said he.

“Do you wish me to devour it?”

“Hans of Iceland,” rejoined Schumacker, “ I like you because you hate mankind.”

“And for that reason I hate you.”

“Hark ye, I hate men, as you do, because they have returned me evil for good.”

“You do not hate them as I do; I hate them because they have returned me good for evil.”

Schumacker shuddered at the monster’s expression. In vain he conquered his natural disposition; he could not sympathize with this fiend.

“Yes,” he exclaimed, “‘ I abhor men because they are false, ungrateful, cruel. I owe to them all the misery of my life.”

“So much the better! I owe them all the pleasure of mine.”

“What pleasure?”

“The pleasure of feeling their quivering flesh throb beneath my teeth, their hot blood moisten my parched throat; the rapture of crushing living beings against sharp rocks, and hearing the shriek of my victims mingle with the sound of their breaking limbs. These are the pleasures which I owe to men.”

Schumacker shrank in horror from the monster whom he had approached with something like pride in his resemblance to him. Pierced with shame, he hid his wrinkled face in his hands; for his eyes were full of tears of anger, not against mankind, but against himself. His great and noble heart began to revolt at the hatred he had so long cherished, when he saw it reflected in Hans of Iceland's heart as in a fearful mirror.

"Well," said the monster, with a sneer, "well, enemy of man, dare you boast your likeness to me?"

The old man shuddered." Oh, God! Rather than hate mankind as you do, let me love them."

Guards came to remove the monster to a more secure cell. Schumacker was left alone in his dungeon to dream; but he was no longer the enemy of mankind.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Keep me, Lord, from the hands of the wicked;
Preserve me from the violent man;
Who have purposed to thrust aside my step.
The proud have hid a snare for me, and cords;
They have spread a net by the wayside;
They have set gins for me.
Psalms cxl. 4.

The fatal hour had come; the sun showed but half his disk above the horizon. The guards were doubled throughout Munkholm castle; before each door paced fierce, silent sentinels. The noises of the town seemed louder and more confused than usual as they ascended to the dark towers of the fortress, itself a prey to strange excitement. The mournful sound of muffled drums was heard in every courtyard; now and again cannon growled; the heavy bell in the donjon tolled slowly, with sullen, measured strokes; and from every direction boats loaded with people hastened toward the fearful rock.

A scaffold hung with black, around which an impatient mob swarmed in ever-increasing numbers, rose from the castle parade-ground in the centre of a hollow square of troops. Upon the scaffold a man clad in red serge walked up and down, now leaning upon the axe in his hand, and now fingering a billet and block upon the funeral platform. Close at hand a stake was prepared, before which several pitch torches burned. Between the scaffold and the stake was planted a post, from which hung the inscription:

“ORDENER GULDENLEW, TRAITOR.”

A black flag floated from the top of the Schleswig tower.

At this moment Ordener appeared before the judges, still assembled in the court-room. The bishop alone was absent; his office as counsel for the defence had ended.

The son of the viceroy was dressed in black, and wore upon his neck the collar of the Dannebrog. His face was pale but proud. He was alone; for he had been led forth to torture before Chaplain Athanasius Munder returned to his cell.

Ordener’s sacrifice was already inwardly accomplished. And yet Ethel’s husband still clung to life, and might perhaps have chosen another night than that of the tomb for his wedding night. He had prayed and dreamed many dreams in his dreary cell. Now he was beyond all prayers and all dreams. He was strong in the strength imparted by religion and by love.

The crowd, more deeply moved than the prisoner, eagerly gazed at him. His illustrious rank, his horrible fate, awakened universal envy and pity. Every spectator watched his punishment, without comprehending his crime. In every human heart lurks a strange feeling which urges its owner to behold the tortures of others as well as their pleasures. Men seek with awful avidity to read destruction upon the distorted features of one who is about to die, as if some revelation from heaven or from  Hell or that death would cast it's shadow over him. They go to see how a man can look when all hope is fled all hope has fled -this being, full of strength and health, who breathes and lives like themselves, yet who in a few short moments will cease to breathe, to live. He has never injured them, and they pity him; but none will venture to help the unfortunate wretch, now on the verge of death, without being permitted the final gasp, and who is shortly to be struck off at a single blow- this life, which society cannot give, yet ruthlessly takes away, with all the pomp of judicial murder, tending only to inflame the imagination of the spectators.

Time, with its indefinite delays, condemns us all to death, yet it is a strange and grievous sight to watch the unfortunate being who knows his hour is nigh.

Ordener was brought into court that he might be stripped of his rank and honors, previous to mounting the scaffold.

The assembly was scarcely restored to calmness, when the president, commanding that a respectful silence should be maintained, ordered the condemned man to remain before him on bended knee, while he read in a clear, distinct tone the following words from the archives of the Knights of the Dannebrog:

"Christian, by the grace of Almighty God, King of Denmark, Norway, the Vandals and the Goths; Duke of Sleswig, Holstein, Storrmarie, and of Dytmarsa; Count of Oldenburg and of Delmenhurst; also on the proposition of the grand chancellor, created Count of Griffenfeld (here the president spoke so rapidly that the name was scarcely heard), Knight of the royal Order of the Dannebrog, founded by our illustrious ancestor, Saint Waldemar, in memory of the Dannebrog standard, which came direct from heaven to our blessed kingdom. It would be against the precepts of this Divine order if one of its knights were allowed to abuse with impunity the honor and holy laws, both of Church and State. “We order that any knight of the order, who has given his soul to the devil by means of felony or treachery, shall kneel in God’s presence, and in that position to be publicly censured by a judge, and then forever degraded of his rank as Knight of our royal Order of Dannebrog.”

Here the president closed the book.

“Ordener Guldenlew, Baron of Thorwick, Knight of Dannebrog, you have been guilty of high treason, a crime for which your head is to be severed, your body burned, and your ashes cast to the winds. Ordener Guldenlew, traitor, you have rendered yourself unworthy to rank amid the Knights of Dannebrog; therefore prepare yourself, for I am about to publicly degrade you in the name of the king.” Resting his hand on the book, the president was going to pronounce the fatal formula on Ordener, who still remained calm and unmoved, when a door to the right of the bench was thrown open, and an usher announced his reverence the Bishop of the Drontheimhus.

An officer of the Church entered and announced his reverence, the Bishop of Throndhjem. He entered hurriedly, accompanied by another ecclesiastic, on whose arm he leaned.

“Stop, Mr. President!” he exclaimed with a strength of which a man of his age seemed hardly capable.” Stop! Heaven be praised! I am in time.”

The audience listened with renewed interest, foreseeing some fresh development. The president turned angrily to the bishop:” Allow me to inform your reverence that your presence here is wholly unnecessary. The court is about to degrade from his rank the prisoner, who will suffer the penalty of his crime directly.”

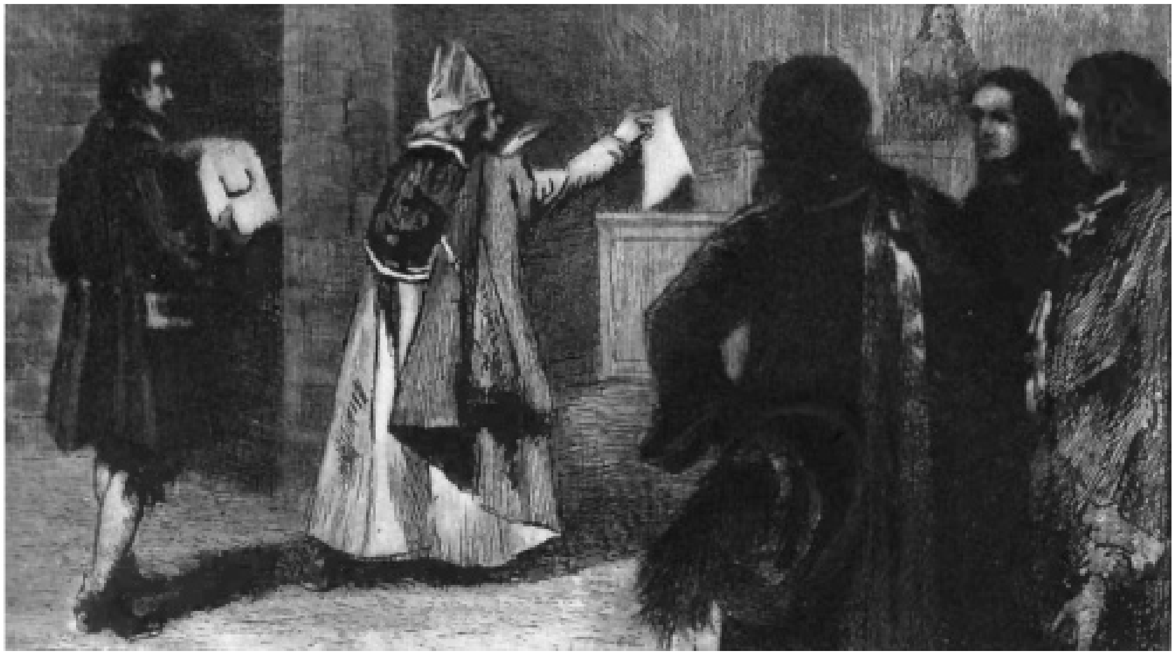
“Forbear,” said the bishop, “ to lay hands on one who is pure in the sight of God. The prisoner is innocent.”

The cry of astonishment which burst from the spectators was only matched by the cry of terror uttered by the president and private secretary.

“Yes, tremble, judges!” resumed the bishop, before the president could recover his usual presence of mind; “ tremble! for you are about to shed innocent blood.”

As the president’s agitation died away, Ordener arose in consternation. The noble youth feared lest his generous ruse had been discovered, and proofs of Schumacker’s guilt had been found.

"Bishop," said the president, "in this affair crime seems to evade us, being transferred from one to another. Do not trust to any mere appearance. If Ordener Guldenlew be innocent, who, then, is guilty?"



"Forbear," said the Bishop

"Your grace shall know," replied the bishop. Then showing the court an iron casket which a servant had brought in behind him: "Noble lords, you have judged in darkness; within this casket is the miraculous light which shall dissipate that darkness."

The president, private secretary, and Ordener, all seemed amazed at the sight of the mysterious casket.

The bishop added: " Noble judges, hear me. Today, as I returned to my palace, to rest from the fatigues of the night and to pray for the prisoners, I received this sealed iron box. The keeper of the Spladgest, I was told, brought it to the palace this morning to be given to me, declaring that it undoubtedly contained some Satanic charm, as he had found it on the body of the sacrilegious Benignus Spiagudry, which had just been fished out of Lake Sparbo."

Ordener listened more eagerly than ever. All the spec- tators were as still as death. The president and private secretary hung their heads guiltily. They seemed to have lost all their cunning and audacity. There is a moment in the life of every sinner when his power vanishes.

"After blessing this casket," continued the bishop, " we broke the seal, which, as you can still see, bears the ancient and now extinct arms of Griffenfeld. We did indeed find a devilish secret within. You shall judge for yourselves, venerable sirs. Lend me your most earnest attention, for human blood is at stake, and the Lord will hold you accountable for every drop that you may shed."

Then opening the terrible casket, he drew forth a slip of parchment, upon which was written the following testimony:-

I, Blaxtham Cumbysulsum. doctor, being about to die, do declare that of my own free will and pleasure I have placed in the hands of Captain Dispolsen, the agent, at Copenhagen, of the former Count Griffenfeld, the enclosed document, drawn up wholly by the hand of Turiaf Musdœmon. servant of the chancellor. Count d'Ahlefeld. to the end that the said captain may make such use of it as shall seem to him best: and I pray God to pardon my crimes.

Given under my hand and seal at Copenhagen, this eleventh day of January, 1699.

CUMBYSULSUM.

The private secretary shook like a leaf. He tried to speak, but could not. The bishop handed the parchment to the pale and agitated president.

"What do I see? " exclaimed the latter, as he unfolded the parchment. "A note to the noble Count d'Ahlefeld, upon the means of legally ridding himself of Schumacker! I- I swear, reverend Bishop- "

The paper dropped from his trembling fingers.

"Read it, read it, sir," said the bishop. " I doubt not that your unworthy servant has abused your name as he has that of the unfortunate Schumacker. Only see the result of your uncharitable aversion to your fallen predecessor. One of your followers has plotted his ruin in your name, doubtless hoping to make a merit of it to your Grace."

These words revived the president, as showing him that the suspicions of the bishop, who was acquainted with the entire contents of the casket, had not fallen upon him. Ordener also breathed more freely. He began to see that the innocence of Ethel's father might be made manifest at the same time with his own. He felt a deep surprise at the singular fate which had led him to pursue a fearful brigand to recover this casket, which his old guide, Benignus Spiagudry, bore about him all the time; that it was actually following him while he was seeking for it. He also reflected on the solemn lesson of the events which, after ruining him by means of this same fatal casket, now proved the instrument of his salvation.

The president, recovering himself, read with much show of indignation, in which the entire audience shared, a lengthy memorandum, in which Musdœcemon set forth all the details of the abominable scheme which we have seen him execute in the course of this story. Several times the private secretary attempted to rise and defend himself, but each time he was frowned down. At last the odious reading came to an end amid a murmur of universal horror.

“Halberdiers, seize that man!” said the president, pointing to the private secretary.

The wretch, speechless and almost lifeless, stepped from his place, and was cast into the criminal dock, followed by the hoots of the populace.

“Judges,” said the bishop, “ shudder and rejoice. The truth, which has just been brought home to your consciences, will now be even more strongly confirmed by the testimony of our honored brother, Athanasius Munder, chaplain to the prisons of this royal town.”

It was indeed Athanasius Munder who accompanied the bishop. He bowed to his superior in the Church and to the court, then at a sign from the president, proceeded as follows: “ What I am about to state is the truth. May Heaven punish me if I utter a word with any other object than to do my duty! From what I saw this morning in the cell of the viceroy’s son, I was led to think that the young man was not guilty, although your lordships had condemned him upon his own confession. Now, I was called, a few hours since, to give the last spiritual consolations to the unfortunate mountaineer so cruelly murdered before your very eyes, and whom you condemned, worthy sirs, as being Hans of Iceland. The dying man said to me: ‘ I am not Hans of Iceland; I am justly punished for having assumed his name. I was paid to play the part by the chancellor’s private secretary; he is called Musdœmon; and it was he who managed the whole revolt under the name of Hacket! I believe him to be the only guilty man in this whole matter.’ Then he asked me to give him my blessing, and advised me to make haste and repeat his last words to the court. God is my witness. May I save the shedding of innocent blood, and not cause that of the guilty to flow! “

He ceased, again bowing to his bishop and the judges.

"Your Grace sees," said the bishop to the president, " that one of my clients was not mistaken when he found so much resemblance between Hacket and your private secretary."

"Turiaf Musdœmon," said the president to the prisoner, " what have you to say in your defence?"

Musdœmon looked at his master with an expression which alarmed him. He had recovered his usual impudence, and after a brief pause, answered: Nothing, sir."

The president resumed in a weak and faltering voice: " Then you acknowledge yourself guilty of the crime with which you are charged? You confess yourself to be the author of a conspiracy alike against the State and against one John Schumacker?"

"I do, my lord," replied Musdœmon.

The bishop rose. " Mr. President, that there may be no shadow of doubt in this affair, will your grace ask the prisoner if he had any accomplices?"

"Accomplices? " repeated Musdœmon.

He hesitated a moment. The president wore a look of awful anxiety.

"No, my lord Bishop" he said at last.

The president's look of relief fell full upon him.

"No, I had no accomplices," repeated Musdœmon, still more emphatically. " I concocted this plot through affection for my master, who knew nothing of it, to destroy his enemy, Schumacker."

The eyes of prisoner and president met once more.

"Your grace," said the bishop, " must see that as Musdœmon had no accomplices, Baron Ordener Guldenlew must be innocent."

"Then why, worthy Bishop, did he confess his guilt?"

"Mr. President, why did that mountaineer persist that he was Hans of Iceland at the risk of his life? God alone knows our secret motives."

Ordener took up the word: "Judges, I can tell you my motive, now that the real criminal has been discovered. I accused myself falsely to save the former chancellor, Schumacker, whose death would have left his daughter without a protector."

The president bit his lip.

"We request the court," said the bishop, " to proclaim the innocence of our client, Ordener Guldeulew."

The president responded with a nod; and at the request of the lord mayor, they finished their examination of the terrible casket, which contained nothing more except Schumacker's titles of nobility, and a few letters from the Munkholm prisoner to Captain Dispolsen, bitter, but not criminal letters, which alarmed no one but Chancellor d'Ahlefeld.

The court then withdrew; and after a brief deliberation, while the curious crowd, gathered on the parade, waited with stubborn impatience to see the viceroy's son led forth to die, and the executioner nonchalantly paced the scaffold, the president pronounced in a scarcely audible voice the death sentence of Turiaf Musdœmon, the acquittal of Ordener Guldeulew, and the restoration of all his honors, titles, and privileges.

CHAPTER XLIX.

“What will you sell me your carcass for, my boy?
I would not give you, in faith, a broken toy.
Saint Michael and Satan (Old Miracle Play).

The remnant of the regiment of Munkholm musketeers had returned to their old quarters in the barracks, which stood in the centre of a vast, square courtyard within the fortress. At night-fall the doors of this building were barricaded, all the soldiers withdrawing into it. with the exception of the sentinels upon the various towers, and the handful of men on guard before the military prison adjoining the barracks. This, being the safest and best watched place of confinement in Muukholm, contained the two prisoners sentenced to be hanged on the following morning, Hans of Iceland and Musdœmon.

Hans of Iceland was alone in his cell. He was stretched upon the floor, chained, his head upon a stone; a feeble light filtered through a square grated opening, cut in the heavy oak door which divided his cell from the next room, where he heard his jailers laugh and swear, and heard the sound of the bottles which they drained, and the dice which they threw upon a drumhead. The monster silently writhed in the darkness, his limbs twitched convulsively, and he gnashed his teeth.

All at once he lifted his voice and called aloud. A turnkey appeared at the grating: “What do you want?” said he.

Hans of Iceland rose. “Mate, I am cold; my stone bed is hard and damp. Give me a bundle of straw to sleep on, and a little fire to warm myself.”

“It is only fair,” replied the turnkey, “ to give a little comfort to a poor devil who is going to be hung, even if he be the Iceland Devil. I will bring you what you want. Have you any money?”

“No,” replied the brigand.

“What! you, the most famous robber in Norway, and you have not a few scurvy gold ducats in your pouch?”

“No,” repeated the brigand.

“A few little crowns?”

“I tell you, no!”

“Not even a few paltry escalins?”

“No, no, nothing; not enough to buy a rat’s skin or a man’s soul.”

The turnkey shook his head:” That ‘s a different matter; you have no right to complain. Your cell is not so cold as the one you will have to sleep in tomorrow, and yet I’ll be bound you won’t notice the hardness of that bed.”

So saying, the jailer withdrew, followed by the curses of the monster, who continued to rattle his chains, which gave forth a hollow clang as if they were breaking slowly under repeated and violent jerks and pulls.

The door opened. A tall man, dressed in red serge, carrying a dark lantern, entered the cell, accompanied by the jailer who had refused the prisoner’s request. The latter at once became perfectly quiet.

“Hans of Iceland,” said the man in red, “ I am Nychol Orugix, executioner of the province of Throndhjem; tomorrow, at sunrise, I am to have the honor of hanging your Excellency upon a fine new gallows in Throndhjem market-place.”

“Are you very sure that you will hang me?” replied the brigand.

The executioner laughed. “I wish you were as sure to rise straight into heaven by Jacob’s ladder as you are to mount the scaffold by Nychol Orugix’s ladder.”

“Indeed?” said the monster, with a malicious grin.

“I tell you again, Sir Brigand, that I am hangman for the province.”

“If I were not myself I should like to be you,” replied the brigand.

“I can’t say the same for you,” rejoined the hangman; then rubbing his hands with a conceited and complacent smirk, he added: “My friend, you are right; ours is a fine trade. Ah: my hand knows the weight of a man’s head.”

“Have you often tasted blood?” asked the brigand.

“No; but I have often used the rack.”

“Have you ever devoured the entrails of a living child?”

“No; but I have crushed men’s bones in a vise; I have broken their limbs upon the wheel; I have dulled steel saws upon their skulls; I have torn their quivering flesh with red-hot pincers; I have burned the blood in their open veins by pouring in a stream of molten lead and boiling oil.”

“Yes,” said the brigand, with a thoughtful look, “you have your pleasures too.”

“In fact,” added the hangman, “Hans of Iceland though you be, I imagine that my hands have released more human souls than yours, to say nothing of your own, which you must render up tomorrow.”

"Always provided that I have one. Do you suppose, then, executioner of Throndhjem, that you can release the spirit of Ingulf from Hans of Iceland's mortal frame without its carrying off your own?"

The executioner laughed heartily. "Indeed, we shall see to-morrow.''

"We shall see," said the brigand.

"Well," said the executioner, "I did not come here to talk of your spirit, but only of your body. Hearken! your body by law belongs to me after your death; but the law gives you the right to sell it to me. Tell me what you will take for it?"

"What I will take for my corpse?" said the brigand.

"Yes, and be reasonable."

Hans of Iceland turned to his jailer: " Tell me, mate, how much do you ask for a bundle of straw and a handful of fire?"

The jailer reflected. "Two gold ducats."

"Well," said the brigand to the hangman, " you must give me two gold ducats for my corpse."

"Two gold ducats!" cried the hangman. " It is horribly dear. Two gold ducats for a wretched corpse! No, indeed! I'll give no such price."

"Then," quietly responded the monster, "you shall not have it."

"Then you will be thrown into the common sewer, instead of adorning the Royal Museum at Copenhagen or the collection of curiosities at Bergen."

"What do I care?"

"Long after your death, people will flock to look at your skeleton, saying, 'Those are the remains of the famous Hans of Iceland!' Your bones will be nicely polished, and strung on copper wire; you will be placed in a big glass case, and dusted carefully every day. Instead of these honors, consider what awaits you if you refuse to sell me your body; you will be left to rot in some charnelhouse, where you will be the prey of worms and other vermin."

"Well, I shall be like the living, who are perpetually preyed upon by their inferiors and devoured by their superiors."

"Two gold ducats!" muttered the hangman; "what an exorbitant price! If you will not come down in your terms, my dear fellow, we can never make a trade."

"It is my first and probably my last trade; I am bent on having it a good one."

“Consider that I may make you repent of your obstinacy. Tomorrow you will be in my power.”

“Do you think so?” These words were uttered with a look which escaped the hangman.

“Yes; and there is a certain way of tightening a slipknot but if you will only be reasonable, I will hang you in my best manner.”

“Little do I care what you do to my neck tomorrow,” replied the monster, with a mocking air.

“Come, won’t you be satisfied with two crowns? What can you do with the money?”

“Ask your comrade there,” said the brigand, pointing to the turnkey;” he charges me two gold ducats for a handful of straw and a fire.”

“Now by Saint Joseph’s saw,” said the hangman, angrily addressing the turnkey, “ it is shocking to make a man pay its weight in gold for a fire and a little worthless straw.”

“Two ducats!” the turnkey replied sourly; “ I’ve a good mind to make him pay four! It is you, Master Nychol, who act like a regular screw in refusing to give this poor prisoner two gold ducats for his corpse, when you can sell it for at least twenty to some learned old fogy or some doctor.”

“I never paid more than twenty escalins for a corpse in my life,” said the hangman.

“Yes,” replied the jailer,” for the body of some paltry thief, or some miserable Jew, that may be; but everybody knows that you can get whatever you choose to ask for Hans of Iceland’s body.”

Hans of Iceland shook his head.

“What business is it of yours?” said Orugix, curtly;

“do I interfere with your plunder, with the clothes and jewels that you steal from the prisoners, and the dirty water which you pour into their thin soup, and the torture to which you put them, to extort money from them? No, I never will give two gold ducats.”

“No straw and no fire for less than two gold ducats,” replied the obstinate jailer.’

“No corpse for less than two gold ducats,” repeated the unmoved brigand.

The hangman, after a brief pause, stamped his foot angrily, saying: “ Well, I ‘ve no time to waste with you. I am wanted elsewhere.” He drew from his waistcoat a leather bag, which he opened slowly and reluctantly.

“There, cursed demon of Iceland, there are your two ducats. Satan would never give you as much for your soul as I do for your body, I am sure.”

The brigand accepted the gold. The turnkey instantly held out his hand to take it.

“One instant, mate; first give me what I asked for.”

The jailer went out, and soon returned with a bundle of dry straw and a pan of live coals, which he placed beside the prisoner.

“That ‘s it,” said the brigand, giving him the two ducats; “ I’ll make a warm night of it. One word more,” he added in an ominous tone. “ Does not this prison adjoin the barracks of the Munkholm musketeers?”

“It does,” said the jailer.

“And which way is the wind?”

“From the east, I think.”

“Good,” said the brigand.

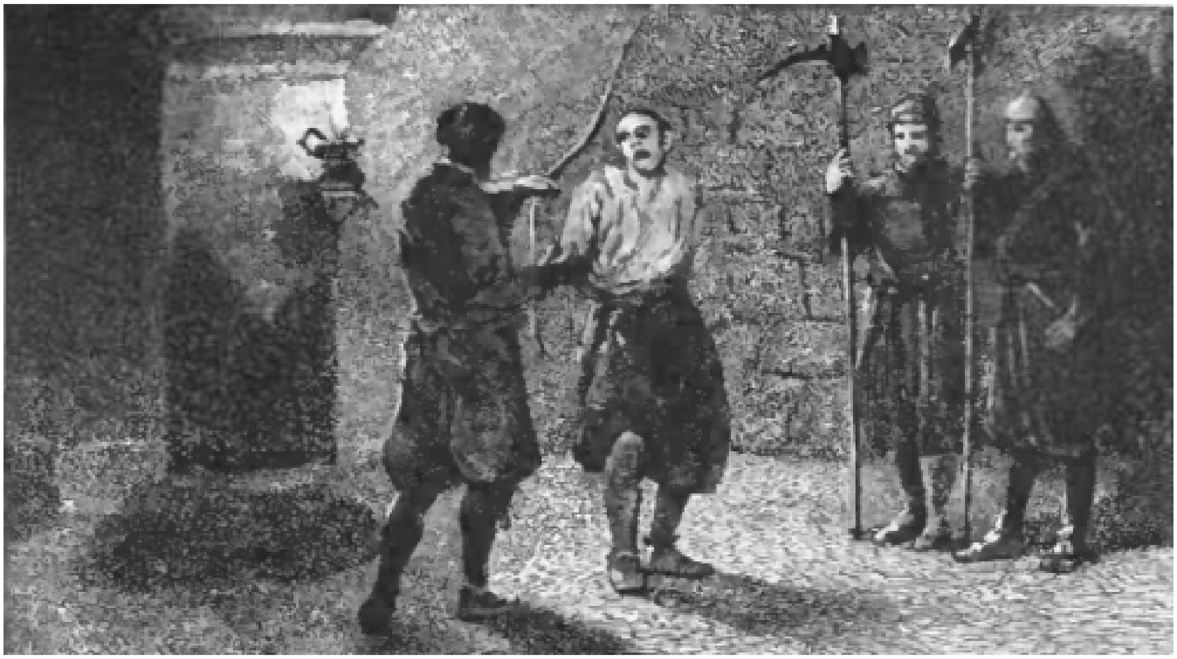
“What are you aiming at, comrade? “ asked the jailer.

“Oh, nothing,” replied the brigand.

“Farewell, comrade, until to-morrow morning early.”

“Yes, to-morrow,” repeated the brigand.

And the noise of the heavy door, as it closed, prevented the jailer and his companion from hearing the fierce, jeering laughter which accompanied these words.



Musdæmon and his Brother, the Hangman

CHAPTER L

Do you hope to end with another crime?
Alex Soumet

Let us now take a look at the other cell in the military prison adjoining the barracks, which holds our old acquaintance, Turiaf Musdœmon.

It may seem surprising that Musdœmon, crafty and cowardly as he was, should so readily confess his crime to the court which condemned him, and so generously conceal the share of his ungrateful master, Chancellor d’Ahlefeld, in it.

However, Musdœmon had not experienced a change of heart. His noble frankness was perhaps the greatest proof of cunning which he could possibly have given. “When he saw his infernal intrigue so unexpectedly exposed, beyond all hope of denial, he was for an instant stunned and terrified. Conquering his alarm, his extreme shrewdness soon showed him that as it was impossible to destroy his chosen victims, he must bend all his energies to saving himself. Two plans at once presented themselves: the first, to throw all the blame upon Count d’Ahlefeld, who had so basely deserted him; the second, to assume the whole burden of the crime himself. A vulgar mind would have grasped at the former: Musdœmon chose the latter. The chancellor was chancellor, after all; besides, there was nothing in the papers which directly implicated him, although they contained overwhelming evidence against his secretary. Then, his master had given him several meaning looks: this was enough to confirm him in his purpose to suffer himself to be condemned, confident that Count d’Ahleteld would connive at his escape, though less from gratitude for past service than through his need for future aid.

He therefore paced his prison, which was dimly lighted by a wretched lamp, never doubting that the door would be thrown open during the night. He studied the architecture of the old stone cell, built by kings whose very names have almost vanished from the pages of history, and was much surprised to find a wooden plank, which echoed back his tread as if it covered some subterranean vault. He also observed a huge iron ring cemented into the arched roof, from which hung a fragment of rope. Time passed; and he listened impatiently to the clock on the tower as it slowly struck the hours, its mournful toll resounding through the silence of the night.

At last there was a footfall outside his cell; his heart-beat high with hope. The massive bolt creaked; the padlock dropped; and as the door opened, his face beamed with delight. It was the same character in scarlet robes whom we have just encountered in Hans of Iceland’s prison. He had a coil of hempen cord under his arm. and was accompanied by four halberdiers in black, armed with swords and partisans.

Musdœmon still wore the wig and gown of a magistrate. His dress seemed to impress the man in red, who bowed low as if accustomed to respect that garb, and said with some hesitation: “ Sir, is our business with jour worship?”

“Yes, yes,” hastily replied Musdœmon, confirmed in his hope of escape by this polite address, and failing to observe the bloody hue of the speaker’s garments.

“Your name,” said the man, his eyes fixed on a parchment which he had just unrolled, “ is Turiaf Musdœmon, I believe.”

“Just so. Do you come from the chancellor, my friend?”

“Yes, your worship.”

“Do not fail, when you have done your errand, to assure his Grace of my undying gratitude.”

The man in red looked at him in amazement. “ Your gratitude!”

“Yes, to be sure, my friend; for it will probably be out of my power to thank him in person very soon.”

“Probably,” dryly replied the man.

“And you must feel,” added Musdœmon, “ that I owe him a deep debt of gratitude for such a service.”

“By the cross of the repentant thief,” cried the man, with a coarse laugh, “ to hear you, one would think that the chancellor was doing something quite unusual for you!”

“Well, to be sure, it is no more than strict justice.”

“Strict justice! that is the word; but you acknowledge that it is justice. It is the first admission of the kind that 1 ever heard in the six-and-twenty years that I have followed my profession. Come, sir, we waste our time in idle talk; are you ready?”

“I am,” said the delighted Musdœmon, stepping to the door.

“Wait; wait a minute,” exclaimed the man in red, stooping to lay his coil of rope on the floor.

Musdœmon paused.

“What are you going to do with all that rope?”

“Your worship may well ask. I know that there is much more than I shall need; but when I began on this affair I thought there would be a great many more prisoners.”

“Come, make haste!” said Musdœmon.

“Your worship is in a wonderful hurry. Have you no last favor to ask?”

“None but the one I have already mentioned, that you will thank his Grace for me. For God’s sake, make haste!” added Musdœmon;” I long to get away from here. Have we a long journey before us?”

“A long journey!” replied the man in red, straightening himself, and measuring off a few lengths of rope. “ The journey will not tire your worship much; for we can make it without leaving this room.”

Musdœmon shuddered.

“What do you mean?”

“What do you mean yourself?” asked the man.

“Oh, God!” said Musdœmon, turning pale,” who are you?”

“I am the hangman.”

The poor wretch trembled like a dry leaf blown by the wind.

“Did you not come to help me to escape?” he feebly muttered.

The hangman laughed.” Yes, truly.” to help you to escape into the spirit-land, whence I warrant you will not be brought back.”

Musdœmon grovelled on the floor. “Mercy.” Have pity on me! Mercy!”

“I’faith,” coldly observed the hangman, “ ’tis the first time I was ever asked such a thing. Do you take me for the king?”

The unfortunate man dragged himself on his knees, trailing his gown in the dust, beating his head against the floor, and clasping the hangman’s feet with muffled groans and broken sobs.

“Come, be quiet!” said the hangman. “ I never before saw a black gown kneel to a red jerkin.” He kicked the suppliant aside, adding:” Pray to God and the saints, fellow; they will be more apt to hear you than I.”

Musdœmon. still knelt, his face buried in his hands, weeping bitterly.

Meantime, the hangman, standing on tiptoe, passed his rope through the ring in the ceiling; he let it hang until it reached the floor, then secured it by a double turn, and made a slip-knot in the end.

“I am ready,” said he, when these ominous preparations were over;” are you ready to lay down your life?”

“No!” said Musdu-mon, springing up; “no; it cannot be; There is some horrible mistake. Chancellor d’Ahlefeld is not so base; I am too necessary to him. It is impossible that it was for me he sent you. Let me escape; do not fear that the chancellor will be angry.”

“Did you not say,” replied the executioner, “ that you were Turiaf Musdœmon?”

The prisoner hesitated for an instant, then said suddenly:” No, no! my name is not Musdœmon; my name is Turiaf Orugix.”

“Orugix!” cried the executioner,” Orugix!”

He snatched off the periwig which concealed the prisoner’s face, and uttered an exclamation of surprise:” My brother!”

“Your brother!” replied the prisoner, with a mixture of shame and pleasure;” can you be”

“Nychol Orugix, hangman for the province of Throndhjem, at your service, brother Turiaf.”

The prisoner fell upon the executioner’s neck, calling him his brother, his beloved brother. This fraternal recognition would not have gratified any one who witnessed it. Turiaf lavished countless caresses upon Nychol with a forced and timid smile, while Nychol responded with a gloomy and embarrassed look. It was like a tiger fondling an elephant, while the monster’s ponderous foot is already planted upon its panting chest.

“What happiness, brother Nychol! I am glad indeed to see you.”

“And I am sorry for you, brother Turiaf.”

The prisoner pretended not to hear these words, and went on in trembling tones:” You have a wife and children, I suppose? You must take me to see my gentle sister, and let me kiss my dear nephews.”

“The Devil fly away with you!” muttered the hangman.

“I will be a second father to them. Hark ye, brother, I am powerful; I have great influence

The brother replied with a sinister expression: “I know that you had! At present, you had better be thinking of that which you have doubtless contrived to curry with the saints.”

All hope faded from the prisoner’s face.

“Good God! what does this mean, dear Nychol? I am safe, since I have found you. Think that the same mother bore us; that we played together as children. Remember, Nychol, you are my brother!"

"You never remembered it until now," replied the brutal Nychol.

"No, I cannot die by my brother's hand!"

"It is your own fault, Turiaf. It was you who ruined my career; who prevented me from becoming royal executioner at Copenhagen; who caused me to be sent into this miserable region as a petty provincial hangman. If you had not been a bad brother, you would have no cause to complain of that which distresses you so much now. I should not be in Throndhjem, and some one else would have to finish your business. Now, enough, brother, you must die."

Death is hideous to the wicked for the same reason that it is beautiful to the good; both must put off their humanity, but the just man is delivered from his body as from a prison, while the wicked man is torn from it as from a jail. At the last moment hell yawns before the sinful soul which has dreamed of annihilation. It knocks anxiously at the dark portals of death; and it is not annihilation that answers.

The prisoner rolled upon the floor and wrung his hands, with moans more heart-rending than the everlasting wail of the damned.

"God have mercy! Holy angels in heaven, if you exist, have pity upon me! Nychol, brother Nychol, in our mother's name, oh, let me live!"

The hangman held out his warrant.

"I cannot; the order is peremptory."

"That warrant is not for me," stammered the despairing prisoner; " it is for one Musdœmon. That is not I; I am Turiaf Orugix."

"You jest," said Nychol, shrugging his shoulders." I know perfectly well that it is meant for you. Besides," he added roughly, "yesterday you would not have been Turiaf Orugix to your brother; to-day he can only look upon you as Turiaf Musdœmon."

"Brother, brother!" groaned the wretch, "only wait until tomorrow! It is impossible that the chancellor could have given the order for my death; it is some frightful mistake. Count d'Ahlefeld loves me dearly. Dear Nychol, I implore you, spare my life! I shall soon be restored to favor, and I will do whatever you may ask"

"You can do me but one service, Turiaf," broke in the hangman. " I have lost two executions already upon which I counted the most, those of exchaucellor Schumacker and the viceroy's son. I am always unlucky. You and Hans of Iceland are all that are left. Your execution, being secret and by night, is worth at least twelve gold ducats to me. Let me hang you peaceably, that is the only favor I ask of you."

"Oh, God!" sighed the prisoner.

"It will be the first and last, in good sooth; but, in return. I promise that you shall not suffer. I will hang you like a brother; submit to your fate."

Musdœmon sprang to his feet; his nostrils were distended with rage; his livid lips quivered; his teeth chattered; his mouth foamed with despair.

"Satan! I saved that d'Ahlefeld; I have embraced my brother, and they murder me! And I must die this very night in a dark dungeon, where none can hear my curses: where I may not cry out against them from one end of the kingdom to the other; where I may not tear asunder the veil that hides their crimes! Was it for such a death that I have stained my entire life? Wretch!" he added, turning to his brother, "would you become a fratricide?"

"I am the executioner," answered the phlegmatic Nychol.

"No!" exclaimed the prisoner; and he flung himself headlong upon the executioner, his eyes darting flame and streaming with tears, like those of a bull at bay, "no, I will not die thus meekly; I have not lived like a poisonous serpent to die like a paltry worm trampled under foot! I will leave my life in my last sting; but it shall be mortal."

So saying, he grappled like a bitter foe with him whom he had just embraced as a brother: the fulsome, flattering Musdœmon now showed his true spirit. Despair stirred up the foul dregs of his soul; and after crawling prostrate like a tiger, like a tiger he sprang upon his enemy. It would have been hard to decide which of the two brothers was the most appalling, as they struggled, one with the brute ferocity of a wild beast, the other with the artful fury of a demon.

But the four halberdiers, hitherto passive spectators, did not remain motionless. They lent their aid to the executioner; and soon Musdceinon, whose rage was his only strength, was forced to quit his hold. He dashed himself against the wall, uttering inarticulate yells, and blunting his nails upon the stone.

"To die! Devils in hell, to die! My shrieks unheard outside this roof, my arms powerless to tear down these walls!"

He was seized, but offered no resistance; his useless efforts had exhausted him. He was stripped of his gown, and bound; at this moment a sealed packet fell from his bosom.

"What is that?" said the hangman.

An infernal light gleamed in the prisoner’s haggard eyes. He muttered:” How could I forget that? Look here, brother Nychol,” he added in an almost friendly tone; “these papers belong to the lord chancellor. Promise to give them to him, and you may do what you will with me.”

“Since you are quiet now, I promise to grant your last wish, although you have been a bad brother to me. I will see that the chancellor has the papers, on the honor of an Orugix.”

“Ask leave to hand them to him yourself,” replied the prisoner, smiling at the executioner, who, from his nature, had little understanding of smiles. “The pleasure which they will afford his Grace may lead him to confer some favor on you.”

“Really, brother?” said Orugix. “Thank you “Perhaps he will make me executioner royal after all, eh? Well, let us part good friends! I forgive you all the scratches which you gave me; forgive me for the hempen collar which I must give you.”

“The chancellor promised me a very different sort of collar,” said Musdœmon.

Then the halberdiers led him, bound, into the middle of the cell; the hangman placed the fatal noose round his neck.

“Are you ready, Turiaf?”

“One moment! one moment!” said the prisoner, whose terror had revived; “for mercy’s sake, brother, do not pull the rope until I tell you to do so!”

“I do not need to pull it,” answered the hangman.

A moment later he repeated his question: “Are you ready?”

“One moment more! Alas! must I die?”

“Turiaf, I have no time to waste.”

So saying, Orugix signed to the halberdiers to stand away from the prisoner.

“One word more, brother; do not forget to give the packet to Count d’Ahlefeld.”

“Never fear,” replied Nychol. He added for the third time: “ Come, are you ready”

The unfortunate man opened his lips, perhaps to plead for another brief delay, when the impatient hangman stooped and turned a brass button projecting from the floor.

The plank gave way beneath the victim; the poor wretch disappeared through a square trap-door with a dull twang from the rope, which was stretched suddenly and vibrated fearfully with the dying man’s final convulsions.

Nothing was seen but the rope swinging to and fro in the dark opening, through which came a cool breeze and a sound as of running water.

The halberdiers themselves shrank back, horror-stricken. The hangman approached the abyss, seized the rope, which still vibrated, and swung himself into the hole, pressing both feet against his victim’s shoulders; the fatal rope stretched to its utmost with a creak, and stood still. A stifled sob rose from the trap.

“All is over,” said the hangman, climbing back into the cell. “ Farewell, brother!”

He drew a cutlass from his belt. “Go feed the fishes in the fjord. Your body to the waves; your soul to the flames!”

With these words, he cut the taut rope. The fragment still fastened to the iron ring lashed the ceiling, while the deep, dark waters splashed high as the body fell, then swept on their underground course.

The hauguiau closed the trap as he had opened it; as he rose, he saw that the room was full of smoke.

“What is all this?” he asked the halberdiers. “Where does this smoke corne from?”

They knew no better than he. In surprise, they opened the door; the corridors were also filled with thick and nauseating snioke. A secret outlet led them, greatly terrified, to the square courtyard, where a fearful sight met their gaze.

A vast conflagration, fanned by a violent east wind, was consuming the military prison and the barracks. The flames, driven in eddying whirls, climbed stone walls, crowned burning roofs, leaped from gaping window-frames; and the black towers of Munkholm now shone in a red and ominous light, now vanished in a dense cloud of smoke.

A turnkey, who was escaping by the courtyard, told them hastily that the fire had broken out in the monster’s cell during the sleep of Hans of Iceland’s keepers, he having been imprudently allowed to have a fire and straw.

“How unlucky I am!” cried Orugix, when he heard this story; “now I suppose Hans of Iceland has slipped through my hands too. The rascal must have been burned; and I sha’n’t even get his body, for which I paid two ducats!”

Meantime, the unfortunate Munkholm musketeers, roused suddenly from their sleep by imminent death, crowded toward the door only to find it closely barred.

Their shrieks of anguish and despair were heard outside; they stood at the blazing windows, wringing their hands, or dashed themselves madly upon the flagging of the court, escaping one death to meet another. The victorious flames devoured the entire structure before the rest of the garrison could come to the rescue.

All help was vain. Luckily, the building stood by itself. The door was broken in with hatchets, but it was too late; for as it opened, the burning roof and floors gave way, and fell upon the unfortunate men with a loud crash.

The entire building disappeared in a whirlwind of fiery dust and burning smoke, which stifled the faint moans of the expiring men.

Next morning nothing was left in the courtyard but four high walls, black and smoking, around a horrid mass of smouldering ruins still devouring each other like wild beasts in a circus.

When the pile had cooled, it was searched. Beneath a heap of stones and iron beams, twisted out of shape by the flames, was found a mass of whitened bones and disfigured corpses; with some thirty soldiers, most of whom were crippled, this was all that remained of the crack regiment of Munkholm.

When the site of the prison was searched, and they reached the fatal cell where the fire had broken out, and where Hans of Iceland had been imprisoned, they found the remains of a human body close beside an iron pan and a heap of broken chains. It was curious that among these ashes there were two skulls, although there was but one skeleton.

Saladin. Bravo, Ibrahim! you are indeed the messenger of good fortune; I thank you for your joyful tidings.
The Mameluke. Well, is that all?
Saladin. What did you expect?
The Mameluke. Nothing more for the messenger of good fortune.
Lessing: Nathan the Wise.

Pale and worn, Count d'Ahlefeld strode up and down his apartment; in his hand he crushed a bundle of letters which he had just read, while he stamped his foot on the smooth marble floor and the gold-fringed rugs.

At the other end of the room, in an attitude of deep respect, stood Nychol Orugix in his infamous scarlet dress, felt hat in hand.

"You have done me good service, Musdœmon," hissed the chancellor.

The hangman looked up timidly: "Is your Grace pleased?"

"What do you want here?" said the chancellor, turning upon him suddenly.

The hangman, proud that he had won a glance from the chancellor, smiled hopefully.

"What do I want, your Grace? The post of executioner at Copenhagen, if your Grace will deign to bestow so great a favor on me in return for the good news I have brought you."

The chancellor called to the two halberdiers on guard at his door: "Seize this rascal; he annoys rne by his impudence."

The guards led away the amazed and confounded Nychol, who ventured one word more: "My lord "

"You are no longer hangman for the province of Throndhjem; I deprive you of your office!" cried the chancellor, slamming the door.

The chancellor returned to his letters, angrily read and re-read them, maddened by his dishonor; for these were the letters which once passed between the countess and Musdœmon. This was Elphega's handwriting. He found that Ulrica was not his daughter; that, it might be, the Frederic whom he mourned was not his son. The unhappy count was punished through that same pride which had caused all his crimes. He cared not now if vengeance evaded him; all his ambitious dreams vanished, his past was blasted, his future dead. He had striven to destroy his enemies; he had only succeeded in losing his own reputation, his adviser, and even his marital and paternal rights.

But he must see once more the wretched woman who had betrayed him. He hastily crossed the spacious apartment, shaking the letters in his hand as if they were a thunderbolt. He threw open the door of Elphega’s room; he entered- The guilty wife had just unexpectedly learned from Colonel Vœthaün of her son Frederic’s tearful death. The poor mother was insane.

CONCLUSION.

What I said in jest, you took seriously.-
Old Spanish Romance (King Alfonso to Bernard).

For a fortnight the events which we have just related formed the sole topic of conversation in the town and province of Throndhjem, judged from the various standpoints of the various speakers. The people of the town, who had waited in vain to see seven successive executions, began to despair of ever having that pleasure; and purblind old women declared that, on the night of the lamentable fire at the barracks, they had seen Hans of Iceland fly up in the flames, laughing amid the blaze, as he dashed the burning roof of the building upon the Munkholm musketeers; when, after an absence which to his Ethel seemed an age, Ordener returned to the Lion of Schleswig tower, accompanied by General Levin de Knud and Chaplain Athanasius Munder.

Schumacker was walking in the garden, leaning on his daughter. The young couple found it hard not to rush into each other's arms; but they were forced to be content with a look. Schumacker affectionately grasped Ordener's hand, and greeted the two strangers in a friendly manner.

"Young man," said the aged captive, " may Heaven bless your return!"

"Sir," replied Ordener, " I have just arrived. Having seen my father at Bergen, I would now embrace my father at Munkholm."

"What do you mean? " asked the old man. in great surprise.

"That you must give me your daughter, noble sir."

"My daughter!" exclaimed the prisoner, turning to the confused and blushing Ethel.

"Yes, my lord, I love your Ethel. I have devoted my life to her; she is mine."

Schumacker's face clouded:" You are a brave and noble youth, my son. Although your father has done me much harm, I forgive him for your sake; and I should be glad to sanction this marriage. But there is an obstacle-"

"What is it, sir?" asked Ordener, anxiously.

"You love my daughter; but are you sure that she loves you?"

The two lovers cast at each other a rapid glance of mute amazement.

"Yes," continued the father. "I am sorry; for I love you, and would gladly call you son. But my daughter would never consent. She has recently confessed her aversion for you, and since your departure she is silent whenever I speak of you, and seems to avoid all thought of you as if you were odious to her. You must give up your love for her, Ordener. Never fear; love may be cured as well as hatred."

"My lord!" exclaimed the astonished Ordener.

"Father!" cried Ethel, clasping her hands.

"Do not be alarmed, my daughter," interrupted the old man; " I approve of this marriage, but you do not. I will never force your inclinations, Ethel. This last fortnight has wrought a great change in me; you are free to choose for yourself."

Athanasius Munder smiled. "She is not," he said.

"You are mistaken, dear father," added Ethel, taking courage; "I do not hate Ordener."

"What!" cried her father.

"I am" resumed Ethel. She hesitated.

Ordener knelt at the old man's feet.

"She is my wife, father! Forgive me as my other father has forgiven me, and bless your children."

Schumacker, surprised in his turn, blessed the young couple.

"I have cursed so many people in my lifetime," said he, "that I now seize every opportunity for blessing. But explain."

All was made clear to him. He wept with emotion, gratitude, and love.

"I thought myself wise; I am old, and I did not understand the heart of a young girl!"

"And so I am Mrs. Ordener Guldenlew!" said Ethel, with child-like delight.

"Ordener Guldenlew," rejoined old Schumacker, " you are a better man than I , for in the day of my prosperity I would never have stooped to wed the penniless and disgraced daughter of an unfortunate prisoner."

The general took the old man's hand, and offered him a roll of parchment, saying: "Do not speak thus, Count. Here are your titles, which the king long since sent you by Dispolsen; his Majesty now adds a free pardon. Such is the dowry of your daughter, Countess Danneskiold."

"Pardon! freedom!" repeated the enraptured Ethel.

"Countess Danneskiold!" added her father.

“Yes, Count,” continued the general; “your honors and estates are restored.”

“To whom do I owe all this?” asked the happy Schumacker.

“To General Levin de Knud,” answered Ordener.

“Levin de Knud! Did I not tell you, Governor, that Levin de Knud was the best of men? But why did he not bring me the good news himself? Where is he?”

Ordener pointed in surprise to the smiling, weeping general: “Here!”

The recognition of the two who had been comrades in the days of their youth and power was a touching one. Schumacker’s heart swelled. His acquaintance with Hans had destroyed his hatred of men; his acquaintance with Ordener and Levin taught him to love them.

The gloomy wedding in the cell was soon celebrated by brilliant festivities. Life smiled upon the young couple who had smiled at death. Count d’Ahlefeld saw that they were happy; this was his most cruel punishment.

Athanasius Munder shared their joy. He obtained the pardon of his twelve convicts, and Ordener added that of his former companions in misfortune, Jonas and Norbith, who returned, free and happy, to inform the appeased miners that the king released them from the protectorate.

Schumacker did not long enjoy the union of Ethel and Ordener. Liberty and happiness were too much for him; he went to enjoy a different happiness and a different freedom. He died that same year, 1699, his children accepting this blow as a warning that there is no perfect bliss in this world. He was buried in Veer Church, upon an estate in Jutland belonging to his son-in-law, and his tomb preserves all the titles of which captivity deprived him. From the marriage of Ordener and Ethel sprang the race of the counts of Danneskiold.

PREMIÈRE ÉDITION

L'auteur de cet ouvrage, depuis le jour où il en a écrit la première page, jusqu'au jour où il a pu tracer le bienheureux mot FIN au bas de la dernière, a été le jouet de la plus ridicule illusion. S'étant imaginé qu'une composition en quatre volumes valait la peine d'être méditée, il a perdu son temps à chercher une idée fondamentale, à la développer bien ou mal dans un plan bon ou mauvais, à disposer des scènes, à combiner des effets, à étudier des moeurs de son mieux; en un mot, il a pris son ouvrage au sérieux.

Ce n'est que tout à l'heure, au moment où, selon l'usage des auteurs de terminer par où le lecteur commence, il allait élaborer une longue préface, qui fût comme le bouclier de son oeuvre, et contînt, avec l'exposé des principes moraux et littéraires sur lesquels repose sa conception, un précis plus ou moins rapide des divers événements historiques qu'elle embrasse, et un tableau plus ou moins complet du pays qu'elle parcourt; ce n'est que tout à l'heure, disons-nous, qu'il s'est aperçu de sa méprise, qu'il a reconnu toute l'insignifiance et toute la frivolité du genre à propos duquel il avait si gravement noirci tant de papier, et qu'il a senti combien il s'était, pour ainsi dire, mystifié lui-même, en se persuadant que ce roman pourrait bien, jusqu'à un certain point, être une production littéraire, et que ces quatre volumes formaient un livre.

Il se résout donc sagement, après avoir fait amende honorable, à ne rien dire dans cette espèce de préface, que monsieur l'éditeur aura soin en conséquence d'imprimer en gros caractères. Il n'informera pas même le lecteur de son nom ou de ses prénoms, ni s'il est jeune ou vieux, marié ou célibataire, ni s'il a fait des élégies ou des fables, des odes ou des satires, ni s'il veut faire des tragédies, des drames ou des comédies, ni s'il jouit du patriciat littéraire dans quelque académie, ni s'il a une tribune dans un journal quelconque; toutes choses, cependant, fort intéressantes à savoir. Il se bornera seulement à faire remarquer que la partie pittoresque de son roman a été l'objet d'un soin particulier; qu'on y rencontre fréquemment des K, des Y, des H et des W, quoiqu'il n'ait jamais employé ces caractères romantiques qu'avec une extrême sobriété, témoin le nom historique de Guldenlew, que plusieurs chroniqueurs écrivent Guldenloëwe, ce qu'il n'a pas osé se permettre; qu'on y trouve également de nombreuses diphtongues variées avec beaucoup de goût et d'élégance; et qu'enfin tous les chapitres sont précédés d'épigraphes étranges et mystérieuses, qui ajoutent singulièrement à l'intérêt et donnent plus de physionomie à chaque partie de la composition.

Janvier 1823.

DEUXIÈME ÉDITION

On a affirmé à l'auteur de cet ouvrage qu'il était absolument nécessaire de consacrer spécialement quelques lignes d'avertissement, de préface ou d'introduction à cette seconde édition. Il a eu beau représenter que les quatre ou cinq malencontreuses pages vides qui escortaient la première édition, et dont le libraire s'est obstiné à déparer celle-ci, lui avaient déjà attiré les anathèmes de l'un de nos écrivains les plus honorables et les plus distingués [Footnote: M. C. Nodier. Quotidienne du 12 mars.], lequel l'avait accusé de prendre le ton aigre-doux de l'illustre Jedediah Cleishbotham, maître d'école et sacristain de la paroisse de Gandercleugh; il a eu beau alléguer que ce brillant et judicieux critique, de sévère pour la faute, deviendrait sans doute impitoyable pour la récidive; et présenter, en un mot, une foule d'autres raisons non moins bonnes pour se dispenser d'y tomber, il paraît qu'on lui en a opposé de meilleures, puisque le voici maintenant écrivant une seconde préface, après s'être tant repenti d'avoir écrit la première. Au moment d'exécuter cette détermination hardie, il conçut d'abord la pensée de placer en tête de cette seconde édition ce dont il n'avait pas osé charger la première, savoir quelques vues générales et particulières sur le roman. Méditant ce petit traité littéraire et didactique, il était encore dans cette mystérieuse ivresse de la composition, instant bien court, où l'auteur, croyant saisir une idéale perfection qu'il n'atteindra pas, est intimement ravi de son ouvrage à faire; il était, disons-nous, dans cette heure d'extase intérieure, où le travail est un délice, où la possession secrète de la muse semble bien plus douce que l'éclatante poursuite de la gloire, lorsqu'un de ses amis les plus sages est venu l'arracher brusquement à cette possession, à cette extase, à cette ivresse, en lui assurant que plusieurs hommes de lettres très hauts, très populaires et très puissants, trouvaient la dissertation qu'il préparait tout à fait méchante, insipide et fastidieuse; que le douloureux apostolat de la critique dont ils se sont chargés dans diverses feuilles publiques, leur imposant le devoir pénible de poursuivre impitoyablement le monstre du romantisme et du mauvais goût, ils s'occupaient, dans le moment même, de rédiger pour certains journaux impartiaux et éclairés une critique consciencieuse, raisonnée et surtout piquante de la susdite dissertation future. À ce terrible avis, le pauvre auteur

Obstipuit; steteruntque comae; et vox faucibus haesit;

c’est-à-dire qu’il n’a trouvé d’autre expédient que de laisser dans les limbes, d’où il se préparait à la tirer, cette dissertation, vierge non encor née, comme parle Jean-Baptiste Rousseau, sur laquelle grondait une si juste et si rude critique. Son ami lui conseilla de la remplacer tout simplement par une manière d’avant-propos des éditeurs, dans lequel il pourrait se faire dire très décemment, par ces messieurs, toutes les douceurs qui chatouillent si voluptueusement l’oreille d’un auteur; il lui en présenta même plusieurs modèles empruntés à quelques ouvrages très en faveur, les uns commençant par ces mots: Le succès immense et populaire de cet ouvrage, etc.; les autres par ceux-ci: La célébrité européenne que vient d’acquérir ce roman, etc.; ou: Il est maintenant superflu de louer ce livre, puisque la voix universelle déclare toutes les louanges fort au-dessous de son mérite, etc., etc. Quoique ces diverses formules, au dire du discret conseiller, ne fussent pas sans quelque vertu tentative, l’auteur de ce livre ne se sentit pas assez d’humilité et d’indifférence paternelle pour exposer son ouvrage au désenchantement et à l’exigence du lecteur qui aurait vu ces magnifiques apologies, ni assez d’effronterie pour imiter ces baladins des foires, qui montrent, comme appât à la curiosité du public, un crocodile peint sur une toile, derrière laquelle, après avoir payé, il ne trouve qu’un lézard. Il rejeta donc l’idée d’entonner ses propres louanges par la bouche complaisante de messieurs ses éditeurs. Son ami lui suggéra alors de donner pour passe-port à son vilain brigand islandais quelque chose qui pût le mettre à la mode et le faire sympathiser avec le siècle, soit plaisanteries fines contre les marquises, soit amers sarcasmes contre les prêtres, soit ingénieuses allusions contre les nonnes, les capucins, et autres monstres de l’ordre social. L’auteur n’eût pas mieux demandé; mais il ne lui semblait pas, à vrai dire, que les marquises et les capucins eussent un rapport très direct avec l’ouvrage qu’il publie. Il eût pu, à la vérité, emprunter d’autres couleurs sur la même palette, et jeter ici quelques bonnes pages bien philanthropiques, dans lesquelles — en côtoyant toutefois avec prudence un banc dangereux, caché sous les mers de la philosophie, qu’on nomme le banc du tribunal correctionnel — il eût avancé quelques-unes de ces vérités découvertes par nos sages pour la gloire de l’homme et la consolation du mourant; savoir, que l’homme n’est qu’une brute, que l’âme n’est qu’un peu de gaz plus ou moins dense, et que Dieu n’est rien; mais il a pensé que ces vérités incontestables étaient déjà bien triviales et bien usées, et qu’il ajouterait à peine une goutte d’eau à ce déluge de morales raisonnables, de religions athées, de maximes, de doctrines, de principes qui nous inondent pour notre bonheur, depuis trente ans, d’une si prodigieuse façon qu’on pourrait — s’il n’y avait irrévérence — leur appliquer les vers de Régnier sur une averse:

Des nuages en eau tombait un tel degoust,
Que les chiens altérés pouvaient boire debout.

Du reste, ces hautes matières ne se rattachaient pas encore très visiblement au sujet de cet ouvrage, et il eût été fort embarrassé de trouver une liaison qui l’y conduisit, quoique l’art des transitions soit singulièrement simplifié depuis que tant de grands hommes ont trouvé le secret de passer sans secousse d’une échoppe dans un palais, et d’échanger sans disparate le bonnet de police contre la couronne civique.

Reconnaissant donc qu’il ne saurait trouver dans son talent ni dans sa science, par ses ailes ou par son bec, comme dit l’ingénieuse poésie des Arabes, une préface intéressante pour les lecteurs, l’auteur de ceci s’est déterminé à ne leur offrir qu’un récit grave et naïf des améliorations apportées à cette seconde édition.

Il les préviendra d’abord que ce mot, seconde édition, est ici assez impropre, et que le titre de première édition est réellement celui qui convient à cette réimpression, attendu que les quatre liasses inégales de papier grisâtre maculé de noir et de blanc, dans lesquelles le public indulgent a bien voulu voir jusqu’ici les quatre volumes de Han d’Islande, avaient été tellement déshonorées d’incongruités typographiques par un imprimeur barbare, que le déplorable auteur, en parcourant sa méconnaissable production, était incessamment livré au supplice d’un père auquel on rendrait son enfant mutilé et tatoué par la main d’un iroquois du lac Ontario.

Ici, l’esclavage du suicide en remplaçait l’usage; ailleurs, Je manoeuvre typographe donnait à un lien une voix qui appartenait à un lion; plus loin il ôtait à la montagne du Dofre-Field ses pics, pour lui attribuer des pieds, on, lorsque les pêcheurs norvégiens s’attendaient à amarrer dans des criques, il poussait leur barque sur des briques. Pour ne pas fatiguer le lecteur, l’auteur passe sous silence tout ce que sa mémoire ulcérée lui rappelle d’outrages de ce genre:

Manet alto in pectore vulnus.

Il lui suffira de dire qu’il n’est pas d’image grotesque, de sens baroque, de pensée absurde, de figure incohérente, d’hiéroglyphe burlesque, que l’ignorance industrieusement stupide de ce prote logogriphique ne lui ait fait exprimer. Hélas! quiconque a fait imprimer douze lignes dans sa vie, ne fût-ce qu'une lettre de mariage ou d'enterrement, sentira l'amertume profonde d'une pareille douleur!

C'est donc avec le soin le plus scrupuleux qu'ont été revues les épreuves de cette nouvelle publication, et maintenant l'auteur ose croire, ainsi qu'un ou deux amis intimes, que ce roman restauré est digne de figurer parmi ces splendides écrits en présence desquels les onze étoiles se prosternent, comme devant la lune et le soleil[Alcoran].

Si messieurs les journalistes l'accusent de n'avoir pas fait de corrections, il prendra la liberté de leur envoyer les épreuves, noircies par un minutieux labeur, de ce livre régénéré; car on prétend qu'il y a parmi ces messieurs plus d'un Thomas l'incrédule.

Du reste, le lecteur bénévole pourra remarquer qu'on a rectifié plusieurs dates, ajouté quelques notes historiques, surtout enrichi un ou deux chapitres d'épigraphes nouvelles; en un mot, il trouvera à chaque page des changements dont l'importance extrême a été mesurée sur celle même de l'ouvrage.

Un impertinent conseiller désirait qu'il mît au bas des feuillets la traduction de toutes les phrases latines que le docte Spiagudry sème dans cet ouvrage, pour l'intelligence — ajoutait ce quidam — de ceux de messieurs les maçons, chaudronniers ou perruquiers qui rédigent certains journaux où pourrait être jugé par hasard Han d'Islande. On pense avec quelle indignation l'auteur a reçu cet insidieux avis. Il a instamment prié le mauvais plaisant d'apprendre que tous les journalistes, indistinctement, sont des soleils d'urbanité, de savoir et de bonne foi, et de ne pas lui faire l'injure de croire qu'il fût du nombre de ces citoyens ingrats, toujours prêts à adresser aux dictateurs du goût et du génie ce méchant vers d'un vieux poëte:

Tenez-vous dans vos peaux et ne jugez personne; que pour lui, enfin, il était loin de penser que la peau du lion ne fût pas la peau véritable de ces populaires seigneurs.

Quelqu'un l'exhortait encore — car il doit tout dire ingénument à ses lecteurs — à placer son nom sur le titre de ce roman, jusqu'ici enfant abandonné d'un père inconnu. Il faut avouer qu'outre l'agrément de voir les sept ou huit caractères romains qui forment ce qu'on appelle son nom, ressortir en belles lettres noires sur de beau papier blanc, il y a bien un certain charme à le faire briller isolément sur le dos de la couverture imprimée, comme si l'ouvrage qu'il revêt, loin d'être le seul monument du génie de l'auteur, n'était que l'une des colonnes du temple imposant où doit s'élever un jour son immortalité, qu'un mince échantillon de son talent caché et de sa gloire inédite. Cela prouve qu'on a au moins l'intention d'être un jour un écrivain illustre et considérable. Il a fallu, pour triompher de cette tentation nouvelle, toute la crainte qu'a éprouvée l'auteur de ne pouvoir percer la foule de ces noircisseurs de papier, lesquels, même en rompant l'anonyme, gardent toujours l'incognito.

Quant à l'observation que plusieurs amateurs d'oreille délicate lui ont soumise touchant la rudesse sauvage de ses noms norvégiens, il la trouve tout à fait fondée; aussi se propose-t-il, dès qu'il sera nommé membre de la société royale de Stockholm ou de l'académie de Berghen, d'inviter messieurs les norvégiens à changer de langue, attendu que le vilain jargon dont ils ont la bizarrerie de se servir, blesse le tympan de nos parisiennes, et que leurs noms biscornus, aussi raboteux que leurs rochers, produisent sur la langue sensible qui les prononce l'effet que ferait sans doute leur huile d'ours et leur pain d'écorce sur les houppes nerveuses et sensitives de notre palais.

Il lui reste à remercier les huit où dix personnes qui ont eu la bonté de lire son ouvrage en entier, comme le constate le succès vraiment prodigieux qu'il a obtenu; il témoigne également toute sa gratitude à celles de ses jolies lectrices qui, lui assure-t-on, ont bien voulu se faire d'après son livre un certain idéal de l'auteur de Han d'Islande; il est infiniment flatté qu'elles veuillent bien lui accorder des cheveux rouges, une barbe crépue et des yeux hagards; il est confus qu'elles daignent lui faire l'honneur de croire qu'il ne coupe jamais ses ongles; mais il les supplie à genoux d'être bien convaincues qu'il ne pousse pas encore la férocité jusqu'à dévorer les petits enfants vivants; du reste, tous ces faits seront fixés lorsque sa renommée sera montée jusqu'au niveau de celles des auteurs de Lolotte et Fanfan ou de Monsieur Botte, hommes transcendants, jumeaux de génie et de goût, Arcades ambo; et qu'on placera en tête de ses oeuvres son portrait, terribiles visu formæ, et sa biographie, domestica facta. Il allait clore cette trop longue note, lorsque son libraire, au moment d'envoyer l'ouvrage aux journaux, est venu lui demander pour eux quelques petits articles de complaisance sur son propre ouvrage, ajoutant, pour dissiper tous les scrupules de l'auteur, que son écriture ne serait pas compromise, et qu'il les recopierait lui-même. Ce dernier trait lui a semblé touchant. Comme il paraît qu’en ce siècle tout lumineux chacun se fait un devoir d’éclairer son prochain sur ses qualités et perfections personnelles, chose dont nul n’est mieux instruit que leur propriétaire; comme, d’ailleurs, cette dernière tentation est assez forte; l’auteur croit, dans le cas où il y succomberait, devoir prévenir le public de ne jamais croire qu’à demi tout ce que les journaux lui diront de son ouvrage.

Avril 1823.

I

L'avez-vous vu? qui est-ce qui l'a vu? — Ce n'est pas moi. — Qui donc? — Je n'en sais rien.

STERNE, Tristram Shandy.

— Voilà où conduit l'amour, voisin Niels, cette pauvre Guth Stersen ne serait point là étendue sur cette grande pierre noire, comme une étoile de mer oubliée par la marée, si elle n'avait jamais songé qu'à reclouer la barque ou à raccommoder les filets de son père, notre vieux camarade. Que saint Usuph le pêcheur le console dans son affliction!

— Et son fiancé, reprit une voix aiguë et tremblotante, Gill Stadt, ce beau jeune homme que vous voyez tout à côté d'elle, n'y serait point, si, au lieu de faire l'amour à Guth et de chercher fortune dans ces maudites mines de Roeraas, il avait passé sa jeunesse à balancer le berceau de son jeune frère aux poutres enfumées de sa chaumière.

Le voisin Niels, à qui s'adressait le premier interlocuteur, interrompit: — Votre mémoire vieillit avec vous, mère Olly; Gill n'a jamais eu de frère, et c'est en cela que la douleur de la pauvre veuve Stadt doit être plus amère, car sa cabane est maintenant tout à fait déserte; si elle veut regarder le ciel pour se consoler, elle trouvera entre ses yeux et le ciel son vieux toit, où pend encore le berceau vide de son enfant, devenu grand jeune homme, et mort.

— Pauvre mère! reprit la vieille Olly, car pour le jeune homme, c'est sa faute; pourquoi se faire mineur à Roeraas?

— Je crois en effet, dit Niels, que ces infernales mines nous prennent un homme par ascalin de cuivre qu'elles nous donnent. Qu'en pensez-vous, compère Braal?

— Les mineurs sont des fous, repartit le pêcheur. Pour vivre, le poisson ne doit pas sortir de l'eau, l'homme ne doit pas entrer en terre.

— Mais, demanda un jeune homme dans la foule, si le travail des mines était nécessaire à Gill Stadt pour obtenir sa fiancée?…

— Il ne faut jamais exposer sa vie, interrompit Olly, pour des affections qui sont loin de la valoir et de la remplir. Le beau lit de noces en effet que Gill a gagné pour sa Guth.

— Cette jeune femme, demanda un autre curieux, s'est donc noyée en désespoir de la mort de ce jeune homme?

— Qui dit cela? s’écria d’une voix forte un soldat qui venait de fendre la presse. Cette jeune fille, que je connais bien, était en effet fiancée à un jeune mineur écrasé dernièrement par un éclat de rocher dans les galeries souterraines de Storwaadsgrube, près Roeraas; mais elle était aussi la maîtresse d’un de mes camarades; et comme avant-hier elle voulut s’introduire à Munckholm furtivement pour y célébrer avec son amant la mort de son fiancé, la barque qui la portait chavira sur un écueil, et elle s’est noyée.

Un bruit confus de voix s’éleva: — Impossible, seigneur soldat, criaient les vieilles femmes; les jeunes se taisaient; et le voisin Niels rappelait malignement au pêcheur Braal sa grave sentence: «Voilà où conduit l’amour!»

Le militaire allait se fâcher sérieusement contre ses contradicteurs femelles; il les avait déjà appelées vieilles sorcières de la grotte de Quiragoth, et elles n’étaient pas disposées à endurer patiemment une si grave insulte, quand une voix aigre et impérieuse, criant paix, paix, radoteuses! vint mettre fin au débat. Tout se tut, comme lorsque le cri subit d’un coq s’élève parmi les glapissements des poules.

Avant de raconter le reste de la scène, il n’est peut-être pas inutile de décrire le lieu où elle se passait; c’était — le lecteur l’a sans doute déjà deviné — dans, un de ces édifices lugubres que la pitié publique et la prévoyance sociale consacrent aux cadavres inconnus, dernier asile de morts qui la plupart ont vécu malheureux; où se pressent le curieux indifférent, l’observateur morose ou bienveillant, et souvent des amis, des parents éplorés, à qui une longue et insupportable inquiétude n’a plus laissé qu’une lamentable espérance. A l’époque déjà loin de nous, et dans le pays peu civilisé où j’ai transporté mon lecteur, on n’avait point encore imaginé, comme dans nos villes de boue et d’or, de faire de ces lieux de dépôt des monuments ingénieusement sinistres et élégamment funèbres. Le jour n’y descendait pas à travers une ouverture de forme tumulaire, le long d’une voûte artistement sculptée, sur des espèces de couches où l’on semble avoir voulu laisser aux morts quelques-unes des commodités de la vie, et où l’oreiller est marqué comme pour le sommeil. Si la porte du gardien s’entr’ouvrait, l’oeil, fatigué par des cadavres nus et hideux, n’avait pas, comme aujourd’hui, le plaisir de se reposer sur des meubles élégants et des enfants joyeux. La mort était là dans toute sa laideur, dans toute son horreur; et l’on n’avait point encore essayé de parer son squelette décharné de pompons et de rubans.

La salle où se trouvaient nos interlocuteurs était spacieuse et obscure, ce qui la faisait paraître plus spacieuse encore; elle ne recevait de jour que par la porte carrée et basse qui s’ouvrait sur le port de Drontheim, et une ouverture grossièrement pratiquée dans le plafond, d’où une lumière blanche et terne tombait avec la pluie, la grêle ou la neige, selon le temps, sur les cadavres couchés directement au-dessous. Cette salle était divisée dans sa largeur par une balustrade de fer à hauteur d’appui. Le public pénétrait dans la première partie par la porte carrée; on voyait dans la seconde six longues dalles de granit noir, disposées de front et parallèlement. Une petite porte latérale servait, dans chaque section, d’entrée au gardien et à son aide, dont le logement remplissait les derrières de l’édifice, adossé à la mer. Le mineur et sa fiancée occupaient deux des lits de granit; la décomposition s’annonçait dans le corps de la jeune fille par les larges taches bleues et pourprées qui couraient le long de ses membres sur la place des vaisseaux sanguins. Les traits de Gill paraissaient durs et sombres; mais son cadavre était si horriblement mutilé, qu’il était impossible de juger si sa beauté était aussi réelle que le disait la vieille Olly.

C’est devant ces restes défigurés qu’avait commencé, au milieu de la foule muette, la conversation dont nous avons été le fidèle interprète.

Un grand homme, sec et vieux, assis les bras croisés et la tête penchée sur un débris d’escabelle dans le coin le plus noir de la salle, n’avait paru y prêter aucune attention jusqu’au moment où il se leva subitement en criant: Paix, paix, radoteuses! et vint saisir le bras du soldat.

Tout le monde se tut; le soldat se retourna et partit d’un brusque éclat de rire à la vue de son singulier interrupteur, dont le visage hâve, les cheveux rares et sales, les longs doigts et le complet accoutrement de cuir de renne, justifiaient amplement un accueil aussi gai. Cependant un murmure s’élevait dans la foule des femmes, un moment interdites: — C’est le gardien du Spladgest [Nom de la morgue de Drontheim].

— Cet infernal concierge des morts! — Ce diabolique Spiagudry! — Ce maudit sorcier…

— Paix, radoteuses, paix! Si c’est aujourd’hui jour de sabbat, hâtez-vous d’aller retrouver vos balais; autrement ils s’envoleront tout seuls. Laissez en paix ce respectable descendant du dieu Thor.

Puis Spiagudry, s’efforçant de faire une grimace gracieuse, adressa la parole au soldat:

— Vous disiez, mon brave, que cette misérable femme…

— Le vieux drôle! murmura Olly; oui, nous sommes pour lui de misérables femmes, parce que nos corps, s’ils tombent en ses griffes, ne lui rapportent à la taxe que trente ascalins, tandis qu’il en reçoit quarante pour la méchante carcasse d’un homme.

— Silence, vieilles! répéta Spiagudry. En vérité, ces filles du diable sont comme leurs chaudières; lorsqu’elles s’échauffent, il faut qu’elles chantent. Dites-moi, vous, mon vaillant roi de l’épée, votre camarade, dont cette Guth était la maîtresse, va sans doute se tuer du désespoir de l’avoir perdue?…

Ici éclata l’explosion longtemps comprimée. — Entendez-vous le mécréant, le vieux païen? crièrent vingt voix aigres et discordantes; il voudrait voir un vivant de moins, à cause des quarante ascalins que lui rapporte un mort.

— Et quand cela serait? reprit le concierge du Spladgest, notre gracieux roi et maître Christiern V, que saint Hospice bénisse, ne se déclare-t-il pas le protecteur né de tous les ouvriers des mines, afin, lorsqu’ils meurent, d’enrichir son trésor royal de leurs chétives dépouilles?

— C’est faire beaucoup d’honneur au roi, répliqua le pêcheur Braal, que de comparer le trésor royal au coffre-fort de votre charnier, et lui à vous, voisin Spiagudry.

— Voisin! dit le concierge, choqué de tant de familiarité; votre voisin! dites plutôt votre hôte, car il se pourrait bien faire que quelque jour, mon cher citoyen de la barque, je vous prêtasse pour une huitaine de jours un de mes six lits de pierre. Au reste, ajouta-t-il en riant, si je parlais de la mort de ce soldat, c’était simplement pour voir se perpétuer l’usage du suicide dans les grandes et tragiques passions que ces dames ont coutume d’inspirer.

— Eh bien! grand cadavre gardien de cadavres, dit le militaire, où en veux-tu donc venir avec ta grimace aimable qui ressemble si bien au dernier éclat de rire d’un pendu?

— À merveille, mon vaillant! répondit Spiagudry, j’ai toujours pensé qu’il y avait plus de facultés spirituelles sous le casque du gendarme Thurn, qui vainquit le diable avec le sabre et la langue, que sous la mitre de l’évêque Isleif, qui a fait l’histoire d’Islande, ou sous le bonnet carré du professeur Shoenning, qui a décrit notre cathédrale.

— En ce cas, si tu m’en crois, mon vieux sac de cuir, tu laisseras là les revenus du charnier, et tu iras te vendre au cabinet de curiosités du vice-roi, à Berghen. Je te jure, par saint Belphégor, qu’on y paye au poids de l’or les animaux rares; mais dis, que veux-tu de moi?

— Quand les corps qu’on nous apporte ont été trouvés dans l’eau, nous sommes obligés de céder la moitié de la taxe aux pêcheurs. Je voulais donc vous prier, illustre héritier du gendarme Thurn, d’engager votre infortuné camarade à ne point se noyer, et à choisir quelque autre genre de mort; la chose doit lui être indifférente, et il ne voudrait pas faire tort en mourant au malheureux chrétien qui donnera l’hospitalité à son cadavre, si toutefois la perte de Guth le pousse à cet acte de désespoir.

— C’est ce qui vous trompe, mon charitable et hospitalier concierge, mon camarade n’aura point la satisfaction d’être reçu dans votre appétissante auberge à six lits. Croyez-vous qu’il ne se soit pas déjà consolé avec une autre valkyrie, de la mort de celle-là? Il y a, par ma barbe, bien longtemps qu’il était las de votre Guth.

À ces mots l’orage, que Spiagudry avait un moment détourné sur sa tête, revint fondre plus terrible que jamais sur le malencontreux soldat.

— Comment, misérable drôle, criaient les vieilles, c’est ainsi que vous nous oubliez! mais aimez donc maintenant ces vauriens-là!

Les jeunes se taisaient encore; quelques-unes même trouvaient, bien malgré elles, que ce mauvais sujet avait assez bonne mine.

— Oh! oh! dit le soldat, est-ce donc une répétition du sabbat? le supplice de Belzébuth est bien effroyable s’il est condamné à entendre de pareils choeurs une fois par semaine!

On ne sait comment cette nouvelle bourrasque se serait passée, si en ce moment l’attention générale n’eût été entièrement absorbée par un bruit venu du dehors. La rumeur s’accrut progressivement, et bientôt un essaim de petits garçons demi-nus, criant et courant autour d’une civière voilée et portée par deux hommes, entra tumultueusement dans le Spladgest.

— D’où vient cela? demanda le concierge aux porteurs.

— Des grèves d’Urchtal.

— Oglypiglap! cria Spiagudry.

Une des portes latérales s’ouvrit, un petit homme de race lapone, vêtu de cuir, se présenta, fit signe aux porteurs de le suivre; Spiagudry les accompagna, et la porte se referma avant que la multitude curieuse eût eu le temps de deviner, à la longueur du corps posé sur la civière, si c’était un homme ou une femme.

Ce sujet occupait encore toutes les conjectures, quand Spiagudry et son aide reparurent dans la seconde salle, portant un cadavre d’homme, qu’ils déposèrent sur l’une des couches de granit.

— Il y a longtemps que je n’avais touché d’aussi beaux habits, dit Oglypiglap; puis, hochant la tête et se haussant sur la pointe des pieds, il accrocha au-dessus du mort un élégant uniforme de capitaine. La tête du cadavre était défigurée et les autres membres couverts de sang; le concierge l’arrosa plusieurs fois avec un vieux seau à demi brisé.

— Par saint Belzébuth! cria le soldat, c’est un officier de mon régiment; voyons, serait-ce le capitaine Bollar… de douleur d’avoir perdu son oncle? Bah! il hérite. — Le baron Randmer? il a risqué hier sa terre au jeu, mais demain il la regagnera avec le château de son adversaire. — Serait-ce le capitaine Lory, dont le chien s’est noyé? ou le trésorier Stunck, dont la femme est infidèle? — Mais, vraiment, je ne vois point dans tout cela de motif pour se faire sauter la cervelle.

La foule croissait à chaque instant. En ce moment un jeune homme qui passait sur le port, voyant cette affluence de peuple, descendit de cheval, remit la bride aux mains du domestique qui le suivait, et entra dans le Spladgest. Il était vêtu d’un simple habit de voyage, armé d’un sabre et enveloppé d’un large manteau vert; une plume noire, attachée à son chapeau par une boucle de diamants, retombait sur sa noble figure et se balançait sur son front élevé, ombragé de longs cheveux châtains; ses bottines et ses éperons, souillés de boue, annonçaient qu’il venait de loin.

Lorsqu’il entra, un homme petit et trapu, enveloppé comme lui d’un manteau, et cachant ses mains sous des gants énormes, répondait au soldat:

— Et qui vous dit qu’il s’est tué? Cet homme ne s’est pas plus suicidé, j’en réponds, que le toit de votre cathédrale ne s’est incendié de lui-même.

Comme la bisaiguë fait deux blessures, cette phrase fit naître deux réponses.

— Notre cathédrale! dit Niels, on la couvre maintenant en cuivre.

C’est ce misérable Han qui, dit-on, y a mis le feu, pour faire travailler les mineurs, parmi lesquels se trouvait son protégé Gill Stadt, que vous voyez ici.

— Comment diable! s’écriait de son côté le soldat, m’oser soutenir à moi, second arquebusier de la garnison de Munckholm, que cet homme-là ne s’est pas brûlé la cervelle!

— Cet homme est mort assassiné, reprit froidement le petit homme.

— Mais écoutez donc l’oracle! Va, tes petits yeux gris ne voient pas plus clair que tes mains sous les gros gants dont tu les couvres au milieu de l’été.

Un éclair brilla dans les yeux du petit homme.

— Soldat! prie ton patron que ces mains-là ne laissent pas un jour leur empreinte sur ton visage.

— Oh! sortons! cria le soldat enflammé de colère. Puis, s’arrêtant tout à coup: Non, dit-il, car il ne faut point parler de duel devant des morts.

Le petit homme grommela quelques mots dans une langue étrangère et disparut.

Une voix s’éleva: — C’est aux grèves d’Urchtal qu’on l’a trouvé.

— Aux grèves d’Urchtal? dit le soldat; le capitaine Dispolsen a dû y débarquer ce matin, venant de Copenhague.

— Le capitaine Dispolsen n’est point encore arrivé à Munckholm, dit une autre voix.

— On dit que Han d’Islande erre actuellement sur ces plages, reprit un quatrième.

— En ce cas, il est possible que cet homme soit le capitaine, dit le soldat, si Han est le meurtrier; car chacun sait que l’islandais assassine d’une manière si diabolique, que ses victimes ont souvent l’apparence de suicidés.

— Quel homme est-ce donc que ce Han? demanda-t-on.

— C’est un géant, dit l’un.

— C’est un nain, dit l’autre.

— Personne ne l’a donc vu? reprit une voix.

— Ceux qui le voient pour la première fois le voient aussi pour la dernière.

— Chut! dit la vieille Olly; il n’y a, dit-on, que trois personnes qui aient jamais échangé des paroles humaines avec lui: ce réprouvé de Spiagudry, la veuve Stadt, et…. — mais il a eu malheureuse vie et malheureuse mort — ce pauvre Gill, que vous voyez ici. Chut!

— Chut! répéta-t-on de toutes parts.

— Maintenant, s’écria tout à coup le soldat, je suis sûr que c’est en effet le capitaine Dispolsen; je reconnais la chaîne d’acier que notre prisonnier, le vieux Schumacker, lui donna en don à son départ.

Le jeune homme à la plume noire rompit vivement le silence: — Vous êtes sûr que c’est le capitaine Dispolsen?

— Sûr, par les mérites de saint Belzébuth! dit le soldat.

Le jeune homme sortit brusquement.

— Fais avancer une barque pour Munckholm, dit-il à son domestique.

— Mais, seigneur, et le général?….

— Tu lui mèneras les chevaux. J’irai demain. Suis-je mon maître ou non? Allons, le jour baisse; et je suis pressé, une barque.

Le valet obéit et suivit quelque temps des yeux son jeune maître, qui s’éloignait du rivage.

II

Je m’assiérai près de vous, tandis que vous raconterez quelque histoire agréable pour tromper le temps.

MATURIN, Bertram.

Le lecteur sait déjà que nous sommes à Drontheim, l’une des quatre principales villes de la Norvège, bien qu’elle ne fût pas la résidence du vice-roi. À l’époque où cette histoire se passe — en 1699 — le royaume de Norvège était encore uni au Danemark et gouverné par des vice-rois, dont le séjour était Berghen, cité plus grande, plus méridionale et plus belle que Drontheim, en dépit du surnom de mauvais goût que lui donnait le célèbre amiral Tromp.

Drontheim offre un aspect agréable lorsqu’on y arrive par le golfe auquel cette ville donne son nom; le port assez large, quoique les vaisseaux n’y entrent pas aisément en tout temps, ne présentait toutefois alors que l’apparence d’un long canal, bordé à droite de navires danois et norvégiens, à gauche de navires étrangers, division prescrite par les ordonnances. On voit dans le fond la ville assise sur une plaine bien cultivée, et surmontée par les hautes aiguilles de sa cathédrale. Cette église, un des plus beaux morceaux de l’architecture gothique, comme on peut en juger par le livre du professeur Shoenning — si savamment cité par Spiagudry — qui la décrivit avant que de fréquents incendies ne l’eussent ravagée, portait sur sa flèche principale la croix épiscopale, signe distinctif de la cathédrale de l’évêché luthérien de Drontheim. Au-dessus de la ville, on aperçoit dans un lointain bleuâtre les cimes blanches et grêles des monts de Kole, pareilles aux fleurons aigus d’une couronne antique.

Au milieu du port, à une portée de canon du rivage, s’élève, sur une masse de rochers battus des flots, la solitaire forteresse de Munckholm, sombre prison qui renfermait alors un captif célèbre par l’éclat de ses longues prospérités et de ses rapides disgrâces.

Schumacker, né dans un rang obscur, avait été comblé des faveurs de son maître, puis précipité du fauteuil de grand-chancelier de Danemark et de Norvège sur le banc des traîtres, puis traîné sur l’échafaud, et de là jeté par grâce dans un cachot isolé à l’extrémité des deux royaumes. Ses créatures l’avaient renversé, sans qu’il eût droit de crier à l’ingratitude. Pouvait-il se plaindre de voir se briser sous ses pieds des échelons qu’il n’avait placés si haut que pour s’élever lui-même?

Celui qui avait fondé la noblesse en Danemark voyait, du fond de son exil, les grands qu’il avait faits se partager ses propres dignités. Le comte d’Ahlefeld, son mortel ennemi, était son successeur comme grand-chancelier; le général Arensdorf disposait, comme grand maréchal, des grades militaires; et l’évêque Spollyson exerçait la charge d’inspecteur des universités. Le seul de ses ennemis qui ne lui dût pas son élévation était le comte Ulric-Frédéric Guldenlew, fils naturel du roi Frédéric III, vice-roi de Norvège; c’était le plus généreux de tous.

C’est vers le triste rocher de Munckholm que s’avançait assez lentement la barque du jeune homme à la plume noire. Le soleil baissait rapidement derrière le château-fort isolé, dont la masse interceptait ses rayons, déjà si horizontaux que le paysan des collines lointaines et orientales de Larsynn pouvait voir se promener près de lui, sur les bruyères, l’ombre vague de la sentinelle placée sur le donjon le plus élevé de Munckholm.

III

Ah! mon coeur ne pouvait être plus sensiblement blessé!… Un jeune homme sans moeurs… il a osé la regarder! ses regards souillaient sa pureté. — Claudia! cette seule pensée me met hors de moi.

LESSING.

— Andrew, allez dire que dans une demi-heure on sonne le couvre-feu. Sorsyll relèvera Duckness à la grande herse, et Maldivius montera sur la plate-forme de la grosse tour. Qu’on veille attentivement du côté du donjon du Lion de Slesvig. Ne pas oublier à sept heures de tirer le canon pour qu’on lève la chaîne du port; — mais non, on attend encore le capitaine Dispolsen; il faut au contraire allumer le fanal et voir si celui de Walderhog est allumé, comme l’ordre en a été donné aujourd’hui. Surtout qu’on tienne des rafraîchissements prêts pour le capitaine. — Et, j’oubliais, — qu’on marque pour deux jours de cachot Toric-Belfast, second arquebusier du régiment; il a été absent toute la journée.

Ainsi parlait le sergent d’armes sous la voûte noire et enfumée du corps de garde de Munckholm, situé dans la tour basse qui domine la première porte du château.

Les soldats auxquels il s’adressait quittèrent le jeu ou le lit pour exécuter ses ordres; puis le silence se rétablit.

En ce moment, le bruit alternatif et mesuré des rames se fit entendre au dehors. — Voilà sans doute, enfin, le capitaine Dispolsen! dit le sergent en ouvrant la petite fenêtre grillée qui donne sur le golfe.

Une barque abordait en effet au bas de la porte de fer.

— Qui va là? cria le sergent d’une voix rauque.

— Ouvrez! répondit-on; paix et sûreté.

— On n’entre pas; avez-vous droit de passe?

— Oui.

— C’est ce que je vais vérifier; si vous mentez, par les mérites du saint mon patron, je vous ferai goûter l’eau du golfe.

Puis, refermant le guichet et se retournant, il ajouta: — Ce n’est point encore le capitaine!

Une lumière brilla derrière la porte de fer; les verrous rouillés crièrent; les barres se levèrent, elle s’ouvrit, et le sergent examina un parchemin que lui présentait le nouveau venu.

— Passez, dit-il. Arrêtez cependant, reprit-il brusquement, laissez en dehors la boucle de votre chapeau. On n’entre pas dans les prisons d’état avec des bijoux. Le règlement porte que «le roi et les membres de la famille du roi, — le vice-roi et les membres de la famille du vice-roi, l’évêque et les chefs de la garnison, sont seuls exceptés». Vous n’avez, n’est-ce pas, aucune de ces qualités?

Le jeune homme détacha, sans répondre, la boucle proscrite, et la jeta pour payement au pêcheur qui l’avait amené; celui-ci, craignant qu’il ne revînt sur sa générosité, se hâta de mettre un large espace de mer entre le bienfaiteur et le bienfait.

Tandis que le sergent, murmurant de l’imprudence de la chancellerie qui prodiguait ainsi les droits de passe, replaçait les lourds barreaux, et que le bruit lent de ses bottes fortes retentissait sur les degrés de l’escalier tournant du corps de garde, le jeune homme, après avoir rejeté son manteau sur son épaule, traversait rapidement la voûte noire de la tour basse, puis la longue place d’armes, puis le hangar de l’artillerie où gisaient quelques vieilles couleuvrines démontées que l’on peut voir aujourd’hui dans le musée de Copenhague, et dont le cri impérieux d’une sentinelle l’avertit de s’éloigner. Il parvint à la grande herse, qui fut levée à l’inspection de son parchemin. Là, suivi d’un soldat, il franchit, suivant la diagonale, sans hésiter et comme un habitué de ces lieux, une de ces quatre cours carrées qui flanquent la grande cour circulaire, du milieu de laquelle sort le vaste rocher rond où s’élevait alors le donjon, dit château du Lion de Slesvig, à cause de la détention que Rolf le Nain y fit jadis subir à son frère, Joatham le Lion, duc de Slesvig.

Notre intention n’est pas de donner ici une description du donjon de Munckholm, d’autant plus que le lecteur, enfermé dans une prison d’état, craindrait peut-être de ne pouvoir se sauver au travers du jardin. Ce serait à tort, car le château du Lion de Slesvig, destiné à des prisonniers de distinction, leur offrait, entre autres commodités, celle de se promener dans une espèce de jardin sauvage assez étendu, où des touffes de houx, quelques vieux ifs, quelques pins noirs, croissaient parmi les rochers autour de la haute prison, et dans un enclos de grands murs et d’énormes tours.

Arrivé au pied du rocher rond, le jeune homme gravit les degrés grossièrement taillés qui montent tortueusement jusqu’au pied de l’une des tours de l’enclos, laquelle, percée d’une poterne dans sa partie inférieure, servait d’entrée au donjon. Là, il sonna fortement d’un cor de cuivre que lui avait remis le gardien de la grande herse.-Ouvrez, ouvrez! cria vivement une voix de l’intérieur, c’est sans doute ce maudit capitaine!

La poterne qui s’ouvrit laissa voir au nouvel arrivant, dans l’intérieur d’une salle gothique faiblement éclairée, un jeune officier nonchalamment couché sur un amas de manteaux et de peaux de rennes, près d’une de ces lampes à trois becs que nos aïeux suspendaient aux rosaces de leurs plafonds, et qui, pour le moment, était posée à terre. La richesse élégante et même l’excessive recherche de ses vêtements contrastaient avec la nudité de la salle et la grossièreté des meubles; il tenait un livre entre ses mains et se détourna à demi vers le nouveau venu.

— C’est le capitaine? salut, capitaine! Vous ne vous doutiez guère que vous faisiez attendre un homme qui n’a point la satisfaction de vous connaître; mais notre connaissance sera bientôt faite, n’est-il pas vrai? Commencez par recevoir tous mes compliments de condoléance sur votre retour dans ce vénérable château. Pour peu que j’y séjourne encore, je vais devenir gai comme la chouette qu’on cloue à la porte des donjons pour servir d’épouvantail, et quand je retournerai à Copenhague pour les fêtes du mariage de ma soeur, du diable si quatre dames sur cent me reconnaissent! Dites-moi, les noeuds de ruban rose au bas du justaucorps sont-ils toujours de mode? a-t-on traduit quelques nouveaux romans de cette Française, la demoiselle Scudéry? Je tiens précisément la Clélie; je suppose qu’on la lit encore à Copenhague. C’est mon code de galanterie, maintenant que je soupire loin de tant de beaux yeux…. — car, tout beaux qu’ils sont, les yeux de notre jeune prisonnière, vous savez de qui je veux parler, ne me disent jamais rien. Ah! sans les ordres de mon père!… Il faut vous dire en confidence, capitaine, que mon père, n’en parlez pas, m’a chargé de… vous m’entendez, auprès de la fille de Schumacker; mais je perds toutes mes peines, cette jolie statue n’est pas une femme; elle pleure toujours et ne me regarde jamais.

Le jeune homme, qui n’avait pu encore interrompre l’extrême volubilité de l’officier, poussa un cri de surprise: — Comment! que dites-vous? chargé de séduire la fille de ce malheureux Schumacker!…

— Séduire, eh bien soit! si c’est ainsi que cela s’appelle à présent à Copenhague; mais j’en défierais le diable. Avant-hier, étant de garde, je mis exprès pour elle une superbe fraise française qui m’était envoyée de Paris même. Croiriez-vous qu’elle n’a pas levé seulement les yeux sur moi, quoique j’aie traversé trois ou quatre fois son appartement en faisant sonner mes éperons neufs, dont la molette est plus large qu’un ducat de Lombardie? — C’est la forme la plus nouvelle, n’est-ce pas?

— Dieu! Dieu! dit le jeune homme en se frappant le front! mais cela me confond!

— N’est-ce pas? reprit l’officier, se méprenant sur le sens de cette exclamation. Pas la moindre attention à moi! c’est incroyable, mais c’est pourtant vrai.

Le jeune homme se promenait, violemment agité, de long en large et à grands pas.

— Voulez-vous vous rafraîchir, capitaine Dispolsen? lui cria l’officier.

Le jeune homme se réveilla.

— Je ne suis point le capitaine Dispolsen.

— Comment! dit l’officier d’un ton sévère, et se levant sur son séant; et qui donc êtes-vous pour oser vous introduire ici, et à cette heure?

Le jeune homme déploya sa pancarte.

— Je veux voir le comte Griffenfeld;… je veux dire votre prisonnier.

— Le comte! le comte! murmura l’officier d’un air mécontent. — Mais en vérité cette pièce est en règle; voilà bien la signature du vice-chancelier Grummond de Knud: «Le porteur pourra visiter, à toute heure et en tout temps, toutes les prisons royales.» Grummond de Knud est frère du vieux général Levin de Knud, qui commande à Drontheim, et vous saurez que ce vieux général a élevé mon futur beau-frère.

— Merci de vos détails de famille, lieutenant. Ne pensez-vous pas que vous m’en avez déjà assez raconté?

— L’impertinent a raison, se dit le lieutenant en se mordant les lèvres. — Holà, huissier! huissier de la tour! Conduisez cet étranger à Schumacker, et ne grondez pas si j’ai décroché votre luminaire à trois becs et à une mèche. Je n’étais pas fâché d’examiner une pièce qui date sans doute de Sciold le Païen ou de Havar le Pourfendu; et d’ailleurs on ne suspend plus aux plafonds que des lustres en cristal.

Il dit, et pendant que le jeune homme et son conducteur traversaient le jardin désert du donjon, il reprit, martyr de la mode, le fil des aventures galantes de l’amazone Clélie et d’Horatius le Borgne.

IV

BENVOLIO

Où diable ce Roméo peut-il être? il n'est pas rentré chez lui cette nuit.

MERCUTIO

Il n'est pas rentré chez son père; j'ai parlé à son domestique.

SHAKESPEARE.

Cependant un homme et deux chevaux étaient entrés dans la cour du palais du gouverneur de Drontheim. Le cavalier avait quitté la selle en hochant la tête d'un air mécontent; il se préparait à conduire les deux montures à l'écurie, lorsqu'il se sentit saisir brusquement le bras, et une voix lui cria:

— Comment! vous voilà seul, Poël! Et votre maître? où est votre maître?

C'était le vieux général Levin de Knud, qui, de sa fenêtre, ayant vu le domestique du jeune homme et la selle vide, était descendu précipitamment et fixait sur le valet un regard plus inquiet encore que sa question.

— Excellence, dit Poël en s'inclinant profondément, mon maître n'est plus à Drontheim.

— Quoi! il y était donc? il est reparti sans voir son général, sans embrasser son vieil ami! et depuis quand?

— Il est arrivé ce soir et reparti ce soir.

— Ce soir! ce soir! mais où donc s'est-il arrêté? où est-il allé?

— Il a descendu au Spladgest, et s'est embarqué pour Munckholm.

— Ah! je le croyais aux antipodes. Mais que va-t-il faire à ce château? qu'allait-il faire au Spladgest? Voilà bien mon chevalier errant! C'est aussi un peu ma faute, pourquoi l'ai-je élevé ainsi? J'ai voulu qu'il fût libre en dépit de son rang.

— Aussi n'est-il point esclave des étiquettes, dit Poël.

— Non, mais il l'est de ses caprices. Allons, il va sans doute revenir. Songez à vous rafraîchir, Poël. — Dites-moi, et le visage du général prit une expression de sollicitude, dites-moi, Poël, avez-vous beaucoup couru à droite et à gauche?

— Mon général, nous sommes venus en droite ligne de Berghen. Mon maître était triste.

— Triste? que s'est-il donc passé entre lui et son père? Ce mariage lui déplaît-il?

— Je l'ignore. Mais on dit que sa sérénité l'exige.

— L'exige! vous dites, Poël, que le vice-roi l'exige! Mais pour qu'il l'exige, il faut qu'Ordener s'y refuse.

— Je l'ignore, excellence. Il paraît triste.

— Triste! savez-vous comment son père l'a reçu?

— La première fois, c'était dans le camp, près Berghen. Sa sérénité a dit: Je ne vous vois pas souvent, mon fils. — Tant mieux pour moi, mon seigneur et père, a répondu mon maître, si vous vous en apercevez. Puis il a donné à sa sérénité des détails sur ses courses du Nord; et sa sérénité a dit: C'est bien. Le lendemain, mon maître est revenu du palais, et a dit: On veut me marier; mais il faut que je voie mon second père, le général Levin. — J'ai sellé les chevaux, et nous voilà.

— Vrai, mon bon Poël, dit le général d'une voix altérée, il m'a appelé son second père?

— Oui, votre excellence.

— Malheur à moi si ce mariage le contrarie, car j'encourrai plutôt la disgrâce du roi que de m'y prêter. Mais cependant, la fille du grand-chancelier des deux royaumes!… À propos, Poël, Ordener sait-il que sa future belle-mère, la comtesse d'Ahlefeld, est ici incognito depuis hier, et que le comte y est attendu?

— Je l'ignore, mon général.

— Oh! se dit le vieux gouverneur, oui, il le sait, car pourquoi aurait-il battu en retraite dès son arrivée?

Ici le général, après avoir fait un signe de bienveillance à Poël, et salué la sentinelle qui lui présentait les armes, rentra inquiet dans l'hôtel d'où il venait de sortir inquiet.

V

On eût dit que toutes les passions avaient agité son coeur, et que toutes l’avaient abandonné; il ne lui restait rien que le coup d’oeil triste et perçant d’un homme consommé dans la connaissance des hommes, et qui voyait, d’un regard, où tendait chaque chose.

Quand, après avoir fait parcourir à l’étranger les escaliers en spirale et les hautes salles du donjon du Lion de Slesvig, l’huissier lui ouvrit enfin la porte de l’appartement où se trouvait celui qu’il cherchait, la première parole qui frappa les oreilles du jeune homme fut encore celle-ci: — Est-ce enfin le capitaine Dispolsen?

Celui qui faisait cette question était un vieillard assis le dos tourné à la porte, les coudes appuyés sur une table de travail et le front appuyé sur ses mains. Il était revêtu d’une simarre de laine noire, et l’on apercevait, au-dessus d’un lit placé à une extrémité de la chambre, un écusson brisé autour duquel étaient suspendus les colliers rompus des ordres de l’Éléphant et de Dannebrog; une couronne de comte renversée était fixée au-dessous de l’écusson, et les deux fragments d’une main de justice liés en croix complétaient l’ensemble de ces bizarres ornements. — Le vieillard était Schumacker.

— Non, seigneur, répondit l’huissier; puis il dit à l’étranger: Voici le prisonnier; et, les laissant ensemble, il referma la porte, avant d’avoir pu entendre la voix aigre du vieillard, qui disait: Si ce n’est pas le capitaine, je ne veux voir personne.

L’étranger, à ces mots, resta debout près de la porte; et le prisonnier, se croyant seul, — car il ne s’était pas un moment détourné, — retomba dans sa silencieuse rêverie.

Tout à coup il s’écria: — Le capitaine m’a certainement abandonné et trahi! Les hommes…. les hommes sont comme ce glaçon qu’un Arabe prit pour un diamant; il le serra précieusement dans son havre-sac, et quand il le chercha, il ne trouva même plus un peu d’eau.

— Je ne suis pas de ces hommes, dit l’étranger.

Schumacker se leva brusquement. — Qui est ici? qui m’écoute? Est-ce quelque misérable suppôt de ce Guldenlew?

— Ne parlez point mal du vice-roi, seigneur comte.

— Seigneur comte! est-ce pour me flatter que vous m’appelez ainsi? Vous perdez vos peines; je ne suis plus puissant.

— Celui qui vous parle ne vous a jamais connu puissant, et n’en est pas moins votre ami.

— C’est qu’il espère encore quelque chose de moi; les souvenirs que l’on conserve aux malheureux se mesurent toujours aux espérances qui en restent.

— C’est moi qui devrais me plaindre, noble comte; car je me suis souvenu de vous, et vous m’avez oublié. Je suis Ordener.

Un éclair de joie passa dans les tristes yeux du vieillard, et un sourire qu’il ne put réprimer entr’ouvrit sa barbe blanche, comme le rayon qui perce un nuage.

— Ordener! soyez le bienvenu, voyageur Ordener. Mille voeux de bonheur au voyageur qui se souvient du prisonnier!

— Mais, demanda Ordener, vous, m’aviez donc oublié?

— Je vous avais oublié, dit Schumacker reprenant son air sombre, comme on oublie la brise qui nous rafraîchit et qui passe; heureux lorsqu’elle ne devient pas l’ouragan qui nous renverse.

— Comte de Griffenfeld, reprit le jeune homme, vous ne comptiez donc pas sur mon retour?

— Le vieux Schumacker n’y comptait pas; mais il y a ici une jeune fille qui me faisait remarquer aujourd’hui même qu’il y avait eu, le 8 mai dernier, un an que vous étiez absent.

Ordener tressaillit.

— Quoi, grand Dieu! serait-ce votre Éthel, noble comte?

— Et qui donc?

— Votre fille, seigneur, a daigné compter les mois depuis mon départ! Oh! combien j’ai passé de tristes journées! j’ai visité toute la Norvège, depuis Christiania jusqu’à Wardhus; mais c’est vers Drontheim que mes courses me ramenaient toujours.

— Usez de votre liberté, jeune homme, tant que vous en jouissez. — Mais dites-moi donc enfin qui vous êtes. Je voudrais, Ordener, vous connaître sous un autre nom. Le fils d’un de mes mortels ennemis s’appelle Ordener.

— Peut-être, seigneur comte, ce mortel ennemi a-t-il plus de bienveillance pour vous que vous n’en avez pour lui.

— Vous éludez ma question; mais gardez votre secret, j'apprendrais peut-être que le fruit qui désaltère est un poison qui me tuera.

— Comte! dit Ordener d'une voix irritée. Comte! reprit-il d'un ton de reproche et de pitié.

— Suis-je contraint de me fier à vous, répondit Schumacker, à vous qui prenez toujours en ma présence le parti de l'implacable Guldenlew?

— Le vice-roi, interrompit gravement le jeune homme, vient d'ordonner que vous seriez à l'avenir libre et sans gardes dans l'intérieur de tout le donjon du Lion de Slesvig. C'est une nouvelle que j'ai recueillie à Berghen, et que vous recevrez sans doute prochainement.

— C'est une faveur que je n'osais espérer, et je croyais n'avoir parlé de mon désir qu'à vous seul. Au surplus, on diminue le poids de mes fers à mesure que celui de mes années s'accroît, et, quand les infirmités m'auront rendu impotent, on me dira sans doute: Vous êtes libre. À ces mots le vieillard sourit amèrement; il continua:

— Et vous, jeune homme, avez-vous toujours vos folles idées d'indépendance?

— Si je n'avais point ces folles idées, je ne serais pas ici.

— Comment êtes-vous venu à Drontheim?

— Eh bien! à cheval.

— Comment êtes-vous venu à Munckholm?

— Sur une barque.

— Pauvre insensé! qui crois être libre, et qui passes d'un cheval dans une barque. Ce ne sont point tes membres qui exécutent tes volontés; c'est un animal, c'est la matière; et tu appelles cela des volontés!

— Je force des êtres à m'obéir.

— Prendre sur certains êtres le droit d'en être obéi, c'est donner à d'autres celui de vous commander. L'indépendance n'est que dans l'isolement.

— Vous n'aimez pas les hommes, noble comte?

Le vieillard se mit à rire tristement. — Je pleure d'être homme, et je ris de celui qui me console. — Vous le saurez, si vous l'ignorez encore, le malheur rend défiant comme la prospérité rend ingrat. Écoutez, puisque vous venez de Berghen, apprenez-moi quel vent favorable a soufflé sur le capitaine Dispolsen. Il faut qu'il lui soit arrivé quelque chose d'heureux, puisqu'il m'oublie.

Ordener devint sombre et embarrassé.

— Dispolsen, seigneur comte? C’est pour vous en parler que je suis venu dès aujourd’hui. — Je sais qu’il avait toute votre confiance.

— Vous le savez? interrompit le prisonnier avec inquiétude. Vous vous trompez. Nul être au monde n’a ma confiance. — Dispolsen tient, il est vrai, entre ses mains mes papiers, des papiers même très importants. C’est pour moi qu’il est allé à Copenhague, près du roi. J’avouerai même que je comptais plus sur lui que sur tout autre, car dans ma puissance je ne lui avais jamais rendu service.

— Eh bien! noble comte, je l’ai vu aujourd’hui….

— Votre trouble me dit le reste; il est traître.

— Il est mort.

— Mort!

Le prisonnier croisa ses bras et baissa la tête, puis relevant son oeil vers le jeune homme:

— Quand je vous disais qu’il lui était arrivé quelque chose d’heureux!

Puis son regard se tourna vers la muraille où étaient suspendus les signes de ses grandeurs détruites, et il fit un geste de la main comme pour éloigner le témoin d’une douleur qu’il s’efforçait de vaincre.

— Ce n’est pas lui que je plains; ce n’est qu’un homme de moins. — Ce n’est pas moi; qu’ai-je à perdre? Mais ma fille, ma fille infortunée! je serai la victime de cette infâme machination; et que deviendra-t-elle si on lui enlève son père?

Il se retourna vivement vers Ordener.

— Comment est-il mort? où l’avez-vous vu? Je l’ai vu au Spladgest; on — ne sait s’il est mort d’un suicide ou d’un assassinat.

— Voici maintenant l’important. S’il a été assassiné, je sais d’où le coup part; alors tout est perdu. Il m’apportait les preuves du complot qu’ils trament contre moi; ces preuves auraient pu me sauver et les perdre. Ils ont su les détruire! — Malheureuse Éthel!

— Seigneur comte, dit Ordener en saluant, je vous dirai demain s’il a été assassiné.

Schumacker, sans répondre, suivit Ordener qui sortait, d’un regard où se peignait le calme du désespoir, plus effrayant que le calme de la mort.

Ordener était dans l’antichambre solitaire du prisonnier, sans savoir de quel côté se diriger. La soirée était avancée et la salle obscure; il ouvrit une porte au hasard et se trouva dans un immense corridor, éclairé seulement par la lune, qui courait rapidement à travers de pâles nuées. Ses lueurs nébuleuses tombaient par intervalles sur les vitraux étroits et élevés, et dessinaient sur la muraille opposée comme une longue procession de fantômes, qui apparaissait et disparaissait simultanément dans les profondeurs de la galerie. Le jeune homme se signa lentement, et marcha vers une lumière rougeâtre qui brillait faiblement à l'extrémité du corridor.

Une porte était entr'ouverte; une jeune fille agenouillée dans un oratoire gothique, au pied d'un simple autel, récitait à demi-voix les litanies de la Vierge; oraison simple et sublime où l'âme qui s'élève vers la Mère des Sept-Douleurs ne la prie que de prier.

Cette jeune fille était vêtue de crêpe noir et de gaze blanche, comme pour faire deviner en quelque sorte, au premier aspect, que ses jours s'étaient enfuis jusqu'alors dans la tristesse et dans l'innocence. Même en cette attitude modeste, elle portait dans tout son être l'empreinte d'une nature singulière. Ses yeux et ses longs cheveux étaient noirs, beauté très rare dans le Nord; son regard élevé vers la voûte paraissait plutôt enflammé par l'extase qu'éteint par le recueillement. Enfin, on eût dit une vierge des rives de Chypre ou des campagnes de Tibur, revêtue des voiles fantastiques d'Ossian, et prosternée devant la croix de bois et l'autel de pierre de Jésus.

Ordener tressaillit et fut prêt à défaillir, car il reconnut celle qui priait.

Elle pria pour son père, pour le puissant tombé, pour le vieux captif abandonné, et elle récita à haute voix le psaume de la délivrance.

Elle pria encore pour un autre; mais Ordener n'entendit pas le nom de celui pour qui elle priait; il ne l'entendit pas, car elle ne le prononça pas; seulement elle récita le cantique de la sulamite, l'épouse qui attend l'époux, et le retour du bien-aimé.

Ordener s'éloigna dans la galerie; il respecta cette vierge qui s'entretenait avec le ciel; la prière est un grand mystère, et son coeur s'était rempli, malgré lui, d'un ravissement inconnu, mais profane.

La porte de l'oratoire se ferma doucement. Bientôt une lumière, et une femme blanche dans les ténèbres, vinrent de son côté. Il s'arrêta, car il éprouvait une des plus violentes émotions de la vie; il s'adossa à l'obscure muraille; son corps était faible, et les os de ses membres s'entre-choquaient dans leurs jointures, et, dans le silence de tout son être, les battements de son coeur retentissaient à son oreille.

Quand la jeune fille passa, elle entendit le froissement d'un manteau, et une haleine brusque et précipitée.

— Dieu! cria-t-elle.

Ordener s’élança; d’un bras il la soutint, de l’autre il chercha vainement à retenir la lampe, qu’elle avait laissée échapper, et qui s’éteignit.

— C’est moi, dit-il doucement.

— C’est Ordener! dit la jeune fille, car le dernier retentissement de cette voix, qu’elle n’avait pas entendue depuis un an, était encore dans son oreille.

Et la lune qui passait éclaira la joie de sa charmante figure; puis elle reprit, timide et confuse, et se dégageant des bras du jeune homme:

— C’est le seigneur Ordener.

— C’est lui, comtesse Éthel.

— Pourquoi m’appelez-vous comtesse?

— Pourquoi m’appelez-vous seigneur?

La jeune fille se tut et sourit; le jeune homme se tut et soupira.

Elle rompit la première le silence:

— Comment donc êtes-vous ici?

— Faites-moi merci, si ma présence vous afflige. J’étais venu pour parler au comte votre père.

— Ainsi, dit Éthel d’une voix altérée, vous n’êtes venu que pour mon père. Le jeune homme baissa la tête, car ces paroles lui semblaient bien injustes.

— Il y a sans doute déjà longtemps, continua la jeune fille d’un ton de reproche, il y a sans doute déjà longtemps que vous êtes à Drontheim? Votre absence de ce château n’a pu vous paraître longue, à vous.

Ordener, profondément blessé, ne répondit pas.

— Je vous approuve, dit la prisonnière d’une voix tremblante de douleur et de colère; mais, ajouta-t-elle d’un ton fier, j’espère, seigneur Ordener, que vous ne m’avez pas entendue prier?

— Comtesse, répondit enfin le jeune homme, je vous ai entendue.

— Ah! seigneur Ordener, il n’est point courtois d’écouter ainsi.

— Je ne vous ai pas écoutée, noble comtesse, dit faiblement Ordener; je vous ai entendue.

— J’ai prié pour mon père, reprit la jeune fille en le regardant fixement, et comme attendant une réponse à cette parole toute simple.

Ordener garda le silence.

— J’ai aussi prié, continua-t-elle, inquiète et paraissant attentive à l’effet que ces paroles allaient produire sur lui, j’ai aussi prié pour quelqu’un qui porte votre nom, pour le fils du vice-roi, du comte de Guldenlew. Car il faut prier pour tout le monde, même pour ses persécuteurs.

Et la jeune fille rougit, car elle pensait mentir; mais elle était piquée contre le jeune homme, et elle croyait l'avoir nommé pendant sa prière; elle ne l'avait nommé que dans son coeur.

— Ordener Guldenlew est bien malheureux, noble dame, si vous le comptez au nombre de vos persécuteurs; il est bien heureux cependant d'occuper une place dans vos prières.

— Oh! non, dit Éthel troublée et effrayée de l'air froid du jeune homme, non, je ne priais pas pour lui. J'ignore ce que j'ai fait, ce que je fais. Quant au fils du vice-roi, je le déteste, je ne le connais pas. Ne me regardez pas de cet oeil sévère; vous ai-je offensé? ne pouvez-vous rien pardonner à une pauvre prisonnière, vous qui passez vos jours près de quelque belle et noble dame libre et heureuse comme vous!

— Moi, comtesse! s'écria Ordener.

Éthel versait des larmes; le jeune homme se précipita à ses pieds.

— Ne m'avez-vous pas dit, continua-t-elle souriant à travers ses pleurs, que votre absence vous avait semblé courte?

— Qui, moi, comtesse?

— Ne m'appelez pas ainsi, dit-elle doucement, je ne suis plus comtesse pour personne, et surtout pour vous.

Le jeune homme se leva violemment, et ne put s'empêcher de la presser sur son coeur dans un ravissement convulsif.

— Eh bien! mon Éthel adorée, nomme-moi ton Ordener. — Dis-moi, — et il attacha un regard brûlant sur ses yeux mouillés de larmes, — dis-moi, tu m'aimes donc? Ce que dit la jeune fille ne fut pas entendu, car Ordener, hors de lui, avait ravi sur ses lèvres avec sa réponse cette première faveur, ce baiser sacré qui suffit aux yeux de Dieu pour changer deux amants en époux.

Tous deux restèrent sans paroles, parce qu'ils étaient dans un de ces moments solennels, si rares et si courts sur la terre, où l'âme semble éprouver quelque chose de la félicité des cieux. Ce sont des instants indéfinissables que ceux où deux âmes s'entretiennent ainsi dans un langage qui ne peut être compris que d'elles; alors tout ce qu'il y a d'humain se tait, et les deux êtres immatériels s'unissent mystérieusement pour la vie de ce monde et l'éternité de l'autre.

Éthel s’était lentement retirée des bras d’Ordener, et, aux lueurs de la lune, ils se regardaient avec ivresse; seulement, l’oeil de flamme du jeune homme respirait un mâle orgueil et un courage de lion, tandis que le regard demi-voilé de la jeune fille était empreint de cette pudeur, honte angélique, qui, dans le coeur d’une vierge, se mêle à toutes les joies de l’amour.

— Tout à l’heure, dans ce corridor, dit-elle enfin, vous m’évitiez donc, mon Ordener?

— Je ne vous évitais pas, j’étais comme le malheureux aveugle que l’on rend à la lumière après de longues années, et qui se détourne un moment du jour.

— C’est à moi plutôt que s’applique votre comparaison, car, durant votre absence, je n’ai eu d’autre bonheur que la présence d’un infortuné, de mon père. Je passais mes longues journées à le consoler, et, ajouta-t-elle en baissant les yeux, à vous espérer. Je lisais à mon père les fables de l’Edda, et quand je l’entendais douter des hommes, je lui lisais l’Évangile, pour qu’au moins il ne doutât pas du ciel; puis je lui parlais de vous, et il se taisait, ce qui prouve qu’il vous aime. Seulement, quand j’avais inutilement passé mes soirées à regarder de loin sur les routes les voyageurs qui arrivaient, et dans le port les vaisseaux qui abordaient, il secouait la tête avec un sourire amer, et je pleurais. Cette prison, où s’est jusqu’ici passée toute ma vie, m’était devenue odieuse, et pourtant mon père, qui, jusqu’à votre apparition, l’avait toujours remplie pour moi, y était encore; mais vous n’y étiez plus, et je désirais cette liberté que je ne connaissais pas.

Il y avait dans les yeux de la jeune fille, dans la naïveté de sa tendresse, dans la douce hésitation de ses épanchements, un charme que des paroles humaines n’exprimeraient pas. Ordener l’écoutait avec cette joie rêveuse d’un être qui serait enlevé au monde réel pour assister au monde idéal.

— Et moi, dit-il, maintenant je ne veux plus de cette liberté que vous ne partagez pas!

— Quoi, Ordener! reprit vivement Éthel, vous ne nous quitterez donc plus?

Cette expression rappela au jeune homme tout ce qu’il avait oublié.

— Mon Éthel, il faut que je vous quitte ce soir. Je vous reverrai demain, et demain je vous quitterai encore, jusqu’à ce que je revienne pour ne plus vous quitter.

— Hélas! interrompit douloureusement la jeune fille, absent encore!

— Je vous répète, ma bien-aimée Éthel, que je reviendrai bientôt vous arracher de cette prison ou m'y ensevelir avec vous.

— Prisonnière avec lui! dit-elle doucement. Ah! ne me trompez pas, faut-il que j'espère tant de bonheur?

— Quel serment te faut-il? que veux-tu de moi? s'écria Ordener; dis-moi, mon Éthel, n'es-tu pas mon épouse? — Et, transporté d'amour, il la serrait fortement contre sa poitrine.

— Je suis à toi, murmura-t-elle faiblement.

Ces deux coeurs nobles et purs battaient ainsi avec délices l'un contre l'autre, et n'en étaient que plus nobles et plus purs.

En ce moment un violent éclat de rire se fit entendre auprès d'eux. Un homme enveloppé d'un manteau découvrit une lanterne sourde qu'il y avait cachée, et dont la lumière éclaira subitement la figure effrayée et confuse d'Éthel et le visage étonné et fier d'Ordener.

— Courage! mon joli couple! courage! mais il me semble qu'après avoir cheminé si peu de temps dans le pays du Tendre, vous n'avez pas suivi tous les détours du ruisseau du Sentiment, et que vous avez dû prendre un chemin de traverse pour arriver si vite au hameau du Baiser.

Nos lecteurs ont sans doute reconnu le lieutenant admirateur de Mlle de Scudéry. Arraché de la lecture de la Clélie par le beffroi de minuit, que les deux amants n'avaient pas entendu, il était venu faire sa ronde nocturne dans le donjon. En passant à l'extrémité du corridor de l'orient, il avait recueilli quelques paroles et vu comme deux spectres se mouvoir dans la galerie à la clarté de la lune. Alors, naturellement curieux et hardi, il avait caché sa lanterne sous son manteau, et s'était avancé sur la pointe du pied près des deux fantômes, que son brusque éclat de rire venait d'arracher désagréablement à leur extase.

Éthel fit un mouvement pour fuir Ordener, puis, revenant à lui comme par instinct et pour lui demander protection, elle cacha sa tête brûlante dans le sein du jeune homme.

Celui-ci releva la sienne avec un orgueil de roi.

— Malheur, dit-il, malheur à celui qui vient de t'effrayer et de t'affliger, mon Éthel!

— Oui vraiment, dit le lieutenant, malheur à moi si j'avais eu la maladresse d'épouvanter la tendre Mandane!

— Seigneur lieutenant, dit Ordener d'un ton hautain, je vous engage à vous taire.

— Seigneur insolent, répliqua l’officier, je vous engage à vous taire.

— M’entendez-vous? reprit Ordener d’une voix tonnante; achetez votre pardon par le silence.

— Tibi tua, répondit le lieutenant, prenez vos avis pour vous, achetez votre pardon par le silence.

— Taisez-vous! s’écria Ordener avec une voix qui fit trembler les vitraux; et, déposant la tremblante jeune fille sur un des vieux fauteuils du corridor, il secoua énergiquement le bras de l’officier.

— Oh! paysan, dit le lieutenant, moitié riant, moitié irrité, vous ne remarquez pas que ce pourpoint que vous froissez si brutalement est du plus beau velours d’Abingdon.

Ordener le regarda fixement.

— Lieutenant, ma patience est plus courte que mon épée.

— Je vous entends, mon brave damoisel, dit le lieutenant avec un sourire ironique, vous voudriez bien que je vous fisse un tel honneur; mais savez-vous qui je suis? Non, non, s’il vous plaît, prince contre prince, berger contre berger, comme disait le beau Léandre.

— S’il faut dire aussi: lâche contre lâche! reprit Ordener, assurément je n’aurai point l’insigne honneur de me mesurer avec vous.

— Je me fâcherais, mon très honorable berger, si vous portiez seulement l’uniforme.

— Je n’en ai ni les galons ni les franges, lieutenant, mais j’en porte le sabre.

Le fier jeune homme, rejetant son manteau en arrière, avait mis sa toque sur sa tête et saisi la garde de son sabre, lorsque Éthel, réveillée par ce danger imminent, se précipita sur son bras et s’attacha à son cou avec un cri de terreur et de prière.

— Vous faites sagement, ma belle damoiselle, si vous ne voulez pas que le jouvencel soit puni de ses hardiesses, dit le lieutenant, qui, aux menaces d’Ordener, s’était mis en garde sans s’émouvoir; car Cyrus allait se brouiller avec Cambyse, pourvu toutefois que ce ne soit pas faire trop d’honneur à ce vassal que de le comparer à Cambyse.

— Au nom du ciel, seigneur Ordener, disait Éthel, que je ne sois pas la cause et le témoin d’un pareil malheur! — Puis, levant sur lui ses beaux yeux, elle ajouta: — Ordener, je t’en supplie!

Ordener repoussa lentement dans le fourreau la lame à demi tirée, et le lieutenant s’écria:

— Par ma foi, chevalier, — j’ignore si vous l’êtes, mais je vous en donne le titre parce que vous paraissez le mériter, moi et vous agissons suivant les lois de la bravoure, mais non suivant celles de la galanterie. La damoiselle a raison, des engagements comme celui que je vous crois digne de nouer avec moi ne doivent pas avoir des dames pour témoins, quoique, n’en déplaise à la charmante damoiselle, ils puissent avoir des dames pour cause. Nous ne pouvons donc ici convenablement parler que du duellum remotum, et, comme l’offensé, si vous voulez en fixer l’époque, le lieu et les armes, ma fine lame de Tolède ou mon poignard de Mérida seront à la disposition de votre hachoir sorti des forges d’Ashkreuth, ou de votre couteau de chasse trempé dans le lac de Sparbo.

Le duel ajourné que l’officier proposait à Ordener était en usage dans le Nord, d’où les savants prétendent que la coutume du duel est sortie. Les plus vaillants gentilshommes proposaient et acceptaient le duellum remotum. On le remettait à plusieurs mois, quelquefois à plusieurs années, et, durant cet intervalle, les adversaires ne devaient s’occuper ni en paroles ni en actions de l’affaire qui avait amené le défi. Ainsi, en amour, les deux rivaux s’abstenaient de voir leur maîtresse, afin que les choses restassent dans le même état; on se reposait à cet égard sur la loyauté des chevaliers; comme dans les anciens tournois, si les juges du camp, croyant la loi courtoise violée, jetaient leur bâton dans l’arène, à l’instant tous les combattants s’arrêtaient; mais, jusqu’à l’éclaircissement du doute, la gorge du vaincu restait à la même distance de l’épée du vainqueur.

— Eh bien! chevalier, dit Ordener après un moment de réflexion, un messager vous instruira du lieu.

— Soit, répondit le lieutenant; d’autant mieux que cela me donnera le temps d’assister aux cérémonies du mariage de ma soeur, car vous saurez que vous aurez l’honneur de vous battre avec le futur beau-frère d’un haut seigneur, du fils du vice-roi de Norvège, du baron Ordener Guldenlew, lequel, à l’occasion de cet illustre hyménée, comme dit Artamène, va être créé comte de Daneskiold, colonel et chevalier del’Éléphant; et moi-même, qui suis le fils du grand-chancelier des deux royaumes, je serai sans doute nommé capitaine.

— Fort bien, fort bien, lieutenant d’Ahlefeld, dit Ordener avec impatience, vous n’êtes point encore capitaine, ni le fils du vice-roi colonel; — et les sabres sont toujours des sabres.

— Et les rustres toujours des rustres, quoi qu’on fasse pour les élever jusqu’à soi, dit entre ses dents l’officier.

— Chevalier, continua Ordener, vous connaissez la loi courtoise. Vous n’entrerez plus dans ce donjon, et vous garderez le silence sur cette affaire.

— Pour le silence, rapportez-vous-en à moi, je serai aussi muet que Muce Scévole lorsqu’il eut le poing sur le brasier. Je n’entrerai non plus dans le donjon, ni moi, ni aucun argus de la garnison; car je viens de recevoir un ordre d’y laisser à l’avenir Schumacker sans gardes, ordre que j’étais chargé de lui communiquer ce soir; ce que j’aurais fait si je n’avais passé une partie de la soirée à essayer de nouvelles bottines de Cracovie. — Cet ordre, entre nous, est bien imprudent.

— Voulez-vous que je vous montre mes bottines?

Pendant cette conversation, Éthel, les voyant apaisés, et ne comprenant pas ce que c’était qu’un duellum remotum, avait disparu, après avoir dit doucement à l’oreille d’Ordener: À demain.

— Je voudrais, lieutenant d’Ahlefeld, que vous m’aidassiez à sortir du fort.

— Volontiers, dit l’officier, quoiqu’il soit un peu tard, ou plutôt de bien bonne heure. Mais comment trouverez-vous une barque?

— Cela me regarde, dit Ordener.

Alors, s’entretenant de bonne amitié, ils traversèrent le jardin, la cour circulaire, la cour carrée, sans qu’Ordener, conduit par l’officier de ronde, éprouvât d’obstacle; ils franchirent la grande herse, le hangar de l’artillerie, la place d’armes, et arrivèrent à la tour basse, dont la porte de fer s’ouvrit à la voix du lieutenant.

— Au revoir, lieutenant d’Ahlefeld! dit Ordener.

— Au revoir, répondit l’officier. Je déclare que vous êtes un brave champion, quoique j’ignore qui vous êtes, et si ceux de vos pairs que vous amènerez à notre rendez-vous auront qualité pour prendre le titre de parrains, et ne devront pas se borner au nom modeste d’assistants.

Ils se serrèrent la main; la porte de fer se referma, et le lieutenant retourna, en fredonnant un air de Lulli, admirer ses bottes polonaises et le roman français.

Ordener, resté seul sur le seuil, quitta ses vêtements, qu’il enveloppa de son manteau et attacha sur sa tête avec le ceinturon de son sabre; puis, mettant en pratique les principes d’indépendance de Schumacker, il s’élança dans l’eau froide et calme du golfe, et commença à nager au milieu de l’obscurité, vers le rivage, en se dirigeant du côté du Spladgest, destination où il était toujours à peu près sûr d’arriver, mort ou vif.

Les fatigues de la journée l’avaient épuisé; aussi n’aborda-t-il que très péniblement. Il se rhabilla à la hâte, et marcha vers le Spladgest qui se dessinait dans la place du port comme une masse noire; car depuis quelque temps la lune s’était entièrement voilée.

En approchant de cet édifice, il entendit comme un bruit de voix; une lumière faible sortait par l’ouverture supérieure. Étonné, il frappa violemment à la porte carrée; le bruit cessa, la lueur disparut. Il frappa de nouveau; la lumière en reparaissant lui laissa voir quelque chose de noir sortir par l’orifice supérieur et se blottir sur le toit plat du bâtiment. Ordener frappa une troisième fois avec le pommeau de son sabre, et cria: — Ouvrez, de par sa majesté le roi! ouvrez, de par sa sérénité le vice-roi!

La porte s’ouvrit enfin lentement, et Ordener se trouva face à face avec la longue figure pâle et maigre de Spiagudry, qui, les habits en désordre, l’oeil hagard, les cheveux hérissés, les mains ensanglantées, portait une lampe sépulcrale, dont la flamme tremblait encore moins visiblement que son grand corps.

PIRRO

Jamais!

ANGELO.

Quoi! je crois que tu veux faire l’homme de bien. Misérable! si tu dis un seul mot…

PIRRO.

Mais, Angelo, je t’en conjure, pour l’amour de
Dieu…

ANGELO.

Laisse faire ce que tu ne peux empêcher.

PIRRO.

Ah! quand le diable vous tient par un cheveu, il faut lui abandonner toute la tête. Malheureux que je suis!

(Émilia Galotti.)

Une heure environ après que le jeune voyageur à la plume noire était sorti du Spladgest, la nuit étant tout à fait tombée et la foule entièrement écoulée, Oglypiglap avait fermé la porte extérieure de l’édifice funèbre, tandis que son maître Spiagudry arrosait pour la dernière fois les corps qui y étaient déposés. Puis tous deux s’étaient retirés dans leur très peu somptueux appartement, et tandis qu’Oglypiglap dormait sur son petit grabat, comme l’un des cadavres confiés à sa garde, le vénérable Spiagudry, assis devant une table de pierre couverte de vieux livres, de plantes desséchées et d’ossements décharnés, s’était plongé dans les graves études qui, bien que réellement fort innocentes, n’avaient pas peu contribué à lui donner parmi le peuple une réputation de sorcellerie et de diablerie, fâcheux apanage de la science à cette époque.

Il y avait plusieurs heures qu’il était absorbé dans ses méditations; et, prêt enfin à quitter ses livres pour son lit, il s’était arrêté à ce passage lugubre de Thormodus Torfoeus:

«Quand un homme allume sa lampe, la mort est chez lui avant qu’elle soit éteinte…»

— N’en déplaise au savant docteur, se dit-il à demi-voix, il n’en sera point ainsi chez moi ce soir. Et il prit sa lampe pour la souffler.

— Spiagudry! cria une voix qui sortait de la salle des cadavres.

Le vieux concierge trembla de tous ses membres. Ce n'est pas qu'il crût, comme tout autre peut-être à sa place, que les tristes hôtes du Spladgest s'insurgeaient contre leur gardien. Il était assez savant pour ne pas éprouver de ces terreurs imaginaires; et la sienne n'était si réelle que parce qu'il connaissait trop bien la voix qui l'appelait.

— Spiagudry! répéta violemment la voix, faudra-t-il, pour te faire entendre, que j'aille t'arracher les oreilles?

— Que saint Hospice ait pitié, non de mon âme, mais de mon corps! dit l'effrayé vieillard; et, d'un pas que la peur pressait et ralentissait à la fois, il se dirigea vers la seconde porte latérale, qu'il ouvrit. Nos lecteurs n'ont pas oublié que cette porte communiquait à la salle des morts.

La lampe qu'il portait éclaira alors un tableau bizarrement hideux. D'un côté, le corps maigre, long et légèrement voûté de Spiagudry; de l'autre, un homme petit, épais et trapu, vêtu de la tête aux pieds de peaux de toutes sortes d'animaux encore teintes, d'un sang desséché, et debout au pied du cadavre de Gill Stadt, qui, avec ceux de la jeune fille et du capitaine, occupait le fond de la scène. Ces trois muets témoins, ensevelis dans une sorte de pénombre, étaient les seuls qui pussent'voir, sans fuir d'épouvanté, les deux vivants dont l'entretien commençait.

Les traits du petit homme, que la lumière faisait vivement ressortir, avaient quelque chose d'extraordinairement sauvage. Sa barbe était rousse et touffue, et son front, caché sous un bonnet de peau d'élan, paraissait hérissé de cheveux de môme couleur; sa bouche était large, ses lèvres épaisses, ses dents blanches, aiguës et séparées; son nez, recourbé comme le bec de l'aigle; et son oeil gris bleu, extrêmement mobile, lançait sur Spiagudry un regard oblique, où la férocité du tigre n'était tempérée que par la malice du singe. Ce personnage singulier était armé d'un large sabre, d'un poignard sans fourreau, et d'une hache à tranchants de pierre, sur le long manche de laquelle il était appuyé; ses mains étaient couvertes de gros gants de peau de renard bleu;

— Ce vieux spectre m'a fait attendre bien longtemps, dit-il, se parlant à lui-même; et il poussa une espèce de rugissement comme une bête des bois.

Spiagudry aurait certainement pâli d'effroi, s'il eût pu pâlir.

— Sais-tu bien, poursuivit le petit homme en s'adressant à lui directement, que je viens des grèves d'Urchtal? Avais-tu donc envie, en me retardant, d'échanger ta couche de paille contre une de ces couches de pierre?

Le tremblement de Spiagudry redoubla; les deux seules dents qui lui restaient s'entre-choquèrent avec violence.

— Pardonnez, maître, dit-il en courbant l'arc de son grand corps jusqu'au niveau du petit homme, je dormais d'un profond sommeil.

— Veux-tu que je te fasse connaître un sommeil plus profond encore?

Spiagudry fit une grimace de terreur, qui seule pouvait être plus plaisante que ses grimaces de gaieté.

— Eh bien! qu'est-ce? continua le petit homme. Qu'as-tu? Est-ce que ma présence ne t'est pas agréable?

— Oh! mon maître et seigneur, répondit le vieux concierge, il n'est certainement pas pour moi 'de bon heur plus grand que la vue de votre excellence.

Et l'effort qu'il faisait pour donner à sa physionomie; effrayée une expression riante eût déridé tout autre que des morts.

— Vieux renard sans queue, mon excellence t'ordonne de me remettre les vêtements de Gill Stadt. En prononçant ce nom, le visage farouche et railleur du petit homme devint sombre et triste.

— Oh! maître, pardonnez, je ne les ai plus, dit Spiagudry; votre grâce sait que nous sommes obligés de livrer au fisc royal les dépouilles des ouvriers des mines, dont le roi hérite en sa qualité de leur tuteur né.

Le petit homme se tourna vers le cadavre, croisa les bras, et dit d'une voix sourde: — Il a raison. Ces misérables mineurs sont comme l'eider [Footnote: Oiseau qui donne l'edredon. Les paysana norvégiens lui construisent des nids, ou ils le suprennent et le plumet.]; on lui'fait son nid, on lui prend son duvet.

Puis soulevant le cadavre entre ses bras et l'étreignant fortement, il se mit à pousser des cris sauvages d'amour et de douleur, pareils aux grondements d'un ours qui caresse son petit. À ces sons inarticulés, se mêlaient, par intervalles, quelques mots d'un jargon étrange que Spiagudry ne comprenait pas.

11 laissa retomber le cadavre sur la pierre, et se tourna vers le gardien.

— Sais-tu, sorcier maudit, le nom du soldat né sous un mauvais astre qhi a eu le malheur d'être préféré à Gill par cette fille?

Et il poussa du pied les restes froids de Guth Stersen.

Spiagudry fit un signe négatif.

— Eh bien! par la hache d'Ingolphe, le chef de ma race, j'exterminerai tous les porteurs de cet uniforme; et il désignait les vêtements de l'officier. — Celui dont je veux la vengeance se trouvera dans le nombre. J'incendierai toute la forêt pour brûler l'arbuste vénéneux qu'elle renferme. Je l'ai juré du jour où Gill est mort; et je lui ai donné déjà un compagnon qui doit réjouir son cadavre. — O Gill! te voilà donc là sans force et sans vie, toi qui atteignais le phoque à la nage, le chamois à la course, toi qui étouffais l'ours des monts de Kolè à la lutte; te voilà immobile, toi qui parcourais le Drontheimhus depuis l'Orkel jusqu'au lac de Smiasen en un jour, toi qui gravissais les pics du Dofre-Field comme l'écureuil gravit le chêne; te voilà muet, Gill, toi qui, debout sur les sommets orageux de Kongsberg, chantais plus haut que le tonnerre. O Gill! c'est donc en vain que j'ai comblé pour toi les mines de Fa-roër; c'est en vain que j'ai incendié l'église cathédrale de Drontheim; toutes mes peines sont perdues, et je ne verrai pas se perpétuer en toi la race des enfants d'Islande, la descendance d'Ingolphe l'Exterminateur; tu n'hériteras pas de ma hache de pierre; et c'est toi au contraire qui me lègues ton crâne pour y boire désormais l'eau des mers et le sang des hommes.

À ces mots, saisissant la tête du cadavre:

— Spiagudry, dit-il, aide-moi. Et arrachant ses gants, il découvrit ses-larges mains, armées d'ongles longs, durs et retors comme ceux d'une bête fauve.

Spiagudry, qui le vit prêt à faire sauter avec son sabre le crâne du cadavre, s'écria avec un accent d'horreur qu'il ne put réprimer: — Juste Dieu! maître! un mort!

— Eh bien, répliqua traquillement le petit homme, aimes-tu mieux que cette lame s'aiguise ici sur un vivant?

— Oh! permettez-moi de supplier votre courtoisie… Comment votre excellence peut-elle profaner?… Votre grâce…. Seigneur, votre sérénité ne voudra pas….

— Finiras-tu? ai-je besoin de tous ces titres, squelette vivant, pour croire à ton profond respect pour mon sabre?

— Par saint Waldemar, par saint Usuph, au nom de saint Hospice, épargnez un mort!

— Aide-moi, et ne parle pas des saints au diable.

— Seigneur, poursuivit le suppliant Spiagudry, par votre illustre aïeul saint Ingolphe!…

— Ingolphe l’Exterminateur était un réprouvé comme moi.

— Au nom du ciel, dit le vieillard en se prosternant, c’est cette réprobation que je veux vous éviter.

L’impatience transporta le petit homme. Ses yeux gris et ternes brillèrent comme deux charbons ardents.

— Aide-moi! répéta-t-il en agitant son sabre.

Ces deux mots furent prononcés de la voix dont les prononcerait un lion, s’il parlait. Le concierge, tremblant et à demi mort, s’assit sur la pierre noire, et soutint de ses mains la tête froide et humide de Gill, tandis que le petit homme, à l’aide de son poignard et de son sabre, enlevait le crâne avec une dextérité singulière.

Quand cette opération fut terminée, il considéra quelque temps le crâne sanglant, en proférant des paroles étranges; puis il le remit à Spiagudry pour qu’il le dépouillât et le lavât, et dit en poussant une espèce de hurlement:

— Et moi, je n’aurai pas en mourant la consolation de penser qu’un héritier de l’âme d’Ingolphe boira dans mon crâne le sang des hommes et l’eau des mers.

Après une sinistre rêverie, il continua:

— L’ouragan est suivi de l’ouragan, l’avalanche entraîne l’avalanche, et moi je serai le dernier de ma race. Pourquoi Gill n’a-t-il pas haï comme moi tout ce qui porte la face humaine? Quel démon ennemi du démon d’Ingolphe l’a poussé sous ces fatales mines à la recherche d’un peu d’or?

Spiagudry, qui lui rapportait le crâne de Gill, l’interrompit.

— L’excellence a raison; l’or lui-même, dit Snorro Sturleson, s’achète souvent trop cher.

— Tu me rappelles, dit le petit homme, une commission dont il faut que je te charge; voici une boîte de fer que j’ai trouvée sur cet officier, dont tu n’as pas, comme tu le vois, toutes les dépouilles; elle est si solidement fermée, qu’elle doit renfermer de l’or, seule chose précieuse aux yeux des hommes; tu la remettras à la veuve Stadt, au hameau de Thoctree, pour lui payer son fils.

Il tira alors de son havresac de peau de renne un très petit coffre de fer. Spiagudry le reçut, et s’inclina.

— Remplis fidèlement mon ordre, dit le petit homme en lui lançant un regard perçant; songe que rien n’empêche deux démons de se revoir; je te crois encore plus lâche qu’avare, et tu me réponds de ce coffre.

— Oh! maître, sur mon âme.

— Non pas! sur tes os et sur ta chair.

En ce moment, la porte extérieure du Spladgest retentit d’un coup violent. Le petit homme s’étonna, Spiagudry chancela, et couvrit sa lampe de sa main.

— Qu’est-ce? s’écria le petit homme en grondant.

— Et toi, vieux misérable, comment trembleras-tu donc quand tu entendras la trompette du jugement dernier?

Un second coup plus fort se fit entendre.

— C’est quelque mort pressé d’entrer, dit le petit homme.

— Non, maître, murmura Spiagudry, on n’amène point de morts passé minuit.

— Mort ou vivant, il me chasse. — Toi, Spiagudry sois fidèle et muet. Je te jure, par l’esprit d’Ingolphe et le crâne de Gill, que tu passeras dans ton auberge de cadavres tout le régiment de Munckholm en revue.

Et le petit homme, attachant le crâne de Gill à sa ceinture et remettant ses gants, s’élança avec l’agilité d’un chamois, et à l’aide des épaules de Spiagudry, par l’ouverture supérieure, où il disparut.

Un troisième coup ébranla le Spladgest, et une voix du dehors ordonna d’ouvrir aux noms du roi et du vice-roi. Alors le vieux concierge, à la fois agité par deux terreurs différentes, dont on pourrait nommer l’une de souvenir, et l’autre d’espérance, s’achemina ver la porte carrée, et l’ouvrit.

VII

Cette joie à laquelle se réduit la félicité temporelle, elle s’est fatiguée à la poursuivre par des sentiers âpres et douloureux, sans avoir jamais pu l’atteindre.

(Confessions de saint Augustin.)

Rentré dans son cabinet après avoir quitté Poël, le gouverneur de Drontheim s’enfonça dans un large fauteuil, et ordonna, pour se distraire, à l’un de ses secrétaires de lui rendre compte des placets présentés au gouvernement.

Celui-ci, après s’être incliné, commença:

— «1° Le révérend docteur Anglyvius demande qu’il soit pourvu au remplacement du révérend docteur Foxtipp, directeur de la bibliothèque épiscopale, pour cause d’incapacité. L’exposant ignore qui pourra remplacer ledit docteur incapable; il fait seulement savoir que lui, docteur Anglyvius, a longtemps exercé les fonctions de bibliothéc….»

— Renvoyez ce drôle à l’évéque, interrompit le général.

— «2° Athanase Munder, prêtre, ministre des prisons, demande la grâce de douze condamnés pénitents, à l’occasion des glorieuses noces de sa courtoisie Ordener Guldenlew, baron de Thorvick, chevalier de Dannebrog, fils du vice-roi, avec noble dame Ulrique d’Ahlefeld, fille de sa grâce le comte grand-chancelier des deux royaumes.»

— Ajournez, dit le général. Je plains les condamnés.

— «3° Fauste-Prudens Destrombidès, sujet norvégien, poëte latin, demande à faire l’épithalame desdits nobles époux.»

— Ah! ah! le brave homme doit être vieux, car c’est le même qui en 1674 avait préparé un épithalame pour le mariage projeté entre Schumacker, alors comte de Griffenfeld, et la princesse Louise-Charlotte de Holstein-Augustenbourg, mariage qui n’eut pas lieu. — Je crains, ajouta le gouverneur entre ses dents, que Fauste-Prudens soit le poëte des mariages rompus.

— Ajournez la demande et poursuivez. On s’informera, à l’occasion dudit poëte, s’il n’y aurait pas un lit vacant à l’hôpital de Drontheim.

— «4° Les mineurs de Guldbranshal, des îles Faroër, du Sund-Moër, de Hubfallo, de Roeraas et de Kongsberg, demandent à être affranchis des charges de la tutelle royale.»

— Ces mineurs sont remuants. On dit même qu'ils commencent déjà à murmurer du long silence gardé sur leur requête. Qu'elle soit réservée pour un mûr examen.

— «5° Braal, pêcheur, déclare, en vertu de l'Odelsrecht [Footnote: Odelsrecht, loi singulière qui établissait parmi les paysans norvégiens dos sortes de majorats. Tout homme qui était contraint de se défaire de son patrimoine pouvait empêcher l'acquéreur de l'aliéner, en déclarant tous les dix ans à l'autorité qu'il était dans l'intention de le racheter.], qu'il persévère dans l'intention de racheter son patrimoine.

— «6° Les syndics de Noes, Loevig, Indal, Skongen, Stod, Sparbo et autres bourgs et villages du Drontheimhus septentrional, demandent que la tête du brigand, assassin et incendiaire Han, natif, dit-on, de Klipstadur en Islande, soit mise à prix. — S'oppose à la requête Nychol Orugix, bourreau du Drontheimhus, qui prétend que Han est sa propriété. — Appuie la requête Benignus Spiagudry, gardien du Spladgest, auquel doit revenir le cadavre.»

— Ce bandit est bien dangereux, dit le général, surtout lorsqu'on craint des troubles parmi les mineurs. Qu'on fasse proclamer sa tête au prix de mille écus royaux.

— «7° Benignus Spiagudry, médecin, antiquaire, sculpteur, minéralogiste, naturaliste, botaniste, légiste, chimiste, mécanicien, physicien, astronome, théologien, grammairien…»

— Eh mais, interrompit le général, est-ce que ce n'est pas le même Spiagudry que le gardien du Spladgest?

— Si vraiment, votre excellence, répondit le secrétaire — «… concierge, pour sa majesté, de l'établissement dit Spladgest, dans la royale ville de Drontheim, expose — que c'est lui, Benignus Spiagudry, qui a découvert que les étoiles appelées fixes n'étaient pas éclairées par l'astre appelé soleil; item, que le vrai nom d'Odin est Frigge, fils de Fridulph; item, que le lombric marin se nourrit de sable; item, que le bruit de la population éloigne les poissons des côtes de Norvège, en sorte que les moyens de subsistance diminuent en proportion de l'accroissement du peuple; item, que le golfe nommé Otte-Sund s'appelait autrefois Limfiord et n'a pris le nom d'Otte-Sund qu'après qu'Othon le Roux y eut jeté sa lance; item, expose que c'est par ses conseils et sous sa direction qu'on a fait d'une vieille statue de Freya la statue de la Justice qui orne la grande place de Drontheim; et qu’on a converti en diable, représentant le crime, le lion qui se trouvait sous les pieds de l’idole; item…

— Ah! faites-nous grâce de ses éminents services. Voyons, que demande-t-il?»

Le secrétaire tourna plusieurs feuillets, et poursuivit:

«…. Le très humble exposant croit pouvoir, en récompense de tant de travaux utiles aux sciences et aux belles-lettres, supplier son excellence d’augmenter la taxe de chaque cadavre mâle et femelle de dix ascalins, ce qui ne peut qu’être agréable aux morts en leur prouvant le cas qu’on fait de leurs personnes.»

Ici la porte du cabinet s’ouvrit, et l’huissier annonça à haute voix la noble dame comtesse d’Ahlefeld. En même temps, une grande dame, portant sur sa tête une petite couronne de comtesse, richement vêtue d’une robe de satin écarlate, bordée d’hermine et de franges d’or, entra, et, acceptant la main que le général lui offrait, vint s’asseoir près de son fauteuil.

La comtesse pouvait avoir cinquante ans. L’âge n’avait, en quelque sorte, rien eu à ajouter aux rides dont les soucis de l’orgueil et de l’ambition avaient depuis si longtemps creusé son visage. Elle attacha sur le vieux gouverneur son regard hautain et son sourire faux.

— Eh bien, seigneur général, votre élève se fait attendre. Il devait être ici avant le coucher du soleil.

— Il y serait, dame comtesse, s’il n’était, en arrivant, allé à Munckholm.

— Comment, à Munckholm! j’espère que ce n’est pas Schumacker qu’il cherche?

— Mais cela se pourrait.

— La première visite du baron de Thorvick aura été pour Schumacker!

— Pourquoi non, comtesse? Schumacker est malheureux.

— Comment, général! le fils du vice-roi est lié avec ce prisonnier d’état!

— Frédéric Guldenlew, en me chargeant de son fils, me pria, noble dame, de l’élever comme j’eusse élevé le mien. J’ai pensé que la connaissance de Schumacker serait utile à Ordener, qui est destiné à être aussi puissant un jour. J’ai en conséquence, avec l’autorisation du vice-roi, demandé à mon frère Grummond de Knud un droit d’entrée pour toutes les prisons, que j’ai donné à Ordener. — Il en use.

— Et depuis quand, noble général, le baron Ordener a-t-il fait cette utile connaissance?

— Depuis un peu plus d’un an, dame comtesse; il paraît que la société de Schumacker lui plut, car elle le fixa assez longtemps à Drontheim; et ce n’est qu’à regret et sur mon invitation expresse qu’il en partit l’année dernière pour visiter la Norvège.

— Et Schumacker sait-il que son consolateur est le fils d’un de ses plus grands ennemis?

— Il sait que c’est un ami, et cela lui suffit, comme à nous.

— Mais vous, seigneur général, dit la comtesse avec un coup d’oeil pénétrant, saviez-vous en tolérant, et même en formant cette liaison, que Schumacker avait une fille?

— Je le savais, noble comtesse.

— Et cette circonstance vous a semblé indifférente pour votre élève?

— L’élève de Levin de Knud, le fils de Frédéric Guldenlew est un homme loyal. Ordener connaît la barrière qui le séparé de la fille de Schumacker; il est incapable de séduire, sans but légitime, une fille, et surtout la fille d’un homme malheureux.

La noble comtesse d’Ahlefeld rougit et pâlit; elle tourna la tête, cherchant à éviter le regard calme du vieillard comme celui d’un accusateur.

— Enfin, balbutia-t-elle, cette liaison, général, me semble, souffrez que je le dise, singulière et imprudente. On dit que les mineurs et les peuplades du Nord menacent de se révolter, et que le nom de Schumacker est compromis dans cette affaire.

— Noble dame, vous m’étonnez! s’écria le gouverneur. Schumacker a jusqu’ici supporté tranquillement son malheur. Ce bruit est sans doute peu fondé.

La porte s’ouvrit en ce moment, et l’huissier annonça qu’un messager de sa grâce le grand-chancelier demandait à parler à la noble comtesse.

La comtesse se leva précipitamment, salua le gouverneur, et, tandis qu’il continuait l’examen des placets, se rendit en toute hâte à ses appartements, situés dans une aile du palais, en ordonnant qu’on y envoyât le messager.

Elle était depuis quelques moments assise sur un riche sopha, au milieu de ses femmes, quand le messager, entra. La comtesse en l’apercevant fit un mouvement de répugnance qu’elle cacha soudain sous un sourire bienveillant. L’extérieur du messager ne semblait pourtant pas repoussant au premier abord; c’était un homme plutôt petit que grand, et dont l’embonpoint annonçait tout autre chose qu’un messager. Cependant, quand on l’examinait, son visage paraissait ouvert jusqu’à l’impudence, et la gaieté de son regard avait quelque chose de diabolique et de sinistre. Il s’inclina profondément devant la comtesse, et lui présenta un paquet, scellé avec des fils de soie.

— Noble dame, dit-il, daignez me permettre d’oser déposer à vos pieds un précieux message de sa grâce, votre illustre époux, mon vénéré maître.

— Est-ce qu’il ne vient pas lui-même? et comment vous prend-il pour messager? demanda la comtesse.

— Des soins importants diffèrent l’arrivée de sa grâce, cette lettre est pour vous en informer, madame la comtesse; pour moi, je dois, d’après l’ordre de mon noble maître, jouir de l’insigne honneur d’un entretien particulier avec vous.

La comtesse pâlit; elle s’écria d’une voix tremblante:

— Moi! un entretien avec vous, Musdoemon?

— Si cela affligeait en rien la noble dame, son indigne serviteur serait au désespoir.

— M’affliger! non sans doute, reprit la comtesse s’efforçant de sourire; mais cet entretien est-il si nécessaire?

Le messager s’inclina jusqu’à terre.

— Absolument nécessaire! la lettre que l’illustre comtesse a daigné recevoir de mes mains doit en contenir l’injonction formelle.

C’était une chose singulière que de voir la fière comtesse d’Ahlefeld trembler et pâlir devant un serviteur qui lui rendait de si profonds respects. Elle ouvrit lentement le paquet et en lut le contenu. Après l’avoir relu:

— Allons, dit-elle à ses femmes d’une voix faible, qu’on nous laisse seuls.

— Daigne la noble dame, dit le messager fléchissant le genou, me pardonner la liberté que j’ose prendre et la peine que je parais lui causer.

— Croyez au contraire, repartit la comtesse avec un sourire forcé, que j’ai beaucoup de plaisir à vous voir.

Les femmes se retirèrent.

— Elphège, tu as donc oublié qu’il fut un temps où nos tête-à-tête ne te répugnaient pas?

C’était le messager qui parlait à la noble comtesse, et ces paroles étaient accompagnées d’un rire pareil à celui du diable lorsqu’au moment où le pacte expire il saisit l’âme qui s’est donnée à lui.

La puissante dame baissa sa tête humiliée.

— Que ne l’ai-je en effet oublié! murmura-t-elle.

— Pauvre folle! comment peux-tu rougir de choses que nul oeil humain n’a vues?

— Ce que les hommes ne voient pas, Dieu le voit.

— Dieu, faible femme! tu n’es pas digne d’avoir trompé ton mari, car il est moins crédule que toi.

— Vous insultez peu généreusement à mes remords, Musdoemon.

— Eh bien! si tu en as, Elphège, pourquoi leur insultes-tu toi-même chaque jour par des crimes nouveaux?

La comtesse d’Ahlefeld cacha sa tête dans ses mains; le messager poursuivit:

— Elphège, il faut choisir: ou le remords et plus de crimes, ou le crime et plus de remords. Fais comme moi, choisis le second parti, c’est le meilleur, le plus gai du moins.

— Puissiez-vous, dit la comtesse à voix basse, ne pas retrouver ces paroles dans l’éternité!

— Allons, ma chère, quittons la plaisanterie. Alors Musdoemon s’asseyant près de la comtesse, et passant ses bras autour de son cou:

— Elphège, dit-il, tâche de rester, par l’esprit du moins, ce que tu étais il y a vingt ans.

L’infortunée comtesse, esclave de son complice, tâcha de répondre à sa repoussante caresse. Il y avait dans cet embrassement adultère de deux êtres qui se méprisaient et s’exécraient mutuellement quelque chose de trop révoltant, même pour ces âmes dégradées. Les caresses illégitimes qui avaient fait leur joie, et que je ne sais quelle horrible convenance les forçait de se prodiguer encore, faisaient maintenant leur torture. Étrange et juste changement des affections coupables! leur crime était devenu leur supplice.

La comtesse, pour abréger ce tourment adultère, demanda enfin à son odieux amant, en s’arrachant de ses bras, de quel message verbal son époux l’avait chargé.

— D’Ahlefeld, dit Musdoemon, au moment de voir son pouvoir s’affermir par le mariage d’Ordener Guldenlew avec notre fille…

— Notre fille! s’écria la hautaine comtesse, et son regard fixé sur

Musdoemon reprit une expression d’orgueil et de dédain.

— Eh bien, dit froidement le messager, je crois qu’Ulrique peut m’appartenir au moins autant qu’à lui. Je disais donc que ce mariage ne satisfaisait pas entièrement ton mari, si Schumacker n’était en même temps tout à fait renversé. Du fond de sa prison, ce vieux favori est encore presque aussi redoutable que dans son palais. Il a à la cour des amis obscurs, mais puissants, peut-être parce qu’ils sont obscurs; et le roi, apprenant il y a un mois que les négociations du grand-chancelier avec le duc de Holstein-Ploen ne marchaient pas, s’est écrié avec impatience: — Griffenfeld à lui seul en savait plus qu’eux tous. — Un intrigant nommé Dispolsen, venu de Munckholm à Copenhague, a obtenu de lui plusieurs audiences secrètes, après lesquelles le roi a fait demander à la chancellerie, où ils sont déposés, les titres de noblesse et de propriété de Schumacker. On ignore à quoi Schumacker aspire; mais ne désirerait-il que la liberté, pour un prisonnier d’état c’est désirer le pouvoir. — Il faut donc qu’il meure, et qu’il meure judiciairement; c’est à lui forger un crime que nous travaillons. — Ton mari, Elphège, sous prétexte d’inspecter incognito provinces du Nord, va s’assurer par lui-même du résultat qu’ont eu nos menées parmi les mineurs, dont nous voulons provoquer, au nom de Schumacker, une insurrection qu’il sera facile ensuite d’étouffer. Ce qui nous inquiète, c’est la perte de plusieurs papiers importants relatifs à ce plan, et que nous avons tout lieu de croire au pouvoir de Dispolsen. Sachant donc qu’il était reparti de Copenhague pour Munckholm, rapportant à Schumacker ses parchemins, ses diplômes, et peut-être ces documents qui peuvent nous perdre ou au moins nous compromettre, nous avons aposté dans les gorges de Kole quelques fidèles, chargés de se défaire de lui, après l’avoir dépouillé de ses papiers. Mais si, comme on l’assure, Dispolsen est venu de Berghen par mer, nos peines seront perdues de ce côté-là. — Pourtant j’ai recueilli en arrivant je ne sais quels bruits d’un assassinat d’un capitaine nommé Dispolsen. — Nous verrons. — Nous sommes en attendant à la recherche d’un brigand fameux, Han, dit d’Islande, que nous voudrions mettre à la tête de la révolte des mines. Et toi, ma chère, quelles nouvelles d’ici me donneras-tu? Le joli oiseau de Munckholm a-t-il été pris dans sa cage? La fille du vieux ministre a-t-elle enfin été la proie de notre falcofulvus, de notre fils Frédéric?

La comtesse, retrouvant sa fierté, se récria encore:

— Notre fils!

— Ma foi, quel âge peut-il avoir? Vingt-quatre ans. Il y en a vingt-six que nous nous connaissons, Elphège.

— Dieu le sait, s’écria la comtesse, mon Frédéric est l’héritier légitime du grand-chancelier.

— Si Dieu le sait, répondit le messager en riant, le diable peut l’ignorer. Au reste, ton Frédéric n’est qu’un étourneau indigne de moi, et ce n’est pas la peine de nous quereller pour si peu de chose. Il n’est bon qu’à séduire une fille. Y est-il parvenu au moins?

— Pas encore, que je sache.

— Mais, Elphège, tâche donc de jouer un rôle moins passif dans nos affaires. Celui du comte et le mien sont, tu le vois, assez actifs. Je retourne dès demain vers ton mari. Pour toi, ne te borne pas, de grâce, à prier pour nos péchés, comme la madone que les Italiens invoquent en assassinant. — Il faut aussi qu’Ahlefeld songe à me récompenser un peu plus magnifiquement qu’il ne l’a fait jusqu’ici. Ma fortune est liée à la vôtre; mais je me lasse d’être le serviteur de l’époux, quand je suis l’amant de la femme, et de n’être que le gouverneur, le précepteur, le pédagogue, quand je suis presque le père.

En ce moment minuit sonna, et une des femmes entra, rappelant à la comtesse que, d’après la règle du palais, toutes les lumières devaient être éteintes à cette heure. La comtesse, heureuse de terminer un entretien pénible, rappela ses suivantes.

— Me permette la gracieuse comtesse, dit Musd?mon en se retirant, de conserver l’espérance de la revoir demain, et de déposer à ses pieds l’hommage de mon profond respect.

VIII

Il faut absolument que tu l'aies massacré; tu as le regard d'un meurtrier, un air sinistre et farouche.

SHAKESPEARE, le Songe d'été.

— En honneur, vieillard, dit Ordener à Spiagudry, je commençais à croire que c'étaient les cadavres logés dans cet édifice qui étaient chargés d'en ouvrir la porte.

— Pardonnez, seigneur, répondit le concierge ayant encore dans l'oreille les noms du roi et du vice-roi et répétant son excuse banale, je… je dormais profondément.

— En ce cas, il paraît que vos morts ne dorment pas, car c'étaient eux sans doute que j'entendais tout à l'heure causer distinctement.

Spiagudry se troubla.

— Vous avez, seigneur étranger, vous avez entendu?….

— Eh! mon Dieu, oui; mais qu'importe? je ne suis pas venu ici pour m'occuper de vos affaires, mais pour vous occuper des miennes. Entrons.

Spiagudry ne se souciait guère d'introduire le nouveau venu près du corps de Gill; mais ces dernières paroles le rassurèrent un peu, et d'ailleurs, pouvait-il résister?

Il laissa donc passer le jeune homme, et, refermant la porte:

— Benignus Spiagudry, dit-il, est à votre service pour tout ce qui concerne les sciences humaines. Cependant, si, comme votre visite nocturne semble l'annoncer, vous croyez parler à un sorcier, vous avez tort; ne famam credas; je ne suis qu'un savant. — Entrons, seigneur étranger, dans mon laboratoire.

— Non pas, dit Ordener, c'est à ces cadavres qu'il faut nous arrêter.

— À ces cadavres! s'écria Spiagudry, recommençant à trembler. Mais, seigneur, vous ne pouvez les voir.

— Comment, je ne puis voir des corps qui ne sont déposés là que pour être vus! Je vous répète que j'ai des renseignements à vous demander sur l'un d'eux; votre devoir est de me les donner. Obéissez de gré, vieillard, ou vous obéirez de force.

Spiagudry avait un profond respect pour les sabres, et il en voyait briller un au côté d'Ordener.

— Nihil non arrogat armis, murmura-t-il; et, fouillant dans le trousseau de ses clefs, il ouvrit la grille à hauteur d'appui, et introduisit l'étranger dans la seconde section de la salle.

— Montrez-moi les vêtements du capitaine, dit celui-ci.

En ce moment, un rayon de la lampe tomba sur la tête sanglante de Gill Stadt.

— Juste Dieu! s'écria Ordener, quelle abominable profanation!

— Grand saint Hospice, ayez pitié de moi! dit à voix basse le vieux concierge.

— Vieillard, poursuivit Ordener d'une voix menaçante, êtes-vous si loin de la tombe, pour violer le respect qu'on lui voue, et ne craignez-vous pas, malheureux, que les vivants ne vous apprennent ce que l'on doit aux morts?

— Oh! s'écria le pauvre concierge, grâce, ce n'est pas moi! Si vous saviez!…. Et il s'arrêta, car il se rappela ces mots du petit homme: Sois fidèle et muet.

— Avez-vous vu quelqu'un sortir par cette ouverture? demanda-t-il d'une voix éteinte.

— Oui. Est-ce ton complice?

— Non, c'est le coupable, le seul coupable! j'en, jure par toutes les réprobations infernales, par toutes les bénédictions célestes, par ce corps même si indignement profané! — Et il s'était prosterné sur la pierre devant Ordener.

Tout hideux qu'était Spiagudry, il y avait cependant dans son désespoir, dans ses protestations, un accent de vérité qui persuada le jeune homme.

— Vieillard, dit-il, relève-toi, et si tu n'as point outragé la mort, n'avilis point la vieillesse.

Le concierge se releva. Ordener continua:

— Quel est le coupable?

— Oh! silence, noble jeune seigneur, vous ignorez de qui vous parlez. Silence!

Et Spiagudry se répétait intérieurement: Sois fidèle et muet.

Ordener reprit froidement:

— Quel est le coupable? Je veux le connaître.

— Au nom du ciel, seigneur! ne parlez pas ainsi, taisez-vous, de peur….

— La peur ne me fera point taire et te fera parler.

— Excusez-moi, pardon, mon jeune maître! dit le désolé Spiagudry, je ne puis.

— Tu le peux, car je le veux. Tu nommeras le profanateur!

Spiagudry chercha encore à tergiverser.

— Eh bien! noble maître, le profanateur de ce cadavre est l’assassin de cet officier.

— Cet officier est donc mort assassiné? demanda Ordener, ramené par cette transition au but de sa recherche.

— Oui, sans doute, seigneur.

— Et par qui? par qui?

— Au nom de la sainte que votre mère invoquait en vous donnant le jour, ne cherchez pas à savoir ce nom, mon jeune maître, ne me forcez pas à le révéler.

— Si l’intérêt que j’ai à le savoir avait besoin d’être accru, vous y ajouteriez, vieillard, l’intérêt de la curiosité. Je vous commande de me nommer ce meurtrier.

— Eh bien, dit Spiagudry, remarquez ces profondes déchirures produites par des ongles longs et tranchants sur le corps de ce malheureux. Elles vous nomment l’assassin.

Et le vieillard montrait à Ordener de longues et fortes égratignures sur le cadavre nu et lavé.

— Comment? dit Ordener, est-ce quelque bête fauve?

— Non, mon jeune seigneur.

— Mais, à moins que ce ne soit le diable….

— Chut! prenez garde de trop bien deviner. N’avez-vous jamais entendu parler, poursuivit le concierge à voix basse, d’un homme ou d’un monstre à face humaine, dont les ongles sont aussi longs que ceux d’Astaroth qui nous a perdus, ou de l’Antéchrist qui nous perdra?

— Parlez plus clairement.

— Malheur! dit l’Apocalypse….

— C’est le nom de l’assassin que je vous demande.

— L’assassin… le nom?…. Seigneur, ayez pitié de moi, ayez pitié de vous.

— La seconde de ces prières détruirait la première, quand bien même des motifs graves ne me forceraient pas à t’arracher ce nom. N’abuse pas plus longtemps….

— Eh bien, vous le voulez, jeune homme, dit Spiagudry se redressant et d’une voix haute, ce meurtrier, ce profanateur est Han d’Islande.

Ce nom redoutable n’était pas ignoré d’Ordener.

— Comment! reprit-il, Han! cet exécrable bandit!

— Ne l’appelez pas bandit, car il vit toujours seul.

— Alors, misérable, comment le connaissez-vous? Quels crimes communs vous ont donc rapprochés?

— Oh! noble maître, daignez ne pas croire aux apparences. Le tronc de chêne est-il vénéneux parce que le serpent s’y abrite?

— Point de vaines paroles! un scélérat ne peut avoir d’ami qu’un complice.

— Je ne suis point son ami, et moins encore son complice; et si mes serments ne vous ont pas persuadé, seigneur, veuillez de grâce remarquer que cette profanation détestable m’expose, dans vingt-quatre heures, quand on viendra relever le corps de Gill Stadt, au supplice des sacrilèges, et me jette ainsi dans la plus effroyable inquiétude où innocent se soit jamais trouvé.

Ces considérations d’intérêt personnel firent encore plus sur Ordener que la voix suppliante du pauvre gardien, auquel elles avaient probablement inspiré en bonne partie sa pathétique, quoique inutile résistance au sacrilège du petit homme. Ordener parut méditer un moment, pendant lequel Spiagudry cherchait à lire sur son visage si ce repos déciderait la paix ou ramènerait la tempête.

Enfin il dit d’un ton sévère, mais calme:

— Vieillard, soyez véridique. Ayez-vous trouvé des papiers sur cet officier?

— Aucun, sur mon honneur.

— Savez-vous si Han d’Islande en a trouvé?

— Je vous jure par saint Hospice que je l’ignore.

— Vous l’ignorez? savez-vous où se cache ce Han d’Islande?

— Il ne se cache jamais, il erre toujours.

— Soit; mais enfin quelles sont ses retraites?

— Ce païen, répondit le vieillard à voix basse, a autant de retraites que l’île de Hitteren a de récifs, que l’étoile Sirius a de rayons.

— Je vous engage de nouveau, interrompit Ordener, à parler en termes positifs. Je vais vous donner l’exemple; écoutez. Vous êtes mystérieusement lié avec un brigand dont vous soutenez ne pas être le complice. Si vous le connaissez, vous devez savoir où il s’est maintenant retiré. — Ne m’interrompez pas. — Si vous n’êtes pas son complice, vous n’hésiterez pas à me conduire à sa recherche.

Spiagudry ne put contenir son effroi.

— Vous, noble seigneur, vous, grand Dieu! plein de jeunesse et de vie, provoquer, rechercher ce démoniaque! Quand Ingiald aux quatre bras combattit le géant Nyctolm, du moins avait-il quatre bras.

— Eh bien, dit Ordener en souriant, s'il faut quatre bras, ne serez-vous pas mon guide?

— Moi! votre guide! Comment pouvez-vous vous railler ainsi d'un pauvre vieillard qui a déjà presque besoin d'un guide lui-même?

— Écoutez, reprit Ordener, n'essayez pas vous-même de vous jouer de moi. Si cette profanation, dont je veux bien vous croire innocent, vous expose au châtiment des sacrilèges, vous ne pouvez rester ici. Il vous faut donc fuir. Je vous offre ma sauvegarde, mais à condition que vous me conduirez à la retraite du brigand. Soyez mon guide, je serai votre protecteur. Je dis plus; si j'atteins Han d'Islande, je l'amènerai ici mort ou vif. Vous pourrez prouver votre innocence, et je vous promets de vous faire rentrer dans votre emploi. Voilà, en attendant, plus d'écus royaux qu'il ne vous en rapporte par an.

Ordener, en gardant la bourse pour la fin, avait observé dans ses arguments la gradation voulue par les saines lois de la logique. Cependant ils étaient par eux-mêmes assez forts pour faire rêver Spiagudry. Il commença par prendre l'argent.

— Noble maître, vous avez raison, dit-il ensuite, et son?il, jusqu'alors indécis, se releva sur Ordener. Si je vous suis, je m'expose quelque jour à la vengeance du formidable Han. Si je reste, je tombe demain entre les mains du bourreau Orugix. — Quel est donc déjà le supplice des sacrilèges? N'importe. — Dans les deux cas, ma pauvre vie est en péril; mais comme, d'après la juste observation de S?mond-Sigfusson, autrement dit le Sage, inter duo pericùla?qualia, minus imminens eligendum est, je vous suis. — Oui, seigneur, je serai votre guide. Veuillez ne pas oublier toutefois que j'ai fait tout ce que j'ai pu pour vous détourner de votre aventureux dessein.

— Soit, dit Ordener. Vous serez donc mon guide. Vieillard, ajouta-t-il avec un regard expressif, je compte sur votre loyauté.

— Ah! maître, répondit le concierge, la foi de Spiagudry est aussi pure que l'or que vous venez de me donner si gracieusement.

— Qu'il n'en soit pas autrement, car je vous prouverais que le fer que je porte n'est pas de moins bon aloi que mon or. — Où pensez-vous que soit Han d'Islande?

— Mais, comme le midi du Drontheimhus est plein de troupes qu’on y a envoyées sur je ne sais quelle réquisition du grand-chancelier, Han doit s’être dirigé vers la grotte de Walderlong ou vers le lac de Smiasen. Notre route est par Skongen.

— Quand pouvez-vous me suivre?

— Après la journée qui commence, quand la nuit sera close et le Spladgest fermé, votre pauvre serviteur commencera près de vous les fonctions de guide, pour lesquelles il privera les morts de ses soins. Nous chercherons un moyen de cacher pendant tout le jour, aux yeux du peuple, la mutilation du mineur.

— Où vous trouverai-je ce soir?

— Sur la grande place de Drontheim, s’il convient au maitre, près la statue de la Justice, qui fut jadis Freya, et qui me protégera sans doute de son ombre en reconnaissance du beau diable que j’ai fait sculpter sous ses pieds.

Spiagudry allait peut-être répéter verbalement à Ordener les considérants de son placet au gouverneur, si celui-ci ne l’eût interrompu.

— Il suffit, vieillard, le traité est conclu.

— Conclu, répéta le concierge.

Il achevait ce mot, lorsqu’une espèce de grondement se fit entendre comme au-dessus d’eux. Le concierge tressaillit.

— Qu’est cela? dit-il.

— N’y a-t-il ici, dit Ordener également surpris, d’autre habitant vivant que vous?

— Vous me rappelez mon vicaire Oglypiglap, reprit Spiagudry rassuré par cette idée; c’est lui sans doute qui dort bruyamment. Un lapon qui dort, selon l’évêque Arngrim, fait autant de bruit qu’une femme qui veille.

En parlant ainsi, ils s’étaient rapprochés de la porte du Spladgest.

Spiagudry l’ouvrit doucement.

— Adieu, mon jeune seigneur, dit-il à Ordener, le ciel vous mette en joie. À ce soir. Si votre chemin vous conduit devant la croix de saint Hospice, daignez prier pour votre misérable serviteur Benignus Spiagudry.

Alors refermant en hâte la porte, autant de crainte d’être aperçu que pour garantir sa lampe des premières brises du matin, il revint près du cadavre de Gill, et s’occupa d’en tourner la tête de manière à en cacher la blessure.

Il avait fallu bien des raisons pour décider le timide concierge à accepter l'offre aventureuse de l'étranger. Dans les motifs de sa téméraire détermination entraient: 1° la crainte d'Ordener présent; 2° celle du bourreau Orugix; 3° une vieille haine pour Han d'Islande, haine qu'il osait à peine s'avouer à lui-même, tant la terreur la comprimait; 4° l'amour pour les sciences, auxquelles son voyage serait si utile; 5° la confiance en son esprit rusé, pour se dérober aux regards de Han; 6° un attrait tout spéculatif pour certain métal que renfermait la bourse du jeune aventurier, et dont paraissait aussi remplie la boîte de fer volée au capitaine et destinée à la veuve Stadt, message qui maintenant courait grand risque de ne jamais quitter le messager.

Une dernière raison enfin, c'était l'espérance bien ou mal fondée de rentrer tôt ou tard dans la place qu'il allait abandonner. Que lui importait d'ailleurs que le brigand tuât le voyageur ou le voyageur le brigand? A ce point de sa rêverie, il ne put s'empêcher de dire à haute voix:

— Cela me fera toujours un cadavre.

Un nouveau grondement se fit encore entendre, et le malheureux concierge frissonna.

— Ce ne sont vraiment point là les ronflements d'Oglypiglap, se dit-il; ce bruit vient du dehors.

Puis, après un moment de réflexion:

— Je suis bien simple de m'effrayer ainsi, c'est sans doute le dogue du port qui se réveille et qui aboie.

Alors il acheva de disposer les membres défigurés de Gill; puis, refermant toutes les portes, vint se délasser sur son grabat des fatigues de la nuit qui s'achevait, et prendre des forces pour celle qui se préparait.

IX

JULIETTE.

Ah! crois-tu que nous nous revoyions jamais?

ROMÉO.

Je n’en doute point; et toutes ces peines deviendront le doux entretien de nos jours à venir.

SHAKESPEARE.

Le fanal du château de Munckholm venait de s’éteindre, et, à sa place, le matelot entrant dans le golfe de Drontheim voyait le casque du soldat de garde briller de loin, comme une étoile mobile, aux rayons du soleil levant, quand Schumacker, appuyé sur le bras de sa fille, descendit comme de coutume dans le jardin circulaire qui environnait sa prison. Tous deux avaient eu une nuit agitée, le vieillard par l’insomnie, la jeune fille par des rêves délicieux. Ils se promenaient depuis quelque temps en silence, quand le vieux prisonnier attacha sur la belle jeune fille un regard triste et grave:

— Vous rougissez et souriez toute seule, Éthel; vous êtes heureuse, car vous ne rougissez pas du passé, et vous souriez à l’avenir.

Éthel rougit plus fort, et cessa de sourire.

— Mon seigneur et père, dit-elle, embarrassée et confuse, j’ai apporté le livre de l’Edda.

— Eh bien, lisez, ma fille, dit Schumacker; et il retomba dans sa rêverie.

Alors le sombre captif, assis sur un rocher noirâtre ombragé d’un sapin noir, écouta la douce voix de sa fille, sans entendre sa lecture, comme un voyageur altéré se plaît au murmure de la source où il puise la vie.

Éthel lui lut l’histoire de la bergère Allanga, qui refusa un roi jusqu’à ce qu’il eût prouvé qu’il était un guerrier. Le prince Regner Lodbrog n’obtint la bergère qu’en revenant vainqueur du brigand de Klipstadur, Ingolphe l’Exterminateur.

Soudain un bruit de pas et de feuillage froissé vint interrompre sa lecture et arracher Schumacker à sa méditation. Le lieutenant d’Ahlefeld sortit de derrière le rocher où ils étaient assis. Éthel baissa la tête en reconnaissant l’interrupteur éternel, et l’officier s’écria:

— Sur ma foi, ma belle damoiselle, le nom d’Ingolphe l’Exterminateur vient d’être prononcé par votre charmante bouche. Je l’ai entendu, et je présume que c’est en parlant de son petit-fils, Han d’Islande, que vous êtes remontée jusqu’à lui. Les damoiselles aiment beaucoup à parler des brigands. Sous ce rapport, on conte d’Ingolphe et de sa descendance des choses singulièrement agréables et effrayantes à entendre. L’exterminateur Ingolphe n’eut qu’un fils, né de la sorcière Thoarka; ce fils n’eut également qu’un fils, né de même d’une sorcière. Depuis quatre siècles, cette race s’est ainsi perpétuée pour la désolation de l’Islande, toujours par un seul rejeton, qui ne produit jamais qu’un rameau. C’est par cette série d’héritiers uniques que l’esprit infernal d’Ingolphe est arrivé de nos jours sain et entier au fameux Han d’Islande, qui avait sans doute tout à l’heure le bonheur d’occuper les virginales pensées de la damoiselle.

L’officier s’arrêta un moment. Éthel gardait le silence de l’embarras; Schumacker, celui de l’ennui. Enchanté de les trouver disposés sinon à répondre, du moins à écouter, il continua:

— Le brigand de Klipstadur n’a d’autre passion que la haine des hommes, d’autre soin que celui de leur nuire.

— Il est sage, interrompit brusquement le vieillard.

— Il vit toujours seul, reprit le lieutenant.

— Il est heureux, dit Schumacker.

Le lieutenant fut ravi de cette double interruption, qui semblait sceller un pacte de conversation.

— Nous préserve le dieu Mithra, s’écria-t-il, de ces sages et de ces heureux! Maudit soit le zéphyr malintentionné qui a apporté en Norvège le dernier des démons d’Islande. J’ai tort de dire malintentionné, car c’est, assure-t-on, à un évêque que nous devons le bonheur de posséder Han de Klipstadur. Si l’on en croit la tradition, quelques paysans islandais, ayant pris sur les montagnes de Bessestedt le petit Han encore enfant, voulurent le tuer, comme Astyage tua le lionceau de Bactriane; mais l’évêque de Scalholt s’y opposa, et prit l’oursin sous sa protection, espérant faire un chrétien du diable. Le bon évêque employa mille moyens pour développer cette intelligence infernale, oubliant que la ciguë ne s’était point changée en lys dans les serres chaudes de Babylone. Aussi le démoniaque adolescent le paya-t-il de ses soins en s’enfuyant une belle nuit sur un tronc d’arbre, à travers les mers, et en éclairant sa fuite de l’incendie du manoir épiscopal. Voilà, selon les vieilles fileuses du pays, comment s’est transporté en Norvège cet islandais, qui, grâce à son éducation, offre aujourd’hui toute la perfection du monstre. Depuis ce temps, les mines de Fa-roër comblées et trois cents ouvriers écrasés sous les décombres; le rocher pendant de Golyn précipité pendant la nuit sur le village qu'il dominait; le pont de Half-Broën croulant du haut des roches sous le passage des voyageurs; la cathédrale de Drontheim incendiée; les fanaux côtiers éteints durant les nuits orageuses, et une foule de crimes et de meurtres ensevelis dans les lacs de Sparbo ou de Smiasen, ou cachés sous les grottes de Walderhog et de Rylass, et dans les gorges du Dofre-Field, ont attesté la présence de cet Arimane incarné dans le Drontheimhus. Les vieilles prétendent qu'il lui pousse un poil de la barbe à chaque crime; en ce cas sa barbe doit être aussi touffue que celle du plus vénérable mage assyrien. La belle damoiselle saura cependant que le gouverneur a plus d'une fois essayé d'arrêter la crue extraordinaire de cette barbe.

Schumacker rompit encore le silence.

— Et tous les efforts pour s'emparer de cet homme, dit-il avec un regard de triomphe et un sourire ironique, ont été vains? J'en félicite la grande-chancellerie.

L'officier ne comprit pas le sarcasme de l'ex-grand-chancelier.

— Han a jusqu'ici été aussi imprenable qu'Horatius surnommé Coclès. Vieux soldats, jeunes miliciens, campagnards, montagnards, tout meurt ou tout fuit devant lui. C'est un démon qu'on ne saurait éviter ni atteindre; ce qui peut arriver de plus heureux à ceux qui le cherchent, c'est de ne pas le trouver.

— La gracieuse damoiselle est peut-être surprise, continua-t-il en s'asseyant familièrement près d'Éthel, qui se rapprocha de son père, de tout ce que je sais de curieux touchant cet être surnaturel. Ce n'est pas sans intention que j'ai recueilli ces singulières traditions. Il me semble, et je serais heureux que ma charmante damoiselle partageât mon avis, que les aventures de Han pourraient fournir un roman délicieux, dans le genre des sublimes écrits de la damoiselle Scudéry, l'Artamène ou la Clélie, dont je n'ai encore lu que six volumes, mais qui n'en est pas moins un chef-d'oeuvre à mes yeux. Il faudrait, par exemple, adoucir notre climat, orner nos traditions, modifier nos noms barbares. Ainsi Drontheim, qui deviendrai Durtinianum, verrait ses forêts se changer sous ma baguette magique, en des bosquets délicieux, arrosés de mille petits ruisseaux, bien autrement poétiques que nos vilains torrents. Nos cavernes noires et profondes feraient place à des grottes charmantes, tapissées de rocailles dorées et de coquillages d'azur. Dans l'une de ces grottes habiterait un célèbre enchanteur, Hannus de Thulé… — Car vous conviendrez que le nom de Han d'Islande ne flatte pas l'oreille. — Ce géant… — vous sentez qu'il serait absurde que le héros d'un tel ouvrage ne fût pas un géant — ce géant descendrait en droite ligne du dieu Mars. — Ingolphe l'Exterminateur ne présente rien à l'imagination — et de la magicienne Théonne… — ne trouvez-vous pas le nom de Thoarka heureusement altéré? — fille de la sibylle de Cumes. Hannus, après avoir été élevé par le grand-mage de Thulé, se serait enfin échappé du palais du pontife, sur un char attelé de deux dragons… — Il faudrait être un pauvre esprit pour conserver la mesquine tradition du tronc d'arbre. — Arrivé sous le ciel de Durtinianum, et séduit par ce pays charmant, il en aurait fait le lieu de sa résidence et le théâtre de ses crimes. Ce ne serait pas chose aisée que de faire une peinture agréable des brigandages de Han. On pourrait en adoucir l'horreur par quelque amour ingénieusement imaginé. La bergère Alcippe, en promenant un jour son agneau dans un bois de myrtes et d'oliviers, serait aperçue par le géant, qui céderait soudain au pouvoir de ses yeux. Mais Alcippe aimerait le beau Lycidas, officier des milices, en garnison dans son hameau. Le géant s'irriterait du bonheur du centurion, et le centurion des assiduités du géant. Vous concevez, aimable damoiselle, tout ce qu'une pareille imagination pourrait semer de charme dans les aventures de Hannus. Je parierais mes bottes de Cracovie contre une paire de patins qu'un tel sujet, traité par la damoiselle Scudéry, ferait raffoler toutes les daines de Copenhague.

Ce mot arracha Schumacker de la sombre rêverie où il était resté enseveli pendant la dépense inutile de bel esprit que venait de faire le lieutenant.

— Copenhague?-dit-il brusquement; seigneur officier, que s'est-il passé de nouveau à Copenhague?

— Rien, sur ma foi, que je sache, répondit le lieutenant, sinon le consentement donné par le roi au mariage important qui occupe en ce moment les deux royaumes.

— Comment! reprit Schumacker; quel mariage?

L'apparition d'un quatrième interlocuteur arrêta la réponse sur les lèvres du lieutenant.

Tous trois levèrent les yeux. Le visage sombre du prisonnier s'éclaircit, la physionomie frivole du lieutenant prit une expression de gravité, et la douce figure d'Éthel, pâle et confuse pendant le long soliloque de l'officier, se ranima de vie et de joie. Elle soupira profondément, comme si son coeur eût été allégé d’un poids insupportable, et son sourire triste et furtif s’élança au-devant du nouveau venu. — C’était Ordener.

Le vieillard, la jeune fille et l’officier étaient devant Ordener dans une position singulière, ils avaient chacun un secret commun avec lui; aussi se gênaient-ils réciproquement. Le retour d’Ordener au donjon ne surprit ni Schumacker ni Éthel, qui l’attendaient; mais il étonna le lieutenant, autant que la présence du lieutenant surprit Ordener, qui aurait pu craindre quelque indiscrétion de l’officier sur la scène de la veille, si le silence prescrit par la loi courtoise ne l’eût rassuré. Il ne pouvait donc que s’étonner de le voir paisiblement assis près des deux prisonniers.

Ces quatre personnages ne pouvaient rien se dire réunis, précisément parce qu’ils auraient eu beaucoup à se dire isolément. Aussi, hormis les regards d’intelligence et d’embarras, l’accueil que reçut Ordener fut-il absolument muet.

Le lieutenant partit d’un éclat de rire.

— Par la queue du manteau royal, mon cher nouveau-venu, voilà un silence qui ne ressemble pas mal à celui des sénateurs gaulois, quand le romain Brennus…. Je ne sais, en honneur, déjà plus qui était romain ou gaulois, des sénateurs ou du général. N’importe! puisque vous voilà, aidez-moi à instruire cet honorable vieillard de ce qui se passe de nouveau. J’allais, sans votre subite entrée en scène, l’entretenir du mariage illustre qui occupe en ce moment mèdes et persans.

— Quel mariage? dirent en même temps Ordener et Schumacker.

— À la coupe de vos vêtements, seigneur étranger, s’écria le lieutenant en frappant des mains, j’avais déjà pressenti que vous veniez de quelque autre monde. Voici une question qui change en certitude mon soupçon. Vous êtes sans doute débarqué hier sur les bords de la Nidder, dans un char-fée attelé de deux griffons ailés; car vous n’auriez pu parcourir la Norvège sans entendre parler du fameux mariage du fils du vice-roi avec la fille du grand-chancelier.

Schumacker se tourna vers le lieutenant.

— Quoi! Ordener Guldenlew épouse Ulrique d’Ahlefeld?

— Comme vous dites, répondit l’officier, et cela sera conclu avant que la mode des vertugadins à la française soit passée à Copenhague.

— Le fils de Frédéric doit avoir environ vingt-deux ans; car j’étais depuis une année dans la forteresse de Copenhague quand le bruit de sa naissance parvint jusqu’à moi. Qu’il se marie jeune, continua Schumacker avec un sourire amer; au moment de la disgrâce on ne lui reprochera pas du moins d'avoir ambitionné le chapeau de cardinal.

Le vieux favori faisait à ses propres malheurs une allusion que le lieutenant ne comprit pas.

— Non certes, dit-il en éclatant de rire. Le baron Ordener va recevoir le titre de comte, le collier de l'Éléphant et les aiguillettes de colonel, qui ne se concilient guère vraiment avec la barrette de cardinal.

— Tant mieux, répondit Schumacker. Puis, après une pause, il ajouta, secouant la tête comme s'il eût vu sa vengeance devant lui: — Quelque jour peut-être on lui fera un carcan du noble collier, on lui brisera sur le front sa couronne de comte, on lui battra les joues de ses aiguillettes de colonel. Ordener saisit la main du vieillard.

— Dans l'intérêt de votre haine, seigneur, ne maudissez pas le bonheur d'un ennemi avant de savoir si ce bonheur en est un pour lui.

— Eh! mais, dit le lieutenant, qu'importent au baron de Thorvick les anathèmes du bonhomme?

— Lieutenant! s'écria Ordener, ils lui importent plus que vous ne pensez…. — peut-être. — Et, poursuivit-il après un moment de silence, votre fameux mariage est moins certain que vous ne le croyez.

— Fiat quod vis, repartit le lieutenant avec une salutation ironique; le roi, le vice-roi et le grand-chancelier ont, il est vrai, tout disposé pour cette union; ils la désirent, ils la veulent; mais puisqu'elle déplaît au seigneur étranger, qu'importe le grand-chancelier, le vice-roi et le roi!

— Vous avez peut-être raison, dit Ordener d'un air sérieux.

— Oh! sur ma foi! — et le lieutenant se renversa sur le dos en éclatant de rire, — cela est trop plaisant. Je voudrais pour beaucoup que le baron de Thorvick fût ici pour entendre un devin aussi bien instruit des choses de ce monde décider de sa destinée. Mon docte prophète, croyez-moi, vous n'avez pas encore assez de barbe pour être bon sorcier.

— Seigneur lieutenant, répondit froidement Ordener, je ne pense pas qu'Ordener Guldenlew épouse une femme sans l'aimer.

— Eh! eh! voilà le livre des maximes. Et qui vous dit, seigneur du manteau vert, que le baron n'aime pas Ulrique d'Ahlefeld?

— Et, s'il vous plaît, à votre tour, qui vous dit qu'il l'aime?

Ici le lieutenant fut entraîné, comme il arrive souvent, par la chaleur de la conversation, à affirmer un fait dont il n'était pas sûr.

— Qui me dit qu’il l’aime? la question est amusante! J’en suis fâché pour votre divination; mais tout le monde sait que ce mariage n’est pas moins un mariage de passion que de convenance.

— Excepté moi, du moins, dit Ordener d’un ton grave.

— Excepté vous, soit; mais qu’importe! vous n’empêcherez pas que le fils du vice-roi ne soit amoureux de la fille du chancelier!

— Amoureux?

— Amoureux fou!

— Il faudrait en effet qu’il fût fou pour en être amoureux.

— Holà! n’oubliez pas de qui et à qui vous parlez. Ne dirait-on pas que le fils du comte vice-roi n’a pu s’éprendre d’une dame sans consulter ce rustaud?

En parlant ainsi, l’officier s’était levé. Éthel, qui vit le regard d’Ordener s’enflammer, se précipita devant lui.

— Oh! dit-elle, de grâce calmez-vous; n’écoutez pas ces injures; que nous importe que le fils du vice-roi aime la fille du chancelier? Cette douce main posée sur le coeur du jeune homme en apaisa la tempête; il abaissa sur son Éthel un regard enivré, et n’entendit plus le lieutenant qui, reprenant sa gaieté, s’écriait: — La damoiselle remplit avec une grâce infinie le rôle des dames sabines entre leurs pères et leurs maris. Mes paroles étaient peu mesurées; j’oubliais, poursuivit-il en s’adressant à Ordener, qu’il existait entre nous un lien de fraternité, et que nous ne pouvions plus nous provoquer.

— Chevalier, donnez-moi la main. Convenez-en, vous aviez aussi oublié que vous parliez du fils du vice-roi à son futur beau-frère, le lieutenant d’Ahlefeld.

À ce nom, Schumacker, qui avait tout observé jusque-là d’un oeil d’indifférence ou d’impatience, s’élança de son siège de pierre en poussant un cri terrible.

— D’Ahlefeld! un d’Ahlefeld devant moi! Serpent! comment n’ai-je pas reconnu dans le fils son exécrable père! Laissez-moi paisible dans mon cachot, je n’ai point été condamné au supplice de vous voir. Il ne me manque plus, comme il l’osait souhaiter tout à l’heure, que de voir le fils de Guldenlew près du fils d’Ahlefeld! — Traîtres! lâches! que ne viennent-ils eux-mêmes jouir de mes larmes de démence et de rage? Race! race abhorrée! fils d’Ahlefeld, laisse-moi!

L’officier, d’abord étourdi de la vivacité de ces imprécations, retrouva bientôt la colère et la parole.

— Silence! vieil insensé! auras-tu bientôt fini de me chanter les litanies des démons?

— Laisse, laisse-moi! poursuivit le vieillard, et emporte ma malédiction, pour toi et la misérable race de Guldenlew qui va s’allier à la tienne.

— Pardieu, s’écria l’officier furieux, tu me fais un double outrage!

Ordener arrêta le lieutenant, qui ne se connaissait plus.

— Respectez un vieillard dans votre ennemi, lieutenant; nous avons déjà des satisfactions à nous rendre, je vous ferai raison des offenses du prisonnier.

— Soit, dit le lieutenant, vous contractez une double dette; le combat sera à outrance, car j’aurai mon beau-frère et moi à venger. Songez qu’avec mon gant vous ramassez celui d’Ordener Guldenlew.

— Lieutenant d’Ahlefeld, répondit Ordener, vous embrassez le parti des absents avec une chaleur qui prouve de la générosité. N’y en aurait-il pas autant à prendre pitié d’un malheureux vieillard à qui l’adversité donne quelque droit d’être injuste?

D’Ahlefeld était de ces âmes chez qui on éveille une vertu avec une louange. Il serra la main d’Ordener, et s’approcha de Schumacker, qui, épuisé par son emportement même, était retombé sur le rocher dans les bras d’Éthel éplorée.

— Seigneur Schumacker, dit l’officier, vous avez abusé de votre vieillesse, et j’allais peut-être abuser de ma jeunesse, si vous n’aviez trouvé un champion. J’étais entré ce matin pour la dernière fois dans votre prison, car c’était pour vous dire que désormais vous pourriez rester, d’après l’ordre spécial du vice-roi, libre et sans gardes dans le donjon. Recevez cette bonne nouvelle de la bouche d’un ennemi.

— Retirez-vous, dit le vieux captif d’une voix sourde.

Le lieutenant s’inclina, et obéit, intérieurement satisfait d’avoir conquis le regard approbateur d’Ordener.

Schumacker resta quelque temps les bras croisés et la tête courbée, enseveli dans ses rêveries; tout à coup il releva son regard sur Ordener, debout et en silence devant lui.

— Eh bien? dit-il.

— Seigneur comte, Dispolsen est mort assassiné.

La tête du vieillard retomba sur sa poitrine. Ordener poursuivit:

— Son assassin est un brigand fameux, Han d'Islande.

— Han d'Islande! dit Schumacker.

— Han d'Islande! répéta Éthel.

— Il a dépouillé le capitaine, continua Ordener.

— Ainsi, dit le vieillard, vous n'avez point entendu parler d'un coffret de fer, scellé des armes de Griffenfeld?

— Non, seigneur.

Schumacker laissa tomber son front sur ses mains.

— Je vous le rapporterai, seigneur comte, fiez-vous à moi. Le meurtre a été commis hier matin. Han a fui vers le nord. J'ai un guide qui connaît ses retraites, j'ai souvent parcouru les monts du Drontheimhus. J'atteindrai le brigand. Éthel pâlit. Schumacker se leva; son regard avait quelque chose de joyeux, comme s'il comprenait encore la vertu chez les hommes.

— Noble Ordener, dit-il, adieu. — Et levant une main vers le ciel, il disparut derrière les broussailles.

Quand Ordener se retourna, il vit, sur le roc bruni par la mousse, Éthel pâle, comme une statue d'albâtre sur un piédestal noir.

— Juste Dieu, mon Éthel! dit-il se précipitant près d'elle et la soutenant dans ses bras, qu'avez-vous?

— Oh! répondit la tremblante jeune fille d'une voix qu'on entendait à peine, oh! si vous avez, non quelque amour, mais quelque pitié pour moi, seigneur, si vous ne me parliez pas hier tout à fait pour m'abuser, si ce n'est pas pour causer ma mort que vous avez daigné venir dans cette prison; seigneur Ordener, mon Ordener, renoncez, au nom du ciel, au nom des anges, renoncez à votre projet insensé! Ordener, mon bien-aimé Ordener! poursuivit-elle, — et ses larmes s'échappaient avec abondance, et sa tête s'était penchée sur le sein du jeune homme, — fais-moi ce sacrifice. Ne poursuis pas ce brigand, cet affreux démon, que tu veux combattre. Dans quel intérêt y vas-tu, Ordener? Dis-moi, quel intérêt peut t'être plus cher que celui de la malheureuse que tu nommais hier ta bien-aimée épouse?

Elle s'arrêta suffoquée par les sanglots. Ses deux bras étaient attachés par ses mains jointes au cou d'Ordener, sur les yeux duquel elle fixait ses yeux suppliants.

— Mon Éthel adorée, vous vous alarmez à tort. Dieu soutient les bonnes intentions, et l'intérêt pour lequel je m'expose n'est autre que le vôtre. Ce coffret de fer renferme….

Éthel l'interrompit.

— Mon intérêt! ai-je un autre intérêt que ta vie? Et si tu meurs, Ordener, que veux-tu que je devienne?

— Pourquoi penses-tu que je mourrai, Éthel?

— Ah! tu ne connais donc pas ce Han, ce brigand infernal? Sais-tu à quel monstre tu cours? Sais-tu qu'il commande à toutes les puissances des ténèbres? qu'il renverse des montagnes sur des villes? que son pas fait crouler les cavernes souterraines? que son souffle éteint les fanaux sur les rochers? Et crois-tu, Ordener, résister à ce géant aidé du démon, avec tes bras blancs et ta frêle épée?

— Et vos prières, Éthel, et l'idée que je combats pour vous? Sois-en sûre, mon Éthel, on t'a beaucoup exagéré la force et le pouvoir de ce brigand. C'est un homme comme nous, qui donne la mort jusqu'à ce qu'il la reçoive.

— Tu ne veux donc pas m'écouter? mes paroles ne sont donc rien pour toi? Que veux-tu, dis-moi, que je devienne si tu pars, si tu vas errer de périls en périls, exposant, pour je ne sais quel intérêt de la terre, tes jours qui sont à moi, les livrant à un monstre?

Ici les récits du lieutenant apparurent de nouveau à l'imagination d'Éthel, accrus de tout son amour et de toute sa terreur. Elle poursuivit, d'une voix entrecoupée par les sanglots:

— Je te l'assure, mon bien-aimé Ordener, ils t'ont trompé ceux qui t'ont dit que ce n'était qu'un homme. Tu dois me croire plus qu'eux, Ordener, tu sais que je ne voudrais pas te tromper. On a mille fois essayé de le combattre, il a détruit des bataillons entiers. Je voudrais seulement que d'autres te le disent, tu les croirais et tu n'irais pas.

Les prières de la pauvre Éthel auraient sans doute ébranlé l'aventureuse résolution d'Ordener, s'il n'eût été aussi avancé. Les paroles échappées la veille au désespoir de Schumacker revinrent à sa mémoire, et le raffermirent.

— Je pourrais, ma chère Éthel, vous dire que je n'irai pas, et n'en pas moins exécuter mon projet; mais je ne vous tromperai jamais, même pour vous rassurer. Je ne dois pas, je le répète, balancer entre vos larmes et vos intérêts. Il s'agit de votre fortune, de votre bonheur, de votre vie peut-être, de ta vie, mon Éthel.

Et il la pressait doucement dans ses bras.

— Et que me fait tout cela? reprit-elle éplorée. Mon ami, mon Ordener, ma joie, tu sais que tu es toute ma joie, ne me donne pas un malheur affreux et certain pour des malheurs légers et douteux. Que me font ma fortune, ma vie?

— Il s’agit aussi, Éthel, de la vie de votre père.

Elle s’arracha de ses bras.

— De mon père? répéta-t-elle à voix basse et en pâlissant.

— Oui, Éthel. Ce brigand, soudoyé sans doute par les ennemis du comte Griffenfeld, a en son pouvoir des papiers dont la perte compromet les jours, déjà si détestés, de votre père. Je veux lui reprendre ces papiers avec la vie.

Éthel resta quelques instants pâle et muette; ses larmes s’étaient taries, son sein gonflé respirait péniblement, elle regardait la terre d’un oeil terne et indifférent, de l’oeil dont le condamné la regarde au moment où la hache se lève derrière lui sur sa tête.

— De mon père! murmura-t-elle.

Puis elle tourna lentement les yeux sur Ordener.

— Ce que tu fais est inutile; mais fais-le.

Ordener l’attira sur son sein.

— Oh! noble fille, laisse ton coeur battre sur le mien. Généreuse amie! je reviendrai bientôt. Va, tu seras à moi; je veux être le sauveur de ton père, pour mériter de devenir son fils. Mon Éthel, ma bien-aimée Éthel!

Qui pourrait dire ce qui se passe dans un noble coeur qui se sent compris d’un noble coeur? Et si l’amour unit ces deux âmes pareilles d’un lien indestructible, qui pourrait peindre ces inexprimables délices? Il semble alors que l’on éprouve, réunis dans un court moment, tout le bonheur et toute la gloire de la vie, embellie du charme des généreux sacrifices.

— O mon Ordener, va, et, si tu ne reviens pas, la douleur sans espoir tue. J’aurai cette lente consolation. Ils se levèrent tous deux, et Ordener plaça sur son bras le bras d’Éthel, et dans sa main cette main adorée; ils traversèrent en silence les allées tortueuses du sombre jardin, et arrivèrent à regret à la porte de la tour qui servait d’issue. Là, Éthel, tirant de son sein de petits ciseaux d’or, coupa une boucle de ses beaux cheveux noirs.

— Reçois-la, Ordener; qu’elle t’accompagne, qu’elle soit plus heureuse que moi.

Ordener pressa religieusement sur ses lèvres ce présent de sa bien-aimée.

Elle poursuivit:

— Ordener, pense à moi, je prierai pour toi. Ma prière sera peut-être aussi puissante auprès de Dieu que tes armes devant le démon.

Ordener s’inclina devant cet ange. Son âme sentait trop pour que sa bouche pût parler. Ils restèrent quelque temps sur le coeur l’un de l’autre. Au moment de la quitter, peut-être pour jamais, Ordener jouissait, avec un triste ravissement, du bonheur de tenir une fois encore toute son Éthel entre ses bras. Enfin, déposant un chaste et long baiser sur le front décoloré de la douce jeune fille, il s’élança violemment sous la voûte obscure de l’escalier en spirale, qui lui apporta un moment après le mot si lugubre et si doux: Adieu!

X

Tu ne la croirais pas malheureuse, tout ce qui l'entoure annonce le bonheur. Elle porte des colliers d'or et des robes de pourpre. Lorsqu'elle sort, la foule de ses vassaux se prosterne sur son passage, et des pages obéissants étendent des tapis sous ses pieds. Mais on ne la voit point dans la retraite qui lui est chère: car alors elle pleure, et son mari ne l'entend pas. — Je suis cette malheureuse, l'épouse d'un homme honoré, d'un noble comte, la mère d'un enfant dont les sourires me poignardent.

MATURIN, Bertram.

La comtesse d'Ahlefeld venait de quitter l'insomnie de la nuit pour celle du jour. À demi couchée sur un sopha, elle rêvait aux arrière-goûts amers des jouissances impures, au crime qui use la vie par des joies sans bonheur et des douleurs sans consolation. Elle songeait à ce Musdoemon, que de coupables illusions lui avaient jadis peint si séduisant, si affreux maintenant qu'elle l'avait pénétré et qu'elle avait vu l'âme à travers le corps. La misérable pleurait, non d'avoir été trompée, mais de ne pouvoir plus l'être; de regret, non de repentir; aussi ses pleurs ne la soulageaient-ils pas. En ce moment sa porte s'ouvrit; elle essuya en hâte ses yeux, et se retourna irritée d'être surprise, car elle avait ordonné qu'on la laissât seule. Sa colère se changea à l'aspect de Musdoemon en un effroi qu'elle apaisa pourtant en le voyant accompagné de son fils Frédéric.

— Ma mère! s'écria le lieutenant, comment donc êtes-vous ici? Je vous croyais à Berghen. Est-ce que nos belles dames ont repris la mode de courir les champs?

La comtesse accueillit Frédéric avec des embrassements auxquels, comme tous les enfants gâtés, il répondit assez froidement. C'était peut-être la plus sensible des punitions pour cette malheureuse. Frédéric était son fils chéri, le seul être au monde pour lequel elle conservât une affection désintéressée; car souvent, dans une femme dégradée, même quand l'épouse a disparu, il reste encore quelque chose de la mère.

— Je vois, mon fils, qu'en apprenant ma présence à Drontheim, vous êtes accouru sur-le-champ pour me voir.

— Oh! mon Dieu non. Je m'ennuyais au fort, je suis venu dans la ville où j'ai rencontré Musdoemon, qui m'a conduit ici.

La pauvre mère soupira profondément.

— À propos, ma mère, continua Frédéric, je suis bien content de vous voir. Vous me direz si les noeuds de ruban rose au bas du justaucorps sont toujours de mode à Copenhague. Avez-vous songé à m'apporter une fiole de cette huile de Jouvence, qui blanchit la peau? Vous n'avez pas oublié, n'est-ce pas, le dernier roman traduit, ni les galons d'or vierge que je vous ai demandés pour ma casaque couleur de feu, ni ces petits peignes que l'on place maintenant sous la frisure pour soutenir les boucles, ni….

La malheureuse femme n'avait rien apporté à son fils, que le seul amour qu'elle eût au monde.

— Mon cher fils, j'ai été malade, et mes souffrances m'ont empêchée de songer à vos plaisirs.

— Vous avez été malade, ma mère? Eh bien, maintenant vous sentez-vous mieux? — À propos, comment va ma meute de chiens normands? Je parie qu'on aura négligé de baigner tous les soirs ma guenon dans l'eau de rose. Vous verrez que je trouverai mon perroquet de Bilbao mort à mon retour. — Quand je suis absent, personne ne songe à mes bêtes.

— Votre mère du moins songe à vous, mon fils, dit la mère, d'une voix altérée.

C'aurait été l'heure inexorable où l'ange exterminateur lancera les âmes pécheresses dans les châtiments éternels, qu'il aurait eu pitié des douleurs auxquelles était en ce moment livré le coeur de l'infortunée comtesse.

Musdoemon riait dans un coin de l'appartement.

— Seigneur Frédéric, dit-il, je vois que l'épée d'acier ne veut pas se rouiller dans le fourreau de fer. Vous ne vous souciez pas de perdre dans les tours de Munckholm les saines traditions des salons de Copenhague. Mais pourtant, daignez me le dire, à quoi bon cette huile de Jouvence, ces rubans roses et ces petits peignes; à quoi bon ces apprêts de siège, si la seule forteresse féminine que renferment les tours de Munckholm est imprenable?

— En honneur! elle l'est, répondit Frédéric en riant. Certes, si j'ai échoué, le général Schack y échouerait. Mais comment surprendre un fort où rien n'est à découvert, où tout est gardé sans relâche? Que faire contre des guimpes qui ne laissent voir que le cou, contre des manches qui cachent tout le bras, en sorte qu'il n'y a que le visage et les mains pour prouver que la jeune damoiselle n'est pas noire comme l'empereur de Mauritanie? Mon cher précepteur, vous seriez un écolier. Croyez-moi, le fort est inexpugnable quand la Pudeur y tient garnison.

— En vérité! dit Musdoemon. Mais ne forcerait-on pas la Pudeur à capituler, en lui faisant donner l'assaut par l'Amour, au lieu de se borner au blocus des Petits Soins?

— Peine perdue, mon cher; l'Amour s'est bien introduit dans la place, mais il y sert de renfort à la Pudeur.

— Ah! seigneur Frédéric, voilà du nouveau. Avec l'Amour pour vous….

— Et qui vous dit, Musdoemon, qu'il est pour moi?

— Et pour qui donc? s'écrièrent à la fois Musdoemon et la comtesse, qui jusqu'alors avait écouté en silence, mais à qui les paroles du lieutenant venaient de rappeler Ordener.

Frédéric allait répondre et préparait déjà un récit piquant de la scène nocturne de la veille, quand le silence prescrit par la loi courtoise lui revint à l'esprit et changea sa gaieté en embarras.

— Ma foi, dit-il, je ne sais pour qui… mais… quelque rustaud, peut-être… quelque vassal….

— Quelque soldat de la garnison? dit Musdoemon en éclatant de rire.

— Quoi, mon fils! s'écriait de son côté la comtesse, vous êtes sûr qu'elle aime un paysan, un vassal?

— Quel bonheur si vous en étiez sûr!

— Eh! sans doute, j'en suis sûr. Ce n'est point un soldat de la garnison, ajouta le lieutenant d'un air piqué. Mais je suis assez sûr de ce que je dis pour vous prier, ma mère, d'abréger mon très inutile exil dans ce maudit château.

Le visage de la comtesse s'était éclairci en apprenant la chute de la jeune fille. L'empressement d'Ordener Guldenlew à se rendre à Munckholm se présenta alors à son esprit sous des couleurs toutes différentes. Elle en fit les honneurs à son fils.

— Vous nous donnerez tout à l'heure, Frédéric, des détails sur les amours d'Éthel Schumacker; ils ne m'étonnent pas, fille de rustre ne peut aimer qu'un rustre. En attendant, ne maudissez pas ce château qui vous a procuré hier l'honneur de voir certain personnage faire les premières démarches pour vous connaître.

— Comment! ma mère, dit le lieutenant ouvrant les yeux, — quel personnage?

— Trêve de plaisanteries, mon fils. Personne ne vous a-t-il rendu visite hier? Vous voyez que je suis instruite.

— Ma foi, mieux que moi, ma mère. Du diable si j'ai vu hier autre visage que les mascarons placés sous les corniches de ces vieilles tours!

— Comment, Frédéric, vous n'avez vu personne?

— Personne, ma mère, en vérité!

Frédéric, en omettant son antagoniste du donjon, obéissait à la loi du silence; et d'ailleurs ce manant pouvait-il compter pour quelqu'un?

— Quoi! dit la mère, le fils du vice-roi n'est pas allé hier soir à Munckholm?

Le lieutenant éclata de rire.

— Le fils du vice-roi! En vérité, ma mère, vous rêvez ou vous raillez.

— Ni l'un ni l'autre, mon fils. Qui donc était hier de garde?

— Moi-même, ma mère.

— Et vous n'avez point vu le baron Ordener?

— Eh non, répéta le lieutenant.

— Mais songez, mon fils, qu'il a pu entrer incognito, que vous ne l'avez jamais vu, ayant été élevé à Copenhague tandis qu'on relevait à Drontheim; songez à ce qu'on dit de ses caprices, du vagabondage de ses idées. Êtes-vous sûr, mon fils, de n'avoir vu personne?

Frédéric hésita un instant.

— Non, s'écria-t-il, personne! je ne puis dire autre chose.

— En ce cas, reprit la comtesse, le baron n'est sans doute pas allé à Munckholm.

Musdoemon, d'abord surpris comme Frédéric, avait tout écouté attentivement. Il interrompit la comtesse.

— Noble dame, permettez. — Seigneur Frédéric, quel est, de grâce, le nom du vassal aimé de la fille de Schumacker?

Il répéta sa question; car Frédéric, qui depuis quelques moments était devenu pensif, ne l'avait pas entendue.

— Je l'ignore…. ou plutôt…. Oui, je l'ignore.

— Et comment, seigneur, savez-vous qu'elle aime un vassal?

— L'ai-je dit? un vassal? Eh bien! oui, un vassal.

L'embarras de la position du lieutenant s'accroissait. Cet interrogatoire, les idées qu'il faisait naître en lui, l'obligation de se taire, le jetaient dans un trouble dont il craignait de n'être plus maître.

— Par ma foi, sire Musdoemon, et vous, ma noble mère, si la manie d'interroger est à la mode, amusez-vous à vous interroger tous deux. Pour moi, je n'ai rien de plus à vous dire.

Et, ouvrant brusquement la porte, il disparut, les laissant plongés dans un abîme de conjectures. Il descendit précipitamment dans la cour, car il entendait la voix de Musdoemon qui le rappelait.

Il remonta à cheval, et se dirigea vers le port, d'où il voulait se rembarquer pour Munckholm, pensant y trouver peut-être encore l'étranger qui jetait dans de profondes réflexions l'un des plus frivoles cerveaux d'une des plus frivoles capitales.

— Si c'était Ordener Guldenlew! se disait-il; en ce cas ma pauvre Ulrique…. Mais non; il est impossible qu'on soit assez fou pour préférer la fille indigente d'un prisonnier d'état à la fille opulente d'un ministre tout-puissant. En tout cas, la fille de Schumacker pourrait n'être qu'une fantaisie, et rien n'empêche, quand on a une femme, d'avoir en même temps une maîtresse; cela même est de bon ton. Mais non, ce n'est pas Ordener. Le fils du vice-roi ne se vêtirait pas d'un justaucorps usé; et cette vieille plume noire sans boucle, battue du vent et de la pluie! et ce grand manteau dont on pourrait faire une tente! et ces cheveux en désordre, sans peignes et sans frisure! et ces bottines à éperons de fer, souillées de boue et de poussière! Vraiment ce ne peut être lui. Le baron de Thorvick est chevalier de Dannebrog; cet étranger ne porte aucune décoration d'honneur. Si j'étais chevalier de Dannebrog, il me semble que je coucherais avec le collier de l'ordre. Oh non! il ne connaît seulement pas la Clélie. Non, ce n'est pas le fils du vice roi.

XI

Si l’homme pouvait conserver encore la chaleur de l’âme quand l’expérience l’éclaire; s’il héritait du temps sans se courber sous son poids, il n’insulterait jamais aux vertus exaltées, dont le premier conseil est toujours le sacrifice de soi-même.

Mme DE STAËL. De l’Allemagne.

— Eh bien! qu’est-ce? Vous, Poël! qui vous a fait monter?

— Son excellence oublie qu’elle vient de m’en donner l’ordre.

— Oui? dit le général. — Ah! c’était pour que vous me donnassiez ce carton.

Poël remit au gouverneur le carton, que celui-ci aurait pu prendre lui-même, en étendant un peu le bras.

Son excellence replaça machinalement le carton sans l’ouvrir, puis elle feuilleta quelques papiers avec distraction.

— Poël, je voulais aussi vous demander…. Quelle heure est-il?

— Six heures du matin, répondit le valet au général, qui avait une horloge sous les yeux.

— Je voulais vous dire, Poël…. Qu’y a-t-il de nouveau dans le palais?

Le général continua sa revue des papiers, écrivant d’un air préoccupé quelques mots sur chacun d’eux.

— Rien, votre excellence, sinon que l’on attend encore mon noble maître, dont je vois que le général est inquiet.

Le général se leva de son grand bureau, et regarda Poël d’un air d’humeur.

— Vous avez de mauvais yeux, Poël. Moi, inquiet d’Ordener! Je sais le motif de son absence; je ne l’attends pas encore.

Le général Levin de Knud était tellement jaloux de son autorité, qu’elle lui eût semblé compromise, si un subalterne eût pu deviner une de ses secrètes pensées, et croire qu’Ordener avait agi sans son ordre.

— Poël, poursuivit-il, retirez-vous.

Le valet sortit.

— En vérité, s’écria le gouverneur resté seul, Ordener use et abuse. À force de plier la lame, on la brise. Me faire passer une nuit d’insomnie et d’impatience! exposer le général Levin aux sarcasmes d’une chancelière et aux conjectures d’un valet! et tout cela pour qu’un vieil ennemi ait les premiers embrassements qu’il doit à un vieil ami. Ordener! Ordener! les caprices tuent la liberté. Qu’il vienne, qu’il arrive maintenant, du diable si je ne l’accueille pas comme la poudre accueille le feu! Exposer le gouverneur de Drontheim aux conjectures d’un valet, aux sarcasmes d’une chancelière! Qu’il vienne!

Le général continuait d’apostiller les papiers sans les lire, tant sa mauvaise humeur le préoccupait.

— Mon général! mon noble père! s’écria une voix connue.

Ordener serrait dans ses bras le vieillard, qui ne songea pas même à réprimer un cri de joie.

— Ordener, mon brave Ordener! Pardieu! que je suis aisé!…. — La réflexion arriva au milieu de cette phrase. — Je suis aisé, seigneur baron, que vous sachiez maîtriser vos sentiments. Vous paraissez avoir du plaisir à me revoir; c’est sans doute pour vous mortifier que vous vous en êtes imposé la privation depuis vingt-quatre heures que vous êtes ici.

— Mon père, vous m’avez souvent dit qu’un ennemi malheureux devait passer avant un ami heureux. Je viens de Munckholm.

— Sans doute, dit le général, quand le malheur de l’ennemi est imminent. Mais l’avenir de Schumacker….

— Est plus menaçant que jamais. Noble général, une trame odieuse est ourdie contre cet infortuné. Des hommes nés ses amis veulent le perdre. Un homme né son ennemi saura le servir.

Le général, dont le visage s’était par degrés entièrement adouci, interrompit Ordener.

— Bien, mon cher Ordener. Mais que dis-tu là? Schumacker est sous ma sauvegarde. Quels hommes? quelles trames?

Ordener aurait été bien empêché de répondre clairement à cette question. Il n’avait que des lueurs très vagues, que des présomptions très incertaines sur la position de l’homme pour lequel il allait exposer sa vie. Bien des gens trouveront qu’il agissait follement; mais les âmes jeunes font ce qu’elles croient juste par instinct et non par calcul; et d’ailleurs, dans ce monde où la prudence est si aride et la sagesse si ironique, qui nie que la générosité soit folie? Tout est relatif sur la terre, où tout est borné; et la vertu serait une grande démence, si derrière les hommes il n’y avait Dieu. Ordener était dans l’âge où l’on croit et où l’on est cru. Il risquait ses jours de confiance. Le général accueillit de même des raisons qui n’auraient pas résisté à une discussion froide.

— Quelles trames? quels hommes? mon bon père. Dans quelques jours j’aurai tout éclairci; alors vous saurez tout ce que je saurai. Je vais repartir ce soir.

— Comment! s’écria le vieillard, tu ne me donneras encore que quelques heures! Mais où vas-tu? pourquoi pars-tu, mon cher fils?

— Vous m’avez quelquefois permis, mon noble père, de faire une action louable en secret.

— Oui, mon brave Ordener; mais tu pars sans trop savoir pourquoi, et tu sais quelle grande affaire te demande.

— Mon père m’a laissé un mois de réflexion, je le consacre aux intérêts d’un autre. Bonne action donne bon conseil. D’ailleurs à mon retour nous verrons.

— Quoi! reprit le général d’un ton de sollicitude, ce mariage te déplairait-il? on dit Ulrique d’Ahlefeld si belle! dis-moi, l’as-tu vue?

— Je crois qu’oui, dit Ordener; il me semble qu’elle est belle, en effet.

— Eh bien? reprit le gouverneur.

— Eh bien, dit Ordener, elle ne sera pas ma femme.

Ce mot froid et décisif frappa le général comme un coup violent. Les soupçons de l’orgueilleuse comtesse lui revinrent à l’esprit.

— Ordener, dit-il en hochant la tête, je devrais être sage, car j’ai été pécheur. Eh bien, je suis un vieux fou! Ordener! le prisonnier a une fille….

— Oh! s’écria le jeune homme, général, je voulais vous en parler. Je vous demande, mon père, votre protection pour cette faible et opprimée jeune fille.

— En vérité, dit gravement le gouverneur, tes instances sont vives.

Ordener revint un peu à lui.

— Et comment ne le seraient-elles pas pour une pauvre prisonnière à laquelle on veut arracher la vie, et, ce qui est bien plus précieux, l’honneur?

— La vie! l’honneur! mais c’est moi pourtant qui gouverne ici, et j’ignore toutes ces horreurs! Explique-toi.

— Mon noble père, la vie du prisonnier et de sa fille sans défense est menacée par un infernal complot.

— Mais ce que tu avances est grave; quelle preuve en as-tu?

— Le fils aîné d’une puissante famille est en ce moment à Munckholm; il y est pour séduire la comtesse Éthel. Il me l’a dit lui-même.

Le général recula de trois pas.

— Dieu, Dieu! pauvre jeune abandonnée! Ordener, Ordener! Éthel et Schumacker sont sous ma protection. Quel est le misérable? quelle est la famille?

Ordener s’approcha du général et lui serra la main.

— La famille d’Ahlefeld.

— D’Ahlefeld! dit le vieux gouverneur; oui, la chose est claire, le lieutenant Frédéric est encore en ce moment à Munckholm. Noble Ordener, on veut t’allier à cette race. Je conçois ta répugnance, noble Ordener!

Le vieillard, croisant les bras, resta quelques moments rêveur, puis il vint à Ordener et le serra sur sa poitrine.

— Jeune homme, tu peux partir; ta protection ne sera pas absente pour tes protégés; je leur reste. Oui, pars; tu fais bien de toute manière. Cette infernale comtesse d’Ahlefeld est ici, tu le sais peut-être?

— La noble dame comtesse d’Ahlefeld, dit la voix de l’huissier qui ouvrait la porte.

À ce nom Ordener recula machinalement vers le fond de la chambre, et la comtesse, entrant sans l’apercevoir, s’écria:

— Seigneur général, votre élève se joue de vous; il n’est point allé à Munckholm.

— En vérité! dit le général.

— Eh mon Dieu! mon fils Frédéric, qui sort du palais, était hier de garde au donjon, et n’a vu personne.

— Vraiment, noble dame? répéta le général.

— Ainsi, continua la comtesse en souriant d’un air de triomphe, général, n’attendez plus votre Ordener.

Le gouverneur resta grave et froid.

— Je ne l’attends plus en effet, dame comtesse.

— Général, dit la comtesse en se détournant, je croyais que nous étions seuls. Quel est?….

La comtesse attacha son regard scrutateur sur Ordener, qui s’inclina.

— Vraiment, poursuivit-elle, — je ne l’ai vu qu’une fois… — mais… sans ce costume, ce serait….

— Seigneur général, c’est le fils du vice-roi?

— Lui-même, noble dame, dit Ordener, s’inclinant de nouveau.

La comtesse sourit.

— En ce cas permettez-vous à une dame, qui doit bientôt être plus encore pour vous, de vous demander où vous êtes allé hier, seigneur comte.

— Seigneur comte! Je ne crois pas avoir eu le malheur de perdre déjà mon noble père, dame comtesse.

— Ce n’est certes point là ma pensée. Mieux vaut devenir comte en prenant une épouse qu’en perdant un père.

— L’un ne vaut guère mieux que l’autre, noble dame.

La comtesse, un peu interdite, prit cependant le parti d’éclater de rire.

— Allons, on m’avait dit vrai; sa courtoisie est un peu sauvage. Elle se familiarisera pourtant avec les présents des dames, quand Ulrique d’Ahlefeld lui passera au cou la chaîne de l’ordre de l’Éléphant.

— Véritable chaîne en effet! dit Ordener.

— Vous verrez, général Levin, reprit la comtesse, dont le rire devenait embarrassé, que votre intraitable élève ne voudra pas non plus tenir d’une dame son rang de colonel.

— Vous avez raison, dame comtesse, répliqua Ordener, un homme qui porte l’épée ne doit pas devoir ses aiguillettes à un jupon.

La physionomie de la grande dame se rembrunit tout à fait.

— Ho! ho! d’où vient donc le seigneur baron? Est-il bien vrai que sa courtoisie ne soit pas allée hier à Munckholm?

— Noble dame, je ne satisfais pas toujours à toutes les questions. — Mais, général, nous nous reverrons….

Puis, serrant la main du vieillard et saluant la comtesse, il sortit, laissant la dame stupéfaite de tout ce qu’elle ignorait, seule avec le gouverneur, indigné de tout ce qu’il savait.

XII

… L’homme qui est en ce moment assis près de lui, qui rompt avec lui son pain et boit à sa santé la coupe qu’ils ont partagée ensemble, sera le premier à l’assassiner.

SHAKESPEARE, Timon d’Athènes.

Que le lecteur se transporte maintenant sur la route de Drontheim à Skongen, route étroite et pierreuse qui côtoie le golfe de Drontheim jusqu’au hameau de Vygla, il ne tardera pas à entendre les pas de deux voyageurs qui sont sortis de la porte dite de Skongen à la chute du jour, et montent assez rapidement les collines étagées sur lesquelles serpente le chemin de Vygla.

Tous deux sont enveloppés de manteaux. L’un marche d’un pas jeune et ferme, le corps droit et la tête levée; l’extrémité d’un sabre dépasse le bord de son manteau, et, malgré l’obscurité de la nuit, on peut voir une plume se balancer au souffle du vent sur sa toque. L’autre est un peu plus grand que son compagnon, mais légèrement voûté; on voit sur son dos une bosse, formée sans doute par une besace que cache un grand manteau noir dont les bords profondément dentelés annoncent les bons et loyaux services. Il n’a d’autre arme qu’un long bâton dont il aide sa marche inégale et précipitée.

Si la nuit empêche le lecteur de distinguer les traits des deux voyageurs, il les reconnaîtra peut-être à la conversation que l’un d’eux entame après une heure de route silencieuse, et par conséquent ennuyeuse.

— Maître! mon jeune maître! nous sommes au point d’où l’on aperçoit à la fois la tour de Vygla et les clochers de Drontheim. Devant nous, à l’horizon, cette masse noire, c’est la tour; derrière nous; voici la cathédrale, dont les arcs-boutants, plus sombres encore que le ciel, se dessinent comme les côtes de la carcasse d’un mammouth.

— Vygla est-il loin de Skongen? demanda l’autre piéton.

— Nous avons l’Ordals à traverser, seigneur; nous ne serons pas à Skongen avant trois heures du matin.

— Quelle est l’heure qui sonne en ce moment?

— Juste Dieu, maître! vous me faites trembler. Oui, c’est la cloche de Drontheim, dont le vent nous apporte les sons. Cela annonce l’orage. Le souffle du nord-ouest amène les nuages.

— Les étoiles, en effet, ont toutes disparu derrière nous.

— Doublons le pas, mon noble seigneur, de grâce. L’orage arrive, et peut-être s’est-on déjà aperçu à la ville de la mutilation du cadavre de Gill et de ma fuite. Doublons le pas.

— Volontiers. Vieillard, votre fardeau paraît lourd; cédez-le-moi, je suis jeune et plus vigoureux que vous.

— Non, en vérité, noble maître; ce n’est point à l’aigle à porter l’écaille de la tortue. Je suis trop indigne que vous vous chargiez de ma besace.

— Mais, vieillard, si elle vous fatigue? Elle paraît pesante. Que contient-elle donc? Tout à l’heure vous avez bronché, cela a résonné comme du fer.

Le vieillard s’écarta brusquement du jeune homme.

— Cela a résonné, maître! oh non! vous vous êtes trompé. Elle ne contient rien… que des vivres, des habits. Non, elle ne me fatigue pas, seigneur.

La proposition bienveillante du jeune homme paraissait avoir causé à son vieux compagnon un effroi qu’il s’efforçait de dissimuler.

— Eh bien, répondit le jeune homme sans s’en apercevoir, si ce fardeau ne vous fatigue pas, gardez-le.

Le vieillard, tranquillisé, se hâta néanmoins de changer la conversation.

— Il est triste de suivre, la nuit, en fugitifs, une route qu’il serait si agréable, seigneur, de parcourir le jour en observateurs. On trouve sur les bords du golfe, à notre gauche, une profusion de pierres runiques, sur lesquelles on peut étudier des caractères tracés, suivant les traditions, par les dieux et les géants. À notre droite, derrière les rochers qui bordent le chemin, s’étend le marais salé de Sciold, qui communique sans doute avec la mer par quelque canal souterrain, puisque l’on y pêche le lombric marin, ce poisson singulier qui, d’après les découvertes de votre serviteur et guide, mange du sable. C’est dans la tour de Vygla, dont nous approchons, que le roi païen Vermond fit rôtir les mamelles de sainte Étheldera, cette glorieuse martyre, avec du bois de la vraie croix, apporté à Copenhague par Olaüs III, et conquis par le roi de Norvège. On dit que depuis on a essayé inutilement de faire une chapelle de cette tour maudite; toutes les croix qu’on y a placées successivement ont été consumées par le feu du ciel.

En ce moment un immense éclair couvrit le golfe, la colline, les rochers, la tour, et disparut avant que l’oeil des deux voyageurs eût pu discerner aucun de ces objets. Ils s’arrêtèrent spontanément, et l’éclair fut suivi presque immédiatement d’un coup de tonnerre violent, dont l’écho se prolongea de nuage en nuage dans le ciel, et de rocher en rocher sur la terre.

Ils levèrent les yeux. Toutes les étoiles étaient voilées, de grosses nues roulaient rapidement les unes sur les autres, et la tempête s’amassait comme une avalanche au-dessus de leurs têtes. Le grand vent sous lequel couraient toutes ces masses n’était point encore descendu jusqu’aux arbres, qu’aucun souffle n’agitait, et sur lesquels ne retentissait encore aucune goutte de pluie. On entendait en haut comme une rumeur orageuse qui, jointe à la rumeur du golfe, était le seul bruit qui s’élevât dans l’obscurité de la nuit, redoublée par les ténèbres de la tempête.

Ce tumultueux silence fut soudain interrompu, près des deux voyageurs, par une espèce de rugissement qui fit tressaillir le vieillard.

— Dieu tout-puissant! s’écria-t-il en serrant le bras du jeune homme, c’est le rire du diable dans l’orage, ou la voix de….

Un nouvel éclair, un nouveau coup de tonnerre lui coupèrent la parole. La tempête commença alors avec impétuosité, comme si elle eut attendu ce signal. Les deux voyageurs resserrèrent leurs manteaux pour se garantir à la fois de la pluie qui s’échappait des nuages par torrents, et de la poussière épaisse qu’un vent furieux enlevait par tourbillons à la terre encore sèche.

— Vieillard, dit le jeune homme, un éclair vient de me montrer la tour de Vygla sur notre droite; quittons la route et cherchons-y un abri.

— Un abri dans la Tour-Maudite! s’écria le vieillard, que saint Hospice nous protège! songez, jeune maître, que cette tour est déserte.

— Tant mieux! vieillard, nous n’attendrons pas à la porte.

— Songez quelle abomination l’a souillée!

— Eh bien! qu’elle se purifie en nous abritant. Allons, vieillard, suivez-moi. Je vous déclare qu’en une pareille nuit je tenterais l’hospitalité d’une caverne de voleurs. Alors, malgré les remontrances du vieillard, dont il avait saisi le bras, il se dirigea vers l’édifice, que les fréquentes lueurs des éclairs lui montraient à peu de distance. En approchant, ils aperçurent une lumière à l’une des meurtrières de la tour.

— Vous voyez, dit le jeune homme, que cette tour n’est pas déserte.

Vous voilà rassuré, sans doute.

— Dieu! bon Dieu! s’écria le vieillard, où me menez-vous, maître? Ne plaise à saint Hospice que j’entre dans cet oratoire du démon!

Ils étaient au bas de la tour. Le jeune voyageur frappa avec force à la porte neuve de cette ruine redoutée.

— Tranquillisez-vous, vieillard; quelque pieux cénobite sera venu sanctifier cette demeure profanée, en l'habitant.

— Non, disait son compagnon, je n'entrerai pas. Je réponds que nul ermite ne peut vivre ici, à moins qu'il n'ait pour chapelet une des sept chaînes de Belzébuth.

Cependant une lumière était descendue de meurtrière en meurtrière, et vint briller à travers la serrure de la porte.

— Tu viens bien tard, Nychol! cria une voix aigre; on dresse la potence à midi, et il ne faut que six heures pour venir de Skongen à Vygla. Est-ce qu'il y a eu surcroît de besogne?

Cette question tomba au moment où la porte s'ouvrait. La femme qui l'ouvrait, apercevant deux figures étrangères, au lieu de celle qu'elle attendait, poussa un cri d'effroi et de menace, et recula de trois pas. L'aspect de cette femme n'était pas lui-même très rassurant. Elle était grande, son bras élevait au-dessus de sa tête une lampe de fer dont son visage était fortement éclairé. Ses traits livides, sa figure sèche et anguleuse, avaient quelque chose de cadavéreux, et il s'échappait de ses yeux creux des rayons sinistres pareils à ceux d'une torche funèbre. Elle était vêtue depuis la ceinture d'un jupon de serge écarlate, qui ne laissait voir que ses pieds nus, et paraissait souillé de taches d'un autre rouge. Sa poitrine décharnée était à moitié couverte d'une veste d'homme de même couleur, dont les manches étaient coupées au coude. Le vent, entrant par la porte ouverte, agitait au-dessus de sa tête ses longs cheveux gris à peine retenus par une ficelle d'écorce, ce qui rendait plus sauvage encore l'expression de sa farouche physionomie.

— Bonne dame, dit le plus jeune des nouveaux-venus, la pluie tombe à flots, vous avez un toit et nous avons de l'or.

Son vieux compagnon le tirait par son manteau, et s'écriait à voix basse:

— O maître! que dites-vous là? Si ce n'est pas ici la maison du diable, c'est l'habitacle de quelque bandit. Notre or nous perdra, loin de nous protéger.

— Paix! dit le jeune homme; et tirant une bourse de sa veste, il la fit briller aux yeux de l'hôtesse, en répétant sa prière.

Celle-ci, revenue un peu de sa surprise, les considérait alternativement d'un oeil fixe et hagard.

— Étrangers! s'écria-t-elle enfin, comme n'ayant pas entendu leur voix, vos esprits gardiens vous ont-ils abandonnés? que venez-vous chercher parmi les habitants maudits de la Tour-Maudite? Étrangers! ce ne sont point des hommes qui vous ont indiqué ces ruines pour abri, car tous vous auraient dit: Mieux vaut l'éclair de la tempête que le foyer de la tour de Vygla. Le seul vivant qui puisse entrer ici n'entre dans aucune demeure des autres vivants, il ne quitte la solitude que pour la foule, il ne vit que pour la mort. Il n'a de place que dans les malédictions des hommes, il ne sert qu'à leurs vengeances, il n'existe que par leurs crimes. Et le plus vil scélérat, à l'heure du châtiment, se décharge sur lui du mépris universel, et se croit encore en droit d'y ajouter le sien. Étrangers! vous l'êtes, car votre pied n'a pas encore repoussé avec horreur le seuil de cette tour; ne troublez pas plus longtemps la louve et les louveteaux; regagnez le chemin où marchent tous les autres hommes, et, si vous ne voulez pas être fuis de vos frères, ne leur dites pas que votre visage ait été éclairé par la lampe des hôtes de la tour de Vygla.

À ces mots, indiquant la porte du geste, elle s'avança vers les deux voyageurs. Le vieux tremblait de tous ses membres, et regardait d'un air suppliant le jeune, lequel, n'ayant rien compris aux paroles de la grande femme, à cause de l'extrême volubilité de son débit, la croyait folle, et ne se sentait d'ailleurs nullement disposé à retourner sous la pluie, qui continuait de tomber à grand bruit.

— Par ma foi, notre bonne hôtesse, vous venez de nous peindre un personnage singulier, avec lequel je ne veux pas perdre l'occasion de faire connaissance.

— La connaissance avec lui, jeune homme, est bientôt faite, plus tôt terminée. Si votre démon vous y pousse, allez assassiner un vivant ou profaner un mort.

— Profaner un mort! répéta le vieillard d'une voix tremblante et se cachant dans l'ombre de son compagnon.

— Je ne comprends guère, dit celui-ci, vos moyens, au moins très indirects; il est plus court de rester ici. Il faudrait être fou pour continuer sa route par un pareil temps.

— Mais bien plus fou encore, murmura le vieillard, pour s'abriter contre un pareil temps dans un pareil lieu.

— Malheureux! s'écria la femme, ne frappez pas au seuil de celui qui ne sait ouvrir d'autre porte que celle du sépulcre.

— Dût la porte du sépulcre s'ouvrir en effet pour moi avec la vôtre, femme, il ne sera pas dit que j'aurai reculé devant une parole sinistre. Mon sabre me répond de tout. Allons, fermez la tour, car le vent est froid, et prenez cet or.

— Eh! que me fait votre or! reprit l’hôtesse; précieux dans vos mains, il deviendra dans les miennes plus vil que l’étain. Eh bien, restez donc pour de l’or. Il peut garantir des orages du ciel, il ne sauve pas du mépris des hommes. Restez; vous payez l’hospitalité plus cher qu’on ne paie un meurtre. Attendez-moi un instant ici, et donnez-moi votre or. Oui, c’est la première fois que les mains d’un homme entrent ici chargées d’or sans être souillées de sang.

Alors, après avoir déposé sa lampe et barricadé la porte, elle disparut sous la voûte d’un escalier noir, percé dans le fond de la salle.

Tandis que le vieillard frissonnait, et, invoquant, sous tous ses noms, le glorieux saint Hospice, maudissait de bon coeur, mais à voix basse, l’imprudence de son jeune compagnon, celui-ci prit la lumière, et se mit à parcourir la grande pièce circulaire où ils se trouvaient. Ce qu’il vit en approchant de la muraille le fit tressaillir, et le vieillard, qui l’avait suivi du regard, s’écria:

— Grand Dieu, maître! une potence?

Une grande potence était en effet appuyée au mur, et atteignait au cintre de la voûte haute et humide.

— Oui, dit le jeune homme et voici des scies de bois et de fer, des chaînes, des carcans; voici un chevalet et de grandes tenailles suspendues au-dessus.

— Grands saints du paradis! s’écria le vieillard, où sommes-nous?

Le jeune homme poursuivit froidement son examen.

— Ceci est un rouleau de corde de chanvre; voilà des fourneaux et des chaudières; cette partie de la muraille est tapissée de pinces et de scalpels; voici des fouets de cuir garnis de pointes d’acier, une hache, une masse.

— C’est donc ici le garde-meuble de l’enfer! interrompit le vieillard épouvanté de cette terrible énumération.

— Voici, continua l’autre, des siphons en cuivre, des roues à dents de bronze, une caisse de grands clous, un cric. En vérité, ce sont de sinistres ameublements. Il peut vous sembler fâcheux que mon impatience vous ait amené ici avec moi.

— Vraiment, vous en convenez!

Le vieillard était plus mort que vif.

— Ne vous effrayez pas; qu'importe le lieu où vous êtes? j'y suis avec vous.

— Belle défense! murmura le vieillard, chez qui une plus grande terreur affaiblissait la crainte et le respect pour son jeune compagnon; un sabre de trente pouces contre une potence de trente coudées!

La grande femme rouge reparut, et, reprenant la lampe de fer, fit signe aux voyageurs de la suivre. Ils montèrent avec précaution un escalier étroit et dégradé pratiqué dans l'épaisseur du mur de la tour. À chaque meurtrière, une bouffée de vent et de pluie venait menacer la flamme tremblante de la lampe, que l'hôtesse couvrait de ses mains longues et diaphanes. Ce ne fut pas sans avoir plus d'une fois trébuché sur des pierres roulantes, que l'imagination alarmée du vieillard prenait pour des os humains épars sur les degrés, qu'ils arrivèrent au premier étage de l'édifice, dans une salle ronde pareille à la salle inférieure. Au milieu, suivant l'usage gothique, brillait un vaste foyer, dont la fumée s'échappait par une ouverture percée dans le plafond, non sans obscurcir très sensiblement l'atmosphère de la salle, et dont la lumière, jointe à celle de la lampe de fer, avait été aperçue des deux voyageurs sur le chemin. Une broche, chargée de viande encore fraîche, tournait devant le feu. Le vieillard se détourna avec horreur.

— C'est à ce foyer exécrable, dit-il à son compagnon, que la braise de la vraie croix a consumé les membres d'une sainte.

Une table grossière était placée à quelque distance du foyer. La femme invita les voyageurs à s'y asseoir.

— Étrangers, dit-elle en plaçant la lampe devant eux, le souper sera bientôt prêt, et mon mari va sans doute se hâter d'arriver, de peur que l'esprit de minuit ne l'emporte en passant près de la Tour-Maudite.

Alors Ordener — car le lecteur a sans doute déjà deviné que c'était lui et son guide Benignus Spiagudry — put examiner à son aise le déguisement bizarre pour lequel ce dernier avait épuisé toutes les ressources de son imagination fécondée par la peur d'être reconnu et repris. Le pauvre concierge fugitif avait échangé ses habits de cuir de renne contre un vêtement noir complet, laissé jadis dans le Spladgest par un célèbre grammairien de Drontheim, qui s'était noyé du désespoir de n'avoir pu trouver pourquoi Jupiter donnait Jovis au génitif. Ses sabots de coudrier avaient fait place aux bottes fortes d'un postillon écrasé par ses chevaux, dans lesquelles ses jambes fluettes étaient tellement à l'aise qu'il n'aurait pu marcher sans le secours d'une demi-botte de foin. La vaste perruque d'un jeune et élégant voyageur français assassiné par des voleurs aux portes de Drontheim cachait sa calvitie, et flottait sur ses épaules pointues et inégales. L'un de ses yeux était couvert d'un emplâtre, et, grâce à un pot de fard qu'il avait trouvé dans les poches d'une vieille fille morte d'amour, ses joues pâles et creuses s'étaient revêtues d'un vermillon insolite, agrément auquel la pluie avait fait participer jusqu'à son menton. Avant de s'asseoir, il plaça soigneusement sous lui le paquet qu'il portait sur son dos, s'enveloppa de son vieux manteau, et, tandis qu'il absorbait toute l'attention de son compagnon, la sienne paraissait entièrement concentrée sur le rôti que surveillait l'hôtesse, et vers lequel il lançait de temps en temps des regards d'inquiétude et d'horreur. Sa bouche laissait par intervalles échapper des mots entrecoupés: — Chair humaine!… horrendas epulas!… — Anthropophages!… — Souper de Moloch!… — Ne pueras coram populo Medea trucidet… — Où sommes-nous? Atrée… — Druidesse… — Irmensul… Le diable a foudroyé Lycaon….

Enfin il s'écria:

— Juste ciel! Dieu merci! j'aperçois une queue!

Ordener, qui, l'ayant considéré et écouté attentivement, avait à peu près suivi le fil de ses idées, ne put s'empêcher de sourire.

— Cette queue n'a rien de rassurant. C'est peut-être un quartier du diable.

Spiagudry n'entendit pas cette plaisanterie; son regard s'était attaché au fond de la salle. Il tressaillit et se pencha à l'oreille d'Ordener.

— Maître, regardez, là, au fond, sur ce tas de paille, dans l'ombre….

— Eh bien? dit Ordener.

— Trois corps nus et immobiles, — trois cadavres d'enfants!

— On frappe à la porte de la tour, s'écria la femme rouge, accroupie près du foyer.

En effet, un coup suivi de deux autres plus forts s'était fait entendre dans le bruit de l'orage toujours croissant.

— C'est enfin lui! c'est Nychol!

Et, prenant la lampe, l'hôtesse descendit précipitamment.

Les deux voyageurs n'avaient pas encore repris leur conversation quand ils entendirent dans la salle basse un bruit confus de voix, au milieu duquel s'élevèrent enfin ces paroles prononcées avec un accent qui fit tressaillir et trembler Spiagudry:

— Femme, tais-toi, nous resterons. Le tonnerre entre sans qu’on lui ouvre la porte.

Spiagudry se serra contre Ordener.

— Maître! maître! dit-il faiblement, malheur à nous!

Un tumulte de pas se fit entendre dans l’escalier, puis deux hommes, revêtus d’habits religieux, entrèrent dans la salle, suivis de l’hôtesse effarée.

L’un de ces hommes était assez grand et portait l’habit noir et la chevelure ronde des ministres luthériens; l’autre, de petite taille, avait une robe d’ermite nouée d’une ceinture de corde. Le capuchon rabattu sur son visage ne laissait apercevoir que sa longue barbe noire, et ses mains étaient entièrement cachées sous les larges manches de sa robe.

À l’aspect de ces deux personnages pacifiques, Spiagudry sentit s’évanouir la terreur que la voix étrange de l’un d’eux lui avait causée.

— Ne vous alarmez pas, chère dame, disait le ministre à l’hôtesse, des prêtres chrétiens se rendent utiles à qui leur nuit; voudraient-ils nuire à qui leur est utile? Nous implorons humblement un abri. Si le révérend docteur qui m’accompagne vous a parlé durement tout à l’heure, il a eu tort d’oublier cette modération de la voix, recommandée par nos voeux; hélas! les plus saints peuvent faillir. J’étais égaré sur la route de Skongen à Drontheim, sans guide dans la nuit, sans asile dans la tempête. Ce révérend frère, que j’ai rencontré, éloigné comme moi de sa demeure, a daigné me permettre de venir avec lui vers la vôtre. Il m’avait vanté votre bonté hospitalière, chère dame; sans doute, il ne s’est pas trompé. Ne nous dites pas comme le mauvais pasteur: Advena, cur intrus? Accueillez-nous, digne hôtesse, et Dieu sauvera vos moissons de l’orage, Dieu donnera dans la tempète un abri à vos troupeaux, comme vous en aurez donné un aux voyageurs égarés!

— Vieillard, interrompit la femme d’une voix farouche, je n’ai ni moissons ni troupeaux.

— Eh bien! si vous êtes pauvres, Dieu bénit le pauvre avant le riche. Vous vieillirez avec votre époux, respectés, non pour vos biens, mais pour vos vertus; vos enfants croîtront, entourés de l’estime des hommes et seront ce qu’aura été leur père.

— Taisez-vous! cria l’hôtesse. C’est en restant ce que nous sommes que nos enfants vieilliront comme nous dans le mépris des hommes, transmis sur notre race de génération en génération. Taisez-vous, vieillard! La bénédiction se tourne en malédiction sur nos têtes.

— O ciel! reprit le ministre, qui donc êtes-vous? dans quels crimes passez-vous votre vie?

— Qu’appelez-vous crimes? qu’appelez-vous vertus? nous jouissons ici d’un privilège; nous ne pouvons avoir de vertus ni commettre de crimes.

— La raison de cette femme est égarée, dit le ministre se tournant vers le petit ermite, qui séchait sa robe de bure devant le foyer.

— Non, prêtre! répliqua la femme, sachez où vous êtes. J’aime mieux faire horreur que pitié. Je ne suis pas une insensée, mais la femme du….

Le retentissement prolongé de la porte de la tour sous un coup violent empêcha d’entendre le reste, au grand désappointement de Spiagudry et d’Ordener qui avaient prêté une attention muette à ce dialogue.

— Maudit soit, dit la femme rouge entre ses dents, le syndic haut-justicier de Skongen, qui nous a assigné pour demeure cette tour voisine de la route! peut-être n’est-ce pas encore Nychol.

Elle prit néanmoins la lampe.

— Après tout, si c’est encore un voyageur, qu’importe? le ruisseau peut couler où le torrent a passé. Les quatre voyageurs restés seuls s’entre-regardaient aux lueurs du foyer. Spiagudry, d’abord épouvanté par la voix de l’ermite, et rassuré ensuite par sa barbe noire, eût peut-être recommencé à trembler s’il eût vu de quel oeil perçant celui-ci l’observait en dessous de son capuchon.

Dans le silence général, le ministre hasarda une question:

— Frère ermite, je présume que vous êtes un des prêtres catholiques échappés à la dernière persécution, et que vous regagniez votre retraite lorsque, pour mon bonheur, je vous ai rencontré; pourriez-vous me dire où nous sommes?

La porte délabrée de l’escalier en ruine se rouvrit avant que le frère ermite eût répondu.

— Femme, vienne un orage, et il y aura foule pour s’asseoir à notre table exécrée et s’abriter sous notre toit maudit.

— Nychol, répondit la femme, je n’ai pu empêcher….

— Et qu’importent tous ces hôtes, pourvu qu’ils paient? l’or est tout aussi bien gagné en hébergeant un voyageur qu’en étranglant un brigand.

Celui qui parlait ainsi s’était arrêté devant la porte, où les quatre étrangers pouvaient le contempler à leur aise. C’était un homme de proportions colossales, vêtu, comme l’hôtesse, de serge rouge. Son énorme tête paraissait immédiatement posée sur ses larges épaules, ce qui contrastait avec le cou long et osseux de sa gracieuse épouse. Il avait le front bas, le nez camard, les sourcils épais; ses yeux, entourés d'une ligne de pourpre, brillaient comme du feu dans du sang. Le bas de son visage, entièrement rasé, laissait voir sa bouche grande et profonde, dont un rire hideux entr'ouvrait les lèvres noires comme les bords d'une plaie incurable. Deux touffes de barbe crépue, pendantes de ses joues sur son cou, donnaient à sa figure, vue de face, une forme carrée. Cet homme était coiffé d'un feutre gris, sur lequel ruisselait la pluie, et dont sa main n'avait seulement pas daigné toucher le bord à l'aspect des quatre voyageurs.

En l'apercevant, Benignus Spiagudry poussa un cri d'épouvante, et le ministre luthérien se détourna frappé de surprise et d'horreur, tandis que le maître du logis, qui l'avait reconnu, lui adressait la parole.

— Comment, vous voilà, seigneur ministre! En vérité, je ne croyais pas avoir l'amusement de revoir aujourd'hui votre air piteux et votre mine effarouchée.

Le prêtre réprima son premier mouvement de répugnance. Ses traits devinrent graves et sereins.

— Et moi, mon fils, je m'applaudis du hasard qui a amené le pasteur vers la brebis égarée, afin, sans doute, que la brebis revînt enfin au pasteur.

— Ah! par le gibet d'Aman, reprit l'autre en éclatant de rire, voilà la première fois que je m'entends comparer à une brebis. Croyez-moi, père, si vous voulez flatter le vautour, ne l'appelez pas pigeon.

— Celui par lequel le vautour devient colombe, console, mon fils, et ne flatte pas. Vous croyez que je vous crains, et je ne fais que vous plaindre.

— Il faut, en vérité, messire, que vous ayez bonne provision de pitié; j'aurais pensé que vous l'aviez épuisée tout entière sur ce pauvre diable, auquel vous montriez aujourd'hui votre croix pour lui cacher ma potence.

— Cet infortuné, répondit le prêtre, était moins à plaindre que vous; car il pleurait, et vous riez. Heureux qui reconnaît, au moment de l'expiation, combien le bras de l'homme est moins puissant que la parole de Dieu!

— Bien dit, père, reprit l'hôte avec une horrible et ironique gaieté. Celui qui pleure! Notre homme d'aujourd'hui, d'ailleurs, n'avait d'autre crime que d'aimer tellement le roi qu'il ne pouvait vivre sans faire le portrait de sa majesté sur des petites médailles de cuivre, qu'il dorait ensuite artistement pour les rendre plus dignes de la royale effigie. Notre gracieux souverain n'a pas été ingrat, et lui a donné en récompense de tant d'amour un beau cordon de chanvre, qui, pour l'instruction de mes dignes hôtes, lui a été conféré ce jour même sur la place publique de Skongen, par moi, grand-chancelier de l’ordre du Gibet, assisté de messire, ici présent, grand-aumônier dudit ordre.

— Malheureux! arrêtez, interrompit le prêtre. Comment celui qui châtie oublie-t-il le châtiment? Écoutez le tonnerre….

— Eh bien! qu’est-ce que le tonnerre? un éclat de rire de Satan.

— Grand Dieu! il vient d’assister à la mort, et il blasphème!

— Trêve aux sermons, vieux insensé, cria l’hôte d’une voix tonnante et presque irritée; sinon vous pourriez maudire l’ange des ténèbres qui nous a réunis deux fois en douze heures sur la même voiture et sous le même toit. Imitez votre camarade l’ermite, qui se tait, car il a bonne envie de retourner dans sa grotte de Lynrass. Je vous remercie, frère ermite, de la bénédiction que tous les matins, à votre passage sur la colline, je vous vois donner à la Tour-Maudite; mais, en vérité, jusqu’ici vous m’aviez semblé de haute taille, et cette barbe si noire m’avait paru blanche. Vous êtes bien cependant l’ermite de Lynrass, le seul ermite du Drontheimhus?

— Je suis en effet le seul, dit l’ermite d’une voix sourde.

— Nous sommes donc, reprit l’hôte, les deux solitaires de la province. — Holà! Bechlie, hâte un peu ce quartier d’agneau, car j’ai faim. J’ai été retardé, au village de Burlock, par ce maudit docteur Manryll, qui ne voulait me donner que douze ascalins du cadavre; on en donne quarante à cet infernal gardien du Spladgest, à Drontheim. — Hé, messire de la perruque, qu’avez-vous donc? vous allez tomber à la renverse. — À propos, Bechlie, as-tu terminé le squelette de l’empoisonneur Orgivius, ce fameux magicien? Il serait temps de l’envoyer au cabinet de curiosités de Berghen. As-tu dépêché l’un de tes petits marcassins au syndic de Loevig pour réclamer ce qu’il me doit? quatre doubles écus pour avoir fait bouillir une sorcière et deux alchimistes, et enlevé plusieurs chaînes des poutres de la salle de son tribunal, qu’elles déparaient; vingt ascalins pour avoir dépendu Ismaël Typhaine, juif dont s’était plaint le révérend évêque; et un écu pour avoir remis un bras de bois neuf à la potence de pierre du bourg?

— Le salaire, répondit la femme d’un voix aigre, est resté dans les mains du syndic, parce que ton fils avait oublié la cuiller de bois pour le recevoir, et qu’aucun valet du juge n’a voulu le lui remettre en main propre.

Le mari fronça le sourcil.

— Que leur cou me tombe entre les mains, ils verront si j’aurai besoin d’une cuiller de bois pour les toucher. Il faut pourtant ménager ce syndic.

C’est à lui qu’est renvoyée la requête du voleur Ivar, qui se plaint de ce que la question lui a été donnée, non par un tortionnaire, mais par moi, alléguant que, n’ayant pas encore été jugé, il n’est pas encore infâme. — À propos, femme, empêche donc tes petits de jouer avec mes tenailles et mes pinces;. ils ont dérangé tous mes instruments, si bien que je n’ai pu m’en servir aujourd’hui. — Où sont-ils, ces petits monstres? continua l’hôte en s’approchant du tas de paille où Spiagudry avait cru voir trois cadavres. Les voilà couchés là; ils dorment, malgré le bruit, comme trois dépendus.

À ces paroles, dont l’horreur contrastait avec la tranquillité effrayante et l’atroce gaieté de celui qui les prononçait, le lecteur a peut-etre dèja deviné quel est l’habitant de la tour de Vygla. Spiagudry, qui, dès son apparition, le reconnut pour l’avoir vu figurer souvent dans de sinistres cérémonies sur la place de Drontheim, se sentit près de défaillir d’épouvante, en songeant surtout au motif personnel qu’il avait depuis la veille pour craindre ce terrible fonctionnaire. Il se pencha vers Ordener, et lui dit d’une voix presque inarticulée:

— C’est Nychol Orugix, bourreau du Drontheimbus!

Ordener, d’abord frappé d’horreur, tressaillit et regretta la route et la tempête. Mais bientôt je ne sais quel sentiment de curiosité indéfinissable s’empara de lui, et, tout en plaignant l’embarras et l’épouvante de son vieux guide, il prêtait son attention entière aux paroles et à l’habitude de vie de l’être singulier qu’il avait sous les yeux, comme on écoute avidement le grondement d’une hyène ou le rugissement d’un tigre amené du désert dans nos villes. Le pauvre Benignus était loin d’avoir l’esprit assez libre pour faire de son côté des observations psychologiques. Caché derrière Ordener, il se ramassait dans son manteau, portait une main inquiète à son emplâtre, attirait sur son visage le derrière de sa perruque flottante, et ne respirait que par gros soupirs.

Cependant l’hôtesse avait servi sur un grand plat de terre le quartier d’agneau rôti, pourvu de sa queue rassurante. Le bourreau vint s’asseoir en face d’Ordener et de Spiagudry, entre les deux prêtres; et sa femme, après avoir chargé la table d’une cruche de bière miellée, d’un morceau de rindebrod [Footnote: Pain d’écorce dont se nourrit la classe indigente en Norvège.] et de cinq assiettes de bois, s’assit devant le feu, et s’occupa d’aiguiser les pinces ébréchées de son mari.

— Ça, révérend ministre, dit Orugix en riant, la brebis vous offre de l’agneau. Et vous, seigneur de la perruque, est-ce le vent qui a ainsi ramené votre coiffure sur votre visage?

— Le vent… seigneur, l’orage…. balbutia le tremblant Spiagudry.

— Allons, enhardissez-vous, mon vieux. Vous voyez que les seigneurs prêtres et moi nous sommes bons diables. Dites-nous qui vous êtes et quel est votre jeune compagnon le taciturne, et parlez un peu. Faisons connaissance. Si vos discours tiennent tout ce que promet votre vue, vous devez être bien amusant.

— Le maître plaisante, dit le concierge contractant ses lèvres, montrant ses dents et clignant son oeil pour avoir l’air de rire, je ne suis qu’un pauvre vieux.

— Oui, interrompit le jovial bourreau, quelque vieux savant, quelque vieux sorcier.

— Oh! seigneur maître, savant oui, sorcier non.

— Tant pis, un sorcier compléterait notre joyeux sanhédrin. — Seigneurs mes hôtes, buvons pour rendre la parole à ce vieux savant, qui va égayer notre souper. À la santé du pendu d’aujourd’hui, frère prédicateur! Eh bien! père ermite, vous refusez ma bière? L’ermite avait en effet tiré de dessous sa robe une grande gourde pleine d’une eau très claire, dont il remplit son verre.

— Parbleu! ermite de Lynrass, s’écria le bourreau, si vous ne goûtez pas de ma bière, je goûterai de cette eau que vous lui préférez.

— Soit, répondit l’ermite.

— Otez d’abord votre gant, révérend frère, répliqua le bourreau; on ne verse à boire qu’à main nue.

L’ermite fit un signe de refus.

— C’est un voeu, dit-il.

— Versez donc toujours, dit le bourreau.

À peine Orugix eut-il porté son verre à ses lèvres, qu’il le repoussa brusquement, tandis que l’ermite vidait le sien d’un trait.

— Par le calice de Jésus, révérend ermite, quelle est cette liqueur infernale? je n’en ai point bu de pareille, depuis le jour où je faillis me noyer dans ma navigation de Copenhague à Drontheim. En vérité, ermite, ce n’est pas de l’eau de la source de Lynrass; c’est de l’eau de mer.

— De l’eau de mer! répéta Spiagudry avec une épouvante qu’augmentait la vue du gant de l’ermite.

— Eh bien! dit le bourreau se tournant vers lui avec un éclat de rire, tout vous alarme donc ici, mon vieux Absalon, jusqu’à la boisson même d’un saint cénobite qui se mortifie?

— Hélas! non, maître. Mais de l’eau de mer…. Il n’y a qu’un homme….

— Allons, vous ne savez que dire, sire docteur; votre trouble parmi nous vient d’une mauvaise conscience ou du mépris.

Ces mots prononcés d’un ton d’humeur ramenèrent Spiagudry à la nécessité de dissimuler sa terreur. Pour amadouer son redoutable hôte, il appela à son secours sa vaste mémoire, et rallia le peu de présence d’esprit qui lui restait.

— Du mépris, moi, du mépris pour vous, seigneur maître! pour vous, dont la présence dans une province donne à cette province le merum imperium [Footnote: Droit de sang, d’avoir un bourreau.] pour vous, maître des hautes-oeuvres, exécuteur de la vindicte séculière, épée de la justice, bouclier de l’innocence! pour vous, qu’Aristote, livre six, chapitre dernier de ses Politiques, classe parmi les magistrats, et dont Paris de Puteo, dans son traité de Syndico, fixe le traitement à cinq écus d’or, comme l’atteste ce passage: Quinque aureos manivolto! pour vous, seigneur, dont les confrères à Cronstadt acquièrent la noblesse après trois cents têtes coupées! pour vous, dont les terribles mais honorables fonctions sont remplies avec orgueil, en Franconie par le plus nouveau marié, à Reutlingue par le plus jeune conseiller, à Stedien par le dernier bourgeois installé! Et ne sais-je pas encore, mon bon maître, que vos confrères ont en France droit de havadium sur chaque malade de Saint-Ladre, sur les pourceaux, et sur les gâteaux de la veille de l’épiphanie! Comment n’aurais-je pas un profond respect pour vous, quand l’abbé de Saint-Germain-des-Prés vous donne chaque année, à la Saint-Vincent, une tête de porc, et vous fait marcher en tête de sa procession!

Ici la verve érudite du concierge fut brusquement interrompue par le bourreau.

— C’est par ma foi la première nouvelle que j’en ai! Le docte abbé dont vous parlez, révérend, m’a jusqu’à présent fraudé de tous ces beaux droits que vous peignez d’une façon si séduisante. — Sires étrangers, poursuivit Orugix, sans m’arrêter à toutes les extravagances de ce vieux fou, il est vrai que j’ai manqué ma carrière. Je ne suis aujourd’hui que le pauvre bourreau d’une pauvre province. Eh bien! j’aurais dû certes faire un plus beau chemin que Stillison Dickoy, ce fameux bourreau de Moscovie. Croiriez-vous que je suis le même qui fut désigné, il y a vingt-quatre ans, pour l’exécution de Schumacker?

— De Schumacker, du comte de Griffenfeld! s’écria Ordener.

— Cela vous étonne, seigneur le muet. Eh bien! oui, de ce même Schumacker qu’un singulier hasard replace encore sous ma main, dans le cas où il plairait au roi de lever le sursis. — Vidons cette cruche, messieurs, et je vais vous conter comment il se fait qu’après avoir débuté avec tant d’éclat, je finisse si misérablement.

— J’étais, en 1676, valet de Rhum Stuald, bourreau royal de Copenhague. Lors de la condamnation du comte de Griffenfeld, mon maître étant tombé malade, je fus, grâce à mes protections, choisi pour le remplacer dans cette honorable exécution. Le 5 juin — je n’oublierai jamais ce jour, — dès cinq heures du matin, aidé du maître des basses oeuvres [Footnote: Charpentier des échafauds], je dressai sur la place de la citadelle un grand échafaud que nous tendîmes de noir, par respect pour le condamné. À huit heures la garde-noble entoura l’échafaud, et les hulans de Slesvig continrent la foule qui se pressait sur la place. Quel autre à ma place n’eût été enivré! Debout, et sabre en main, j’attendais sur l’estrade. Tous les regards étaient fixés sur moi; j’étais en ce moment le personnage le plus important des deux royaumes. Ma fortune, disais-je, est faite, car que pourraient sans moi tous ces grands seigneurs qui ont juré la perte du chancelier? Je me voyais déjà exécuteur royal en titre de la capitale; j’avais des valets, des privilèges… Écoutez! L’horloge du fort sonne dix heures. Le condamné sort de sa prison, traverse la place, monte à l’échafaud d’un pas ferme et d’un air tranquille. Je veux lui lier les cheveux; il me repousse, et se rend à lui-même ce dernier service. — Il y avait longtemps, dit-il en souriant au prieur de Saint-André, que je ne m’étais coiffé moi-même. Je lui offre le bandeau noir, il l’éloigné de ses yeux avec dédain, mais sans me marquer de mépris. — Mon ami, me dit-il, voilà peut-être la première fois qu’un espace de quelques pieds rassemble les deux officiers extrêmes de l’ordre judiciaire, le chancelier et le bourreau. Ces paroles sont restées gravées dans ma tête. Il refuse encore le coussin noir que je voulais mettre sous ses genoux, embrasse le prêtre, et s’agenouille, après avoir dit d’une voix forte qu’il mourait innocent. Alors je brisai d’un coup de masse l’écusson de ses armoiries, en criant, comme de coutume:

— Cela ne se fait pas sans une juste cause! Cet affront ébranla la fermeté du comte; il pâlit; mais il se hâta de dire: — Le roi me les a données, le roi peut me les ôter. Il appuya sa tête sur le billot, les yeux tournés vers l’est, et moi, je levai mon sabre des deux mains… Écoutez bien! — En ce moment un cri arrive jusqu'à moi: — Grâce, au nom du roi! grâce pour Schumacker! Je me retourne. C'était un aide de camp qui galopait vers l'échafaud en agitant un parchemin. Le comte se relève d'un air, non joyeux, mais seulement satisfait. Le parchemin lui est remis. — Juste Dieu! s'écrie-t-il, la prison perpétuelle! leur grâce est plus dure que la mort. — Il descend, abattu comme un voleur, de l'échafaud où il était monté serein. Pour moi, cela m'était égal. Je ne me doutais guère que le salut de cet homme était ma perte. Après avoir démoli l'échafaud, je rentre chez mon maître, encore plein d'espérances, quoiqu'un peu désappointé d'avoir perdu l'écu d'or, prix de la chute de la tête. Ce n'était pas tout. Le lendemain je reçois un ordre de départ et un diplôme d'exécuteur provincial pour le Drontheimhus! Bourreau de province, et de la dernière province de Norvège! Or sachez, messires, comment de petites causes amènent de grands effets. Les ennemis du comte, afin de se donner un air de clémence, avaient tout disposé pour que la grâce arrivât un moment après l'exécution. Il s'en fallut d'une minute; on s'en prit à ma lenteur, comme s'il eût été décent d'empêcher un personnage illustre de s'amuser quelques instants avant le dernier! comme si un exécuteur royal qui décapite un grand-chancelier pouvait le faire sans plus de dignité et de mesure qu'un bourreau de province qui pend un juif! À cela se joignit la malveillance. J'avais un frère, que même je crois avoir encore. Il était parvenu, en changeant de nom, dans la maison du nouveau chancelier, comte d'Ahlefeld. À Copenhague, ma présence importuna le misérable. Mon frère me méprise, parce que ce sera peut-être moi qui le pendrai un jour.

Ici le disert narrateur s'interrompit pour donner passage à sa gaieté, puis il continua:

— Vous voyez, chers hôtes, que j'ai pris mon parti. Ma foi, au diable l'ambition! j'exerce ici honnêtement mon métier; je vends mes cadavres, ou Bechlie en fait des squelettes, que m'achète le cabinet d'anatomie de Berghen. Je ris de tout, même de cette pauvre femelle qui a été bohémienne et que la solitude rend folle. Mes trois héritiers grandissent dans la crainte du diable et de la potence. Mon nom est l'épouvantail des petits enfants du Drontheimhus. Les syndics me fournissent une charrette et des habits rouges. La Tour-Maudite me garantit de la pluie comme ferait le palais de l'évêque. Les vieux prêtres que l'orage pousse chez moi me prêchent, les savants me flagornent. En somme, je suis aussi heureux qu'un autre, je bois, je mange, je pends, et je dors.

Le bourreau n’avait pas mené à fin ce long discours sans l’entremêler de bière et de bruyantes explosions de rire.

— Il tue, et il dort! murmura le ministre; l’infortuné!

— Que ce misérable est heureux! s’écria l’ermite.

— Oui, frère ermite, dit le bourreau, misérable comme vous, mais certes plus heureux. Tenez, le métier serait bon si l’on ne semblait prendre plaisir à en ruiner les bénéfices. Croiriez-vous que je ne sais quelles fameuses noces ont fourni à l’aumônier nouvellement nommé de Drontheim l’occasion de demander la grâce de douze condamnés qui m’appartiennent?

— Qui vous appartiennent! s’écria le ministre.

— Oui, sans doute, père. Sept d’entre eux devaient être fouettés, deux marqués sur la joue gauche, et trois pendus, ce qui fait en somme douze. — Oui, douze écus et trente ascalins, que je perds si la grâce est accordée. Comment trouvez-vous, sires étrangers, cet aumônier qui dispose ainsi de mon bien? Ce maudit prêtre s’appelle Athanase Munder. Oh! si je le tenais!

Le ministre se leva, et dit d’une voix égale et d’un air tranquille:

— Mon fils, c’est moi qui suis Athanase Munder.

À ce nom la colère s’alluma dans tous les traits d’Orugix, il s’élança brusquement de son siège. Puis son regard irrité rencontra le regard calme et bienveillant de l’aumônier, et il vint se rasseoir lentement, muet et confus.

Il se fit un moment de silence. Ordener, qui s’était levé de table, prêt à défendre le prêtre, le rompit le premier.

— Nychol Orugix, dit-il, voici treize écus pour vous dédommager de la grâce des condamnés.

— Hélas! interrompit le ministre, qui sait si je l’obtiendrai? Il faudrait que je pusse parler au fils du vice-roi, car cela dépend de son mariage avec la fille du chancelier.

— Seigneur aumônier, répondit le jeune homme d’une voix ferme, vous l’obtiendrez. Ordener Guldenlew ne recevra pas l’anneau nuptial, que les fers de vos protégés ne soient rompus.

— Jeune étranger, vous n’y pouvez rien; mais Dieu vous entende et vous récompense!

Cependant, les treize écus d’Ordener avaient achevé ce que le regard du prêtre avait commencé. Nychol, entièrement apaisé, reprit sa gaieté.

— Tenez, révérend aumônier, vous êtes un brave homme, digne de desservir la chapelle de Saint-Hilarion; j’en disais de vous plus que je n’en pensais. Vous marchez droit dans votre sentier, ce n’est pas votre faute s’il croise le mien. Mais celui auquel j’en veux, c’est le gardien des morts de Drontheim, ce vieux magicien, concierge du Spladgest. Quel est son nom déjà? Spliugry?… Spadugry?… Dites-moi, mon vieux docteur, vous qui êtes une Babel de science, vous qui connaissez tout, vous ne pourriez pas m’aider à trouver le nom de ce sorcier, votre confrère? Vous avez dû le rencontrer quelquefois, les jours de sabbat, chevauchant en l’air sur un balai?

Certes, si le pauvre Benignus avait pu s’enfuir en ce moment sur quelque monture aérienne de ce genre, le narrateur de cette histoire ne doute pas qu’il ne lui eût confié avec bien de la joie sa frêle machine épouvantée. Jamais l’amour de la vie ne s’était développé avec autant de force chez lui, que depuis qu’il percevait de tous ses organes l’imminence du danger. Tout ce qu’il voyait l’effrayait; les souvenirs de la Tour-Maudite, l’oeil hagard de la femme rouge, la voix, les gants et la boisson du mystérieux ermite, l’aventurière intrépidité de son jeune compagnon, et, par-dessus tout, le bourreau; ce bourreau dans le repaire duquel il tombait en fuyant, chargé d’un crime. Il tremblait si fort que tout mouvement volontaire était chez lui paralysé, surtout lorsqu’il vit la conversation se tourner sur lui, et qu’il entendit l’apostrophe du formidable Orugix. Comme il ne se souciait guère d’imiter l’héroïsme du prêtre, sa langue embarrassée se refusa assez longtemps à répondre.

— Eh bien! reprit le bourreau, savez-vous le nom de ce concierge du Spladgest? Est-ce que votre perruque vous rend sourd?

— Un peu, seigneur… — Mais, dit-il enfin, je ne sais pas ce nom, je vous jure.

— Il ne le sait pas? dit la voix redoutée de l’ermite. Il a tort d’en faire serment. Cet homme se nomme Benignus Spiagudry.

— Moi! moi! grand Dieu! s’écria le vieillard avec terreur.

Le bourreau éclata de rire.

— Et qui vous dit que c’est vous? c’est de ce païen de concierge que nous parlons. En vérité, ce pédagogue s’effraie de rien. Que serait-ce donc si ses grimaces si drôles avaient une cause sérieuse? Ce vieux fou serait amusant à pendre. — Ainsi, vénérable docteur, poursuivit le bourreau que les terreurs de Spiagudry égayaient, vous ne connaissez pas ce Benignus Spiagudry?

— Non, maître, dit le concierge un peu rassuré par son incognito, je ne le connais pas, je vous assure. Et puisqu'il a le malheur de vous déplaire, je serais, maître, bien fâché, vraiment, de connaître cet homme.

— Et vous, seigneur ermite, reprit Orugix, vous paraissez le connaître?

— Oui, vraiment, répondit l'ermite. C'est un homme grand, vieux, sec, chauve…

Spiagudry, justement alarmé de cette prosopographie, raffermit en hâte sa perruque.

— Il a, continua l'ermite, les mains longues comme celles d'un voleur qui n'a pas rencontré de voyageur depuis huit jours, le dos courbé…

Spiagudry se redressa de son mieux.

— Du reste, on pourrait le prendre pour un des cadavres qu'il garde, s'il n'avait les yeux aussi perçants. Spiagudry porta la main à son emplâtre protecteur.

— Merci, père, dit le bourreau à l'ermite; en quelque lieu que je le trouve, je reconnaîtrai maintenant le vieux juif.

Spiagudry, qui était très bon chrétien, révolté de cette intolérable injure, ne put réprimer une exclamation.

— Juif, maître!

Puis il s'arrêta tout court, tremblant d'en avoir trop dit.

— Eh bien, juif ou païen, qu'importé, s'il a des relations avec le diable, comme on le dit!

— Je le croirais volontiers, reprit l'ermite avec un sourire sardonique que son capuchon ne cachait pas entièrement, s'il n'était pas si poltron. Mais comment pourrait-il pactiser avec Satan? il est aussi lâche que méchant. Quand la peur le prend, il ne se connaît plus.

L'ermite parlait lentement, comme s'il eût composé sa voix; et la lenteur même de ses paroles leur donnait une expression singulière. |

— Il ne se connaît plus! répéta intérieurement Spiagudry.

— Je suis fâché qu'un méchant soit lâche, dit le bourreau; il ne vaut pas la peine d'être haï. Il faut combattre un serpent, on ne peut qu'écraser un lézard.

Spiagudry hasarda quelques paroles pour sa défense.

— Mais, seigneurs; êtes-vous sûrs que l'officier public dont vous parlez soit tel que vous le dites? A-t-il donc une réputation?…

— Une réputation! reprit l'ermite; la plus exécrable réputation de la province!

Benignus, désappointé, se tourna vers le bourreau.

— Seigneur maître, quels torts lui reprochez-vous? car je ne doute pas que votre haine ne soit légitime.

— Vous avez raison, vieillard, de n'en pas douter. Comme son commerce ressemble au mien, Spiagudry fait tout ce qu'il peut pour me nuire.

— Oh! maître, ne le croyez pas! Ou, s'il en est ainsi, c'est que cet homme ne vous a pas vu comme moi, entouré de votre gracieuse femme et de vos charmants enfants, admettant les étrangers au bonheur de votre foyer domestique. S'il eût joui, comme nous, de votre aimable hospitalité, maître, ce malheureux ne pourrait être votre ennemi.

Spiagudry achevait à peine cette adroite allocution, quand la grande femme, jusqu'alors muette, se leva, et dit d'une voix aigrement solennelle:

— La langue de la vipère n'est jamais plus venimeuse que lorsqu'elle est enduite de miel.

Puis elle se rassit, et continua de fourbir ses pinces, travail dont le bruit rauque et criard, remplissant les intervalles de la conversation, faisait, aux dépens des oreilles des quatre voyageurs, l'office des choeurs dans une tragédie grecque.

— Cette femme est folle, vraiment! se dit tout bas le concierge, ne pouvant s'expliquer autrement le mauvais effet de sa flatterie.

— Bechlie a raison, docteur aux blonds cheveux! s'écria le bourreau. Je vous tiens pour langue de vipère, si vous continuez de justifier plus longtemps ce Spiagudry.

— À Dieu ne plaise, maître! s'écria celui-ci; je ne le justifie nullement.

— À la bonne heure. Vous ignorez d'ailleurs jusqu'où il pousse l'insolence. Croiriez-vous que l'impudent a la témérité de me disputer la propriété de Han d'Islande?

— De Han d'Islande! dit brusquement l'ermite.

— Eh, oui. Vous connaissez ce fameux brigand?

— Oui, dit l'ermite.

— Eh bien, tout brigand revient au bourreau, n'est-il pas vrai? Que fait cet infernal Spiagudry? il demande qu'on mette à prix la tête de Han.

— Il demande qu'on mette à prix la tête de Han? interrompit l'ermite.

— Il en a l'audace; et cela uniquement pour que le corps lui revienne, et que je sois frustré de ma propriété.

— Voilà qui est infâme, maître Orugix; oser vous disputer un bien qui vous appartient si évidemment!

Ces mots étaient accompagnés du sourire malicieux qui effrayait Spiagudry.

— Le tour est d'autant plus noir, ermite, qu'il me faudrait une exécution comme celle de Han pour me tirer de mon obscurité, et me faire la fortune que ne m'a pas faite celle de Schumacker.

— En vérité, maître Nychol?

— Oui, frère ermite, le jour de l'arrestation de Han, venez me voir, et nous immolerons un pourceau gras à mon élévation future.

— Volontiers; mais savez-vous si je serai libre ce jour-là? D'ailleurs vous aviez tout à l'heure envoyé au diable l'ambition.

— Eh sans doute, père, quand je vois que, pour détruire mes espérances les mieux fondées, il suffit d'un Spiagudry et d'une requête de mise à prix.

— Ah! reprit l'ermite d'une voix étrange, Spiagudry a demandé la mise à prix!

Cette voix était pour le pauvre homme comme le regard du crapaud pour l'oiseau.

— Seigneurs, dit-il, pourquoi juger témérairement? Cela n'est pas sûr, peut-être est-ce un faux bruit.

— Un faux bruit! s'écria Orugix, la chose n'est que trop certaine. La demande des syndics est en ce moment à Drontheim, appuyée de la signature du concierge du Spladgest. On n'attend que la décision de son excellence le général gouverneur.

Le bourreau était si bien instruit, que Spiagudry n'osa poursuivre sa justification; il se contenta de maudire intérieurement, pour la centième fois, son jeune compagnon. Mais que devint-il lorsqu'il entendit l'ermite, qui depuis quelques moments paraissait méditer, s'écrier soudain d'un ton railleur:

— Maître Nychol, quel est donc le supplice des sacrilèges?

Ces paroles firent sur Spiagudry le même effet que si on lui avait arraché son emplâtre et sa perruque. Il attendit avec anxiété la réponse d'Orugix, qui acheva d'abord de vider son verre.

— Cela dépend du genre de sacrilège, répondit le bourreau.

— Si le sacrilège est la profanation d'un mort?

Pour le coup, le tremblant Benignus s'attendit à voir son nom sortir d'un moment à l'autre de la bouche de l'inexplicable ermite.

— Autrefois, dit froidement Orugix, on l’enterrait vivant avec le cadavre profané.

— Et maintenant?

— Maintenant on est plus doux.

— On est plus doux! dit Spiagudry, respirant à peine.

— Oui, reprit le bourreau de l’air satisfait et négligent d’un artiste qui parle de son art; on lui imprime d’abord, avec un fer chaud, une S sur le gras des jambes.

— Et ensuite? interrompit le vieux concierge, contre lequel il eût été difficile d’exécuter cette partie de la peine.

— Ensuite, dit le bourreau, on se contente de le pendre.

— Miséricorde! s’écria Spiagudry; de le pendre!

— Eh bien, qu’a-t-il? il me regarde de l’air dont le patient regarde le gibet.

— Je vois avec plaisir, disait l’ermite, que l’on est revenu à des principes d’humanité.

En ce moment, l’orage, qui avait cessé, permit d’entendre très distinctement au dehors le son clair et intermittent d’un cor.

— Nychol, dit la femme, on est à la poursuite de quelque malfaiteur, c’est le cor des archers.

— Le cor des archers! répéta chacun des interlocuteurs avec un accent différent, mais Spiagudry avec celui de la plus profonde terreur.

Ils achevaient à peine cette exclamation quand on frappa à la porte de la tour.

XIII

Il ne faut qu'un homme, un signal; les éléments d'une révolution sont tout prêts. Qui commencera? Dès qu'il y aura un point d'appui, tout s'ébranlera.

BONAPARTE.

Loevig est un gros bourg situé sur la rive septentrionale du golfe de Drontheim, et adossé à une chaîne basse de collines nues et bizarrement bariolées par diverses sortes de cultures, pareilles à de grands pans de mosaïque appuyés à l'horizon. L'aspect du bourg est triste; la cabane de bois et de jonc du pêcheur, la hutte conique bâtie de terre et de cailloux où le mineur invalide passe le peu de vieux jours que ses épargnes lui permettent de donner au soleil et au repos, la frêle charpente abandonnée que le chasseur de chamois revêt à son tour d'un toit de paille et de murs de peaux de bêtes, bordent des rues plus longues que le bourg, parce qu'elles sont étroites et tortueuses. Sur une place où l'on ne voit plus aujourd'hui que les vestiges d'une grosse tour, s'élevait alors l'ancienne forteresse bâtie par Horda le Fin-Archer, seigneur de Loevig et frère d'armes du roi païen Halfdan, et occupée en 1698 par le syndic du bourg, lequel en eût été l'habitant le mieux logé, sans la cigogne argentée qui venait tous les étés se percher à l'extrémité du clocher pointu de l'église, pareille à la perle blanche au sommet du bonnet aigu d'un mandarin.

Le matin même du jour où Ordener était arrivé à Drontheim, un personnage était débarqué, également incognito, à Loevig. Sa litière dorée, quoique sans armoiries, ses quatre grands laquais armés jusqu'aux dents, avaient soudain fait le sujet de toutes les conversations et de foutes les curiosités. L'hôte de la Mouette d'or, petite taverne où le grand personnage était descendu, avait pris lui-même un air mystérieux et répondait à toutes les questions: Je ne sais pas, d'un air qui voulait dire: Je sais tout, mais vous ne saurez rien. Les grands laquais étaient plus muets que des poissons, et plus sombres que les bouches d'une mine. Le syndic s'était d'abord renfermé dans sa tour, attendant dans sa dignité la première visite de l'étranger; mais bientôt les habitants l'avaient vu avec surprise se présenter deux fois inutilement à la Mouette d'or, et le soir épier un salut du voyageur appuyé sur sa fenêtre entrouverte. Les commères inféraient de là que le personnage avait fait connaître son haut rang au seigneur syndic. Elles se trompaient. Un messager expédié par l'étranger s'était présenté chez le syndic pour y faire viser son droit de passe, et le syndic avait remarqué sur le grand cachet de cire verte du paquet qu'il portait deux mains de justice croisées soutenant un manteau d'hermine surmonté d'une couronne de comte imposée à un écusson autour duquel pendaient les colliers de l'Éléphant et de Dannebrog. Cette observation avait suffi au syndic, qui désirait vivement obtenir de la grande chancellerie le haut syndicat du Drontheimhus. Mais il avait perdu ses avances, car le noble inconnu ne voulait voir personne.

Le second jour de l'arrivée de ce voyageur à Loevig tirait à sa fin, lorsque l'hôte entra dans sa chambre en disant, après une inclination profonde, que le messager attendu de sa courtoisie venait d'arriver.

— Eh bien, dit sa courtoisie, qu'il monte.

Un instant après, le messager entra, ferma soigneusement la porte, puis saluant jusqu'à terre l'étranger qui s'était à demi tourné vers lui, attendit dans un silence respectueux qu'il lui adressât la parole.

— Je vous espérais ce matin, dit celui-ci; qui donc vous a retenu?

— Les intérêts de votre grâce, seigneur comte; ai-je un autre souci?

— Que fait Elphège? que fait Frédéric?

— Ils sont bien portants.

— Bien! bien! interrompit le maître; n'avez-vous rien de plus intéressant à m'apprendre? Quoi de nouveau à Drontheim?

— Rien, sinon que le baron de Thorvick y est arrivé hier.

— Oui, je sais qu'il a voulu consulter ce vieux mecklembourgeois Levin sur le mariage projeté. Savez-vous quel a été le résultat de son entrevue avec le gouverneur?

— Aujourd'hui à midi, heure de mon départ, il n'avait point encore vu le général.

— Comment! arrivé de la veille! Vous m'étonnez, Musdoemon. Et avait-il vu la comtesse?

— Encore moins, seigneur.

— C'est donc vous qui l'avez vu?

— Non, mon noble maître; et d'ailleurs je ne le connais pas.

— Et comment, si personne ne l'a vu, savez-vous qu'il est à Drontheim?

— Par son domestique, qui est descendu hier au palais du gouverneur.

— Mais lui, est-il donc descendu ailleurs?

— Son domestique assure qu'en arrivant il s'est embarqué pour Munckholm, après être entré dans le Spladgest.

Le regard du comte s'enflamma.

— Pour Munckholm! pour la prison de Schumacker! en êtes-vous certain?

J'ai toujours pensé que cet honnête Levin était un traître. Pour Munckholm! Qui peut l'attirer là? va-t-il demander aussi des conseils à Schumacker? va-t-il?…

— Noble seigneur, interrompit Musdoemon, il n'est pas sûr qu'il y soit allé.

— Quoi! et que me disiez-vous donc? vous jouez-vous de moi?

— Pardon, votre grâce, je répétais au seigneur comte ce que disait le domestique du seigneur baron. Mais le seigneur Frédéric, qui était hier de garde au donjon, n'y a point vu le baron Ordener.

— Belle preuve! mon fils ne connaît pas le fils du vice-roi. Ordener a pu entrer au fort incognito.

— Oui, seigneur; mais le seigneur Frédéric affirme n'avoir vu personne.

Le comte parut se calmer.

— Cela est différent; mon fils l'affirme-t-il en effet?

— Il me l'a assuré à trois reprises; et l'intérêt du seigneur Frédéric est ici le même que celui de sa grâce.

Cette réflexion du messager rassura complètement le comte.

— Ah! dit-il, je comprends. Le baron, en arrivant, aura voulu se promener un peu sur le golfe, et le domestique se sera persuadé qu'il allait à Munckholm. En effet, qu'irait-il faire là? j'étais bien sot de m'alarmer. Cette nonchalance de mon gendre à voir le vieux Levin prouve au contraire que son affection pour lui n'est pas si vive que je le craignais. Vous ne croiriez pas, mon cher Musdoemon, poursuivit le comte avec un sourire, que je m'imaginais déjà Ordener amoureux d'Éthel Schumacker, et que je bâtissais un roman et une intrigue sur ce voyage à Munckholm. Mais, Dieu merci, Ordener est moins fou que moi. — À propos, mon cher, que devient cette jeune Danaé entre les mains de Frédéric?

Musdoemon avait conçu les mêmes alarmes que son maître touchant Éthel Schumacker, et les avait combattues sans pouvoir les vaincre aussi aisément. Cependant, charmé de voir son maître sourire, il se garda bien de troubler sa sécurité et chercha au contraire à l'accroître, afin d'accroître cette sérénité si précieuse dans les grands pour leurs favoris.

— Noble comte, votre fils a échoué près de la fille de Schumacker; mais il paraît qu'un autre a été plus heureux.

Le comte l’interrompit vivement.

— Un autre! quel autre?

— Eh! mais, je ne sais quel serf, paysan ou vassal…

— Dites-vous vrai? s’écria le comte, dont la figure dure et sombre était devenue radieuse.

— Le seigneur Frédéric me l’a affirmé, ainsi qu’à la noble comtesse.

Le comte se leva et se mit à parcourir la chambre en se frottant les mains.

— Musdcemon, mon cher Musdoemon, encore un effort et nous sommes au but. Le rejeton de l’arbre est flétri; il ne nous reste plus qu’à renverser le tronc. — Avez-vous encore quelque bonne nouvelle?

— Dispolsen a été assassiné.

Le visage du comte se dérida entièrement.

— Ah! vous verrez que nous marcherons de triomphe en triomphe. A-t-on ses papiers? a-t-on surtout ce coffre de fer?

— J’annonce avec peine à votre grâce que le meurtre n’a point été commis par les nôtres. Il a été tué et dépouillé sur les grèves d’Urchtal, et l’on attribue cet exploit à Han d’Islande.

— Han d’Islande! reprit le maître, dont le visage s’était rembruni; quoi! ce brigand célèbre que nous voulons mettre à la tête de nos révoltés!

— Lui-même, noble comte; et je crains, d’après ce que j’en ai entendu dire, que nous n’ayons de la peine à le trouver. En tout cas, je me suis assuré d’un chef qui prendra son nom et pourra le remplacer. C’est un farouche montagnard, haut et dur comme un chêne, féroce et hardi comme un loup dans un désert de neige; il est impossible que ce formidable géant ne ressemble pas à Han d’Islande.

— Ce Han d’Islande, demanda le comte, est donc de haute taille?

— C’est le bruit le plus populaire, votre grâce.

— J’admire toujours, mon cher Musdoemon, l’art avec lequel vous disposez vos plans. Quand éclate l’insurrection?

— Oh! très prochainement, votre grâce; en ce moment peut-être. La tutelle royale pèse depuis longtemps aux mineurs; tous saisissent avec joie l’idée d’un soulèvement. L’incendie commencera par Guldbranshal, s’étendra à Sund-Moër, gagnera Kongsberg. Deux mille mineurs peuvent être sur pied en trois jours. La révolte se fera au nom de Schumacker; c’est en ce nom que leur parlent nos émissaires. Les réserves du Midi et la garnison de Drontheim et de Skongen s’ébranleront; et vous serez ici justement pour étouffer la rébellion, nouveau et insigne service aux yeux du roi, et pour le délivrer de ce Schumacker si inquiétant pour son trône. Voilà sur quelles indestructibles bases s'élèvera l'édifice que couronnera le mariage de la noble dame Ulrique avec le baron de Thorvick.

L'entretien intime de deux scélérats n'est jamais long, parce que ce qu'il y a d'homme en eux s'effraie bien vite de ce qu'il y a d'infernal. Quand deux âmes perverses s'étalent réciproquement leur impudique nudité, leurs mutuelles laideurs les révoltent. Le crime fait horreur au crime même; et deux méchants qui conversent, avec tout le cynisme du tête-à-tête, de leurs passions, de leurs plaisirs, de leurs intérêts, se sont l'un à l'autre comme un effroyable miroir. Leur propre bassesse les humilie dans autrui, leur propre orgueil les confond, leur propre néant les épouvante; et ils ne peuvent se fuir, se désavouer eux-mêmes dans leur semblable; car chaque rapport odieux, chaque affreuse coïncidence, chaque hideuse parité trouve en eux une voix toujours infatigable qui la dénonce à leur oreille sans cesse fatiguée. Quelque secret que soit leur entretien, il a toujours deux insupportables témoins; — Dieu, qu'ils ne voient pas; et la conscience, qu'ils sentent.

Les conversations confidentielles de Musdoemon étaient d'autant plus fatigantes pour le comte qu'il mettait toujours sans ménagements son maître de moitié dans les crimes entrepris ou à entreprendre. Bien des courtisans croient adroit de sauver aux grands l'apparence des mauvaises actions; ils prennent sur eux la responsabilité du mal, et laissent même souvent à la pudeur du patron la consolation d'avoir semblé résister à un crime profitable. Musdoemon, par un raffinement d'adresse, suivait la marche contraire. Il voulait paraître conseiller rarement et toujours obéir. Il connaissait l'âme de son maître comme son maître connaissait la sienne; aussi ne se compromettait-il qu'en compromettant le comte. La tête que le comte aurait le plus volontiers fait tomber, après celle de Schumacker, c'était celle de Musdoemon; il le savait comme si son maître le lui eût dit, et son maître savait qu'il le savait.

Le comte avait appris ce qu'il voulait apprendre. Il était satisfait.

Il ne lui restait plus qu'à congédier Musdoemon.

— Musdoemon, dit-il avec un sourire gracieux, vous êtes le plus fidèle et le plus zélé de mes serviteurs. Tout va bien et je le dois à vos soins. Je vous fais secrétaire intime de la grande chancellerie.

Musdoemon s'inclina profondément.

— Ce n’est pas tout, poursuivit le comte, je vais demander pour vous une troisième, fois l’ordre de Dannebrog; mais je crains toujours que votre naissance, votre indigne parenté…

Musdoemon rougit, pâlit, et cacha les altérations de son visage en s’inclinant de nouveau.

— Allez, dit le comte lui présentant sa main à baiser, allez, seigneur secrétaire intime, rédiger votre placeat. Il trouvera peut-être le roi dans un moment de bonne humeur.

— Que sa majesté l’accorde ou non, je suis confus et fier des bontés de votre grâce.

— Dépêchez-vous, mon cher, car je suis pressé de partir. Il faut tâcher encore d’avoir des renseignements précis sur ce Han.

Musdoemon, après une troisième révérence, entr’ouvrit la porte.

— Ah! dit le comte, j’oubliais… En votre qualité nouvelle de secrétaire intime, vous écrirez à la chancellerie pour qu’on envoie sa destitution à ce syndic de Loevig, qui compromet son rang dans le canton par une foule de bassesses envers les étrangers qu’il ne connaît pas.

Le religieux qui visite à minuit le reliquaire,
Le chevalier qui dompte un coursier belliqueux,
Celui qui meurt au son redouté de la trompette,
Celui qui meurt au bruit pacifique des oraisons.
Sont l’objet de tes soins, prodigués également
À l’homme pieux, sous le casque ou sous la tonsure.

Hymne à saint Anselme.

— Oui, maître, nous devons en vérité un pèlerinage à la grotte de Lynrass. Eût-on cru que cet ermite, que je maudissais comme un esprit infernal, serait notre ange sauveur, et que la lance qui semblait nous menacer à tout moment nous servirait de pont pour franchir le précipice?

C’est en ces termes assez burlesquement figurés que Benignus Spiagudry faisait éclater aux oreilles d’Ordener sa joie, son admiration et sa reconnaissance pour l’ermite mystérieux. On devine que nos deux voyageurs sont sortis de la Tour-Maudite. Au point où nous les retrouvons, ils ont même déjà laissé assez loin derrière eux le hameau de Vygla et suivent péniblement une route montueuse, entrecoupée de mares ou embarrassée de grosses pierres que les torrents passagers de l’orage ont déposées sur la terre humide et visqueuse. Le jour ne paraît pas encore; seulement les buissons qui couronnent les rochers des deux côtés du chemin se détachent du ciel déjà blanchâtre comme des découpures noires, et l’oeil voit les objets, encore sans couleurs, reprendre par degrés leurs formes à cette lumière terne, et en quelque sorte épaisse, que le crépuscule du nord verse à travers les froids brouillards du matin.

Ordener gardait le silence, car depuis quelques instants il s’était doucement livré à ce demi-sommeil que le mouvement machinal de la marche permet quelquefois. Il n’avait pas dormi depuis la veille où il avait donné au repos, dans une barque de pêcheur amarrée au port de Drontheim, le peu d’heures qui avaient séparé sa sortie du Spladgest de son retour à Munckholm. Aussi, tandis que son corps s’avançait vers Skongen, son esprit s’était envolé au golfe de Drontheim, dans cette sombre prison, sous ces lugubres tours qui renfermaient le seul être auquel il pût dans le monde attacher l’idée d’espérance et de bonheur. Éveillé, le souvenir de son Éthel dominait toutes ses pensées; endormi, ce souvenir devenait comme une image fantastique qui illuminait tous ses rêves. Dans cette seconde vie du sommeil, où l'âme existe un moment seule, où l'être physique avec tous ses maux matériels semble s'être évanoui, il voyait cette vierge bien aimée, non plus belle, non plus pure, mais plus libre, plus heureuse, plus à lui. Seulement, sur la route de Skongen, l'oubli de son corps, l'engourdissement de ses facultés ne pouvaient être complets; car de temps en temps une fondrière, une pierre, une branche d'arbre, heurtant ses pieds, le rappelaient brusquement de l'idéal au réel. Il relevait alors la tête, entr'ouvrait ses yeux fatigués, et regrettait d'être retombé de son beau voyage céleste dans son pénible voyage terrestre, où rien ne le dédommageait de ses illusions enfuies que l'idée de sentir contre son coeur cette boucle de cheveux qui lui appartenait en attendant qu'Éthel tout entière fût à lui. Puis ce souvenir ramenait la charmante image fantastique, et il remontait mollement, non dans son rêve, mais dans sa vague et opiniâtre rêverie.

— Maître, répéta Spiagudry d'une voix plus forte, qui, jointe au choc d'un tronc d'arbre, réveilla Ordener, ne craignez rien. Les archers ont pris sur la droite avec l'ermite en sortant de la tour, et nous sommes assez loin d'eux pour pouvoir parler. Il est vrai que jusqu'ici le silence était prudent.

— Vraiment, dit Ordener en bâillant, vous poussez la prudence un peu loin. Il y a trois heures au moins que nous avons quitté la tour et les archers.

— Cela est vrai, seigneur; mais prudence ne nuit jamais. Voyez, si je m'étais nommé au moment où le chef de cette infernale escouade a demandé Benignus Spiagudry, d'une voix pareille à celle dont Saturne demandait son fils nouveau-né pour le dévorer; si, même, en ce moment terrible, je n'avais eu recours à une taciturnité prudente, où serais-je, mon noble maître?

— Ma foi, vieillard, je crois qu'en ce moment-là nul n'eût pu obtenir de vous votre nom, eût-on employé des tenailles pour vous l'arracher.

— Avais-je tort, maître? Si j'avais parlé, l'ermite, que saint Hospice et saint Usbald le solitaire bénissent! l'ermite n'aurait pas eu le temps de demander au chef des archers si son escouade n'était pas composée de soldats de la garnison de Munckholm, question insignifiante, faite uniquement pour gagner du temps. Avez-vous remarqué, jeune seigneur, après la réponse affirmative de ce stupide archer, avec quel sourire singulier l'ermite l'a invité à le suivre, en lui disant qu'il connaissait la retraite du fugitif Benignus Spiagudry?

Ici le concierge s’arrêta un moment comme pour prendre de l’élan, car il reprit soudain d’une voix larmoyante d’enthousiasme:

— Bon prêtre! digne et vertueux anachorète, pratiquant les principes de l’humanité chrétienne et de la charité évangélique! Et moi qui m’effrayais de ses dehors, assez sinistres à la vérité; mais ils cachent une si belle âme! Avez-vous encore remarqué, mon noble maître, qu’il y avait quelque chose de singulier dans l’accent dont il m’a dit: au revoir! en emmenant les archers? Dans un autre moment, cet accent m’eût alarmé; mais ce n’est pas la faute du pieux et excellent ermite. La solitude donne sans doute à la voix ce timbre étrange; car je connais, seigneur, — ici la voix de Benignus devint plus basse — je connais un autre solitaire, ce formidable vivant que… Mais non, par respect pour le vénérable ermite de Lynrass, je ne ferai pas cet odieux rapprochement. Les gants n’ont également rien d’extraordinaire, il fait assez froid pour qu’on en porte; et sa boisson salée ne m’étonne pas davantage. Les cénobites catholiques ont souvent des règles singulières; celle-là même, maître, se trouve indiquée dans ce vers du célèbre Urensius, religieux du mont Caucase:

Rivos despiciens, maris undam polat amaram.

Comment ne me suis-je pas rappelé ce vers dans cette maudite ruine de Vygla! un peu plus de mémoire m’aurait épargné de bien folles alarmes. Il est vrai qu’il est difficile, n’est-ce pas, seigneur, d’avoir ses idées nettes dans un pareil repaire, assis à la table d’un bourreau! d’un bourreau! d’un être voué au mépris et à l’exécration universelle, qui ne diffère de l’assassin que par la fréquence et l’impunité de ses meurtres, dont le coeur, à toute l’atrocité des plus affreux brigands, réunit la lâcheté que du moins leurs crimes aventureux ne leur permettent pas! d’un être qui offre à manger et verse à boire de la même main qui fait jouer des instruments de torture et crier les os des misérables entre les ais rapprochés d’un chevalet! Respirer le même air qu’un bourreau! Et le plus vil mendiant, si ce contact impur l’a souillé, abandonne avec horreur les derniers haillons qui protégeaient contre l’hiver ses maladies et ses nudités! Et le chancelier, après avoir scellé ses lettres d’office, les jette sous la table des sceaux, en signe de dégoût et de malédiction! Et en France, quand le bourreau est mort à son tour, les sergents de la prévôté aiment mieux payer une amende de quarante livres que de lui succéder! Et à Pesth, le condamné Chorchill, auquel on offrait sa grâce avec des lettres d’exécuteur, préféra le rôle de patient au métier de bourreau! N’est-il pas encore notoire, noble jeune seigneur, que Turmeryn, évêque de Maëstricht, fit purifier une église où était entré le bourreau, et que la czarine Petrowna se lavait le visage chaque fois qu'elle revenait d'une exécution? Vous savez également que les rois de France, pour honorer les gens de guerre, veulent qu'ils soient punis par leurs camarades, afin que ces nobles hommes, même lorsqu'ils sont criminels, ne deviennent pas infâmes par l'attouchement d'un bourreau. Et enfin, ce qui est décisif, dans la Descente de saint Georges aux enfers, par le savant Melasius Iturham, Caron ne donne-t-il pas au brigand Robin Hood le pas sur le bourreau Phlipcrass? — Vraiment, maître, si jamais je deviens puissant — ce que Dieu seul peut savoir — je supprime les bourreaux et je rétablis l'ancienne coutume et les vieux tarifs. Pour le meurtre d'un prince, on paiera, comme en 1150, quatorze cent quarante doubles écus royaux; pour le meurtre d'un comte, quatorze cent quarante écus simples; pour celui d'un baron, quatorze cent quarante bas écus; le meurtre d'un simple noble sera taxé à quatorze cent quarante ascalins; et celui d'un bourgeois….

— N'entends-je pas le pas d'un cheval qui vient à nous? interrompit Ordener.

Ils tournèrent la tête, et, comme le jour avait paru pendant le long soliloque scientifique de Spiagudry, ils purent distinguer en effet, à cent pas en arrière, un homme vêtu de noir, agitant un bras vers eux, et pressant de l'autre un de ces petits chevaux d'un blanc sale que l'on rencontre souvent, domptés ou sauvages, dans les montagnes basses de la Norvège.

— De grâce, maître, dit le peureux concierge, pressons le pas, cet homme noir m'a tout l'air d'un archer.

— Comment, vieillard, nous sommes deux, et nous fuirions devant un seul homme!

— Hélas! vingt éperviers fuient devant un hibou. Quelle gloire y a-t-il à attendre un officier de justice?

— Et qui vous dit que c'en est un? reprit Ordener, dont les yeux n'étaient pas troublés par la peur. Rassurez-vous, mon brave guide; je reconnais ce voyageur. — Arrêtons-nous.

Il fallut céder. Un moment après, le cavalier les aborda; et Spiagudry cessa de trembler en reconnaissant la figure grave et sereine de l'aumônier Athanase Munder.

Celui-ci les salua en souriant, et arrêta sa monture, en disant d'une voix que son essoufflement entrecoupait:

— Mes chers enfants, c’est pour vous que je reviens sur mes pas; et le Seigneur ne permettra sans doute pas que mon absence, prolongée dans une intention de charité, soit préjudiciable à ceux auxquels ma présence est utile.

— Seigneur ministre, répondit Ordener, nous serions heureux de pouvoir vous servir en quelque chose.

— C’est moi, au contraire, noble jeune homme, qui veux vous servir.

Daigneriez-vous me dire quel est le but de votre voyage?

— Révérend aumônier, je ne puis.

— Je désire qu’en effet, mon fils, il y ait de votre part impuissance et non défiance. Car alors malheur à moi! malheur à celui dont l’homme de bien se défie, même quand il ne l’a vu qu’une fois!

L’humilité et l’onction du prêtre touchèrent vivement Ordener.

— Tout ce que je puis vous dire, mon père, c’est que nous visitons les montagnes du nord.

— C’est ce que je pensais, mon fils, et voilà pourquoi je viens à vous. Il y a dans ces montagnes des bandes de mineurs et de chasseurs, souvent redoutables aux voyageurs.

— Eh bien?

— Eh bien, — je sais qu’il ne faut pas essayer de détourner de sa route un noble jeune homme qui va chercher un danger, — mais l’estime que j’ai conçue pour vous m’a inspiré un autre moyen de vous être utile. Le malheureux faux monnayeur auquel j’ai porté hier les dernières consolations de mon Dieu avait été mineur. Au moment de la mort, il m’a donné ce parchemin sur lequel son nom est écrit, disant que cette passe me préserverait de tout danger, si jamais je voyageais dans ces montagnes. Hélas! à quoi cela pourrait-il servir à un pauvre prêtre qui vivra et mourra avec des prisonniers, et qui d’ailleurs, inter castra latronum, ne doit chercher de défense que dans la patience et la prière, seules armes de Dieu! Si je n’ai pas refusé cette passe, c’est qu’il ne faut point affliger par un refus le coeur de celui qui, dans peu d’instants, n’aura plus rien à recevoir et à donner sur la terre. Le bon Dieu daignait m’inspirer, car aujourd’hui je puis vous apporter ce parchemin, afin qu’il vous accompagne dans les hasards de votre route, et que le don du mourant soit un bienfait pour le voyageur.

Ordener reçut avec attendrissement le présent du vieux prêtre.

— Seigneur aumônier, dit-il, Dieu veuille que votre désir soit exaucé! Merci. Pourtant, ajouta-t-il, mettant la main sur son sabre, je portais déjà mon droit de passe à mon côté.

— Jeune homme, dit le prêtre, peut-être ce frêle parchemin vous protégera-t-il mieux que votre épée de fer. Le regard d'un pénitent est plus puissant que le glaive même de l'archange. Adieu. Mes prisonniers m'attendent. Veuillez prier quelquefois pour eux et pour moi.

— Saint prêtre, reprit Ordener en souriant, je vous ai dit que vos condamnés auraient leur grâce; ils l'auront.

— Oh! ne parlez pas avec cette assurance, mon fils. Ne tentez pas le Seigneur. Un homme ne sait pas ce qui se passe dans le coeur d'un autre homme, et vous ignorez encore ce que décidera le fils du vice-roi. Peut-être, hélas! ne daignera-t-il jamais admettre devant lui un humble aumônier. Adieu, mon fils; que votre voyage soit béni, et que parfois il sorte de votre belle âme un souvenir pour le pauvre prêtre et une prière pour les pauvres prisonniers.

XV

Sois le bienvenu, Hugo; dis-moi, toi… as-tu jamais vu un orage aussi terrible?

MATURIN, Bertram.

Dans une salle attenante aux appartements du gouverneur de Drontheim, trois des secrétaires de son excellence venaient de s'asseoir devant une table noire, chargée de parchemins, de papier, de cachets et d'écritoires, et près de laquelle un quatrième tabouret resté vide annonçait qu'un des scribes était en retard. Ils étaient déjà depuis quelque temps méditant et écrivant chacun de leur côté, quand l'un d'eux s'écria:

— Savez-vous, Wapherney, que ce pauvre bibliothécaire Foxtipp va, dit-on, être renvoyé par l'évêque, grâce à la lettre de recommandation dont vous avez appuyé la requête du docteur Anglyvius?

— Que nous contez-vous là, Richard? dit vivement celui des deux autres secrétaires auquel ne s'adressait point Richard, Wapherney n'a pu écrire en faveur d'Anglyvius, car la pétition de cet homme a révolté le général quand je la lui ai lue.

— Vous me l'aviez dit, en effet, reprit Wapherney; mais j'ai trouvé sur la pétition le mot tribuatur, de la main de son excellence.

— En vérité! s'écria l'autre.

— Oui, mon cher; et plusieurs autres décisions de son excellence, dont vous m'aviez parlé, sont également changées dans les apostilles. Ainsi, sur la requête des mineurs, le général a écrit: negetur.

— Comment! mais je n'y comprends rien; le général craignait l'esprit turbulent de ces mineurs.

— Il a peut-être voulu les effrayer par la sévérité. Ce qui me le ferait croire, c'est que le placet de l'aumônier Munder pour les douze condamnés est également mis à néant.

Le secrétaire auquel Wapherney parlait se leva ici brusquement.

— Oh! pour le coup, je ne peux vous croire. Le gouverneur est trop bon et m'a montré trop de pitié envers ces condamnés pour….

— Eh bien, Arthur, reprit Wapherney, lisez vous-même.

Arthur prit le placet et vit le fatal signe de réprobation.

— Vraiment, dit-il, j'en crois à peine mes yeux. Je veux représenter le placet au général. Quel jour son excellence a-t-elle donc apostillé ces pièces?

— Mais, répondit Wapherney, je crois qu'il y a trois jours.

— Ç'a été, reprit Richard à voix basse, dans la matinée qui a précédé l'apparition si courte et la disparition si mystérieusement subite du baron Ordener.

— Tenez, s'écria vivement Wapherney avant qu'Arthur eût eu le temps de répondre, ne voilà-t-il pas encore un tribuatur sur la burlesque requête de ce Benignus Spiagudry!

Richard éclata de rire.

— N'est-ce pas ce vieux gardien de cadavres qui a également disparu d'une manière si singulière?

— Oui, reprit Arthur; on a trouvé dans son charnier un cadavre mutilé, en sorte que la justice le fait poursuivre comme sacrilège. Mais un petit lapon, qui le servait et qui est resté seul au Spladgest, pense, avec tout le peuple, que le diable l'a emporté comme sorcier.

— Voilà, dit Wapherney en riant, un personnage qui laisse une bonne réputation!

Il achevait à peine son éclat de rire quand le quatrième secrétaire entra.

— En honneur, Gustave, vous arrivez bien tard ce matin. Vous seriez-vous marié par hasard hier?

— Eh non! reprit Wapherney, c'est qu'il aura pris le chemin le plus long pour passer, avec son manteau neuf, sous les fenêtres de l'aimable Rosily.

— Wapherney, dit le nouveau venu, je voudrais que vous eussiez deviné. Mais la cause de mon retard est certes moins agréable; et je doute que mon manteau neuf ait produit quelque effet sur les personnages que je viens de visiter.

— D'où venez-vous donc? demanda Arthur.

— Du Spladgest.

— Dieu m'est témoin, s'écria Wapherney laissant tomber sa plume, que nous en parlions tout à l'heure! Mais si l'on peut en parler par passe-temps, je ne conçois pas comment on y entre.

— Et bien moins encore, dit Richard, comment on s'y arrête. Mais, mon cher Gustave, qu'y avez-vous donc vu?

— Oui, dit Gustave, vous êtes curieux, sinon de voir, du moins d'entendre; et vous seriez bien punis si je refusais de vous décrire ces horreurs, auxquelles vous frémiriez d'assister.

Les trois secrétaires pressèrent vivement Gustave, qui se fit un peu prier, quoique son désir de leur raconter ce qu'il avait vu ne fût pas intérieurement moins vif que leur envie de le savoir.

— Allons, Wapherney, vous pourrez transmettre mon récit à votre jeune soeur, qui aime tant les choses effrayantes. J'ai été entraîné dans le Spladgest par la foule qui s'y pressait. On vient d'y apporter les cadavres de trois soldats du régiment de Munckholm et de deux archers, trouvés hier à quatre lieues dans les gorges, au fond du précipice de Cascadthymore. Quelques spectateurs assurent que ces malheureux composaient l'escouade envoyée, il y a trois jours, dans la direction de Skongen, à la recherche du concierge fugitif du Spladgest. Si cela est vrai, on ne peut concevoir comment tant d'hommes armés ont pu être assassinés. La mutilation des corps paraît prouver qu'ils ont été précipités du haut des rochers. Cela fait dresser les cheveux.

— Quoi! Gustave, vous les avez vus? demanda vivement Wapherney.

— Je les ai encore devant les yeux.

— Et présume-t-on quels sont les auteurs de cet attentat?

— Quelques personnes pensaient que ce pouvait être une bande de mineurs, et assuraient qu'on avait entendu hier, dans les montagnes, les sons de la corne avec laquelle ils s'appellent.

— En vérité! dit Arthur.

— Oui; mais un vieux paysan a détruit cette conjecture en faisant observer qu'il n'y avait ni mines ni mineurs du côté de Cascadthymore.

— Et qui serait-ce donc?

— On ne sait; si les corps n'étaient entiers, on pourrait croire que ce sont quelques bêtes féroces, car ils portent sur leurs membres de longues et profondes égratignures. Il en est de même du cadavre d'un vieillard à barbe blanche qu'on a apporté au Spladgest avant-hier matin, à la suite de cet affreux orage qui vous a empêché, mon cher Léandre Wapherney, d'aller visiter, sur l'autre rive du golfe, votre Héro du coteau de Larsynn.

— Bien! bien! Gustave, dit Wapherney en riant; mais quel est ce vieillard?

— À sa haute taille, à sa longue barbe blanche, à un chapelet qu'il tient encore fortement serré entre ses mains, quoiqu'il ait été trouvé du reste absolument dépouillé, on a reconnu, dit-on, un certain ermite des environs; je crois qu'on l'appelle l'ermite de Lynrass. Il est évident que le pauvre homme a été également assassiné; mais dans quel but? On n'égorge plus maintenant pour opinion religieuse, et le vieil ermite ne possédait au monde que sa robe de bure et la bienveillance publique.

— Et vous dites, reprit Richard, que ce corps est déchiré, ainsi que ceux des soldats, comme par les ongles d'une bête féroce?

— Oui, mon cher; et un pêcheur affirmait avoir remarqué des traces pareilles sur le corps d'un officier trouvé, il y a plusieurs jours, assassiné, vers les grèves d'Urchtal.

— Cela est singulier, dit Arthur.

— Cela est effroyable, dit Richard.

— Allons, reprit Wapherney, silence et travail, car je crois que le général va bientôt venir. — Mon cher Gustave, je suis bien curieux de voir ces corps; si vous voulez, ce soir, en sortant, nous entrerons un moment au Spladgest.

XVI

Elle eût été si facilement heureuse! une simple cabane dans une vallée des Alpes, quelques occupations domestiques auraient suffi pour satisfaire ses modestes désirs et remplir sa douce vie; mais moi, l’ennemi de Dieu, je n’ai pas eu de repos que je n’aie brisé son coeur, que je n’aie fait tomber en ruine sa destinée. 11 faut qu’elle soit la victime de l’enfer.

GOETHE, Faust.

En 1675, c’est-à-dire vingt-quatre années avant l’époque où se passe cette histoire, hélas! ç’avait été une fête charmante pour tout le hameau de Thoctree, que le mariage de la douce Lucy Pelnyrh, et du beau, du grand, de l’excellent jeune homme Caroll Stadt. Il est vrai de dire qu’ils s’aimaient depuis longtemps; et comment tous les coeurs ne se seraient-ils pas intéressés aux deux jeunes amants le jour où tant d’ardents désirs, tant d’inquiètes espérances allaient enfin se changer en bonheur! Nés dans le même village, élevés dans les mêmes champs, bien souvent, dans leur enfance, Caroll s’était endormi après leurs jeux sur le sein de Lucy; bien souvent, dans leur adolescence, Lucy s’était, après leurs travaux, appuyée sur le bras de Caroll. Lucy était la plus timide et la plus jolie des filles du pays, Caroll le plus brave et le plus noble des garçons du canton; ils s’aimaient, et ils n’auraient pas mieux pu se rappeler le jour où ils avaient commencé d’aimer, que le jour où ils avaient commencé de vivre.

Mais leur mariage n’était pas venu comme leur amour, doucement et de lui-même. Il y avait eu des intérêts domestiques, des haines de famille, des parents, des obstacles; une année entière ils avaient été séparés, et Caroll avait bien souffert loin de sa Lucy, et Lucy avait bien pleuré loin de son Caroll, avant le jour bienheureux qui les réunissait, pour désormais ne plus souffrir et pleurer qu’ensemble.

C’était en la sauvant d’un grand péril que Caroll avait enfin obtenu sa Lucy. Un jour il avait entendu des cris dans un bois; c’était sa Lucy qu’un brigand, redouté de tous les montagnards, avait surprise et paraissait vouloir enlever. Caroll attaqua hardiment ce monstre à face humaine, auquel le singulier rugissement qu’il poussait comme une bête féroce avait fait donner le nom de Han. Oui, il attaqua celui que personne n’osait attaquer; mais l’amour lui donnait des forces de lion. Il délivra sa bien-aimée Lucy, la rendit à son père, et le père la lui donna.

Or tout le village fut joyeux le jour où l’on unit ces deux fiancés. Lucy, seule, paraissait sombre. Jamais pourtant elle n’avait attaché un regard plus tendre sur son cher Caroll; mais ce regard était aussi triste que tendre, et, dans la joie universelle, c’était un sujet d’étonnement. De moment en moment, plus le bonheur de son ami semblait croître, plus ses yeux exprimaient de douleur et d’amour. — O ma Lucy, lui dit Caroll après la sainte cérémonie, la présence de ce brigand, qui est un malheur pour toute la contrée, aura donc été un bonheur pour moi! — On remarqua qu’elle secoua la tête et ne répondit rien.

Le soir vint; on les laissa seuls dans leur chaumière neuve, et les danses et les jeux redoublèrent sur la place du village, pour célébrer la félicité des deux époux.

Le lendemain matin, Caroll Stadt avait disparu; quelques mots de sa main furent remis au père de Lucy Pelnyrh par un chasseur des monts de Kole, qui l’avait rencontré avant l’aube, errant sur les grèves du golfe. Le vieux Will Pelnyrh montra ce papier au pasteur et au syndic, et il ne resta de la fête de la veille que l’abattement et le morne désespoir de Lucy.

Cette catastrophe mystérieuse consterna tout le village, et l’on s’efforça vainement de l’expliquer. Des prières pour l’âme de Caroll furent dites dans la même église où, quelques jours auparavant, lui-même avait chanté des cantiques d’actions de grâces sur son bonheur. On ne sait ce qui retint à la vie la veuve Stadt. Au bout de neuf mois de solitude et de deuil, elle mit au monde un fils, et, le jour même, le village de Golyn fut écrasé par la chute du rocher pendant qui le dominait.

La naissance de ce fils ne dissipa point la douleur sombre de sa mère. Gill Stadt n’annonçait en rien qu’il dût ressembler à Caroll. Son enfance farouche semblait promettre une vie plus farouche encore. Quelquefois un petit homme sauvage — dans lequel des montagnards qui l’avaient vu de loin affirmaient reconnaître le fameux Han d’Islande — venait dans la cabane déserte de la veuve de Caroll, et ceux qui passaient alors près de là en entendaient sortir des plaintes de femme et des rugissements de tigre. L’homme emmenait le jeune Gill, et des mois s’écoulaient; puis il le rendait à sa mère, plus sombre et plus effrayant encore.

La veuve Stadt avait pour cet enfant un mélange d’horreur et de tendresse. Quelquefois elle le serrait dans ses bras de mère, comme le seul lien qui l’attachât encore à la vie; d’autres fois elle le repoussait avec épouvante en appelant Caroll, son cher Caroll. Nul être au monde ne savait ce qui bouleversait son coeur.

Gill avait passé sa vingt-troisième année; il vit Guth Stersen, et l'aima avec fureur. Guth Stersen était riche, et il était pauvre. Alors, il partit pour Roeraas afin de se faire mineur et de gagner de l'or. Depuis lors sa mère n'en avait plus entendu parler.

Une nuit, assise devant le rouet qui la nourrissait, elle veillait, avec sa lampe à demi éteinte, dans sa cabane, sous ces murs vieillis comme elle dans la solitude et le deuil, muets témoins de la mystérieuse nuit de ses noces. Inquiète, elle pensait à son fils, dont la présence, si vivement désirée, allait lui rappeler, et peut-être lui apporter bien des douleurs. Cette pauvre mère aimait son fils, tout ingrat qu'il était. Et comment ne l'aurait-elle pas aimé? elle avait tant souffert pour lui!

Elle se leva, alla prendre au fond d'une vieille armoire un crucifix rouillé dans la poussière. Un moment elle le considéra d'un oeil suppliant; puis tout à coup, le repoussant avec effroi: — Prier! cria-t-elle; est-ce que je puis prier? — Tu n'as plus à prier que l'enfer, malheureuse! c'est à l'enfer que tu appartiens.

Elle retombait dans sa sombre rêverie, lorsqu'on frappa à la porte.

C'était un événement rare chez la veuve Stadt; car, depuis longues années, grâce à ce que sa vie offrait d'extraordinaire, tout le village de Thoctree la croyait en commerce avec les esprits infernaux. Aussi nul n'approchait de sa cabane. Étranges superstitions de ce siècle et de ce pays d'ignorance! elle devait au malheur la même réputation de sorcellerie que le concierge du Spladgest devait à la science!

— Si c'était mon fils, si c'était Gill! s'écria-t-elle; et elle s'élança vers la porte.

Hélas! ce n'était pas son fils. C'était un petit ermite vêtu de bure, dont le capuchon rabattu ne laissait voir que la barbe noire.

— Saint homme, dit la veuve, que demandez-vous? Vous ne savez pas à quelle maison vous vous adressez.

— Si vraiment! répliqua l'ermite, d'une voix rauque et trop connue.

Et, arrachant ses gants, sa barbe noire et son capuchon, il découvrit un atroce visage, une barbe rousse et des mains armées d'ongles hideux.

— Oh! cria la veuve, et elle cacha sa tête dans ses mains.

— Eh bien! dit le petit homme, est-ce que, depuis vingt-quatre ans, tu ne t'es pas encore habituée à voir l'époux que tu dois contempler durant toute l’éternité?

Elle murmura avec épouvante: — L’éternité!

— Écoute, Lucy Pelnyrh, je t’apporte des nouvelles de ton fils.

— De mon fils! où est-il? pourquoi ne vient-il pas?

— Il ne peut.

— Mais vous avez de ses nouvelles. Je vous rends grâces. Hélas! vous pouvez donc m’apporter du bonheur!

— C’est le bonheur en effet que je t’apporte, dit l’homme d’une voix sourde; car tu es une faible femme, et je m’étonne que ton ventre ait pu porter un pareil fils. Réjouis-toi donc. Tu craignais que ton fils ne marchât sur ma trace; ne crains plus rien.

— Quoi! s’écria la mère avec ravissement, mon fils, mon bien-aimé Gill est donc changé?

L’ermite regardait sa joie avec un rire funeste.

— Oh! bien changé! dit-il.

— Et pourquoi n’est-il pas accouru dans mes bras? Où l’avez-vous vu? que faisait-il?

— Il dormait.

La veuve, dans l’excès de sa joie, ne remarquait ni le regard sinistre, ni l’air horriblement railleur du petit homme.

— Pourquoi ne l’avoir pas réveillé, ne lui avoir pas dit: Gill, viens voir ta mère?

— Son sommeil était profond.

— Oh! quand viendra-t-il? Apprenez-moi, je vous en supplie, si je le reverrai bientôt.

Le faux ermite tira de dessous sa robe une espèce de coupe d’une forme singulière.

— Eh bien! veuve, dit-il, bois au prochain retour de ton fils!

La veuve poussa un cri d’horreur. C’était un crâne humain. Elle fit un geste d’épouvante et ne put proférer une parole.

— Non, non! cria tout à coup l’homme avec une voix terrible, ne détourne pas les yeux, femme; regarde. Tu demandes à revoir ton fils? Regarde, te dis-je! car voilà tout ce qui en reste.

Et, aux lueurs de la lampe rougeâtre, il présentait aux lèvres pâles de la mère le crâne nu et desséché de son fils.

Trop de malheurs avaient passé sur cette âme pour qu’un malheur de plus la brisât. Elle éleva sur le farouche ermite un regard fixe et stupide.

— Oh! la mort! dit-elle faiblement; la mort! laissez-moi mourir.

— Meurs si tu veux! — Mais souviens-toi, Lucy Pelnyrh, du bois de Thoetree; souviens-toi du jour où le démon, en s'emparant de ton corps, a donné ton âme à l'enfer! Je suis le démon, Lucy, et tu es mon épouse éternelle! Maintenant, meurs, si tu veux.

C'était une croyance, dans ces contrées superstitieuses, que des esprits infernaux apparaissaient parfois parmi les hommes pour y vivre des vies de crime et de calamité. Entre autres fameux scélérats, Han d'Islande avait cette effrayante renommée. On croyait encore que la femme qui, par séduction ou par violence, était la proie d'un de ces démons à forme humaine, devenait irrévocablement par ce malheur sa compagne de damnation.

Les événements que l'ermite rappelait à la veuve parurent réveiller en elle ces idées.

— Hélas! dit-elle douloureusement, je ne puis donc échapper à l'existence! — Et qu'ai-je fait? car tu le sais, mon bien-aimé Caroll, je suis innocente. Le bras d'une jeune fille n'a point la force du bras d'un démon.

Elle poursuivit; ses regards étaient pleins de délire, et ses paroles incohérentes semblaient nées du tremblement convulsif de ses lèvres.

— Oui, Caroll, depuis ce jour je suis impure et innocente; et le démon me demande si je me le rappelle, cet horrible jour! — Mon Caroll, je ne t'ai point trompé; tu es venu trop tard; j'étais à lui avant d'être à toi, hélas! — Hélas! et je serai punie éternellement. Non, je ne vous rejoindrai pas, vous que je pleure. A quoi bon mourir? J'irai avec ce monstre, dans un monde qui lui ressemble, dans le monde des réprouvés! et qu'ai-je donc fait? Mes malheurs dans la vie seront mes crimes dans l'éternité.

Le petit ermite appuyait sur elle un regard de triomphe et d'autorité.

— Ah! s'écria-t-elle tout à coup en se tournant vers lui, ah! dites-moi, ceci n'est-il pas quelque rêve affreux que votre présence m'apporte? car, vous le savez, hélas! depuis le jour de ma perte, toutes les fatales nuits où votre esprit m'a visitée ont été marquées pour moi par d'impures apparitions, d'effrayants songes et des visions épouvantables.

— Femme, femme, reviens à la raison. Il est aussi vrai que tu es éveillée, qu'il est vrai que Gill est mort.

Le souvenir de ses anciennes infortunes avait comme effacé en cette mère celui de son nouveau malheur; ces paroles le lui rendirent.

— O mon fils! mon fils! dit-elle; et le son de sa voix aurait ému tout autre que l'être méchant qui l'écoutait. Non, il reviendra; il n'est pas mort; je ne puis croire qu'il est mort.

— Eh bien! va le demander aux rochers de Roeraas, qui l'ont écrasé, au golfe de Drontheim, qui l'a enseveli. La veuve tomba à genoux et cria avec effort:

— Dieu, grand Dieu!

— Tais-toi, servante de l'enfer!

La malheureuse se tut. Il poursuivit.

— Ne doute pas de la mort de ton fils. Il a été puni par où son père a failli. Il a laissé amollir son coeur de granit par un regard de femme. Moi, je t'ai possédée, mais je ne t'ai jamais aimée. Le malheur de ton Caroll est retombé sur lui. — Mon fils et le tien a été trompé par sa fiancée, par celle pour qui il est mort.

— Mort! reprit-elle, mort! Cela est donc vrai? — O Gill, tu étais né de mon malheur; tu avais été conçu dans l'épouvante et enfanté dans le deuil; ta bouche avait déchiré mon sein; enfant, jamais tes caresses n'avaient répondu à mes caresses, tes embrassements à mes embrassements; tu as toujours fui et repoussé ta mère, ta mère si seule et si abandonnée dans la vie! Tu ne cherchais à me faire oublier mes maux passés qu'en me créant de nouvelles douleurs; tu me délaissais pour le démon auteur de ton existence et de mon veuvage; jamais, durant de longues années, Gill, jamais une joie ne m'est venue de toi; et cependant aujourd'hui ta mort, mon fils, me semble la plus insupportable de mes afflictions, aujourd'hui ton souvenir me semble un souvenir d'enchantement et de consolation. Hélas!

Elle ne put continuer; elle cacha sa tête dans son voile de bure noire, et on l'entendait sangloter douloureusement.

— Faible femme! murmura l'ermite; puis il reprit d'une voix forte: — Dompte ta douleur, je me suis joué de la mienne. Écoute, Lucy Pelnyrh, pendant que tu pleures encore ton fils, j'ai déjà commencé à le venger. C'est pour un soldat de la garnison de Munckholm que sa fiancée l'a trompé. Tout le régiment périra par mes mains. — Vois, Lucy Pelnyrh. Il avait relevé les manches de sa robe, et montrait à la veuve ses bras difformes teints de sang.

— Oui, dit-il en poussant une sorte de rugissement, c'est aux grèves d'Urchtal, c'est aux gorges de Cascadthymore, que l'esprit de Gill doit se promener avec joie. — Allons, femme, ne vois-tu pas ce sang? Console-toi donc!

Puis tout à coup, comme frappé d'un souvenir, il s'interrompit:

— Veuve, ne t'a-t-on pas remis de ma part un coffre de fer? — Quoi! je t'ai envoyé de l'or et je t'apporte du sang, et tu pleures encore! Tu n'es donc pas de la race des hommes?

La veuve, absorbée dans son désespoir, gardait le silence.

— Allons! dit-il avec un rire farouche, muette et immobile! tu n'es donc pas non plus de la race des femmes, Lucy Pelnyrh! — Et il secouait son bras pour qu'elle l'écoutât. — Est-ce qu'un messager ne t'a pas apporté un coffre de fer scellé?

La veuve, lui accordant une attention passagère, fit un signe de tête négatif, et retomba dans sa morne rêverie.

— Ah! le misérable! cria le petit homme, le misérable infidèle!

Spiagudry, cet or te coûtera cher!

Et, dépouillant sa robe d'ermite, il s'élança hors de la cabane avec le grondement d'une hyène qui cherche un cadavre.

Seigneur, je peigne mes cheveux, je les peigne en pleurant, parce que vous me laissez seule, et que vous vous en allez dans les montagnes.

La, Dame au Comte, romance.

Éthel, cependant, avait déjà compté quatre jours longs et monotones depuis qu'elle errait seule dans le sombre jardin du donjon de Slesvig; seule dans l'oratoire, témoin de tant de pleurs et confident de tant de voeux; seule dans la longue galerie où, une fois, elle n'avait pas entendu sonner minuit. Son vieux père l'accompagnait quelquefois, mais elle n'en était pas moins seule, car le véritable compagnon de sa vie était absent.

Malheureuse jeune fille! Qu'avait fait cette âme jeune et pure pour être déjà livrée à tant d'infortune? Enlevée au monde, aux honneurs, aux richesses, aux joies de la jeunesse, aux triomphes de la beauté, elle était encore au berceau qu'elle était déjà dans un cachot; captive près d'un père captif, elle avait grandi en le voyant dépérir; et pour comble de douleurs, pour qu'elle n'ignorât aucun esclavage, l'amour était venu la trouver dans sa prison.

Encore si elle eût pu avoir son Ordener auprès d'elle, que lui eût fait la liberté? Eût-elle su seulement s'il existait un monde dont on la séparait? Et d'ailleurs, son monde, son ciel, n'eussent-ils pas été avec elle dans cet étroit donjon, sous ces noires tours hérissées de soldats, et vers lesquelles le passant n'en aurait pas moins jeté un regard de pitié?

Mais, hélas! pour la seconde fois, son Ordener était absent; et, au lieu de couler près de lui des heures bien courtes, mais toujours renaissantes, dans de saintes caresses et de chastes embrassements, elle passait les nuits et les jours à pleurer son absence et à prier pour ses dangers. Car une vierge n'a que sa prière et ses larmes.

Quelquefois elle enviait ses ailes à l'hirondelle libre qui venait lui demander quelque nourriture à travers les barreaux de sa prison. Quelquefois elle laissait fuir sa pensée sur le nuage qu'un vent rapide enfonçait dans le nord du ciel; puis tout à coup elle détournait sa tête et voilait ses yeux, comme si elle eût craint de voir apparaître le gigantesque brigand et commencer le combat inégal sur l'une des montagnes lointaines dont le sommet bleuâtre rampait à l'horizon ainsi qu'une nuée immobile.

Oh! qu’il est cruel d’aimer alors qu’on est séparé de l’être qu’on aime! Bien peu de coeurs ont connu cette douleur dans toute son étendue, parce que bien peu de coeurs ont connu l’amour dans toute sa profondeur. Alors, étranger en quelque sorte à sa propre existence, on se crée pour soi-même une solitude morne, un vide immense, et, pour l’être absent, je ne sais quel monde effrayant de périls, de monstres et de déceptions; les diverses facultés qui composaient notre nature se changent et se perdent en un désir infini de l’être qui nous manque; tout ce qui nous environne est hors de notre vie. Cependant on respire, on marche, on agit, mais sans la pensée. Comme une planète égarée qui aurait perdu son soleil, le corps se meut au hasard; l’âme est ailleurs.

Sur un grand bouclier ces chefs impitoyables
Épouvantent l’enfer de serments effroyables;
Et près d’un taureau noir qu’ils viennent d’égorger,
Tous, la main dans le sang, jurent de se venger.

Les Sept Chefs devant Thèbes.

Les rivages de Norvège abondent en baies étroites, en criques, en récifs, en lagunes, en petits caps tellement multipliés qu’ils fatiguent la mémoire du voyageur et la patience du topographe. Autrefois, à en croire les discours populaires, chaque isthme avait son démon qui le hantait, chaque anse sa fée qui l’habitait, chaque promontoire son saint qui le protégeait; car la superstition mêle toutes les croyances pour se faire des terreurs. Sur la grève de Kelvel, à quelques milles au nord de la grotte de Walderhog, un seul endroit, disait-on, était libre de toute juridiction des esprits infernaux, intermédiaires ou célestes. C’était la clairière riveraine dominée par le rocher sur le sommet duquel on apercevait encore quelques vieilles ruines du manoir de Ralph ou Radulphe le Géant. Cette petite prairie sauvage, bordée au couchant par la mer, et étroitement encaissée dans des roches couvertes de bruyères, devait ce privilège au nom seul de cet ancien sire norvégien, son premier possesseur. Car quelle fée, quel diable, ou quel ange eût osé se faire l’hôte ou le patron du domaine autrefois occupé et protégé par Ralph le Géant?

Il est vrai que le nom seul du formidable Ralph suffisait pour imprimer un caractère effrayant à ces lieux déjà si sauvages. Mais, à tout prendre, un souvenir n’est pas si redoutable qu’un esprit; et jamais un pêcheur, attardé par le gros temps, en amarrant sa barque dans la crique de Ralph, n’avait vu le follet rire et danser, parmi des âmes, sur le haut d’un rocher, ni la fée parcourir les bruyères dans son char de phosphore traîné par des vers luisants, ni le saint remonter vers la lune après sa prière.

Si pourtant, la nuit qui suivit le grand orage, les houles de la mer et la violence du vent eussent permis à quelque marinier égaré d’aborder dans cette baie hospitalière, peut-être eût-il été frappé d’une superstitieuse épouvante en contemplant les trois hommes qui, cette nuit-là, s’étaient assis autour d’un grand feu, allumé au milieu de la clairière. Deux d’entre eux étaient couverts de grands chapeaux de feutre et des larges pantalons des mineurs royaux. Leurs bras étaient nus jusqu'à l'épaule, leurs pieds cachés dans des bottines fauves; une ceinture d'étoffe rouge soutenait leurs sabres recourbés et leurs longs pistolets. Tous deux portaient une trompe de corne suspendue à leur cou. L'un était vieux, l'autre était jeune; et l'épaisseur de la barbe du vieillard, la longueur des cheveux du jeune homme, ajoutaient quelque chose de sauvage à leurs physionomies, naturellement dures et sévères.

À son bonnet de peau d'ours, à sa casaque de cuir huilé, au mousquet fixé en bandoulière à son dos, à sa culotte courte et étroite, à ses genoux nus, à ses sandales d'écorce, à la hache étincelante qu'il portait à la main, il était facile de reconnaître, dans le compagnon des deux mineurs, un montagnard du nord de la Norvège.

Certes, celui qui eût aperçu de loin ces trois figures singulières, sur lesquelles le foyer, agité par les brises de mer, jetait des lueurs rouges et changeantes, eût pu être à bon droit effrayé, sans même croire aux spectres et aux démons; il lui eût suffi pour cela de croire aux voleurs et d'être un peu plus riche qu'un poëte.

Ces trois hommes tournaient souvent la tête vers le sentier perdu du bois qui aboutit à la clairière de Ralph, et d'après celles de leurs paroles que le vent n'emportait pas, ils semblaient attendre un quatrième personnage.

— Dites donc, Kennybol, savez-vous qu'à cette heure-ci nous n'attendrions pas aussi paisiblement cet envoyé du comte Griffenfeld dans la prairie voisine, la prairie du lutin Tulbytilbet, ou là-bas, dans la baie de Saint-Cuthbert?

— Ne parlez pas si haut, Jonas, répondit le montagnard au vieux mineur, béni soit Ralph Géant qui nous protège! Me préserve le ciel de remettre le pied dans la clairière de Tulbytilbet! L'autre jour j'y croyais cueillir de l'aubépine, et j'y ai cueilli de la mandragore, qui s'est mise à saigner et à crier, ce qui a failli me rendre fou.

Le jeune mineur se prit à rire.

— En vérité, Kennybol! je crois, moi, que le cri de la mandragore a bien produit tout son effet sur votre pauvre cerveau.

— Pauvre cerveau toi-même! dit le montagnard avec humeur; voyez, Jonas, il rit de la mandragore. Il rit comme un insensé qui joue avec une tête de mort.

— Hum! repartit Jonas. Qu’il aille donc à la grotte de Walderhog, où les têtes de ceux que Han, démon d’Islande, a assassinés, reviennent chaque nuit danser autour de son lit de feuilles sèches, en entre-choquant leurs dents pour l’endormir.

— Cela est vrai, dit le montagnard.

— Mais, reprit le jeune homme, le seigneur Hacket, que nous attendons, ne nous a-t-il pas promis que Han d’Islande se mettrait à la tête de notre insurrection?

— Il l’a promis, répondit Kennybol; et, avec l’aide de ce démon, nous sommes sûrs de vaincre toutes les casaques vertes de Drontheim et de Copenhague.

— Tant mieux! s’écria le vieux mineur; mais ce n’est pas moi qui me chargerai de faire la sentinelle la nuit près de lui.

En ce moment, le craquement des bruyères mortes sous des pas d’homme appela l’attention des interlocuteurs; ils se détournèrent, et un rayon du foyer leur fit reconnaître le nouveau venu.

— C’est lui! — c’est le seigneur Hacket! — Salut, seigneur Hacket; vous vous êtes fait attendre. — Voilà plus de trois quarts d’heure que nous sommes au rendez-vous.

Ce seigneur Hacket était un homme petit et gras, vêtu de noir, dont la figure joviale avait une expression sinistre.

— Bien, mes amis, dit-il; j’ai été retardé par mon ignorance du chemin et les précautions qu’il m’a fallu prendre. — J’ai quitté le comte Schumacker ce matin; voici trois bourses d’or qu’il m’a chargé de vous remettre.

Les deux vieillards se jetèrent sur l’or avec l’avidité commune, aux paysans de cette pauvre Norvège. Le jeune mineur repoussa la bourse que lui tendait Hacket.

— Gardez votre or, seigneur envoyé; je mentirais si je disais que je me révolte pour votre comte Schumacker; je me révolte pour affranchir les mineurs de la tutelle royale; je me révolte pour que le lit de ma mère n’ait plus une couverture déchiquetée comme les côtes de notre bon pays, la Norvège.

Loin de paraître déconcerté, le seigneur Hacket répondit en souriant:

— C’est donc à votre pauvre mère, mon cher Norbith, que j’enverrai cet argent, afin qu’elle ait deux couvertures neuves pour les bises de cet hiver.

Le jeune homme se rendit par un signe de tête, et l’envoyé, en orateur habile, se hâta d’ajouter:

— Mais gardez-vous de répéter ce que vous venez de dire inconsidérément, que ce n’est pas pour Schumacker, comte de Griffenfeld, que vous prenez les armes.

— Cependant…. cependant, murmurèrent les deux vieillards, nous savons bien qu’on opprime les mineurs, mais nous ne connaissons pas ce comte, ce prisonnier d’état.

— Comment! reprit vivement l’envoyé; pouvez-vous être ingrats à ce point! Vous gémissiez dans vos souterrains, privés d’air et de jour, dépouillés de toute propriété, esclaves de la plus onéreuse tutelle! Qui est venu à votre aide? qui a ranimé votre courage? qui vous a donné de l’or, des armes? N’est-ce pas mon illustre maître, le noble comte de Griffenfeld, plus esclave et plus infortuné encore que vous? Et maintenant, comblés de ses bienfaits, vous refuseriez de vous en servir pour conquérir sa liberté, en même temps que la vôtre?

— Vous avez raison, interrompit le jeune mineur, ce serait mal agir.

— Oui, seigneur Hacket, dirent les deux vieillards, nous combattrons pour le comte Schumacker.

— Courage, mes amis! levez-vous en son nom, portez le nom de votre bienfaiteur d’un bout de la Norvège à l’autre. Écoutez, tout seconde votre juste entreprise; vous allez être délivrés d’un formidable ennemi, le général Levin de Knud, qui gouverne la province. La puissance secrète de mon noble maître, le comte de Griffenfeld, va le faire rappeler momentanément à Berghen. — Allons, dites-moi, Kennybol, Jonas, et vous, mon cher Norbith, tous vos compagnons sont-ils prêts?

— Mes frères de Guldbranshal, dit Norbith, n’attendent que mon signal.

Demain, si vous voulez….

— Demain, soit. Il faut que les jeunes mineurs, dont vous êtes le chef, lèvent les premiers l’étendard. Et vous, mon brave Jonas?

— Six cents braves des îles Fa-roër, qui vivent depuis trois jours de chair de chamois et d’huile d’ours, dans la forêt de Bennallag, ne demandent qu’un coup de trompe de leur vieux capitaine Jonas, du bourg de Loevig.

— Fort bien. Et vous, Kennybol?

— Tous ceux qui portent une hache dans les gorges de Kole, et gravissent les rochers sans genouillères, sont prêts à se joindre à leurs frères les mineurs, quand ils auront besoin d'eux.

— Il suffit. Annoncez à vos compagnons, pour qu'ils ne doutent pas de vaincre, ajouta l'envoyé en haussant la voix, que Han d'Islande sera le chef.

— Cela est-il certain? demandèrent-ils tous trois ensemble et d'une voix où se mêlaient l'expression de la terreur et celle de l'espérance.

L'envoyé répondit:

— Je vous attendrai tous trois dans quatre jours, à pareille heure, avec vos colonnes réunies, dans la mine d'Apsyl-Corh, près le lac de Smiasen, sous la plaine de l'Étoile-Bleue. Han d'Islande m'accompagnera.

— Nous y serons, dirent les trois chefs. Et puisse Dieu ne pas abandonner ceux qu'aidera le démon!

— Ne craignez rien de la part de Dieu, dit Hacket en ricanant. — Écoutez, vous trouverez, dans les vieilles ruines de Crag, des enseignes pour vos troupes. — N'oubliez pas le cri: Vive Schumacker! Sauvons Schumacker! — Il faut que nous nous séparions; le jour ne va pas tarder à paraître. Mais auparavant, jurez le plus inviolable secret sur ce qui se passe entre nous.

Sans répondre une parole, les trois chefs s'ouvrirent la veine du bras gauche avec la pointe d'un sabre; ensuite, saisissant la main de l'envoyé, ils y laissèrent couler chacun quelques gouttes de sang.

— Vous avez notre sang, lui dirent-ils. Puis le jeune s'écria:

— Que tout mon sang s'écoule comme celui que je verse en ce moment; qu'un esprit malfaisant se joue de mes projets, comme l'ouragan d'une paille; que mon bras soit de plomb pour venger une injure; que les chauves-souris habitent mon sépulcre; que je sois, vivant, hanté par les morts; mort, profané par les vivants; que mes yeux se fondent en pleurs comme ceux d'une femme, si jamais je parle de ce qui a lieu, à cette heure, dans la clairière de Ralph le Géant. Daignent les bienheureux saints m'entendre!

— Amen, répétèrent les deux vieillards.

Alors ils se séparèrent, et il ne resta plus dans la clairière que le foyer à demi éteint dont les rayons mourants montaient par intervalles jusqu'au faîte des tours ruinées et solitaires de Ralph le Géant.

LOPE DE VEGA. Le Chien du Jardinier.

Benignus Spiagudry se rendait difficilement compte des motifs qui pouvaient pousser un jeune homme bien constitué et paraissant avoir encore de longues années de vie devant lui, tel que son compagnon de voyage, à se porter l’agresseur volontaire du redoutable Han d’Islande. Bien souvent, depuis qu’ils avaient commencé leur route, il avait abordé adroitement cette question; mais le jeune aventurier gardait, sur la cause de son voyage, un silence obstiné. Le pauvre homme n’avait pas été plus heureux dans toutes les autres curiosités que son singulier camarade devait naturellement lui inspirer. Une fois, il avait hasardé une question sur la famille et le nom de son jeune maître. — Appelez-moi Ordener, avait répondu celui-ci; et cette réponse peu satisfaisante était prononcée d’un ton qui interdisait la réplique. Il fallait donc se résigner; chacun a ses secrets; et le bon Spiagudry lui-même ne cachait-il pas soigneusement, dans sa besace et sous son manteau, certaine cassette mystérieuse sur laquelle toutes recherches lui eussent semblé fort déplacées et fort désagréables.

Ils avaient quitté Drontheim depuis quatre jours, sans avoir fait beaucoup de chemin, tant en raison du dégât causé dans les routes par l’orage, que de la multiplicité des voies de traverse et détours que le concierge fugitif croyait prudent de prendre pour éviter les lieux trop habités. Après avoir laissé Skongen à leur droite, vers le soir du quatrième jour ils atteignirent la rive du lac de Sparbo.

C’était un tableau sombre et magnifique que cette vaste nappe d’eau réfléchissant les derniers rayons du jour et les premières étoiles de la nuit dans un cadre de hauts rochers, de sapins noirs et de grands chênes.

L’aspect d’un lac, le soir, produit quelquefois, à une certaine distance, une singulière illusion d’optique; c’est comme si un abîme prodigieux, perçant le globe de part en part, laissait voir le ciel à travers la terre.

Ordener s’arrêta, contemplant ces vieilles forêts druidiques qui couvrent les rivages montueux du lac comme une chevelure, et les huttes crayeuses de Sparbo, répandues sur une pente ainsi qu’un troupeau épars de chèvres blanches. Il écoutait les bruits lointains des forges [Footnote: Les Eaux du lac de Sparbo sont renommées pour la trempe de l’acier.] mêlés au sourd mugissement des grands bois magiques, aux cris intermittents des oiseaux sauvages et à la grave harmonie des vagues. Au nord, un immense rocher de granit, encore éclairé par le soleil, s’élevait majestueusement au-dessus du petit hameau d’Oëlmoe, puis sa tête se courbait sous un amas de tours ruinées, comme si le géant eût été fatigué du fardeau.

Quand l’âme est triste, les spectacles mélancoliques lui plaisent; elle les rembrunit de toute sa tristesse. Qu’un malheureux soit jeté parmi les sauvages et hautes montagnes, près d’un sombre lac, d’une noire forêt, au moment où le jour va disparaître, il verra cette scène grave, cette nature sérieuse, en quelque sorte à travers un voile funèbre; il ne lui semblera pas que le soleil se couche, mais qu’il meurt.

Ordener rêvait, silencieux et immobile, quand son compagnon s’écria:

— À merveille, jeune seigneur! Il est beau de méditer ainsi devant le lac de Norvège qui renferme le plus de pleuronectes.

Cette observation et le geste qui l’accompagnait eussent fait sourire tout autre qu’un amant séparé de sa maîtresse pour ne la revoir peut-être plus. Le savant concierge poursuivit:

— Pourtant, souffrez que je vous enlève à votre docte contemplation pour vous faire remarquer que le jour décline, et qu’il faut nous hâter si nous voulons arriver au village d’Oëlmoe avant le crépuscule.

La remarque était juste. Ordener se remit en marche, et Spiagudry le suivit en continuant ses réflexions mal écoutées sur les phénomènes botaniques et physiologiques que le lac de Sparbo présente aux naturalistes.

— Seigneur Ordener, disait-il, si vous en croyiez votre dévoué guide, vous abandonneriez votre funeste entreprise; oui, seigneur, et vous vous fixeriez ici sur les bords de ce lac si curieux où nous pourrions nous livrer ensemble à une foule de doctes recherches, par exemple à celle de la stella canora palustris, plante singulière que beaucoup de savants croient fabuleuse, mais que l’évêque Arngrim affirme avoir vue et entendue sur les rives du Sparbo. Ajoutez à cela que nous aurions la satisfaction d'habiter le sol de l'Europe qui renferme le plus de gypse, et où les sicaires de la Thémis de Drontheim pénètrent le moins. — Cela ne vous sourit-il pas, mon jeune maître? Allons, renoncez à votre voyage insensé; car, sans vous offenser, votre entreprise est périlleuse sans profit, periculum sine pecunia, c'est-à-dire insensée, et conçue dans un moment où vous auriez mieux fait de penser à autre chose.

Ordener, qui ne prêtait aucune attention aux paroles du pauvre homme, n'entretenait la conversation que par ces monosyllabes insignifiants et distraits que les grands parleurs prennent pour des réponses. C'est ainsi qu'ils arrivèrent au hameau d'Oëlmoe, sur la place duquel un mouvement inusité se faisait en ce moment remarquer.

Les habitants, chasseurs, pêcheurs, forgerons, sortaient de toutes les cabanes et accouraient se grouper autour d'un tertre circulaire, occupé par quelques hommes, dont l'un sonnait du cor en agitant au-dessus de sa tête une petite bannière blanche et noire.

— C'est sans doute quelque charlatan, dit Spiagudry, ambubaiarum collegia, pharmacopolae, quelque misérable qui convertit l'or en plomb et les plaies en ulcères. Voyons; quelle invention de l'enfer va-t-il vendre à ces pauvres campagnards? Encore si ces imposteurs se bornaient aux rois, s'ils imitaient tous le danois Borch et le milanais Borri, ces alchimistes qui se jouèrent si complètement de notre Frédéric III [Footnote: Frédéric III fut la dupe de Borch ou Borrichius, chimiste danois, et surtout de Borri, charlatan milanais, qui se disait le favori de l'archange Michel. Cet imposteur, après avoir émerveillé de ses prétendus prodiges Strasbourg et Amsterdam, agrandit la sphère de son ambition et la témérité de ses mensonges; après avoir trompé le peuple, il osa tromper les rois. Il commença par la reine Christine à Hambourg, et termina par le roi Frédéric à Copenhague.]; mais il leur faut le denier du paysan non moins que le million du prince.

Spiagudry se trompait; en approchant du monticule, ils reconnurent, à sa robe noire et à son bonnet rond et aigu, un syndic environné de quelques archers. L'homme qui sonnait du cor était le crieur des édits.

Le gardien fugitif, troublé, murmura à voix basse:

— En vérité, seigneur Ordener, en entrant dans cette bourgade, je ne m'attendais guère à tomber sur un syndic. Me protège le grand saint Hospice! que va-t-il dire?

Son incertitude ne fut pas longue, car la voix glapissante du crieur des édits s'éleva tout à coup, religieusement écoutée par la petite foule des habitants d'Oëlmoe.

— «Au nom de sa majesté, et par ordre de son excellence le général Levin de Knud, gouverneur, le haut-syndic du Drontheimhus fait savoir à tous les habitants des villes, bourgs et bourgades de la province, que: — 1° la tête de Han, natif de Klipstadur, en Islande, assassin et incendiaire, est mise au prix de mille écus royaux.»

Un murmure vague éclata dans l'auditoire. Le crieur poursuivit:

— «2° La tête de Benignus Spiagudry, nécroman et sacrilège, ex-gardien du Spladgest de Drontheim, est mise au prix de quatre écus royaux;

«3° Cet édit sera publié dans toute la province, par les syndics des villes, bourgs et bourgades, qui en faciliteront l'exécution.»

Le syndic prit l'édit des mains du crieur, et ajouta d'une voix lugubre et solennelle:

— La vie de ces hommes est offerte à qui voudra la prendre.

Le lecteur se persuadera aisément que cette lecture ne fut pas écoutée sans quelque émotion par notre pauvre et malencontreux Spiagudry. Nul doute même que les signes extraordinaires d'effroi qui lui échappèrent en ce moment n'eussent appelé l'attention du groupe qui l'environnait, si elle n'eût été entièrement absorbée par la première partie de l'édit syndical.

— La tête de Han à prix! s'écria un vieux pêcheur qui était venu traînant ses filets humides. Ils feraient tout aussi bien, par saint Usulph, de mettre à prix également la tête de Belzébuth.

— Pour garder la proportion entre Han et Belzébuth, il faudrait, dit un chasseur, reconnaissable à sa veste de peau de chamois, qu'ils offrissent seulement quinze cents écus du chef cornu du dernier démon.

— Gloire soit à la sainte mère de Dieu! ajouta en roulant son fuseau une vieille dont le front chauve branlait. Je voudrais voir la tête de ce Han, afin de m'assurer que ses yeux sont deux charbons ardents, comme on le dit.

— Oui, sûrement, reprit une autre vieille, c'est seulement en la regardant qu'il a brûlé la cathédrale de Drontheim. Moi, je voudrais voir le monstre tout entier avec sa queue de serpent, son pied fourchu et ses grandes ailes de chauve-souris.

— Qui vous a fait ces contes, bonne mère? interrompit le chasseur d'un air de fatuité. J'ai vu, moi, ce Han d'Islande dans les gorges de Medsyhath; c’est un homme fait comme nous, seulement il a la hauteur d’un peuplier de quarante ans.

— Vraiment? dit avec une expression singulière une voix dans la foule. Cette voix, qui fit tressaillir Spiagudry, était celle d’un petit homme dont le visage était caché sous un large feutre de mineur, et le corps couvert d’une natte de jonc et de poil de veau marin.

— Sur ma foi, reprit, avec un rire épais, un forgeron qui portait son grand marteau en bandoulière, qu’on offre pour sa tête mille ou dix mille écus royaux, qu’il ait quatre ou quarante brasses de hauteur, ce n’est pas moi qui me chargerai d’aller y voir.

— Ni moi, dit le pêcheur.

— Ni moi, ni moi, répétèrent toutes les voix.

— Celui pourtant qui en serait tenté, reprit le petit homme, trouvera Han d’Islande demain dans la ruine d’Arbar, près le Smiasen; après-demain dans la grotte de Walderhog.

— Brave homme, en êtes-vous sûr?

Cette question fut faite à la fois par Ordener, qui assistait à cette scène avec un intérêt facile à comprendre pour tout autre que Spiagudry, et par un autre petit homme, assez replet, vêtu de noir, d’un visage gai, et qui était sorti, aux premiers sons de la trompe du crieur, de la seule auberge que renfermât la bourgade.

Le petit homme au grand chapeau parut les considérer un instant tous deux, et répondit d’une voix sourde:

— Oui.

— Et comment le savez-vous pour pouvoir l’affirmer? demanda Ordener.

— Je sais où est Han d’Islande, comme je sais où est Benignus

Spiagudry; ni l’un ni l’autre ne sont loin d’ici en ce moment.

Toutes les terreurs se réveillèrent dans le pauvre concierge, osant à peine regarder le mystérieux petit homme, et se croyant mal caché sous sa perruque française; il se mit à tirer le manteau d’Ordener en disant à voix basse:

— Maître, seigneur, au nom du ciel, de grâce, par pitié, allons-nous-en, sortons de ce maudit faubourg de l’enfer!

Ordener, surpris comme lui, examinait attentivement le petit homme, qui, tournant le dos au jour, paraissait soigneux de cacher ses traits.

— Ce Benignus Spiagudry, s’écria le pêcheur, je l’ai vu au Spladgest de Drontheim. C’est un grand.

— C’est celui dont on offre quatre écus.

Le chasseur éclata de rire.

— Quatre écus! Ce n’est pas moi qui chasserai celui-là. On paie plus cher la peau d’un renard bleu.

Cette comparaison, qui dans tout autre temps eût fort désobligé le savant concierge, le rassura cette fois. Il allait néanmoins adresser une nouvelle prière à Ordener pour le décider à poursuivre leur chemin, quand celui-ci, sachant ce qu’il lui importait de savoir, le prévint, en sortant du rassemblement qui commençait à s’éclaircir.

Quoiqu’ils eussent, en arrivant au hameau d’Oëlmoe, l’intention d’y passer la nuit, ils le quittèrent tous deux, comme par une convention tacite, sans même s’interroger sur le motif de leur départ précipité. Celui d’Ordener était l’espérance de rencontrer plus tôt le brigand, celui de Spiagudry le désir de s’éloigner plus vite des archers.

Ordener avait l’esprit trop grave pour rire des mésaventures de son compagnon. Ce fut d’une voix affectueuse qu’il rompit le premier le silence.

— Vieillard, quelle est donc déjà cette ruine où l’on pourra trouver demain Han d’Islande, à ce qu’affirme ce petit homme qui paraît tout savoir?

— Je l’ignore…. Je l’ai mal entendu, noble maître, dit Spiagudry, qui en effet ne mentait pas.

— Il faudra donc, continua le jeune homme, se résigner à ne le rencontrer qu’après-demain à cette grotte de Walderhog?

— La grotte de Walderhog, seigneur! c’est en effet la demeure favorite de Han d’Islande.

— Prenons-en le chemin, dit Ordener.

— Tournons à gauche, derrière le rocher d’Oëlmoe; il faut moins de deux journées pour arriver à la caverne de Walderhog.

— Connaissez-vous, vieillard, reprit Ordener avec ménagement, ce singulier homme qui semble si bien vous connaître?

Cette question réveilla dans Spiagudry les craintes qui commençaient à s’affaiblir à mesure qu’ils s’éloignaient de la bourgade d’Oëlmoe.

— Non, vraiment, seigneur, répondit-il d’une voix presque tremblante.

Seulement, il a une voix bien étrange!

Ordener chercha à le rassurer.

— Ne craignez rien, vieillard; servez-moi bien, je vous protégerai de même. Si je reviens vainqueur de Han, je vous promets non-seulement votre grâce, mais encore l'abandon des mille écus royaux qui sont offerts par la justice.

L'honnête Benignus aimait extraordinairement la vie, mais il aimait l'or prodigieusement. Les promesses d'Ordener furent comme des paroles magiques; non-seulement elles bannirent toutes ses frayeurs, mais encore elles réveillèrent en lui cette sorte d'hilarité loquace, qui s'épanchait en longs discours, en gesticulations bizarres et en savantes citations.

— Seigneur Ordener, dit-il, quand je devrais subir à ce sujet une controverse avec Over-Bilseuth, autrement dit le Bavard, non, rien ne m'empêcherait de soutenir que vous êtes un sage et honorable jeune homme. Quoi de plus digne et de plus glorieux en effet, quid cithara, tuba, vel campana dignius, que d'exposer noblement sa vie pour délivrer son pays d'un monstre, d'un brigand, d'un démon, en qui tous les démons, les brigands et les monstres semblent réunis? — Qu'on ne m'aille pas dire qu'un sordide intérêt vous guide! le noble seigneur Ordener abandonne le salaire de son combat au compagnon de son voyage, au vieillard qui l'aura conduit seulement à un mille de la grotte de Walderhog; car, n'est-il pas vrai, jeune maître, que vous me permettrez d'attendre le résultat de votre illustre entreprise au hameau de Surb, situé à un mille du rivage de Walderhog, dans la forêt? Et quand votre éclatante victoire sera connue, seigneur, ce sera dans toute la Norvège une joie pareille à celle de Vermund le Proscrit, quand, du sommet de ce même rocher d'Oëlmoe que nous côtoyons maintenant, il aperçut le grand feu que son frère Hafdan avait allumé, en signe de délivrance, sur le donjon de Munckholm.

À ce nom, Ordener interrompit vivement:

— Quoi! du haut de ce rocher on aperçoit le donjon de Munckholm?

— Oui, seigneur, à douze milles au sud, entre les montagnes que nos pères nommaient les Escabelles de Frigga. À cette heure on doit voir parfaitement le phare du donjon.

— Vraiment! s'écria Ordener, qui s'élançait vers l'idée de revoir encore une fois le lieu où était tout son bonheur. Vieillard, il y a sans doute un sentier qui conduit au sommet de ce rocher?

— Oui, sans doute; un sentier qui prend naissance dans le bois où nous allons entrer, et s'élève, par sur pente assez douce, jusqu'à la tête nue du rocher, une laquelle il se continue en gradins taillés dans le roc par les compagnons de Vermund le Proscrit, au château duquel il aboutit. Ce sont ces ruines, que vous pouvez voir au clair de la lune.

— Eh bien, vieillard, vous allez m'indiquer le sentier; c'est dans ces ruines que nous passerons la nuit, dans ces ruines d'où l'on voit le donjon de Munckholm.

— Y pensez-vous, seigneur? dit Benignus. La fatigue de cette journée….

— Vieillard, j'aiderai votre marche; jamais mon pas ne fut plus ferme.

— Seigneur, les ronces qui obstruent ce sentier depuis si longtemps abandonné, les pierres dégradées, la nuit….

— Je marcherai le premier.

— Peut-être quelque bête malfaisante, quelque animal impur, quelque monstre hideux….

— Ce n'est pas pour éviter les monstres que j'ai entrepris ce voyage.

L'idée de s'arrêter si près d'Oëlmoe déplaisait fort à Spiagudry; celle de voir le phare de Munckholm, et peut-être la lumière de la fenêtre d'Éthel, enchantait et entraînait Ordener.

— Mon jeune maître, dit Spiagudry, abandonnez ce projet, croyez-moi; j'ai le pressentiment qu'il nous portera malheur.

Cette prière n'était rien, devant ce que désirait Ordener.

— Allons, dit-il avec impatience, songez que vous vous êtes engagé à me bien servir. Je veux que vous m'indiquiez ce sentier; où est-il?

— Nous allons y arriver tout à l'heure, dit le concierge forcé d'obéir.

En effet, le sentier s'offrit bientôt à eux; ils y entrèrent, mais Spiagudry remarqua, avec un étonnement mêlé d'effroi, que les hautes herbes étaient couchées et brisées, et que le vieux sentier de Vermund le Proscrit paraissait avoir été foulé récemment.

LEONARDO.
Le roi vous demande.
HENRIQUE.
Comment cela?

LOPE DE VEGA. La Fuerza lastimosa.

Devant quelques papiers épars sur son bureau, parmi lesquels on distingue des lettres nouvellement ouvertes, le général Levin de Knud paraît rêver profondément. Un secrétaire debout près de lui semble attendre ses ordres. Le général tantôt frappe de ses éperons le riche tapis qui s'étend sous ses pieds, tantôt joue d'un air distrait avec la décoration de l'éléphant, suspendue à son cou par le collier de l'ordre. De temps en temps il ouvre la bouche pour parler, puis s'arrête et se frotte le front, et jette un nouveau coup d'oeil sur les dépêches décachetées qui couvrent la table.

— Comment diable!…. s'écrie-t-il enfin.

Cette exclamation concluante est suivie d'un instant de silence.

— Qui se serait jamais figuré, reprend-il, que ces démons de mineurs en viendraient là? Il faut nécessairement que de secrètes instigations les aient poussés à cette révolte. — Mais, savez-vous, Wapherney, que la chose est sérieuse? Savez-vous que cinq à six cents coquins des îles Fa-roër, commandés par un certain vieux bandit nommé Jonas, ont déjà déserté leurs mines? qu'un jeune fanatique, appelé Norbith, s'est également mis à la tête des mécontents de Guldbranshal? qu'à Sund-Moër, à Hubfallo, à Kongsberg, ces mauvaises têtes, qui n'attendaient qu'un signal, sont déjà peut-être soulevées? Savez-vous que les montagnards s'en mêlent, et qu'un des plus hardis renards de Kole, le vieux Kennybol, les commande? Savez-vous enfin que, d'après un bruit général dans le nord du Drontheimhus, s'il faut en croire les syndics qui m'écrivent, ce fameux scélérat dont nous avons fait mettre la tête à prix, le formidable Han, dirige en chef l'insurrection? Que direz-vous de tout cela, mon cher Wapherney? hem!

— Votre excellence, dit Wapherney, sait quelles mesures….

— Il y a encore dans cette déplorable affaire une circonstance que je ne puis m'expliquer; c'est que notre prisonnier Schumacker soit, comme on le prétend, l'auteur de la révolte. C'est ce qui semble n'étonner personne, et c'est enfin ce qui m'étonne le plus. Il me paraît difficile qu'un homme près duquel se plaisait mon loyal Ordener soit un traître. Cependant, les mineurs, assure-t-on, se lèvent en son nom; son nom est leur mot d'ordre, leur cri de ralliement; ils lui donnent même les titres dont le roi l'a privé. — Tout cela semble certain. — Mais comment se fait-il que la comtesse d'Ahlefeld connût déjà tous ces détails il y a six jours, au moment où les premiers symptômes réels de l'insurrection se manifestaient à peine dans les mines? — Cela est étrange. — N'importe, il faut pourvoir à tout. Donnez-moi mon sceau, Wapherney.

Le général écrivit trois lettres, les scella et les remit au secrétaire.

— Faites tenir ces messages au baron Voethaün, colonel des arquebusiers, actuellement en garnison à Munckholm, afin que son régiment marche en hâte aux révoltés. — Voici, pour le commandant de Munckholm, un ordre de veiller plus soigneusement que jamais sur l'ex-grand-chancelier. Il faudra que je voie et que j'interroge moi-même ce Schumacker. — Enfin, envoyez cette lettre à Skongen, au major Wolhm, qui y commande, afin qu'il dirige une partie de la garnison vers le foyer de l'insurrection. — Allez, Wapherney, et qu'on exécute promptement ces ordres.

Le secrétaire sortit, laissant le gouverneur plongé dans ses réflexions.

— Tout cela est fort inquiétant, pensait-il. Ces mineurs révoltés là-bas, cette intrigante chancelière ici, ce fou d'Ordener… on ne sait où! — Peut-être il voyage au milieu de tous ces bandits, laissant ici sous ma protection ce Schumacker, qui conspire contre l'état, et sa fille, pour la sûreté de laquelle j'ai eu la bonté d'éloigner la compagnie où se trouve ce Frédéric d'Ahlefeld, qu'Ordener accuse. — Eh mais, il me semble que cette compagnie pourra bien arrêter les premières colonnes des insurgés; elle est bien placée pour cela. Walhstrom, où elle tient garnison, est près du lac de Smiasen et de la ruine d'Arbar. C'est un des points que la révolte gagnera nécessairement.

À cet endroit de sa rêverie, le général fut interrompu par le bruit de la porte qui s'ouvrait.

— Eh bien, que voulez-vous, Gustave?

— Mon général, c'est un messager qui demande votre excellence.

— Allons! qu'est-ce encore? quelque désastre!…. Faites entrer ce messager.

Le messager, introduit, remit un paquet au gouverneur.

— Votre excellence, dit-il, c'est de la part de sa sérénité le vice-roi.

Le général ouvrit précipitamment la dépêche.

— Par saint Georges, s'écria-t-il avec un mouvement de surprise, je crois qu'ils sont tous fous! Ne voilà-t-il pas le vice-roi qui m'invite à me rendre près de lui, à Berghen? C'est, dit-il, pour une affaire pressante, d'après l'ordre du roi. — Voilà une affaire pressante qui choisit bien son moment. — «Le grand-chancelier, qui visite actuellement le Drontheimhus, suppléera à votre absence….» — C'est un suppléant auquel je ne me fie guère! — «L'évêque l'assistera….» — En vérité, Frédéric choisit là de bons gouverneurs pour un pays révolté; deux hommes de robe, un chancelier et un évêque! — Allons cependant, l'invitation est expresse, c'est l'ordre du roi. Il faut s'y rendre. Mais avant mon départ je veux voir Schumacker, et l'interroger. — Je sens bien qu'on veut m'engloutir dans un chaos d'intrigues, mais j'ai pour me diriger une boussole qui ne me trompe jamais, — c'est ma conscience.

XXI

Il semble que tout prenne une voix pour l’accuser de son crime.
Caïn, tragédie.

— Oui, seigneur comte, c’est aujourd’hui même, dans la ruine d’Arbar, que nous pourrons le rencontrer. Une foule de circonstances me font croire à la vérité de ce renseignement précieux, que j’ai recueilli hier soir par hasard, comme je vous l’ai conté, dans le village d’Oëlmoe.

— Sommes-nous loin de cette ruine d’Arbar?

— Mais c’est auprès du lac de Smiasen. Le guide m’a assuré que nous y serions avant le milieu du jour.

Ainsi s’entretenaient deux personnages à cheval et enveloppés de manteaux bruns, lesquels suivaient de grand matin une de ces mille routes sinueuses et étroites qui traversent en tous sens la forêt située entre les lacs de Smiasen et de Sparbo. Un guide des montagnes, muni de sa trompe et armé de sa hache, les précédait sur son petit cheval gris, et derrière eux marchaient quatre autres cavaliers armés jusqu’aux dents, vers lesquels ces deux personnages tournaient de temps en temps la tête, comme s’ils craignaient d’en être entendus.

— Si ce brigand islandais se trouve en effet dans la ruine d’Arbar, disait celui des deux interlocuteurs dont la monture se tenait respectueusement un peu en arrière de l’autre, c’est un grand point de gagné, car le difficile était de rencontrer cet être insaisissable.

— Vous croyez, Musdoemon? Et s’il allait rejeter nos offres?

— Impossible, votre grâce! de l’or et l’impunité, quel brigand résisterait à cela?

— Mais vous savez que ce brigand n’est pas un scélérat ordinaire. Ne le jugez donc pas à votre mesure; s’il refusait, comment rempliriez-vous la promesse que vous avez faite dans la nuit d’avant-hier aux trois chefs de l’insurrection?

— Eh bien, noble comte, dans ce cas, que je regarde comme impossible, si nous avons le bonheur de trouver notre homme, votre grâce a-t-elle oublié qu’un faux Han d’Islande m’attend dans deux jours à l’heure fixée, au lieu du rendez-vous assigné aux trois chefs, à l’Étoile-Bleue, endroit d’ailleurs assez voisin de la ruine d’Arbar?

— Vous avez raison, toujours raison, mon cher Musdoemon, dit le noble comte; et ils retombèrent tous deux dans leur cercle particulier de réflexions.

Musdoemon, dont l'intérêt était de tenir le maître en bonne humeur, fit, pour le distraire, une question au guide.

— Brave homme, quelle est cette espèce de croix de pierre dégradée qui s'élève là-haut, derrière ces jeunes chênes?

Le guide, homme au regard fixe, à la mine stupide, tourna la tête et la secoua à plusieurs reprises en disant:

— Oh! seigneur maître, c'est la plus vieille potence de Norvège; le saint roi Olaüs la fit construire pour un juge qui avait fait un pacte avec un brigand.

Musdoemon aperçut sur le visage de son patron une impression toute contraire à celle qu'il espérait des paroles simples du guide.

— Ce fut, poursuivit celui-ci, une histoire bien singulière, la bonne mère Osie me l'a contée; le brigand fut chargé de pendre le juge.

Le pauvre guide ne s'apercevait pas, dans sa naïveté, que l'aventure dont il voulait égayer ses voyageurs était presque un outrage pour eux. Musdoemon l'arrêta.

— Assez, assez, lui dit-il, nous connaissons cette histoire.

— L'insolent! murmura le comte, il connaît cette histoire! Ah!

Musdoemon, tu me paieras cher tes impudences.

— Sa grâce ne parle-t-elle pas? dit Musdoemon d'un air obséquieux.

— Je pensais aux moyens de vous faire enfin obtenir l'ordre de Dannebrog. Le mariage de ma fille Ulrique et du baron Ordener sera une bonne occasion.

Musdoemon se confondit en protestations et en remerciements.

— À propos, reprit sa grâce, parlons de nos affaires. Croyez-vous que l'ordre de rappel momentané que nous lui destinons soit parvenu au mecklembourgeois?

Le lecteur se rappelle peut-être que le comte avait l'habitude de désigner sous ce nom le général Levin de Knud, qui était en effet natif du Mecklembourg.

— Parlons de nos affaires! se dit intérieurement Musdoemon choqué; il paraît que mes affaires ne sont pas nos affaires. — Seigneur comte, répondit-il à haute voix, je pense que le messager du vice-roi doit être en ce moment à Drontheim, et qu'ainsi le général Levin n'est pas loin de son départ.

Le comte prit une voix affectueuse.

— Ce rappel, mon cher, est un de vos coups de maître; c'est une de vos intrigues les mieux conçues et les plus habilement exécutées.

— L'honneur en appartient à sa grâce autant qu'à moi, répliqua Musdoemon, soigneux, comme nous l'avons déjà dit, de mêler le comte à toutes ses machinations.

Le patron connaissait cette pensée secrète de son confident, mais il voulait paraître l'ignorer. Il se mit à sourire.

— Mon cher secrétaire intime, vous êtes toujours modeste; mais rien ne me fera méconnaître vos éminents services. La présence d'Elphège et l'absence du mecklembourgeois assurent mon triomphe à Drontheim. Me voici le chef de la province, et si Han d'Islande accepte le commandement des révoltés, que je veux lui offrir moi-même, c'est à moi que reviendra, aux yeux du roi, la gloire d'avoir apaisé cette inquiétante insurrection et pris ce formidable brigand.

Ils parlaient ainsi à voix basse, quand le guide se retourna.

— Mes seigneurs maîtres, dit-il, voici, à notre gauche, le monticule sur lequel Biord le Juste fit décapiter, aux yeux de son armée, Vellon à la langue double, ce traître qui avait éloigné les vrais défenseurs du roi et appelé l'ennemi dans le camp, pour paraître avoir seul sauvé les jours de Biord.

Tous ces souvenirs de la vieille Norvège ne semblèrent pas du goût de Musdoemon, car il interrompit brusquement le guide.

— Allons, allons, bonhomme, taisez-vous et continuez votre chemin sans vous détourner; que nous importe ce que des masures ruinées ou des arbres morts vous rappellent de sottes aventures? Vous importunez mon maître avec vos contes de vieilles femmes.

XXII

Voici l’heure où le lion rugit,
Où le loup hurle à la lune,
Tandis que le laboureur ronfle,
Épuisé de sa pénible tâche.
Maintenant les tisons consumés brillent dans le foyer;
  La chouette poussant son cri sinistre,
  Rappelle aux malheureux, couchés dans les douleurs,
  Le souvenir d’un drap funèbre.
  Voici le temps de la nuit
  Où les tombeaux, tous entr’ouverts,
  Laissent échapper chacun son spectre,
  Qui va errer dans les sentiers des cimetières.

SHAKESPEARE. Le Songe d’été.

Retournons sur nos pas. Nous avons laissé Ordener et Spiagudry gravissant avec assez de peine, au lever de la lune, la croupe du rocher courbé d’Oëlmoe. Ce rocher, chauve à l’origine de sa courbure, était appelé alors par les paysans norvégiens le Cou-de-Vautour, dénomination qui représente en effet assez bien la figure qu’offre de loin cette masse énorme de granit.

À mesure que nos voyageurs s’élevaient vers la partie nue du rocher, la forêt se changeait en bruyère. Les mousses succédaient aux herbes; les églantiers sauvages, les genêts, les houx, aux chênes et aux bouleaux; appauvrissement de végétation qui, sur les hautes montagnes, indique toujours la proximité du sommet, en annonçant l’amincissement graduel de la couche de terre dont ce qu’on pourrait appeler l’ossement du mont est revêtu.

— Seigneur Ordener, disait Spiagudry, dont l’esprit mobile était comme sans cesse entraîné dans un tourbillon d’idées diverses, cette pente est bien fatigante, et, pour vous avoir suivi, il faut tout le dévouement….

— Mais il me semble que je vois là, à droite, un magnifique convolvulus; je voudrais bien pouvoir l’examiner. Pourquoi ne fait-il pas grand jour? — Savez-vous que c’est une chose bien impertinente que d’évaluer un savant tel que moi quatre méchants écus? Il est vrai que le fameux Phèdre était esclave, et qu’Ésope, si nous en croyons le docte

Planude, fut vendu dans une foire comme une bête ou une chose. Et qui ne serait fier d'avoir un rapport quelconque avec le grand Ésope?

— Et avec le célèbre Han? ajouta Ordener en souriant.

— Par saint Hospice, répondit le concierge, ne prononcez pas ce nom ainsi; je me passerais bien, je vous jure, seigneur, de cette dernière conformité. Mais ne serait-ce pas une chose singulière, que le prix de sa tête revînt à Benignus Spiagudry, son compagnond'infortune? — Seigneur Ordener, vous êtes plus noble que Jason, qui ne donna pas la toison d'or au pilote d'Argo; et certes votre entreprise, dont je ne devine pas positivement le but, n'est pas moins périlleuse que celle de Jason.

— Mais, dit Ordener, puisque vous connaissez Han d'Islande, donnez-moi donc quelques détails sur lui. Vous m'avez déjà appris que ce n'est pas un géant, comme on le croit le plus communément.

Spiagudry l'interrompit.

— Arrêtez, maître! n'entendez-vous point un bruit de pas derrière nous?

— Oui, répondit tranquillement le jeune homme. Ne vous alarmez pas; c'est quelque bête fauve que notre approche effarouche, et qui se retire en froissant les halliers.

— Vous avez raison, mon jeune César; il y a si longtemps que ces bois n'ont vu d'êtres humains! Si l'on en juge à la pesanteur des pas, l'animal doit être gros. C'est un élan ou un renne; cette partie de la Norvège en est peuplée. On y trouve aussi des chatpards. J'en ai vu un, entre autres, qu'on avait amené à Copenhague; il était d'une grandeur monstrueuse. Il faut que je vous fasse la description de ce féroce animal.

— Mon cher guide, dit Ordener, j'aimerais mieux que vous me fissiez la description d'un autre monstre non moins féroce, de cet horrible Han.

— Baissez la voix, seigneur! Comme le jeune maître prononce paisiblement un tel nom! Vous ne savez pas…. — Dieu! seigneur, écoutez!

Spiagudry se rapprocha, en disant ces mots, d'Ordener, qui venait d'entendre en effet très distinctement un cri pareil à l'espèce de rugissement qui, si le lecteur se le rappelle, avait si fort effrayé le timide concierge dans cette soirée orageuse où ils avaient quitté Drontheim.

— Avez-vous entendu? murmura celui-ci, tout haletant de crainte.

— Sans doute, dit Ordener, et je ne vois pas pourquoi vous tremblez. C'est un hurlement de bête sauvage, peut-être tout simplement le cri d'un de ces chatpards dont vous parliez tout à l'heure. Comptiez-vous traverser à cette heure un pareil endroit sans être averti en rien de la présence des hôtes que vous troublez? Je vous proteste, vieillard, qu’ils sont plus effrayés encore que vous.

Spiagudry, en voyant le calme de son jeune compagnon, se rassura un peu.

— Allons, il pourrait bien se faire, seigneur, que vous eussiez encore raison. Mais ce cri de bête ressemble horriblement à une voix…. Vous avez été fâcheusement inspiré, souffrez que je vous le dise, seigneur, de vouloir monter à ce château de Vermund. Je crains qu’il ne nous arrive malheur sur le Cou-de-Vautour.

— Ne craignez rien tant que vous serez avec moi, répondit Ordener.

— Oh! rien ne vous alarme; mais, seigneur, il n’y a que le bienheureux saint Paul qui puisse prendre des vipères sans se blesser. — Vous n’avez seulement pas remarqué, quand nous sommes entrés dans ce maudit sentier, qu’il paraissait frayé depuis peu, et que les herbes foulées n’avaient même pas eu le temps de se relever depuis qu’on y avait passé.

— J’avoue que tout cela me frappe peu, et que le calme de mon esprit ne dépend pas du plus ou moins de courbure d’un brin d’herbe. Voici que nous allons quitter la bruyère; nous n’entendrons plus de pas ni de cris de bêtes; je ne vous dirai donc plus, mon brave guide, de rassembler votre courage, mais de ramasser vos forces, car le sentier, taillé dans le roc, sera sans doute plus difficile que celui-ci.

— Ce n’est pas, seigneur, qu’il soit plus escarpé, mais le savant voyageur Suckson conte qu’il est souvent embarrassé d’éclats de roches ou de lourdes pierres qu’on ne peut soulever et qu’il n’est pas aisé de franchir. Il y a entre autres, un peu au delà de la poterne de Malaër, dont nous approchons, un énorme bloc triangulaire de granit que j’ai toujours vivement désiré voir. Schoenning affirme y avoir retrouvé les trois caractères runiques primitifs.

Il y avait déjà quelque temps que les voyageurs gravissaient la roche nue; ils atteignirent une petite tour écroulée, à travers laquelle il fallait passer, et que Spiagudry fit remarquer à Ordener.

— C’est la poterne de Malaër, seigneur. Ce chemin creusé à vif présente plusieurs autres constructions curieuses, qui montrent quelles étaient les anciennes fortifications de nos manoirs norvégiens! Cette poterne, qui était toujours gardée par quatre hommes d’armes, était le premier ouvrage avancé du fort de Vermund. À propos de porte ou poterne, le moine Urensius fait une remarque singulière; le mot janua, qui vient de Janus, dont le temple avait des portes si célèbres, n’a-t-il pas engendré le mot janissaire, gardien de la porte du sultan? Il serait assez curieux que le nom du prince le plus doux de l’histoire eût passé aux soldats les plus féroces de la terre.

Au milieu de tout le fatras scientifique du concierge, ils avançaient assez péniblement sur des pierres roulantes et des cailloux tranchants, mêlés de ce gazon court et glissant qui croît quelquefois sur les rochers. Ordener oubliait la fatigue en songeant au bonheur de revoir ce Munckholm, si éloigné; tout à coup Spiagudry s’écria:

— Ah! je l’aperçois! cette seule vue me dédommage de toute ma peine.

Je la vois, seigneur, je la vois!

— Qui donc? dit Ordener, qui pensait en ce moment à son Éthel.

— Eh! seigneur, la pyramide triangulaire dont parle Schoenning! Je serai, avec le professeur Schoenning et l’évêque Isleif, le troisième savant qui aura eu le bonheur de l’examiner. Seulement il est fâcheux que ce ne soit qu’au clair de lune.

En approchant du fameux bloc, Spiagudry poussa un cri de douleur et d’épouvante à la fois. Ordener, surpris, s’informa avec intérêt du nouveau sujet de son émotion; mais le concierge archéologue fut quelque temps avant de pouvoir lui répondre.

— Vous croyiez, disait Ordener, que cette pierre barrait le chemin; vous devez, au contraire, reconnaître avec plaisir qu’elle le laisse parfaitement libre.

— Et c’est justement ce qui me désespère! dit Benignus d’une voix lamentable.

— Comment?

— Quoi! seigneur, reprit le concierge, ne voyez-vous pas que cette pyramide a été dérangée de sa position; que la base, qui était assise sur le sentier, est maintenant exposée à l’air, tandis que le bloc est précisément appuyé contre terre, sur la face où Schoenning avait découvert les caractères runiques primordiaux? — Je suis bien malheureux!

— C’est jouer de malheur, en effet, dit le jeune homme.

— Et ajoutez à cela, reprit vivement Spiagudry, que le dérangement de cette masse prouve ici la présence de quelque être surhumain. À moins que ce ne soit le diable, il n’y a en Norvège qu’un seul homme dont le bras puisse…

— Mon pauvre guide, vous revenez encore à vos terreurs paniques. Qui sait si cette pierre n’est pas ainsi depuis plus d’un siècle?

— Il y a cent cinquante ans, à la vérité, dit Spiagudry d’une voix plus calme, que le dernier observateur l’a étudiée. Mais il me semble qu’elle est fraîchement remuée; la place qu’elle occupait est encore humide. Voyez, seigneur.

Ordener, impatient d’arriver aux ruines, arracha son guide d’auprès de la pyramide merveilleuse, et parvint, par de sages paroles, à dissiper les nouvelles craintes que cet étrange déplacement avait inspirées au vieux savant.

— Écoutez, vieillard, vous pourrez vous fixer au bord de ce lac, et vous livrer à votre aise à vos importantes études, quand vous aurez reçu les mille écus royaux que vous rapportera la tête de Han.

— Vous avez raison, noble seigneur; mais ne parlez pas si légèrement d’une victoire bien douteuse. Il faut que je vous donne un conseil pour que vous vous rendiez plus aisément maître du monstre.

Ordener se rapprocha vivement de Spiagudry.

— Un conseil! lequel?

— Le brigand, dit celui-ci à voix basse et en jetant des regards inquiets autour de lui, le brigand porte à sa ceinture un crâne dans lequel il a coutume de boire. Ce crâne est le crâne de son fils, dont le cadavre est celui pour la profanation duquel je suis poursuivi.

— Haussez un peu la voix et ne craignez rien, je vous entends à peine.

Eh bien! ce crâne?

— C’est de ce crâne, dit Spiagudry en se penchant à l’oreille du jeune homme, qu’il faut tâcher de vous emparer. Le monstre y attache je ne sais quelles idées superstitieuses. Quand le crâne de son fils sera en votre pouvoir, vous ferez de lui tout ce que vous voudrez.

— Cela est bien, mon brave homme; mais comment s’emparer de ce crâne?

— Par la ruse, seigneur; pendant le sommeil du monstre, peut-être…

Ordener l’interrompit.

— Il suffit. Votre bon conseil ne peut me servir; je ne dois pas savoir si un ennemi dort. Je ne connais pour combattre que mon épée.

— Seigneur, seigneur! il n’est pas prouvé que l’archange Michel n’ait pas usé de ruse pour terrasser Satan.

Ici Spiagudry s’arrêta tout à coup, et étendit ses deux mains devant lui, en s’écriant d’une voix presque éteinte:

— O ciel! ô ciel! qu’est-ce que je vois là-bas? Voyez, maître, n’est-ce pas un petit homme qui marche dans ce même sentier devant nous?

— Ma foi, dit Ordener en levant les yeux, je ne vois rien.

— Rien, seigneur? — En effet, le sentier tourne, et il a disparu derrière ce rocher. — N’allons pas plus loin, seigneur, je vous en conjure.

— En vérité, si ce personnage prétendu a si vite disparu, cela n’annonce pas qu’il ait l’intention de nous attendre; et s’il fuit, ce n’est pas une raison pour nous de fuir.

— Veille sur nous, saint Hospice! dit Spiagudry, qui, dans toutes les occasions périlleuses, se souvenait de son patron favori.

— Vous aurez pris, ajouta Ordener, l’ombre mouvante d’une chouette effrayée pour un homme.

— J’ai pourtant bien cru voir un petit homme; il est vrai que le clair de lune produit souvent des illusions singulières. C’est à cette lumière que Baldan, sire de Merneugh, prit le rideau blanc de son lit pour l’ombre de sa mère; ce qui le décida à aller, le lendemain, déclarer son parricide aux juges de Christiania, qui allaient condamner le page innocent de la défunte. Ainsi, l’on peut dire que le clair de lune a sauvé la vie à ce page.

Personne n’oubliait mieux que Spiagudry le présent dans le passé. Un souvenir de sa vaste mémoire suffisait pour bannir toutes les impressions du moment. Aussi l’histoire de Baldan dissipa-t-elle sa frayeur. Il reprit d’une voix tranquille:

— Il est possible que le clair de lune m’ait trompé de même.

Cependant ils atteignaient le sommet du Cou-de-Vautour, et commençaient à revoir le faîte des ruines, que la courbure du rocher leur avait cachées pendant qu’ils montaient.

Que le lecteur ne s’étonne pas si nous rencontrons souvent des ruines à la cime des monts de Norvège. Quiconque a parcouru des montagnes en Europe n’aura pas manqué de remarquer fréquemment des restes de forts et de châteaux, suspendus à la crête des pics les plus élevés, comme d’anciens nids de vautours ou des aires d’aigles morts. En Norvège surtout, au siècle où nous nous sommes transportés, ces sortes de constructions aériennes étonnaient autant par leur variété que par leur nombre. C’étaient tantôt de longues murailles démantelées, se roulant en ceinture autour d’un roc; tantôt des tourelles grêles et aiguës surmontant la pointe d’un pic, comme une couronne; ou, sur la tête blanche d’une haute montagne, de grosses tours groupées autour d’un grand donjon, et présentant de loin l’aspect d’une vieille tiare. On voyait près des frêles arcades ogives d’un cloître gothique, les lourds piliers égyptiens d’une église saxonne; près de la citadelle à tours carrées d’un chef païen, la forteresse à créneaux d’un sire chrétien; près d’un château-fort ruiné par le temps, un monastère détruit par la guerre. Tous ces édifices, mélange d’architectures singulières et presque ignorées aujourd’hui, construits hardiment sur des lieux en apparence inaccessibles, n’y avaient plus laissé que des débris, pour rendre en quelque sorte à la fois témoignage de la puissance et du néant de l’homme. Peut-être s’était-il passé dans leur enceinte bien des choses plus dignes d’être racontées que tout ce qu’on raconte à la terre; mais les événements s’écoulent, les yeux qui les ont vus se ferment; les traditions s’éteignent avec les ans, comme un feu qu’on n’a point recueilli; et qui pourrait ensuite pénétrer le secret des siècles?

Le manoir de Vermund le Proscrit, où nos deux voyageurs arrivaient en ce moment, était un de ceux auxquels la superstition rattachait le plus d’histoires surprenantes et d’aventures miraculeuses. À ces murailles de cailloux noyés dans un ciment devenu plus dur que la pierre, on reconnaissait aisément qu’il avait été bâti vers le cinquième ou le sixième siècle. De ses cinq tours, une seulement était encore debout dans toute sa hauteur; les quatre autres, plus ou moins dégradées, et couvrant de leurs débris le sommet du rocher, étaient liées entre elles par des lignes de ruines, lesquelles indiquaient également les anciennes limites des cours dans l’enceinte du château. Il était très difficile de pénétrer dans cette enceinte, obstruée de pierres, de quartiers de rochers, et d’arbustes de toute espèce, qui, rampant de ruine en ruine, surmontaient de leurs touffes les murailles tombées, ou laissaient pendre jusque dans le précipice leurs longs bras flexibles. C’est à ces tresses de rameaux que venaient souvent, disait-on, se balancer, au clair de lune, des âmes bleuâtres, esprits coupables de ceux qui s’étaient volontairement noyés dans le Sparbo, ou que le farfadet du lac attachait le nuage qui devait le remmener au lever du soleil. Mystères effrayants, dont avaient été plus d’une fois témoins de hardis pêcheurs, quand, pour profiter du sommeil des chiens de mer, [Footnote: Les chiens de mer sont redoutés des pêcheurs, parce qu’ils effraient les poissons.] ils osaient la nuit pousser leur barque jusque sous le rocher d’Oëlmoe, qui s’arrondissait dans l’ombre, au-dessus de leur tête, comme l’arche rompue d’un pont gigantesque.

Nos deux aventuriers franchirent, non sans peine, la muraille du manoir, à travers une crevasse, car l’ancienne porte était encombrée de ruines. La seule tour qui, ainsi que nous l’avons dit, fût restée debout, était située à l’extrémité du rocher. C’était, dit Spiagudry à Ordener, celle du sommet de laquelle on apercevait le fanal de Munckholm. Ils s’y dirigèrent, quoique l’obscurité fût en ce moment complète. La lune était entièrement cachée par un gros nuage noir. Ils allaient gravir la brèche d’un autre mur, pour pénétrer dans ce qui avait été la seconde cour du château, quand Benignus s’arrêta tout court, et saisit brusquement le bras d’Ordener, d’une main qui tremblait si fort, que le jeune homme lui-même en était ébranlé.

— Quoi donc?… dit Ordener surpris.

Benignus, sans répondre, pressa son bras plus vivement encore, comme pour lui demander du silence.

— Mais…. reprit le jeune homme.

Une nouvelle pression, accompagnée d’un gros soupir mal étouffé, le décida à attendre patiemment que ce nouvel effroi fût passé.

Enfin Spiagudry, d’une voix oppressée:

— Eh bien! maître, qu’en dites-vous?

— De quoi? dit Ordener.

— Oui, seigneur, continua l’autre du même ton, vous vous repentez bien maintenant d’être monté ici!

— Non, en vérité, mon brave guide, j’espère bien monter plus haut encore. Pourquoi voulez-vous que je m’en repente?

— Comment, seigneur, vous n’avez donc point vu?…

— Vu! quoi?

— Vous n’avez point vu! répéta l’honnête concierge, avec un accès toujours croissant de terreur.

— Mais non vraiment! répondit Ordener d’un ton d’impatience; je n’ai rien vu, et je n’ai entendu que le bruit de vos dents que la peur faisait claquer violemment.

— Quoi! là, derrière ce mur, dans l’ombre, ces deux yeux flamboyants comme des comètes, qui se sont fixés sur nous. Vous ne les avez point vus?

— En honneur, non.

— Vous ne les avez point vus errer, monter, descendre et disparaître enfin dans les ruines?

— Je ne sais ce que vous voulez dire. Qu’importe, d’ailleurs?

— Comment! seigneur Ordener, savez-vous qu’il n’y a en Norvège qu’un seul homme dont les yeux rayonnent ainsi dans les ténèbres?

— Allons, qu’importe encore! Quel est donc cet homme aux yeux de chat? Est-ce Han, votre formidable islandais? Tant mieux, s’il est ici! cela nous épargnera le voyage de Walderhog.

Ce tant mieux n’était point du goût de Spiagudry, qui ne put s’empêcher de révéler sa pensée secrète par cette exclamation involontaire:

— Ah! seigneur, vous m’aviez promis de me laisser au village de Surb, à un mille du lieu du combat.

Le bon et noble Ordener comprit et sourit.

— Vous avez raison, vieillard; il serait injuste de vous mêler à mes dangers. Ne craignez donc rien. Vous voyez ce Han d’Islande partout. Est-ce qu’il ne peut pas y avoir dans ces ruines quelque chat sauvage, dont les yeux soient aussi brillants que ceux de cet homme!

Pour la cinquième fois, Spiagudry parvint à se rassurer, soit que l’explication d’Ordener lui parût en effet naturelle, soit que la tranquillité de son jeune compagnon eût quelque chose de contagieux.

— Ah! seigneur, sans vous je serais dix fois mort de peur en gravissant ces roches. — Il est vrai que, sans vous, je ne l’aurais pas tenté.

La lune, qui reparut, leur laissa voir l’entrée de la plus haute tour, au bas de laquelle ils étaient parvenus. Ils y pénétrèrent en soulevant un épais rideau de lierre, qui fit pleuvoir sur eux des lézards endormis et de vieux nids d’oiseaux funèbres. Le concierge ramassa deux cailloux qu’il choqua, en laissant tomber les étincelles sur un tas de feuilles mortes et de branches sèches recueillies par Ordener. En peu d’instants une flamme claire s’éleva; et, dissipant les ténèbres qui les entouraient, elle leur permit d’observer l’intérieur de la tour.

Il n’en restait plus que la muraille circulaire, qui était très épaisse et revêtue de lierre et de mousse. Les plafonds de ses quatre étages s’étaient successivement écroulés au rez-de-chaussée, où ils formaient un amas énorme de décombres. Un escalier étroit et sans rampe, rompu en plusieurs endroits, tournait en spirale sur la surface intérieure de la muraille, au sommet de laquelle il aboutissait. Aux premiers pétillements du feu, une nuée de chats-huants et d’orfraies s’envolèrent lourdement, avec des cris étonnés et lugubres, et de grandes chauves-souris vinrent par intervalles effleurer la flamme de leurs ailes couleur de cendre.

— Voici des hôtes qui ne nous reçoivent pas très gaiement, dit Ordener; mais n’allez pas vous effrayer encore.

— Moi, seigneur, reprit Spiagudry, en s’asseyant près du feu, moi craindre un hibou ou une chauve-souris! Je vivais avec des cadavres, et je ne craignais pas les vampires. Ah! je ne redoute que les vivants! Je ne suis pas brave, j’en conviens; mais je ne suis pas superstitieux. — Tenez, si vous m’en croyez, seigneur, rions de ces dames aux ailes noires et aux chants rauques, et songeons à souper.

Ordener ne songeait qu’à Munckholm.

— J’ai bien là quelques provisions, dit Spiagudry en tirant son havre-sac de dessous son manteau; mais, si votre appétit égale le mien, ce pain noir et ce fromage rance auront bientôt disparu. Je vois que nous serons obligés de rester encore fort loin des limites de la loi du roi français Philippe le Bel: Nemo audeat comedere praeter duo fercula cum potagio. Il doit bien y avoir au sommet de cette tour des nids de mouettes ou de faisans; mais comment y arriver par un escalier branlant qui ne pourrait tout au plus porter que des sylphes?

— Cependant, reprit Ordener, il faudra bien qu’il me porte; car je monterai certainement au faîte de cette tour.

— Quoi! maître, pour avoir des nids de mouettes?

— Ne faites pas, de grâce, cette imprudence. Il ne faut pas se tuer pour mieux souper. Songez d’ailleurs que vous pourriez vous tromper, et prendre des nids de chats-huants.

— C’est bien de vos nids que je m’embarrasse! Ne m’avez-vous pas dit que du haut de cette tour on apercevait le donjon de Munckholm?

— Cela est vrai, jeune maître; au sud. Je vois bien que le désir de fixer ce point important pour la science géographique a été le motif de ce fatigant voyage au château de Vermund. Mais daignez réfléchir, noble seigneur Ordener, que le devoir d’un savant zélé peut être quelquefois de braver la fatigue, mais jamais le danger. Je vous en supplie, ne tentez pas cette méchante ruine d’escalier sur laquelle un corbeau n’oserait se percher.

Benignus ne se souciait nullement de rester seul dans le bas de la tour. Comme il se levait pour prendre la main d’Ordener, son havre-sac, placé sur les pointes de ses genoux, tomba dans les pierres et rendit un son clair.

— Qu’est-ce donc qui résonne ainsi dans ce havre-sac? demanda Ordener.

Cette question sur un point si délicat pour Spiagudry, lui ôta l’envie de retenir son jeune compagnon.

— Allons, dit-il sans répondre à la question, puisque, malgré mes prières, vous vous obstinez à monter au haut de cette tour, prenez garde aux crevasses de l’escalier.

— Mais, reprit Ordener, qu’y a-t-il donc dans votre havre-sac, pour lui faire rendre, ce son métallique?

Cette insistance indiscrète déplut souverainement au vieux gardien qui maudit le questionneur du fond de l’âme.

— Eh! noble maître, répondit-il, comment pouvez-vous vous occuper d’un méchant plat à barbe de fer, qui retentit contre un caillou? — Puisque je ne puis vous fléchir, se hâta-t-il d’ajouter, ne tardez pas à redescendre, et ayez soin de vous tenir aux lierres qui tapissent la muraille. Vous verrez le fanal de Munckholm entre les deux Escabelles de Frigge, au midi.

Spiagudry n’aurait rien pu dire de plus adroit pour bannir toute autre idée de l’esprit du jeune homme. Ordener, se débarrassant de son manteau, s’élança vers l’escalier, sur lequel le concierge le suivit des yeux, jusqu’à ce qu’il ne le vît plus que glisser, comme une ombre vague, au plus haut de la muraille, à peine éclairée à son sommet par la lueur agitée du foyer et le reflet immobile de la lune.

Alors, se rasseyant et ramassant son havre-sac:

— Mon cher Benignus Spiagudry, dit-il, pendant que ce jeune lynx ne vous voit pas et que vous êtes seul, hâtez-vous de briser l’incommode enveloppe de fer qui vous empêche de prendre possession, oculis et manu, du trésor renfermé sans doute dans cette cassette. Quand il sera délivré de cette prison, il sera moins lourd à porter et plus aisé à cacher.

Déjà, armé d’une grosse pierre, il s’apprêtait à briser le couvercle du coffre, quand un rayon de lumière tombant sur le sceau de fer qui le fermait, arrêta tout à coup le concierge antiquaire.

— Par saint Willebrod le Numismate, je ne me trompe pas, s’écriait-il en frottant vivement le couvercle rouillé, ce sont bien là les armes de Griffenfeld. J’allais faire une grande folie de rompre ce sceau. Voilà peut-être le seul modèle qui reste de ces armoiries fameuses, brisées en 1676 par la main du bourreau. Diable! ne touchons pas à ce couvercle. Quelle que soit la valeur des objets qu’il cache, à moins que, contre toute probabilité, ce ne soient des monnaies de Palmyre ou des médailles carthaginoises, il est certainement plus précieux encore. Me voici donc seul propriétaire des armes maintenant abolies de Griffenfeld! Cachons soigneusement ce trésor. — Aussi bien je trouverai peut-être quelque secret pour ouvrir la cassette, sans commettre de vandalisme. Les armoiries de Griffenfeld! Oh oui! voilà bien la main de justice, la balance sur champ de gueules. Quel bonheur!

À chaque nouvelle découverte héraldique qu'il faisait en dérouillant le vieux cachet, il poussait un cri d'admiration ou une exclamation de contentement.

— Au moyen d'un dissolvant, j'ouvrirai la serrure sans briser le sceau. Ce sont sans doute les trésors de l'ex-chancelier. — Si quelqu'un, tenté par l'appât des quatre écus syndicaux, me reconnaît et m'arrête, il ne me sera pas difficile de me racheter. — Ainsi, cette bienheureuse cassette m'aura sauvé.

En parlant ainsi, son regard se leva machinalement.

— Tout à coup son visage grotesque passa en un clin d'oeil de l'expression d'une joie folle à celle d'une terreur stupide. Tous ses membres tremblèrent convulsivement. Ses yeux devinrent fixes, son front se rida, sa bouche demeura béante, et sa voix s'éteignit dans son gosier, comme une lumière qu'on souffle.

En face de lui, de l'autre côté du foyer, un petit homme était debout, les bras croisés. À ses vêtements de peaux ensanglantées, à sa hache de pierre, à sa barbe rousse, et à ce regard dévorant fixé sur lui, le malheureux concierge avait reconnu du premier coup d'oeil l'effrayant personnage dont il avait reçu la dernière visite au Spladgest de Drontheim.

— C'est moi! dit le petit homme d'un air terrible.

— Cette cassette t'aura sauvé, ajouta-t-il avec un affreux sourire ironique. Spiagudry! est-ce ici le chemin de Thoctree?

L'infortuné essaya d'articuler quelques paroles.

— Thoctree!… Seigneur… Mon seigneur maître… j'y allais…

— Tu allais à Walderhog, répondit l'autre d'une voix de tonnerre.

Spiagudry terrifié ramassa toutes ses forces pour faire un signe de tête négatif.

— Tu me conduisais un ennemi; merci! ce sera un vivant de moins. Ne crains rien, fidèle guide, il te suivra.

Le malheureux gardien voulut pousser un cri et put à peine faire entendre un murmure vague et confus.

— Pourquoi t'effraies-tu de ma présence? Tu me cherchais. — Écoute, ne crie pas, ou tu es mort.

Le petit homme agita sa hache de pierre au-dessus de la tête du concierge; il poursuivit, d’une voix qui sortait de sa poitrine comme le bruit d’un torrent sort d’une caverne:

— Tu m’as trahi.

— Non, votre grâce, non, excellence… dit enfin Benignus pouvant à peine articuler ces paroles suppliantes. L’autre fit entendre comme un rugissement sourd.

— Ah! tu voudrais me tromper encore! Ne l’espère plus. — Écoute, j’étais sur le toit du Spladgest quand tu as scellé ton pacte avec cet insensé; c’est moi dont tu as deux fois entendu la voix. C’est moi que tu as encore entendu dans l’orage sur la route; c’est moi que tu as retrouvé dans la tour de Vygla; c’est moi qui t’ai dit: Au revoir!

Le concierge épouvanté jeta un regard égaré autour de lui, comme pour appeler du secours. Le petit homme continua:

— Je ne voulais pas laisser échapper ces soldats qui te poursuivaient.

Ils étaient du régiment de Munckholm.

— Pour toi, je ne pouvais te perdre. — Spiagudry, c’est moi que tu as revu au village d’Oëlmoe sous ce feutre de mineur; c’est moi dont tu as entendu les pas et la voix, dont tu as reconnu les yeux en montant à ces ruines; c’est moi!

Hélas! l’infortuné n’en était que trop convaincu; il se roula à terre, aux pieds de son formidable juge, en s’écriant d’une voix déchirante et étouffée: — Grâce!

Le petit homme, les bras toujours croisés, attachait sur lui un regard de sang, plus ardent que la flamme du foyer.

— Demande ton salut à cette cassette dont tu l’attends, dit-il ironiquement.

— Grâce, seigneur! Grâce! répéta le mourant Spiagudry.

— Je t’avais recommandé d’être fidèle et muet, tu n’as pu être fidèle; à l’avenir je te proteste que tu seras muet.

Le concierge, entrevoyant l’horrible sens de ces paroles, poussa un long gémissement.

— Ne crains rien, dit l’homme, je ne te séparerai pas de ton trésor.

À ces mots, dénouant sa ceinture de cuir, il la passa dans l’anneau de la cassette, et la suspendit ainsi au cou de Spiagudry, qui fléchissait sous le poids.

— Allons! reprit l’autre, quel est le diable auquel tu désires donner ton âme? Hâte-toi de l’appeler, afin qu’un autre démon dont tu ne te soucierais pas ne s’en empare point avant lui.

Le désespéré vieillard, hors d’état de prononcer une parole, tomba aux genoux du petit homme, en faisant mille signes de prière et d’épouvante.

— Non, non! dit celui-ci; écoute, fidèle Spiagudry, ne te désole pas de laisser ainsi ton jeune compagnon sans guide. Je te promets qu’il ira où tu vas. Suis-moi, tu ne fais que lui montrer le chemin. — Allons!

À ces mots, saisissant le misérable dans ses bras de fer, il l’emporta hors de la tour comme un tigre emporte une longue couleuvre; et un moment après il s’éleva dans les ruines un grand cri, auquel se mêla un effroyable éclat de rire.

XXIII

Oui, l’on peut bien montrer à l’oeil éploré de l’amant fidèle l’objet éloigné de son idolâtrie. Mais, hélas! les scènes de l’attente, des adieux, les pensées, les souvenirs doux et amers, les rêves enchanteurs des êtres qui aiment! qui peut les rendre?

MATURIN. Bertram.

Cependant l’aventureux Ordener, après avoir vingt fois failli tomber dans sa périlleuse ascension, était parvenu sur le haut du mur épais et circulaire de la tour. À son arrivée inattendue, de noires chouettes centenaires, brusquement troublées dans leurs ruines, s’enfuirent d’un vol oblique, en tournant vers lui leur regard fixe, et des pierres roulantes, heurtées par son pied, tombèrent dans le gouffre en bondissant sur les saillies des rochers avec des bruits sourds et lointains.

En tout autre instant, Ordener eût longtemps laissé errer sa vue et sa rêverie sur la profondeur de l’abîme, accrue de la profondeur de la nuit. Son oeil, observant à l’horizon toutes ces grandes ombres, dont une lune nébuleuse blanchissait à peine les sombres contours, eût longtemps cherché à distinguer les vapeurs parmi les rochers et les montagnes parmi les nuages; son imagination eût animé toutes les formes gigantesques, toutes les apparences fantastiques que le clair de lune prête aux monts et aux brouillards. Il eût écouté de loin la plainte confuse du lac et des forêts, mêlée au sifflement aigu des herbes sèches que le vent tourmentait à ses pieds, entre les fentes des pierres; et son esprit eût donné un langage à toutes ces voix mortes que la nature matérielle élève pendant le sommeil de l’homme et le silence de la nuit. Mais, quoique cette scène agît à son insu sur son être entier, d’autres pensées le remplissaient. À peine son pied s’était-il posé sur le faîte de la muraille, que son oeil s’était tourné vers le sud du ciel, et qu’une joie indicible l’avait transporté en apercevant, au delà de l’angle de deux montagnes, un point lumineux rayonner à l’horizon comme une étoile rouge. — C’était le fanal de Munckholm.

Ceux-là ne sont pas destinés à goûter les vraies joies de la vie, qui ne comprendront pas le bonheur qu’éprouva le jeune homme. Tout son coeur se souleva de ravissement; son sein gonflé, palpitant avec force, respirait à peine. Immobile, l’oeil tendu, il contemplait l’astre de consolation et d’espérance. Il lui semblait que ce rayon de lumière, venant au sein de la nuit du séjour qui contenait toute sa félicité, lui apportait quelque chose de son Éthel. Ah! n'en doutons pas, à travers les temps et les espaces, les âmes ont quelquefois des correspondances mystérieuses. En vain le monde réel élève ses barrières entre deux êtres qui s'aiment; habitants de la vie idéale, ils s'apparaissent dans l'absence, ils s'unissent dans la mort. Que peuvent en effet les séparations corporelles, les distances physiques sur deux coeurs liés invinciblement par une même pensée et un commun désir? — Le véritable amour peut souffrir, mais non mourir.

Qui ne s'est point arrêté cent fois durant les nuits pluvieuses sous quelque fenêtre à peine éclairée? Qui n'a point passé et repassé devant une porte, erré avec délices autour d'une maison? Qui ne s'est point brusquement retourné de son chemin pour suivre, le soir, dans les détours d'une rue déserte, une robe flottante, un voile blanc tout à coup reconnu dans l'ombre? Celui qui ne connaît pas ces émotions peut dire qu'il n'a jamais aimé.

En présence du fanal lointain de Munckholm, Ordener méditait. À sa première joie avait succédé un contentement triste et ironique; mille sentiments divers se pressaient dans son âme tumultueuse. — Oui, se disait-il, il faut que l'homme gravisse longtemps et péniblement pour voir enfin un point de bonheur dans l'immense nuit. — Elle est donc là! elle dort, elle rêve, elle pense à moi, peut-être! — Mais qui lui dira que son Ordener est maintenant, triste et isolé, suspendu dans l'ombre au-dessus d'un abîme? son Ordener, qui n'a plus d'elle qu'une boucle de cheveux sur son sein, et une lueur vague à l'horizon! — Puis, laissant tomber un coup d'oeil sur les rayons rougeâtres du grand feu allumé dans la tour, qui s'échappaient au dehors à travers les crevasses de la muraille:

— Peut-être, murmura-t-il, de l'une des fenêtres de sa prison, jette-t-elle un regard indifférent sur la flamme lointaine de ce foyer.

Tout à coup un grand cri et un long éclat de rire se firent entendre, comme au-dessous de lui, sur le bord de l'abîme; il se détourna brusquement, et vit l'intérieur de la tour désert. Alors, inquiet pour le vieillard, il se hâta de descendre; mais à peine avait-il franchi quelques marches de l'escalier, qu'un bruit sourd, pareil à celui d'un corps pesant qui serait tombé dans les eaux profondes du lac, monta jusqu'à lui.

XXIV

Le comte don Sancho Diaz, seigneur de Saldana, répandait d’amères larmes dans sa prison.
Plein de désespoir, il exhalait, ses plaintes dans la solitude contre le roi Alphonse.

«O tristes moments, où mes cheveux blancs me rappellent combien d’années j’ai déjà passées dans cette prison horrible!»

Romances espagnoles.

Le soleil se couchait; ses rayons horizontaux dessinaient sur la simarre de laine de Schumacker et sur la robe de crêpe d’Éthel, l’ombre noire des barreaux de leur fenêtre. Tous deux étaient assis près de la haute croisée en ogive, le vieillard sur un grand fauteuil gothique, la jeune fille sur un tabouret, à ses pieds. Le prisonnier paraissait rêver dans sa position favorite et mélancolique. Son front chauve et ridé était appuyé sur ses mains et l’on ne voyait de son visage que sa barbe blanche qui pendait en désordre sur sa poitrine.

— Mon père, dit Éthel qui cherchait tous les moyens de le distraire, mon seigneur et père, j’ai fait cette nuit un songe d’heureux avenir. — Voyez, levez les yeux, mon noble père, regardez ce beau ciel.

— Je ne vois le ciel, répondit le vieillard, qu’à travers les barreaux de ma prison, comme je ne vois votre avenir, Éthel, qu’à travers mes malheurs.

Puis sa tête, un moment soulevée, retomba sur ses mains, et tous deux se turent.

— Mon seigneur et père, reprit la jeune fille un moment après et d’une voix timide, est-ce au seigneur Ordener que vous pensez?

— Ordener, dit le vieillard, comme cherchant à se rappeler de qui on lui parlait. — Ah! je sais qui vous voulez dire. Eh bien?

— Pensez-vous qu’il revienne bientôt, mon père? il y a longtemps déjà qu’il est parti. Voici le quatrième jour.

Le vieillard secoua tristement la tête.

— Je crois que, lorsque nous aurons compté la quatrième année depuis son départ, nous serons aussi près de son retour qu’aujourd’hui.

Éthel pâlit.

— Dieu! croyez-vous donc qu’il ne reviendra pas? Schumacker ne répondit point. La jeune fille répéta sa question avec un accent suppliant et inquiet.

— N’a-t-il donc pas promis qu’il reviendrait? dit brusquement le prisonnier.

— Oui, sans doute, seigneur! reprit Éthel empressée.

— Eh bien! comment pouvez-vous compter sur son retour? n’est-ce pas un homme? Je crois que le vautour pourra retourner au cadavre, mais je ne crois pas au retour du printemps dans l’année qui décline.

Éthel, voyant son père retomber dans ses mélancolies, se rassura; il y avait dans son coeur de vierge et d’enfant une voix qui démentait impérieusement la philosophie chagrine du vieillard.

— Mon père, dit-elle avec fermeté, le seigneur Ordener reviendra; ce n’est pas un homme comme les autres hommes.

— Qu’en savez-vous, jeune fille?

— Ce que vous en savez vous-même, mon seigneur et père.

— Je ne sais rien, dit le vieillard. J’ai entendu des paroles d’un homme qui annonçaient des actions d’un dieu.

Puis il ajouta, avec un rire amer:

— J’ai réfléchi sur cela, et j’ai vu que c’était trop beau pour y croire.

— Et moi, seigneur, j’y ai cru, précisément parce que c’était beau.

— Oh! jeune fille, si vous étiez ce que vous deviez être, comtesse de Tongsberg et princesse de Wollin, entourée, comme vous le seriez, d’une cour de beaux traîtres et d’adorateurs intéressés, cette crédulité serait d’un grand danger pour vous.

— Mon père et seigneur, ce n’est pas crédulité, c’est confiance.

— On s’aperçoit aisément, Éthel, qu’il y a du sang français dans vos veines.

Cette idée ramena le vieillard, par une transition imperceptible, à des souvenirs, et il continua avec une sorte de complaisance:

— Car ceux qui ont dégradé votre père plus qu’il n’avait été élevé, ne pourront empêcher que vous ne soyez fille de Charlotte, princesse de Tarente, et que l’une de vos aïeules ne soit Adèle ou Édèle, comtesse de Flandre, dont vous portez le nom.

Éthel pensait à toute autre chose.

— Mon père, vous jugez mal le noble Ordener.

— Noble, ma fille! quel sens donnez-vous à ce mot? J’ai fait des nobles qui ont été bien vils.

— Je ne veux point dire, seigneur, qu'il soit noble de la noblesse qui se donne.

— Est-ce donc que vous savez qu'il descend d'un jarl ou d'un hersa? [Footnote: Les anciens seigneurs en Norvège, avant que Griffenfeld fondât une noblesse régulière, portaient les titres de hersa (baron), ou jarl (comte). C'est de ce dernier mot qu'est formé le mot anglais earl (comte).]

— Je l'ignore comme vous, mon père. Il est peut-être, poursuivit-elle en baissant les yeux, le fils d'un serf ou d'un vassal. Hélas! on peint des couronnes et des lyres sur le velours d'un marchepied. Je veux dire seulement d'après vous, mon vénéré seigneur, qu'il est noble de coeur.

De tous les hommes qu'elle avait vus, Ordener était celui qu'Éthel connaissait le plus et le moins tout ensemble. Il était apparu dans sa destinée, pour ainsi dire, comme ces anges qui visitaient les premiers hommes, en s'enveloppant à la fois de clartés et de mystères. Leur seule présence révélait leur nature, et l'on adorait. Ainsi Ordener avait laissé voir à Éthel ce que les hommes cachent le plus, son coeur; il avait gardé le silence sur ce dont ils se vantent assez volontiers, sa patrie et sa famille; son regard avait suffi à Éthel, et elle avait eu foi en ses paroles. Elle l'aimait, elle lui avait donné sa vie, elle n'ignorait rien de son âme, et ne savait pas son nom.

— Noble de coeur! répéta le vieillard, noble de coeur! Cette noblesse est au-dessus de celle que donnent les rois; c'est Dieu qui la donne. Il la prodigue moins qu'eux.

Ici le prisonnier leva les yeux vers ses armoiries brisées, en ajoutant:

— Et il ne la reprend jamais.

— Aussi, mon père, dit la jeune fille, celui qui garde l'une se console-t-il aisément d'avoir perdu l'autre.

Cette parole fit tressaillir le père et lui rendit son courage. Il reprit d'une voix ferme:

— Vous avez raison, jeune fille. Mais vous ne savez pas que la disgrâce jugée injuste par le monde est quelquefois justifiée par notre intime conscience. Telle est notre misérable nature; une fois malheureux, il s'élève en nous-mêmes, pour nous reprocher des fautes et des erreurs, une foule de voix qui dormaient dans la prospérité.

— Ne parlez pas ainsi, mon illustre père, dit Éthel, profondément émue; car, à la voix altérée du vieillard, elle sentait qu'il avait laissé échapper le secret de l’une de ses douleurs. Elle leva ses yeux sur lui, et, baisant sa main froide et ridée, elle reprit doucement:

— Vous jugez bien sévèrement deux hommes nobles, le seigneur Ordener et vous, mon vénéré père.

— Vous décidez légèrement, Éthel. On dirait que vous ne savez pas que la vie est une chose grave.

— Ai-je donc mal fait, seigneur, de rendre justice au généreux Ordener?

Schumacker fronça le sourcil d’un air mécontent.

— Je ne puis vous approuver, ma fille, d’attacher ainsi votre admiration à un inconnu, que vous ne reverrez jamais sans doute.

— Oh! dit la jeune fille, sur laquelle ces paroles glacées tombaient comme un poids, ne croyez pas cela. Nous le reverrons. N’est-ce pas pour vous qu’il va affronter ce danger?

— Je me suis comme vous, je l’avoue, laissé prendre d’abord à ses promesses. Mais non, il n’ira pas, et alors il ne reviendra pas vers nous.

— Il ira, seigneur, il ira!

Le ton dont la jeune fille prononça ces mots était presque celui de l’offense. Elle se sentait outragée dans son Ordener. Hélas! elle était trop sûre dans son âme de ce qu’elle affirmait!

Le prisonnier reprit, sans paraître ému:

— Eh bien! s’il va combattre ce brigand, s’il se dévoue à ce danger, il en sera de même; il ne reviendra pas.

Pauvre Éthel! — combien une parole dite avec indifférence peut quelquefois froisser douloureusement la plaie secrète d’un coeur inquiet et déchiré! Elle baissa son visage pâle, pour dérober au regard froid de son père deux larmes qui s’échappaient malgré elle de ses paupières gonflées.

— O mon père! murmura-t-elle, au moment où vous parlez ainsi, peut-être ce noble infortuné meurt-il pour vous!

Le vieux ministre secoua la tête en signe de doute.

— Je ne le crois pas plus que je ne le désire; et d’ailleurs, où serait mon crime? J’aurais été ingrat envers ce jeune homme, comme tant d’autres l’ont été envers moi.

Un soupir profond fut la seule réponse d’Éthel; et Schumacker, se penchant vers son bureau, continua de déchirer d’un air distrait quelques feuillets des Vies des Hommes illustres de Plutarque, dont le volume, déjà lacéré en vingt endroits, et surchargé de notes, était devant lui.

Un moment après, le bruit de la porte qui s'ouvrait se fit entendre, et Schumacker, sans se détourner, cria sa défense habituelle: — Qu'on n'entre pas! laissez-moi; je ne veux pas qu'on entre.

— C'est son excellence le gouverneur, répondit la voix de l'huissier.

En effet, un vieillard, revêtu d'un grand habit de général, portant à son cou les colliers de l'éléphant, de dannebrog et de la toison d'or, s'avança vers Schumacker, qui se leva à demi, en répétant entre ses dents:

— Le gouverneur! le gouverneur! — Le général salua avec respect Éthel, qui, debout près de son père, le considérait d'un air inquiet et craintif.

Peut-être, avant d'aller plus loin, n'est-il pas inutile de rappeler en quelques mots les motifs de cette visite du général Levin à Munckholm. Le lecteur n'a pas oublié les fâcheuses nouvelles qui tourmentaient le vieux gouverneur, au chapitre XX de cette véritable histoire. En les recevant, la nécessité d'interroger Schumacker s'était d'abord présentée à l'esprit du général; mais il n'avait pu s'y décider sans, une extrême répugnance. L'idée d'aller tourmenter un infortuné prisonnier, déjà livré à tant de tourments, et qu'il avait vu si puissant, de scruter sévèrement les secrets du malheur, même coupable, déplaisait à son âme bonne et généreuse. Cependant le service du roi l'exigeait; il ne devait pas quitter Drontheim sans emporter les nouvelles lueurs qui pouvaient jaillir de l'interrogatoire de l'auteur apparent de l'insurrection des mineurs. C'était donc le soir qui devait précéder son départ qu'après un entretien long et confidentiel avec la comtesse d'Ahlefeld, le gouverneur s'était résigné à voir le captif. En se rendant au château, l'idée des intérêts de l'état, du parti que ses nombreux ennemis personnels pourraient tirer de ce qu'on nommerait sa négligence, et peut-être aussi d'astucieuses paroles de la grande-chancelière, avaient fermenté dans sa tête et l'avaient ramené à la fermeté. Il était donc monté au donjon du Lion de Slesvig avec des projets de sévérité; il se promettait d'être avec le conspirateur Schumacker comme s'il n'avait jamais connu le chancelier Griffenfeld, de dépouiller tous ses souvenirs et jusqu'à son caractère, et de parler en juge inflexible à cet ancien confrère de faveur et de puissance.

Cependant, à peine entré dans l'appartement de l'ex-chancelier, le visage, vénérable, quoique morose, du vieillard l'avait frappé; la figure douce, quoique fière, d'Éthel l'avait attendri; et le premier aspect des deux prisonniers avait déjà dissipé la moitié de sa sévérité.

Il s’avança vers le ministre tombé, et lui tendit involontairement la main en disant, sans s’apercevoir que l’autre ne répondait pas à sa politesse:

— Salut, comte de Griffenf… — C’était la surprise d’une vieille habitude. Il se reprit précipitamment:

— Seigneur Schumacker! — Puis il s’arrêta, tout satisfait et tout épuisé d’un tel effort.

Il se fit une pause. Le général cherchait dans sa tête quelles paroles assez sévères pourraient dignement répondre à la dureté de ce début.

— Eh bien, dit enfin Schumacker, vous êtes le gouverneur du Drontheimhus?

Le général, un peu surpris de se voir questionné par celui qu’il venait interroger, fit un signe affirmatif.

— En ce cas, reprit le prisonnier, j’ai une plainte à vous faire.

— Une plainte! laquelle? laquelle? et le visage du noble Levin prenait une expression d’intérêt.

Schumacker continua d’un air d’humeur:

— Un ordre du vice-roi prescrit qu’on me laisse libre et tranquille dans ce donjon.

— Je connais cet ordre.

— Seigneur gouverneur, on se permet pourtant de m’importuner et de pénétrer dans ma prison.

— Qui donc? s’écria le général; nommez-moi celui qui ose…

— Vous, seigneur gouverneur.

Ces paroles, prononcées d’un ton hautain, blessèrent le général. Il répondit d’une voix presque irritée:

— Vous oubliez que mon pouvoir, lorsqu’il s’agit de servir le roi, ne connaît point de limites.

— Si ce n’est, dit Schumacker, celles du respect qu’on doit au malheur. Mais les hommes ne savent pas cela.

L’ex-grand-chancelier parlait ainsi, comme s’il se fût parlé à lui-même. Il fut entendu du gouverneur.

— Si vraiment, si vraiment! J’ai eu tort, comte de Griff…. seigneur Schumacker, veux-je dire; je devais vous laisser la colère, puisque j’ai la puissance.

Schumacker se tut un instant.

— Il y a, reprit-il pensif, dans votre visage et dans votre voix, seigneur gouverneur, quelque chose d’un homme que j’ai connu jadis. Il y a bien longtemps. Il n’y a que moi qui me souvienne de ce temps-là. C’était dans ma prospérité. C’était un certain Levin de Knud, du Mecklembourg. Avez-vous connu ce fou?

— Je l’ai connu, répliqua le général sans s’émouvoir.

— Ah! vous vous le rappelez. Je croyais qu’on ne se souvenait des hommes que dans l’adversité.

— N’était-ce pas un capitaine de la milice royale? poursuivit le gouverneur.

— Oui, un simple capitaine, bien que le roi l’aimât beaucoup. Mais il ne songeait qu’aux plaisirs et ne montrait pas d’ambition. C’était une tête singulièrement extravagante. Conçoit-on une pareille modération de désirs dans un favori?

— Mais cela peut se concevoir.

— Je l’aimais assez, ce Levin de Knud, parce qu’il ne m’inquiétait pas. Il était l’ami du roi comme d’un autre homme. On eût dit qu’il ne l’aimait que pour son plaisir particulier, et nullement pour sa fortune.

Le général voulut interrompre Schumacker; mais celui-ci continua avec quelque opiniâtreté, soit par esprit de contrariété, soit que le souvenir réveillé en lui lui plût en effet:

— Puisque vous avez connu ce capitaine Levin, seigneur gouverneur, vous savez sans doute qu’il eut un fils, lequel même est mort tout jeune. Mais vous souvenez-vous de ce qui se passa à la naissance de ce fils?

— Je me souviens bien plus de ce qui se passa à sa mort, dit le général, en cachant ses yeux de sa main et d’une voix altérée.

— Mais, poursuivit l’indifférent Schumacker, c’est un fait connu de peu de personnes, et qui vous peindra toute la bizarrerie de ce Levin. Le roi voulait tenir l’enfant sur les fonts de baptême; croiriez-vous que Levin refusa? Il fit bien plus encore; il choisit pour le parrain de son fils un vieux mendiant qui se traînait aux portes du palais. Je n’ai jamais pu comprendre le motif d’un pareil acte de démence.

— Je vais vous le dire, répondit le général. En choisissant un protecteur à l’âme de son fils, ce capitaine Levin pensait sans doute qu’un pauvre est plus puissant auprès de Dieu qu’un roi.

Schumacker réfléchit un instant et dit:

— Vous avez raison.

Le gouverneur voulut encore ramener la conversation au but de sa visite. Mais Schumacker l’arrêta.

— De grâce, s’il est vrai que ce Levin du Mecklembourg ne vous soit pas inconnu, laissez-moi parler de lui. De tous les hommes que j’ai vus dans mes temps de grandeur, c’est le seul dont le souvenir ne m’apporte ni dégoût ni horreur. S’il poussait la singularité jusqu’à la folie, il n’en était pas moins, par ses nobles qualités, un homme tel qu’il y en a bien peu.

— Je ne pense pas de même. Ce Levin n’avait rien de plus que les autres hommes. Il y en a beaucoup même qui valent mieux que lui.

Schumacker croisa les bras, en levant les yeux au ciel.

— Oui, voilà bien comme ils sont tous! On ne peut louer devant eux un homme digne de louange, qu’ils ne cherchent aussitôt à le noircir. Ils empoisonnent jusqu’au plaisir de louer justement. Il est cependant assez rare.

— Si vous me connaissiez, vous ne m’accuseriez pas de noirceur envers le gén… — c’est-à-dire, le capitaine Levin.

— Laissez-moi, laissez-moi, dit le prisonnier, pour la loyauté et la générosité il n’y a jamais eu deux hommes comme ce Levin de Knud, et dire le contraire, c’est à la fois le calomnier et louer démesurément cette exécrable race humaine!

— Je vous assure, reprit le gouverneur, cherchant à calmer la colère de Schumacker, que je n’ai eu contre Levin de Knud aucune intention perfide.

— Ne dites pas cela. Bien qu’il fût insensé, tous les hommes sont loin de lui ressembler. Ils sont faux, ingrats, envieux, calomniateurs. Savez-vous que Levin de Knud donnait aux hôpitaux de Copenhague plus de la moitié de son revenu?

— J’ignorais que vous en fussiez instruit.

— C’est cela! s’écria le vieillard d’un air triomphant. Il espérait pouvoir le flétrir en toute sûreté, dans la confiance que j’ignorais les bonnes actions de ce pauvre Levin!

— Mais non, mais non!

— Pensez-vous que je ne sais pas encore qu’il fit donner le régiment que le roi lui destinait, à un officier qui l’avait blessé en duel, lui, Levin de Knud, parce que, disait-il, l’autre était plus ancien que lui?

— Je croyais cependant cette action secrète.

— Dites-moi donc, seigneur gouverneur du Drontheimhus, est-ce que pour cela elle en est moins belle? Parce que Levin cachait ses vertus, est-ce une raison pour les nier? Oh! que les hommes sont bien les mêmes! Oser confondre avec eux le noble Levin, lui qui, n’ayant pu sauver un soldat convaincu d'avoir voulu l'assassiner, fit une pension à la veuve de son meurtrier!

— Eh! qui n'en eût pas fait autant? Ici Schumacker éclata.

— Qui? vous! moi! tous les hommes, seigneur gouverneur! Parce que vous portez le brillant costume de général et des plaques d'honneur sur votre poitrine, croyez-vous donc à votre mérite? Vous êtes général, et le malheureux Levin sera mort capitaine. Il est vrai que c'était un fou, et qu'il ne songeait pas à son avancement.

— S'il n'y a point songé lui-même, la bonté du roi y a songé pour lui.

— La bonté? dites la justice! si pourtant on peut dire la justice d'un roi. Eh bien! quelle insigne récompense lui a-t-on donnée?

— Sa majesté a payé Levin de Knud bien au delà de son mérite.

— À merveille! s'écria le vieux ministre en frappant des mains. Un loyal capitaine vient peut-être, après trente ans de service, d'être nommé major, et cette haute faveur vous porte ombrage, noble général? Un proverbe persan a raison de dire que le soleil couchant est jaloux de la lune qui se lève.

Schumacker était tellement irrité que le général put à peine faire entendre ces paroles: — Si vous m'interrompez sans cesse… vous m'empêchez de vous expliquer…

— Non, non! poursuivit l'autre, j'avais cru, seigneur général, saisir, au premier abord, quelques traits de ressemblance entre vous et le bon Levin; mais, allez! il n'en existe aucun.

— Mais, écoutez-moi…

— Vous écouter! pour que vous me disiez que Levin de Knud est indigne de quelque misérable récompense!

— Je vous jure que ce n'est pas…

— Vous en viendriez bientôt, je vous devine, vous autres hommes, à me soutenir qu'il est, comme vous tous, fourbe, hypocrite, méchant.

— En vérité, non.

— Que sais-je? peut-être qu'il a trahi un ami, persécuté un bienfaiteur, comme vous l'avez tous fait? — ou empoisonné son père, ou assassiné sa mère?

— Vous êtes dans une erreur… — Je suis loin de vouloir…

— Savez-vous que ce fut lui qui détermina le vice-chancelier Wind, ainsi que Scheel, Vinding et le justicier Lasson, trois de mes juges, à ne point opiner pour la peine de mort? Et vous voulez que je vous entende, de sang-froid, le calomnier! Oui, c’est ainsi qu’il a agi envers moi, et pourtant je lui avais toujours fait plutôt du mal que du bien; car je suis semblable à vous, vil et méchant.

Le noble Levin éprouvait, durant cet étrange entretien, une émotion singulière. Objet à la fois des outrages les plus directs et de la louange la plus sincère, il ne savait quelle contenance faire à d’aussi rudes compliments, à tant de flatteuses injures. Il était choqué et attendri. Tantôt il voulait s’emporter, tantôt remercier Schumacker. Présent et inconnu, il aimait à voir le farouche Schumacker défendre en lui, et contre lui, un ami et un absent; seulement, il eût voulu que son avocat mît un peu moins d’amertume et d’âcreté dans son panégyrique. Mais, au fond de l’âme, les éloges furieux donnés au capitaine Levin le touchaient plus que les injures adressées au gouverneur de Drontheim ne le blessaient. Attachant sur le favori disgracié son regard bienveillant, il prit le parti de lui laisser exhaler son indignation et sa reconnaissance. Celui-ci enfin, après une longue déclamation contre l’ingratitude humaine, tomba épuisé sur son fauteuil, dans les bras de la tremblante Éthel, en disant d’une voix douloureuse: — O hommes! que vous ai-je donc fait pour vous être fait connaître à moi?

Le général n’avait pas encore pu arriver au sujet important de sa descente à Munckholm. Toute sa répugnance à tourmenter le captif d’un interrogatoire lui était revenue; à sa pitié et à son attendrissement se joignaient deux raisons assez fortes; l’état d’agitation où était tombé Schumacker ne laissait pas espérer qu’il pût répondre d’une façon satisfaisante; et d’ailleurs, en envisageant l’affaire en elle-même, il ne semblait pas au confiant Levin qu’un pareil homme pût être un conspirateur. Néanmoins, comment partir de Drontheim sans avoir interrogé Schumacker? Cette nécessité fâcheuse de sa position de gouverneur vainquit une fois encore toutes ses hésitations, et ce fut ainsi qu’il commença, en adoucissant le plus possible l’accent de sa voix:

— Veuillez calmer un peu votre agitation, comte Schumacker.

C’était d’inspiration que le bon gouverneur avait trouvé cette qualification, comme pour concilier le respect dû au jugement de dégradation avec les égards réclamés par le malheur du dégradé, en unissant son titre nobiliaire à son nom roturier. Il continua:

— C’est un devoir pénible pour moi que de venir….

— Avant tout, interrompit le prisonnier, permettez-moi, seigneur gouverneur, de vous reparler d’une chose qui m’intéresse beaucoup plus que tout ce que votre excellence peut avoir à me dire. Vous m'avez assuré tout à l'heure qu'on avait récompensé ce fou de Levin de ses services. Je désirerais vivement savoir comment.

— Sa majesté, seigneur de Griffenfeld, a élevé Levin au rang de général, et depuis plus de vingt ans ce fou vieillit paisiblement, honoré de cette dignité militaire et de la bienveillance de son roi.

Schumacker baissa la tête:

— Oui, ce fou de Levin, auquel il importait si peu de vieillir capitaine, mourra général, et le sage Schumacker, qui comptait mourir grand-chancelier, vieillit prisonnier d'état.

En parlant ainsi, le captif couvrit son visage de ses mains, et de longs soupirs s'échappaient de sa vieille poitrine. Éthel, qui ne comprenait de l'entretien que ce qui attristait son père, chercha sur-le-champ à le distraire.

— Mon père, voyez donc là-bas, au nord, on voit briller une lumière que je n'ai pas remarquée les soirées précédentes.

En effet, la nuit, qui était tout à fait tombée, faisait ressortir à l'horizon une lumière faible et lointaine, qui semblait partir du sommet de quelque montagne éloignée. Mais l'oeil et l'esprit de Schumacker ne se dirigeaient pas incessamment comme ceux d'Éthel vers le nord; aussi ne répondit-il point. Le général seul fut frappé de l'observation de la jeune fille. — C'est peut-être, se dit-il en lui-même, un feu allumé par les révoltés; et cette idée lui rappelant avec force le but de sa présence, il adressa la parole au prisonnier:

— Seigneur Griffenfeld, je suis fâché de vous tourmenter; mais il faut que vous subissiez….

— J'entends, seigneur gouverneur, ce n'est pas assez de passer mes jours dans ce donjon, de vivre flétri et abandonné, de n'avoir plus à moi que des souvenirs amers de grandeur et de puissance; il faut encore que vous violiez ma solitude pour scruter mes douleurs et jouir de mon infortune. Puisque ce noble Levin de Knud, que plusieurs traits extérieurs de votre personne m'ont rappelé, est général comme vous, il eût été trop heureux pour moi qu'on lui donnât le poste que vous occupez; car ce n'est pas lui, je vous jure, seigneur gouverneur, qui fût venu tourmenter un infortuné dans sa prison.

Durant le cours de cet entretien bizarre, le général avait été plus d'une fois sur le point de se nommer afin de le faire cesser. Ce reproche indirect de Schumacker lui en ôta le pouvoir. Il s'accordait si bien avec ses sentiments intérieurs, qu’il lui inspira comme un sentiment de honte de lui-même. Il essaya néanmoins de répondre à la supposition accablante de Schumacker. Chose étrange! par la seule différence de leur caractère, ces deux hommes avaient changé réciproquement de position. Le juge était en quelque sorte réduit à se justifier devant l’accusé.

— Mais, dit le général, si le devoir l’y eût contraint, ne doutez pas que Levin de Knud….

— J’en doute, noble gouverneur! s’écria Schumacker; ne doutez pas vous-même qu’il n’eût rejeté, avec toute la généreuse indignation de son âme, l’emploi d’épier et d’accroître les tortures d’un malheureux captif! Allez, je le connais mieux que vous; en aucun cas il n’eût accepté les fonctions de bourreau. Maintenant, seigneur général, je vous écoute. Faites ce que vous appelez votre devoir. Que veut de moi votre excellence?

Et le vieux ministre attachait son regard fier sur le gouverneur. Toute la résolution de celui-ci était tombée. Ses premières répugnances s’étaient réveillées, et réveillées invincibles.

— Il a raison, se disait-il en lui-même; venir tourmenter un malheureux sur de simples soupçons! Qu’on en charge un autre que moi!

L’effet de ces réflexions fut prompt; il s’avança vers Schumacker étonné et lui serra la main. Puis, sortant précipitamment:

— Comte Schumacker, dit-il, conservez toujours la même estime à Levin de Knud.

XXV

LE LION.
Hoh!
THÉSÉE.
Bien rugi, lion!

SHAKESPEARE, le Songe d’été.

Le voyageur qui parcourt de nos jours les montagnes couvertes de neige dont le lac de Smiasen est entouré comme d’une ceinture blanche, ne trouve plus aucun vestige de ce que les norvégiens du dix-septième siècle appelaient la ruine d’Arbar. On n’a jamais pu savoir de quelle construction humaine, de quel genre d’édifice, provenait cette ruine, si l’on peut lui donner ce nom. En sortant de la forêt qui couvre la partie méridionale du lac, après avoir gravi une pente semée çà et là de pans de murs et de restes de tours, on arrive à une ouverture voûtée qui perce le flanc du mont. Cette ouverture, aujourd’hui entièrement obstruée par les éboulements de terre, était l’entrée d’une espèce de galerie creusée à vif dans le roc, laquelle traversait la montagne de part en part. Cette galerie, éclairée faiblement par des soupiraux coniques, pratiqués dans sa voûte de distance en distance, aboutissait à une sorte de salle oblongue et ovale, creusée à moitié dans la roche et terminée en une espèce de maçonnerie cyclopéenne. Autour de cette salle on observait, dans des niches profondes, des figures de granit grossièrement travaillées. Quelques-uns de ces simulacres mystérieux, tombés de leurs piédestaux, gisaient pêle-mêle sur les dalles, avec d’autres décombres informes couverts d’herbes et de mousses, à travers lesquels serpentaient le lézard, l’araignée, et tous les insectes hideux qui naissent de la terre et des ruines.

Le jour ne pénétrait dans ce lieu que par une porte opposée à la bouche de la galerie. Cette porte avait, vue d’un certain côté, la forme ogive, mais grossière, sans âge et sans date, et évidemment donnée à l’architecte par le hasard. On aurait pu donner à cette porte, bien qu’elle fût de plain-pied, le nom de fenêtre, car elle s’ouvrait sur un précipice immense; et l’on ne comprenait pas où pouvaient conduire trois ou quatre marches d’escalier suspendues sur l’abîme en dehors et au-dessous de cette singulière issue.

Cette salle était l’intérieur d’une espèce de tourelle gigantesque qui, de loin, vue du côté du précipice, semblait un des pitons de la montagne. Cette tourelle était isolée, et, comme on l’a déjà dit, nul ne savait à quel édifice elle avait appartenu. On apercevait seulement au-dessus, sur un plateau inaccessible au plus hardi chasseur, une masse qu’on pouvait prendre, à cause de l’éloignement, pour une roche courbée ou pour le débris d’une arcade colossale. — Cette tourelle et cette arcade écroulée étaient connues des paysans sous le nom de ruines d’Arbar. On ne savait pas plus l’origine du nom que l’origine du monument.

C’est sur une pierre située au milieu de cette salle elliptique, qu’un petit homme, vêtu de peaux de bêtes, et que nous avons déjà eu occasion de rencontrer plusieurs fois dans le cours de cet ouvrage, est assis. Il tourne le dos au jour, ou plutôt au vague crépuscule qui pénètre dans la sombre tourelle pendant le soleil éclatant de midi. Cette lueur, la plus forte qui puisse éclairer naturellement l’intérieur de la tourelle, ne suffit pas pour qu’on puisse distinguer de quelle nature est l’objet vers lequel le petit homme se tient courbé. On entend quelques gémissements sourds, et l’on pourrait juger qu’ils partent de ce corps, aux mouvements faibles qu’il semble faire de tout temps. Quelquefois le petit homme se redresse, et il porte à ses lèvres une sorte de coupe, dont la forme paraît être celle d’un crâne humain, pleine d’une liqueur fumante dont on ne peut voir la couleur, et qu’il savoure à longs traits.

Tout à coup il se lève brusquement.

— On marche dans la galerie, je crois; est-ce déjà le chancelier des deux royaumes?

Ces paroles sont suivies d’un éclat de rire horrible, qui se termine en rugissement sauvage, auquel répond soudain un hurlement parti de la galerie.

— Oh! oh! reprend l’hôte de la ruine d’Arbar, ce n’est pas un homme; mais c’est toujours un ennemi; c’est un loup.

En effet, un grand loup sort subitement de dessous la voûte de la galerie, s’arrête un moment, puis s’approche obliquement vers l’homme, le ventre à terre et fixant sur lui des yeux ardents qui étincellent dans l’ombre. Celui-ci, toujours debout et les bras croisés, le regarde.

— Ah! c’est le vieux loup au poil gris! le plus vieux loup des forêts du Smiasen. — Bonjour, loup; tes yeux brillent; tu es affamé, et l’odeur des cadavres t’attire. — Tu attireras aussi bientôt les loups affamés.

— Sois le bienvenu, loup de Smiasen; j’ai toujours eu envie de te rencontrer. Tu es si vieux qu’on dit que tu ne peux mourir. — On ne le dira plus demain.

L’animal répondit par un hurlement affreux, fit un soubresaut en arrière et s’élança d’un bond sur le petit homme.

Celui-ci ne recula point d’un pas. Aussi prompt que l’éclair, de son bras droit il étreignit le ventre du loup, qui, debout en face de lui, avait jeté ses deux pattes de devant sur ses épaules; de la main gauche, il garantit son visage de la gueule béante de son ennemi, en lui saisissant le gosier avec une telle force, que l’animal, contraint de lever la tête, put à peine articuler un cri de douleur.

— Loup de Smiasen, dit l’homme triomphant, tu déchires ma casaque, mais ta peau la remplacera.

Au moment où il mêlait à ces paroles de victoire quelques paroles d’un jargon bizarre, un effort convulsif du loup à l’agonie le fit trébucher contre les pierres qui parsemaient la salle. Ils tombèrent tous deux, et les rugissements de l’homme se confondirent avec les hurlements de la bête.

Obligé dans sa chute de lâcher le gosier du loup, le petit homme sentait déjà les dents tranchantes s’enfoncer dans son épaule, quand, en se roulant l’un sur l’autre, les deux combattants heurtèrent une énorme masse blanche velue qui gisait dans la partie la plus ténébreuse de la salle.

C’était un ours, qui se réveilla de son lourd sommeil en grondant.

À peine les yeux paresseux de ce nouveau personnage se furent-ils assez ouverts pour distinguer la lutte, qu’il se précipita avec fureur, non sur l’homme, mais sur le loup qui en ce moment triomphait à son tour, le saisit violemment de sa gueule par le milieu du corps, et dégagea ainsi le combattant à face humaine.

L’homme, loin de se montrer reconnaissant d’un si grand service, se releva tout ensanglanté, et, s’élançant sur l’ours, lui donna un vigoureux coup de pied dans le ventre, comme un maître à son chien lorsqu’il a commis quelque faute.

— Friend! qui est-ce qui t’appelle? De quoi te mêles-tu?

Ces mots étaient entrecoupés d’interjections furibondes et de grincements de dents.

— Va-t’en! ajouta-t-il en rugissant. L’ours, qui avait reçu à la fois un coup de pied de l’homme et un coup de dent du loup, fit entendre une sorte de murmure plaintif; puis, baissant sa lourde tête, il lâcha l’animal affamé, qui se jeta sur l’homme avec une rage nouvelle.

Pendant que la lutte continuait, l’ours rebuté retourna à la place où il dormait, s’assit gravement en laissant errer sur les deux ennemis furieux un regard indifférent, et garda le plus paisible silence, en passant alternativement chacune de ses pattes de devant sur l’extrémité de son museau blanc.

Mais le petit homme, au moment où le doyen des loups du Smiasen était revenu à la charge, avait saisi le mufle sanglant de la bête; puis, par un effort inouï de force et d’adresse, il était parvenu à emprisonner la gueule tout entière dans sa main. Le loup se débattait avec des élancements de rage et de douleur; une écume livide tombait de ses lèvres comprimées, et ses yeux, comme gonflés de colère, semblaient sortir de leur orbite. Des deux adversaires, celui dont les os étaient broyés par des dents aiguës, les chairs déchirées par des ongles brûlants, ce n’était pas l’homme, mais la bête féroce; celui dont le hurlement avait l’accent le plus sauvage, l’expression la plus farouche, ce n’était point la bête fauve, mais l’homme.

Enfin celui-ci, ramassant toutes ses forces épuisées par la longue résistance du vieux loup, serra le museau de ses deux mains avec une telle vigueur, que le sang jaillit des narines et de la gueule de l’animal; ses yeux de flamme s’éteignirent et se fermèrent à demi; il chancela et tomba inanimé aux pieds de son vainqueur. Le mouvement faible et continuel de sa queue et les tremblements convulsifs et intermittents qui couraient par tout son corps annonçaient seuls qu’il n’était pas encore tout à fait mort.

Tout à coup une dernière convulsion ébranla l’animal expirant, et les symptômes de vie cessèrent.

— Te voilà mort, loup cervier! dit le petit homme en le poussant du pied avec dédain; est-ce que tu croyais vieillir encore après m’avoir rencontré? Tu ne courras plus à pas sourds sur les neiges en suivant l’odeur et les traces de ta proie; te voilà toi-même bon pour les loups ou les vautours; tu as dévoré bien des voyageurs égarés autour du Smiasen durant ta longue vie de meurtre et de carnage; maintenant, tu es mort toi-même, tu ne mangeras plus d’hommes; c’est dommage.

Il s’arma d’une pierre tranchante, s’accroupit sur le corps chaud et palpitant du loup, rompit les jointures des membres, sépara la tête des épaules, fendit la peau dans toute sa longueur sur le ventre, la détacha comme on enlève une veste, et en un clin d’oeil le formidable loup du Smiasen n’offrit plus qu’une carcasse nue et ensanglantée. Il jeta cette dépouille sur ses épaules meurtries de morsures, en tournant au dehors le côté nu de la peau humide et tachée de longues veines de sang.

— Il faut bien, grommela-t-il entre ses dents, se vêtir de la peau des bêtes, celle de l’homme est trop mince pour préserver du froid. Pendant qu’il se parlait ainsi à lui-même, plus hideux encore sous son hideux trophée, l’ours, ennuyé sans doute de son inaction, s’était approché comme furtivement de l’autre objet couché dans l’ombre dont nous avons parlé au commencement de ce chapitre, et bientôt il s’éleva de cette partie ténébreuse de la salle un bruit de dents mêlé de soupirs d’agonie faibles et douloureux. Le petit homme se retourna.

— Friend! cria-t-il d’une voix menaçante; ah! misérable Friend! — Ici, viens ici!

Et ramassant une grosse pierre, il la jeta à la tête du monstre, qui, tout étourdi du choc, s’arracha lentement à son festin, et vint, en léchant ses lèvres rouges, tomber pantelant aux pieds du petit homme, vers lequel il élevait sa tête énorme en courbant son dos, comme pour demander grâce de son indiscrétion.

Alors, il se fit entre les deux monstres, car on peut bien donner ce nom à l’habitant de la ruine d’Arbar, un échange de grondements significatifs. Ceux de l’homme exprimaient l’empire et la colère, ceux de l’ours la prière et la soumission.

— Tiens, dit enfin l’homme, en montrant de son doigt crochu le cadavre écorché du loup, voici ta proie; laisse-moi la mienne.

L’ours, après avoir flairé le corps du loup, secoua la tête d’un air mécontent et tourna son regard vers l’homme qui paraissait son maître.

— J’entends, dit celui-ci, cela est déjà trop mort pour toi, tandis que l’autre palpite encore. — Tu es raffiné dans tes voluptés, Friend, autant qu’un homme; tu veux que ta nourriture vive encore au moment où tu la déchires; tu aimes à sentir la chair mourir sous ta dent; tu ne jouis que de ce qui souffre. Nous nous ressemblons; — car je ne suis pas homme, Friend, je suis au-dessus de cette espèce misérable, je suis une bête farouche comme toi. — Je voudrais que tu pusses parler, compagnon Friend, pour me dire si elle égale ma joie, la joie dont palpitent tes entrailles d’ours quand tu dévores des entrailles d’homme; mais non, je ne voudrais pas t’entendre parler, de peur que ta voix ne me rappelât la voix humaine. — Oui, gronde à mes pieds, de ce grondement qui fait tressaillir dans la montagne le chevrier égaré; il me plaît comme une voix amie, parce qu’il lui annonce un ennemi.

Lève, Friend, lève ta tête vers moi; lèche mes mains de cette langue qui a tant de fois bu le sang humain. — Tu as, ainsi que moi, les dents blanches; cependant ce n'est point notre faute si elles ne sont pas rouges comme une plaie nouvelle; mais le sang lave le sang. — J'ai vu plus d'une fois, du fond d'une caverne noire, les jeunes filles de Kole ou d'Oëlmoe laver leurs pieds nus dans l'eau des torrents, en chantant d'une voix douce; mais je préfère à ces voix mélodieuses et à ces figures satinées ta gueule velue et tes cris rauques; ils épouvantent l'homme.

En parlant ainsi, il s'était assis et abandonnait sa main aux caresses du monstre, qui, se roulant sur le dos à ses pieds, les lui prodiguait de mille manières, comme un épagneul qui déploie toutes ses gentillesses sur le sopha de sa maîtresse. Ce qui était encore plus étrange, c'est l'attention, intelligente avec laquelle il paraissait recueillir les paroles de son patron. Les monosyllabes bizarres dont celui-ci les entremêlait semblaient surtout compris de lui, et il manifestait cette compréhension en redressant subitement sa tête, ou en roulant quelques sons confus au fond de son gosier.

— Les hommes disent que je les fuis, reprit le petit homme, mais ce sont eux qui me fuient; ils font par crainte ce que je ferais par haine. Cependant tu sais, Friend, que je suis aise de rencontrer un homme quand j'ai faim ou soif.

Tout à coup, il aperçut dans les profondeurs de la galerie une lumière rougeâtre poindre et s'accroître par degrés, en colorant faiblement les vieux murs humides.

— En voici un justement. Quand on parle d'enfer, Satan montre sa corne. — Holà! Friend, ajouta-t-il en se tournant vers l'ours; holà, lève-toi!

L'animal se dressa sur-le-champ.

— Allons, il faut bien récompenser ton obéissance en satisfaisant ton appétit.

En parlant ainsi, l'homme se courba vers ce qui était couché à terre. On entendit comme un craquement d'os brisés par la hache; mais il ne s'y mêlait plus ni soupirs ni gémissements.

— Il paraît, murmura le petit homme, que nous ne sommes plus que deux qui vivons dans cette salle d'Arbar. — Tiens, ami Friend, achève ton festin commencé. Il jeta vers la porte extérieure dont nous avons parlé ce qu'il avait détaché de l'objet étendu à ses pieds. L'ours se précipita sur cette proie si avidement, que le coup d'oeil le plus rapide n'eût pu distinguer si ce lambeau n’avait pas en effet la forme d’un bras humain, revêtu d’un morceau d’étoffe verte de la nuance de l’uniforme des arquebusiers de Munckholm.

— Voici que l’on approche, dit le petit homme, l’oeil fixé sur la lumière qui croissait de plus en plus. — Compagnon Friend, laisse-moi seul un instant. — Hé! dehors!

Le monstre obéissant s’élança vers la porte, descendit à reculons les marches extérieures, et disparut, emportant dans sa gueule sa proie dégouttante, avec un hurlement de satisfaction.

Au même instant, un homme assez grand se présenta à l’issue de la galerie, dont les profondeurs sinueuses reflétaient encore une lumière vague. Il était enveloppé d’un long manteau brun, et portait une lanterne sourde, dont il dirigea le foyer lumineux droit au visage du petit homme.

Celui-ci, toujours assis sur sa pierre et les bras croisés, s’écria:

— Sois le mal venu, toi qui viens ici amené par une pensée et non par un instinct!

Mais l’étranger, sans répondre, paraissait le considérer attentivement.

— Regarde-moi, poursuivit-il en dressant la tête, tu n’auras peut-être pas dans une heure un souffle de voix pour te vanter de m’avoir vu. Le nouveau venu, en promenant sa lumière sur toute la personne du petit homme, paraissait plus surpris encore qu’effrayé.

— Eh bien, de quoi t’étonnes-tu? reprit le petit homme avec un rire pareil au bruit d’un crâne qu’on brise; j’ai des bras et des jambes ainsi que toi. Seulement mes membres ne seront pas, ainsi que les tiens, la pâture des chatpards et des corbeaux.

L’étranger répondit enfin d’une voix basse, quoique assurée, et comme s’il craignait seulement d’être entendu du dehors.

— Écoutez, je ne viens pas en ennemi, mais en ami.

L’autre l’interrompit:

— Pourquoi alors n’as-tu pas dépouillé ta forme d’homme?

— Mon intention est de vous rendre service, si vous êtes celui que je cherche.

— C’est-à-dire de tirer un service de moi. Homme, tu perds tes pas. Je ne sais rendre de service qu’à ceux qui sont las de la vie.

— À vos paroles, répondit l’étranger, je vous reconnais, bien pour l’homme qu’il me faut; mais votre taille… Han d’Islande est un géant; ce ne peut être vous.

— C’est la première fois qu’on en doute devant moi.

— Quoi! ce serait vous! — Et l’étranger se rapprochait du petit homme. — Mais on dit que Han d’Islande est d’une stature colossale?

— Ajoute ma renommée à ma taille, et tu me verras plus haut que l’Hécla.

— Vraiment! Répondez-moi, je vous prie; vous êtes bien Han, natif de Klipstadur, en Islande?

— Ce n’est point avec des paroles que je réponds à cette question, dit le petit homme en se levant; et le regard qu’il lança sur l’imprudent étranger le fit reculer de trois pas.

— Bornez-vous, de grâce, à la résoudre avec ce regard, répondit-il d’une voix presque suppliante et en jetant vers le seuil de la galerie un coup d’oeil où se peignait le regret de l’avoir franchi. Ce sont vos seuls intérêts qui me conduisent ici.

En entrant dans la salle, le nouveau-venu, n’ayant fait qu’entrevoir celui qu’il abordait, avait pu conserver quelque sang-froid; mais quand l’hôte d’Arbar se fut levé, avec son visage de tigre, ses membres ramassés, ses épaules sanglantes, à peine couvertes d’une peau encore fraîche, ses grandes mains armées d’ongles, et son regard flamboyant, l’aventureux étranger avait frémi, comme un voyageur ignorant, qui croit caresser une anguille et se sent piquer par une vipère.

— Mes intérêts? reprit le monstre. Viens-tu donc me donner avis qu’il y a quelque source à empoisonner, quelque village à incendier, ou quelque arquebusier de Munckholm à égorger?

— Peut-être. — Écoutez. Les mineurs de Norvège se révoltent. Vous savez combien de désastres amène une révolte.

— Oui, le meurtre, le viol, le sacrilège, l’incendie, le pillage.

— Je vous offre tout cela. Le petit homme se mit à rire.

— Je n’ai pas besoin que tu me l’offres pour le prendre.

Le ricanement féroce qui accompagnait ces paroles fit de nouveau tressaillir l’étranger. Il continua néanmoins:

— Je vous propose, au nom des mineurs, le commandement de l’insurrection.

Le petit homme resta un moment silencieux. Tout à coup sa physionomie sombre prit une expression de malice infernale.

— Est-ce bien en leur nom que tu me le proposes? dit-il.

Cette question sembla déconcerter le nouveau-venu; mais, sûr d’être inconnu de son redoutable interlocuteur, il se remit aisément.

— Pourquoi les mineurs se révoltent-ils? demanda celui-ci.

— Pour s’affranchir des charges de la tutelle royale.

— N’est-ce que pour cela? repartit l’autre avec le même ton railleur.

— Ils veulent aussi délivrer le prisonnier de Munckholm.

— Est-ce là le seul but de ce mouvement? répéta le petit homme avec cet accent qui déconcertait l’étranger.

— Je n’en connais point d’autre, balbutia ce dernier.

— Ah! tu n’en connais point d’autre! Ces paroles étaient prononcées du même ton ironique. L’étranger, pour dissiper l’embarras qu’elles lui causaient, s’empressa de tirer de dessous son manteau une grosse bourse qu’il jeta aux pieds du monstre.

— Voici les honoraires de votre commandement. Le petit homme repoussa le sac du pied.

— Je n’en veux pas. Crois-tu donc que si j’avais envie de ton or ou de ton sang, j’attendrais ta permission pour me satisfaire?

L’étranger fit un geste de surprise et presque d’effroi.

— C’était un présent dont les mineurs royaux m’avaient chargé pour vous.

— Je n’en veux pas, te dis-je. L’or ne me sert à rien. Les hommes vendent bien leur âme, mais ils ne vendent pas leur vie. On est forcé de la prendre.

— J’annoncerai donc aux chefs des mineurs que le redoutable Han d’Islande se borne à accepter leur commandement?

— Je ne l’accepte pas.

Ces mots, prononcés d’une voix brève, parurent frapper très désagréablement le prétendu envoyé des mineurs révoltés.

— Comment? dit-il,

— Non! répéta l’autre.

— Vous refusez de prendre part à une expédition qui vous présente tant d’avantages?

— Je puis bien piller les fermes, dévaster les hameaux, massacrer les paysans ou les soldats, tout seul.

— Mais songez qu’en acceptant l’offre des mineurs l’impunité vous est assurée.

— Est-ce encore au nom des mineurs que tu me promets l’impunité? demanda l’autre en riant.

— Je ne vous dissimulerai pas, répondit l’étranger d’un air mystérieux, que c’est au nom d’un puissant personnage qui s’intéresse à l’insurrection.

— Et ce puissant personnage, lui-même, est-il sûr de n’être pas pendu?

— Si vous le connaissiez, vous ne secoueriez pas ainsi la tête.

— Ah! — Eh bien! quel est-il donc?

— C’est ce que je ne puis vous dire.

Le petit homme s’avança, et frappa sur l’épaule de l’étranger, toujours avec le même rire sardonique.

— Veux-tu que je te le dise, moi?

Un mouvement échappa à l’homme au manteau; c’était à la fois de l’épouvante et de l’orgueil blessé. Il ne s’attendait pas plus à la brusque interpellation du monstre qu’à sa sauvage familiarité.

— Je me joue de toi, continua ce dernier. Tu ne sais pas que je sais tout. Ce puissant personnage, c’est le grand-chancelier de Danemark et de Norvège, et le grand-chancelier de Danemark et de Norvège, c’est toi.

C’était lui en effet. Arrivé à la ruine d’Arbar, vers laquelle nous l’avons laissé voyageant avec Musdoemon, il avait voulu ne s’en remettre qu’à lui-même du soin de séduire le brigand, dont il était loin de se croire connu et attendu. Jamais, par la suite, le comte d’Ahlefeld, malgré toute sa finesse et toute sa puissance, ne put découvrir par quel moyen Han d’Islande avait été si bien informé. Était-ce une trahison de Musdoemon? C’était Musdoemon, il est vrai, qui avait insinué au noble comte l’idée de se présenter en personne au brigand; mais quel intérêt pouvait-il tirer de cette perfidie? Le brigand avait-il saisi sur quelqu’une de ses victimes des papiers relatifs aux projets du grand-chancelier? Mais Frédéric d’Ahlefeld était, avec Musdoemon, le seul être vivant instruit du plan de son père, et, tout frivole qu’il était, il n’était pas assez insensé pour compromettre un pareil secret. D’ailleurs, il était en garnison à Munckholm, du moins le grand-chancelier le croyait. Ceux qui liront la suite de cette scène, sans être, plus que le comte d’Ahlefeld, à même de résoudre le problème, verront quelle probabilité on pouvait asseoir sur cette dernière hypothèse.

Une des qualités les plus éminentes du comte d’Ahlefeld, c’était la présence d’esprit. Quand il s’entendit si rudement nommer par le petit homme, il ne put réprimer un cri de surprise; mais en un clin d’oeil sa physionomie pâle et hautaine passa de l’expression de la crainte et de l’étonnement à celle du calme et de l’assurance.

— Eh bien, oui! dit-il, je veux être franc avec vous; je suis en effet le chancelier. Mais soyez franc aussi.

Un éclat de rire de l’autre l’interrompit.

— Est-ce que je me suis fait prier pour te dire mon nom et pour te dire le tien?

— Dites-moi avec la même sincérité comment vous avez su qui j’étais.

— Ne t’a-t-on donc pas dit que Han d’Islande voit à travers les montagnes?

Le comte voulut insister.

— Voyez en moi un ami.

— Ta main, comte d’Ahlefeld! dit le petit homme brutalement. Puis il regarda le ministre en face et s’écria: — Si nos deux âmes s’envolaient de nos corps en ce moment, je crois que Satan hésiterait avant de décider laquelle des deux est celle du monstre.

Le hautain seigneur se mordit les lèvres; mais, placé entre la crainte du brigand et la nécessité d’en faire son instrument, il ne manifesta pas son mécontentement.

— Ne vous jouez pas de vos intérêts; acceptez la direction de l’insurrection, et confiez-vous à ma reconnaissance.

— Chancelier de Norvège; tu comptes sur le succès de tes entreprises, comme une vieille femme qui songe à la robe qu’elle va se filer avec du chanvre dérobé, tandis que la griffe du chat embrouille sa quenouille.

— Encore une fois, réfléchissez avant de rejeter mes offres.

— Encore une fois, moi, brigand, je te dis à toi, grand-chancelier des deux royaumes: non!

— J’attendais une autre réponse, après l’éminent service que vous m’avez déjà rendu.

— Quel service? demanda le brigand.

— N’est-ce point par vous que le capitaine Dispolsen a été assassiné? répondit le chancelier.

— Cela se peut, comte d’Ahlefeld; je ne le connais pas. Quel est cet homme dont tu me parles?

— Quoi! est-ce que ce ne serait point dans vos mains par hasard que serait tombé le coffret de fer dont il était porteur?

Cette question parut fixer les souvenirs du brigand.

— Attendez, dit-il, je me rappelle en effet cet homme et sa cassette de fer. C’était aux grèves d’Urchtal.

— Du moins, reprit le chancelier, si vous pouviez me remettre cette cassette, ma reconnaissance serait sans bornes. Dites-moi, qu’est devenue cette cassette? car elle est en votre pouvoir.

Le noble ministre insistait si vivement sur cette demande que le brigand en parut frappé.

— Cette boîte de fer est donc d’une bien haute importance pour ta grâce, chancelier de Norvège?

— Oui.

— Quelle sera ma récompense si je te dis où tu la trouveras?

— Tout ce que vous pouvez désirer, mon cher Han d’Islande.

— Eh bien! je ne te le dirai pas.

— Allons, vous riez! Songez au service que vous me rendrez.

— J’y songe précisément.

— Je vous assurerai une fortune immense, je demanderai votre grâce au roi.

— Demande-moi plutôt la tienne, dit le brigand. Écoute-moi, grand-chancelier de Danemark et de Norvège, les tigres ne dévorent pas les hyènes. Je vais te laisser sortir vivant de ma présence, parce que tu es un méchant et que chaque instant de ta vie, chaque pensée de ton âme, enfante un malheur pour les hommes et un crime pour toi. Mais ne reviens plus, car je t’apprendrais que ma haine n’épargne personne, pas même les scélérats. Quant à ton capitaine, ne te flatte pas que ce soit pour toi que je l’ai assassiné; c’est son uniforme qui l’a condamné, ainsi que cet autre misérable, que je n’ai pas non plus égorgé pour te rendre service, je t’assure.

En parlant ainsi, il avait saisi le bras du noble comte et l’avait entraîné vers le corps couché dans l’ombre. Au moment où il achevait ses protestations, la lumière de la lanterne sourde tomba sur cet objet. C’était un cadavre déchiré et revêtu en effet d’un habit d’officier des arquebusiers de Munckholm. Le chancelier s’approcha avec un sentiment d’horreur. Tout à coup son regard s’arrêta sur le visage blême et sanglant du mort. Cette bouche bleue et entr’ouverte, ces cheveux hérissés, ces joues livides, ces yeux éteints, ne l’empêchèrent pas de le reconnaître. Il poussa un cri effrayant:

— Ciel! Frédéric! mon fils!

Qu’on n’en doute pas, les coeurs en apparence les plus desséchés et les plus endurcis recèlent toujours dans leur dernier repli quelque affection ignorée d’eux-mêmes, qui semble se cacher parmi des passions et des vices, comme un témoin mystérieux et un vengeur futur. On dirait qu’elle est là pour faire un jour connaître au crime la douleur. Elle attend son heure en silence. L’homme pervers la porte dans son sein et ne la sent pas, parce qu’aucune des afflictions ordinaires n’est assez forte pour pénétrer l’écorce épaisse d’égoïsme et de méchanceté dont elle est enveloppée; mais qu’une des rares et véritables douleurs de la vie se présente inattendue, elle plonge dans le gouffre de cette âme comme un glaive, et en touche le fond. Alors l’affection inconnue se dévoile, à l’infortuné méchant, d’autant plus violente qu’elle était plus ignorée, d’autant plus douloureuse qu’elle était moins sensible, parce que l’aiguillon du malheur a dû remuer le coeur bien plus profondément pour l’atteindre. La nature se réveille et se déchaîne; elle livre le misérable à des désolations inaccoutumées, à des supplices inouïs; il éprouve réunies en un instant toutes les souffrances dont il s’était joué durant tant d’années. Les tourments les plus opposés le déchirent à la fois. Son coeur, sur qui pèse une stupeur morne, se soulève en proie à des tortures convulsives. Il semble qu’il vienne d’entrevoir l’enfer dans sa vie, et qu’il se soit révélé à lui quelque chose de plus que le désespoir.

Le comte d’Ahlefeld aimait son fils sans le savoir. Nous disons son fils, parce qu’ignorant l’adultère de sa femme, Frédéric, l’héritier direct de son nom, avait ce titre à ses yeux. Le croyant toujours à Munckholm, il était bien loir de s’attendre à le retrouver dans la tourelle d’Arbar et à le retrouver mort! Cependant il était là, sanglant, décoloré; c’était lui, il n’en pouvait douter. On peut se figurer ce qui se passa en lui quand la certitude de l’aimer pénétra dans son âme inopinément avec la certitude de l’avoir perdu. Tous les sentiments que ces deux pages décrivent à peine fondirent sur son coeur ensemble comme des éclats de tonnerre. Foudroyé, en quelque sorte, par la surprise, l’épouvante et le désespoir, il se jeta en arrière et se tordit les bras, en répétant d’une voix lamentable:

— Mon fils! mon fils!

Le brigand se mit à rire; et ce fut une chose horrible que d’entendre ce rire se mêler aux gémissements d’un père devant le cadavre de son fils.

— Par mon aïeul Ingolphe! tu peux crier, comte d’Ahlefeld, tu ne le réveilleras pas.

Tout à coup son atroce visage se rembrunit, et il dit d’une voix sombre:

— Pleure ton fils, je venge le mien.

Un bruit de pas précipités dans la galerie l’interrompit; et au moment où il retournait la tête avec surprise, quatre hommes de haute taille, le sabre nu, s’élancèrent dans la salle; un cinquième, petit et replet, les suivait, portant une torche d’une main et une épée de l’autre. Il était enveloppé d’un manteau brun, pareil à celui du grand-chancelier.

— Seigneur! cria-t-il, nous vous avons entendu, nous accourons à votre secours.

Le lecteur a sans doute déjà reconnu Musdoemon et les quatre domestiques armés qui composaient la suite du comte.

Quand les rayons de la torche jetèrent leur lumière vive dans la salle, les cinq nouveaux-venus s’arrêtèrent frappés d’horreur; et c’était en effet un spectacle effrayant. D’un côté, les restes sanglants du loup; de l’autre, le cadavre défiguré du jeune officier; puis ce père aux yeux hagards, aux cris farouches, et près de lui l’épouvantable brigand, tournant vers les assaillants un visage hideux, où se peignait un étonnement intrépide.

En voyant ce renfort inattendu, l’idée de la vengeance s’empara du comte et le jeta du désespoir dans la rage.

— Mort à ce brigand! s’écria-t-il en tirant son épée. Il a assassiné mon fils! Mort! mort!

— Il a assassiné le seigneur Frédéric? dit Musdoemon, et la torche qu’il portait n’éclaira point la moindre altération sur son visage.

— Mort! mort! répéta le comte furieux.

Et ils s’élancèrent tous six sur le brigand. Celui-ci, surpris de cette brusque attaque, recula vers l’ouverture qui donnait sur le précipice, avec un rugissement féroce, qui annonçait plutôt la colère que la crainte.

Six épées étaient dirigées contre lui, et son regard était plus enflammé, et ses traits étaient plus menaçants qu’aucun de ceux des agresseurs. Il avait saisi sa hache de pierre, et, contraint par le nombre des assaillants à se borner à la défensive, il la faisait tourner dans sa main avec une telle rapidité, que le cercle de rotation le couvrait comme un bouclier. Une multitude d’étincelles jaillissaient avec un bruit clair de la pointe des épées, lorsqu’elles étaient heurtées par le tranchant de la hache; mais aucune lame ne touchait son corps. Toutefois, fatigué par son précédent combat avec le loup, il perdait insensiblement du terrain, et il se vit bientôt acculé à la porte ouverte sur l’abîme.

— Mes amis! cria le comte, du courage! jetons le monstre dans ce précipice.

— Avant que j'y tombe, les étoiles y tomberont, répliqua le brigand.

Cependant les agresseurs redoublèrent d'ardeur et d'audace en voyant le petit homme forcé de descendre une marche de l'escalier suspendu au-dessus du gouffre.

— Bien, poussons! reprit le grand-chancelier; il faudra bien qu'il tombe; encore un effort! — Misérable! tu as commis ton dernier crime. — Courage, compagnons!

Tandis que de sa main droite il continuait les terribles évolutions de sa hache, le brigand, sans répondre, prit de la gauche une trompe de corne suspendue à sa ceinture, et, la portant à ses lèvres, lui fit rendre à plusieurs reprises un son rauque et prolongé, auquel répondit soudain un rugissement parti de l'abîme.

Quelques instants après, au moment où le comte et ses satellites, serrant toujours le petit homme de près, s'applaudissaient de lui avoir fait descendre la seconde marche, la tête énorme d'un ours blanc parut au bout rompu de l'escalier. Frappés d'un étonnement mêlé d'effroi, les assaillants reculèrent.

L'ours acheva de gravir l'escalier lourdement en leur présentant sa gueule sanglante et ses dents acérées.

— Merci, mon brave Friend! cria le brigand.

Et profitant de la surprise des agresseurs, il se jeta sur le dos de son ours qui se mit à descendre à reculons, montrant toujours, sa tête menaçante aux ennemis de son maître.

Bientôt, revenus de leur première stupéfaction, ils purent voir l'ours, emportant le brigand hors de leur atteinte, descendre dans l'abîme, ainsi que sans doute il en était monté, en s'accrochant à de vieux troncs d'arbres et à des saillies de rochers. Ils voulurent faire rouler des quartiers de pierre sur lui; mais avant qu'ils eussent soulevé du sol une de ces vieilles masses de granit qui y dormaient depuis si longtemps, le brigand et son étrange monture avaient disparu dans une caverne.

XXVI

Non, non, ne rions plus. Voyez-vous, ce qui me paraissait si plaisanta aussi son côté sérieux, très sérieux, comme tout dans l’univers! Croyez-moi, ce mot hasard est un blasphème; rien sous le soleil n’arrive par hasard; et ne voyez-vous pas ici le but marqué par la providence?

LESSING. Émilia Galotti.

Oui, une raison profonde se dévoile souvent dans ce que les hommes nomment hasard. Il y a dans les événements comme une main mystérieuse qui leur marque, en quelque sorte, la voie et le but. On se récrie sur les caprices de la fortune, sur les bizarreries du sort, et tout à coup il sort de ce chaos des éclairs effrayants, ou des rayons merveilleux; et la sagesse humaine s’humilie devant les hautes leçons de la destinée.

Si, par exemple, quand Frédéric d’Ahlefeld étalait dans un salon somptueux, aux yeux des femmes de Copenhague, la magnificence de ses vêtements, la fatuité de son rang et la présomption de ses paroles; si quelque homme, instruit des choses de l’avenir, fût venu troubler la frivolité de ses pensées par de graves révélations; s’il lui eût dit qu’un jour ce brillant uniforme qui faisait son orgueil causerait sa perte; qu’un monstre à face humaine boirait son sang comme il buvait, lui, voluptueux insouciant, les vins de France et de Bohême; que ses cheveux, pour lesquels il n’avait pas assez d’essences et de parfums, balaieraient la poussière d’un antre de bêtes fauves; que ce bras, dont il offrait avec tant de grâce l’appui aux belles dames de Charlottenbourg, serait jeté à un ours comme un os de chevreuil à demi rongé; comment Frédéric eût-il répondu à ces lugubres prophéties? par un éclat de rire et une pirouette; et ce qu’il y a de plus effrayant, c’est que toutes les raisons humaines auraient approuvé l’insensé.

Examinons cette destinée de plus haut encore. — N’est-ce pas un mystère étrange que de voir le crime du comte et de la comtesse d’Ahlefeld retomber sur eux en châtiments? Ils ont ourdi une trame infâme contre la fille d’un captif; cette infortunée rencontre par hasard un protecteur qui juge nécessaire d’éloigner leur fils, chargé par eux d’exécuter leur abominable dessein. Ce fils, leur unique espérance, est envoyé loin du théâtre de sa séduction; et, à peine arrivé dans son nouveau séjour, un autre hasard vengeur lui fait rencontrer la mort. Ainsi c’est en voulant entraîner une jeune fille innocente et abhorrée dans le déshonneur, qu’ils ont poussé leur fils coupable et chéri dans le tombeau. C’est par leur faute que ces misérables sont devenus des malheureux.

Ah! voilà notre belle comtesse! — Pardon, madame, si je ne puis aujourd’hui profiter de l’honneur de votre visite. Je suis en affaires. Une autre fois, chère comtesse, une autrefois; mais, pour aujourd’hui, je ne vous retiens pas plus longtemps ici.

Le prince à Orsina.

Le lendemain de sa visite à Munckholm, de grand matin, le gouverneur de Drontheim ordonna qu’on attelât sa voiture de voyage, espérant partir pendant que la comtesse d’Ahlefeld dormirait encore; mais nous avons déjà dit que le sommeil de la comtesse était léger.

Le général venait de signer les dernières recommandations qu’il adressait à l’évêque, aux mains duquel le gouvernement devait être remis par intérim. Il se levait, après avoir endossé sa redingote fourrée, pour sortir, quand l’huissier annonça la noble chancelière. Ce contre-temps déconcerta le vieux soldat, accoutumé à rire devant la mitraille de cent canons, mais non devant les artifices d’une femme. Il fit néanmoins d’assez bonne grâce ses adieux à la méchante comtesse, et ne laissa percer quelque humeur sur son visage que lorsqu’il la vit se pencher vers son oreille avec cet air astucieux qui voulait seulement paraître confidentiel.

— Eh bien, noble général, que vous a-t-il dit?

— Qui? Poël? il m’a dit que la voiture allait être prête.

— Je vous parle du prisonnier de Munckholm, général.

— Ah!

— A-t-il répondu à votre interrogatoire d’une manière satisfaisante?

— Mais… oui vraiment, dame comtesse, dit le gouverneur, dont on devine l’embarras.

— Avez-vous la preuve qu’il ait trempé dans le complot des mineurs?

Une exclamation échappa à Levin.

— Noble dame, il est innocent!

Il s’arrêta tout court, car il venait d’exprimer une conviction de son coeur, et non de son esprit.

— Il est innocent! répéta la comtesse d’un air consterné, quoique incrédule; car elle tremblait qu’en effet Schumacker n’eût démontré au général cette innocence qu’il était si important aux intérêts du grand-chancelier de noircir.

Le gouverneur avait eu le temps de réfléchir; il répondit à l'insistance de la grande-chancelière d'un ton de voix qui la rassura, parce qu'il décelait le doute et le trouble:

— Innocent… — Oui, — si vous voulez…

— Si je veux, seigneur général!

Et la méchante femme éclata de rire.

Ce rire blessa le gouverneur.

— Noble comtesse, dit-il, vous permettrez que je ne rende compte de mon entretien avec l'ex-grand-chancelier qu'au vice-roi.

Alors il salua profondément, et descendit dans la cour où l'attendait sa voiture.

— Oui, se disait la comtesse d'Ahlefeld rentrée dans ses appartements, pars, chevalier errant, que ton absence nous délivre du protecteur de nos ennemis. Va, ton départ est le signal du retour de mon Frédéric.

— Je vous demande un peu, oser envoyer le plus joli cavalier de Copenhague dans ces horribles montagnes! Heureusement il ne me sera pas difficile maintenant d'obtenir son rappel.

À cette pensée, elle s'adressa à sa suivante favorite.

— Ma chère Lisbeth, vous ferez venir de Berghen deux douzaines de ces petits peignes que nos élégants portent dans leurs cheveux; vous vous informerez du nouveau roman de la fameuse Scudéry, et vous veillerez à ce qu'on lave régulièrement tous les matins dans l'eau de rosé la guenon de mon cher Frédéric.

— Quoi! ma gracieuse maîtresse, demanda Lisbeth, est-ce que le seigneur Frédéric peut revenir?

— Oui, vraiment; et, pour qu'il ait quelque plaisir à me revoir, il faut faire tout ce qu'il demande; je veux lui ménager une surprise à son retour.

Pauvre mère!

XXVIII

… Bernard suit en courant les rives de l’Arlança. Il est semblable à un lion qui sort de son antre, cherchant les chasseurs, et déterminé à les vaincre ou à mourir.

Il est parti, l’espagnol vaillant et déterminé?

C’est d’un pas rapide, une grosse lance au poing, dans laquelle il met ses espérances, que Bernard suit les ruines de l’Arlança.

Romances espagnoles.

Ordener, descendu de la tour d’où il avait aperçu le fanal de Munckholm, s’était longtemps fatigué à chercher de tous côtés son pauvre guide Benignus Spiagudry. Longtemps il l’avait appelé, et l’écho brisé des ruines avait seul répondu. Surpris, mais non effrayé de cette inconcevable disparition, il l’avait attribuée à quelque terreur panique du craintif concierge, et, après s’être généreusement reproché de l’avoir quitté quelques instants, il s’était décidé à passer la nuit sur le rocher d’Oëlmoe pour lui donner le temps de revenir. Alors il prit quelque nourriture, et s’enveloppant de son manteau, il se coucha près du foyer qui s’éteignait, déposa un baiser sur la boucle de cheveux d’Éthel, et ne tarda pas à s’endormir; car on peut dormir avec un coeur inquiet, quand la conscience est tranquille.

Au soleil levant, il était debout, mais il ne retrouva de Spiagudry que sa besace et son manteau laissés dans la tour, ce qui semblait l’indice d’une fuite très précipitée. Alors, désespérant de le revoir, du moins sur le rocher d’Oëlmoe, il se détermina à partir sans lui, car c’était le lendemain qu’il fallait atteindre Han d’Islande à Walderhog.

On a appris dans les premiers chapitres de cet ouvrage qu’Ordener s’était de bonne heure accoutumé aux fatigues d’une vie errante et aventurière. Ayant déjà plusieurs fois parcouru le nord de la Norvège, il n’avait plus besoin de guide, maintenant qu’il savait où trouver le brigand. Il dirigea donc vers le nord-ouest son voyage solitaire, dans lequel il n’eut plus de Benignus Spiagudry pour lui dire combien de quartz ou de spath renfermait chaque colline, quelle tradition s’attachait à chaque masure, et si tel ou tel déchirement du sol provenait d’un courant du déluge ou de quelque ancienne commotion volcanique.

Il marcha un jour entier à travers ces montagnes qui, partant comme des côtes, de distance en distance, de la chaîne principale dont la Norvège est traversée dans sa longueur, s'étendent en s'abaissant graduellement jusqu'à la mer, où elles se plongent; de sorte que tous les rivages de ce pays ne présentent qu'une succession de promontoires et de golfes, et tout l'intérieur des terres qu'une suite de montagnes et de vallées, disposition singulière du sol, qui a fait comparer la Norvège à la grande arête d'un poisson.

Ce n'était point une chose commode que de voyager dans ce pays. Tantôt il fallait suivre pour chemin le lit pierreux d'un torrent desséché, tantôt franchir sur des ponts tremblants de troncs d'arbres les chemins mêmes, que des torrents nés de la veille venaient de choisir pour lits.

Au reste, Ordener cheminait quelquefois des heures entières sans être averti de la présence de l'homme dans ces lieux incultes autrement que par l'apparition intermittente et alternative des ailes d'un moulin à vent au sommet d'une colline, ou par le bruit d'une forge lointaine, dont la fumée se courbait au gré de l'air comme un panache noir.

De loin en loin il rencontrait un paysan monté sur un petit cheval au poil gris, à la tête basse, moins sauvage encore que son maître, ou un marchand de pelleteries assis dans son traîneau attelé de deux rennes, derrière lequel était attachée une longue corde, dont les noeuds nombreux, en bondissant sur les pierres de la route, étaient destinés à effrayer les loups.

Si alors Ordener demandait au marchand le chemin de la grotte de Walderhog: — Marchez toujours au nord-ouest, vous trouverez le village d'Hervalyn, vous franchirez la ravine de Dodlysax, et cette nuit vous pourrez atteindre Surb, qui n'est qu'à deux milles de Walderhog. — Ainsi répondait avec indifférence le commerçant nomade, instruit seulement des noms et de la position des lieux que son métier lui faisait parcourir.

Si Ordener adressait la même question au paysan, celui-ci, imbu profondément des traditions du pays et des contes du foyer, secouait plusieurs fois la tête et arrêtait sa monture grise en disant: — Walderhog! la caverne de Walderhog! les pierres y chantent, les os y dansent, et le démon d'Islande y habite; ce n'est sans doute point à la caverne de Walderhog que votre courtoisie veut aller?

— Si vraiment, répondait Ordener.

— C'est donc que votre courtoisie a perdu sa mère, ou que le feu a brûlé sa ferme, ou que le voisin lui a volé son cochon gras?

— Non, en vérité, reprenait le jeune homme.

— Alors, c’est qu’un magicien a jeté un sort sur l’esprit de sa courtoisie.

— Bonhomme, je vous demande le chemin de Walderhog.

— C’est à cette demande que je réponds, seigneur. Adieu donc. Toujours au nord! je sais bien comment vous irez, mais j’ignore comment vous reviendrez.

Et le paysan s’éloignait avec un signe de croix.

À la triste monotonie de cette route se joignait l’incommodité d’une pluie fine et pénétrante qui avait envahi le ciel vers le milieu du jour et accroissait les difficultés du chemin. Nul oiseau n’osait se hasarder dans l’air, et Ordener, glacé sous son manteau, ne voyait voler au-dessus de sa tête que l’autour, le gerfaut ou le faucon-pêcheur, qui, au bruit de son passage, s’envolait brusquement des roseaux d’un étang avec un poisson dans ses griffes.

Il était nuit close quand le jeune voyageur, après avoir franchi le bois de trembles et de bouleaux qui est adossé à la ravine de Dodlysax, arriva à ce hameau de Surb dans lequel Spiagudry, si le lecteur se le rappelle, voulait fixer son quartier général. L’odeur de goudron et la fumée de charbon de terre avertirent Ordener qu’il approchait d’une peuplade de pêcheurs. Il s’avança vers la première hutte que l’ombre lui permit de distinguer. L’entrée, basse et étroite, en était fermée, suivant l’usage norvégien, par une grande peau de poisson transparente, colorée en ce moment par la lumière rouge et tremblante d’un foyer allumé. Il frappa sur l’encadrement de bois de la porte, en criant:

— C’est un voyageur!

— Entrez, entrez, répondit une voix de l’intérieur.

Au même instant une main officieuse leva la peau de poisson, et Ordener fut introduit dans l’habitacle conique d’un pêcheur des côtes de Norvège. C’était une sorte de tente ronde de bois et de terre, au milieu de laquelle brillait un feu où la flamme pourpre de la tourbe se mariait à la clarté blanche du sapin. Près de ce feu le pêcheur, sa femme et deux enfants vêtus de haillons étaient assis devant une table chargée d’assiettes de bois et de vases de terre. Du côté opposé, parmi des filets et des rames, deux rennes endormis étaient couchés sur un lit de feuilles et de peaux, dont le prolongement semblait destiné à recevoir le sommeil des maîtres du logis et des hôtes qu’il plairait au ciel de leur amener. Ce n’était pas du premier coup d’oeil que l’on pouvait distinguer cette disposition intérieure de la hutte, car une fumée âcre et pesante qui s'échappait avec peine par une ouverture pratiquée à la sommité du cône enveloppait tous ces objets d'un voile épais et mobile.

À peine Ordener eut-il franchi le seuil, que le pêcheur et sa femme se levèrent et lui rendirent son salut d'un air ouvert et bienveillant. Les paysans norvégiens aiment les voyageurs, autant peut-être par le sentiment de curiosité, si vif chez eux, que par leur penchant naturel à l'hospitalité.

— Seigneur, dit le pêcheur, vous devez avoir faim et froid, voici du feu pour sécher votre manteau et d'excellent rindebrod pour apaiser votre appétit. Votre courtoisie daignera ensuite nous dire qui elle est, d'où elle vient, où elle va, et quelles sont les histoires que racontent les vieilles femmes de son pays.

— Oui, seigneur, ajouta la femme, et vous pourrez joindre à ce rindebrod excellent, comme le dit mon seigneur et mari, un morceau délicieux de stock-fish salé, assaisonné d'huile de baleine. — Asseyez-vous, seigneur étranger.

— Et si votre courtoisie n'aime pas la chère de saint Usulph, [Footnote: Patron des pêcheurs.] reprit l'homme, qu'elle veuille bien prendre patience un moment, je lui réponds qu'elle mangera un quartier de chevreuil merveilleux ou au moins une aile de faisan royal. Nous attendons le retour du plus fin chasseur qui soit dans les trois provinces. N'est-il pas vrai, ma bonne Maase?

Maase, nom que le pêcheur donnait à sa femme, est un mot norvégien qui signifie mouette. La femme n'en parut nullement choquée, soit que ce fût son nom véritable, soit que ce fût un surnom de tendresse.

— Le meilleur chasseur! je le crois, certes, répondit-elle avec emphase. C'est mon frère, le fameux Kennybol! Dieu bénisse ses courses! Il est venu passer quelques jours avec nous, et vous pourrez, seigneur étranger, boire dans la même tasse que lui quelques coups de cette bonne bière. C'est un voyageur comme vous.

— Grand merci, ma brave hôtesse, dit Ordener en souriant; mais je serai forcé de me contenter de votre appétissant stock-fish et d'un morceau de ce rindebrod. Je n'aurai pas le loisir d'attendre votre frère, le fameux chasseur. Il faut que je reparte sur-le-champ.

La bonne Maase, à la fois contrariée du prompt départ de l'étranger et flattée des éloges qu'il donnait à son stock-fish et à son frère, s'écria:

— Vous êtes bien bon, seigneur. Mais comment! vous allez nous quitter si tôt?

— Il le faut.

— Vous hasarder clans ces montagnes à cette heure et par un temps semblable?

— C’est pour une affaire importante. Ces réponses du jeune homme piquaient la curiosité native de ses hôtes autant qu’elles excitaient leur étonnement.

Le pêcheur se leva et dit:

— Vous êtes chez Christophe Buldus Braall, pêcheur, du hameau de Surb.

La femme ajouta:

— Maase Kennybol est sa femme et sa servante.

Quand les paysans norvégiens voulaient demander poliment son nom à un étranger, leur usage était de lui dire le leur.

Ordener répondit:

— Et moi, je suis un voyageur qui n’est sûr ni du nom qu’il porte, ni du chemin qu’il suit.

Cette réponse singulière ne parut pas satisfaire le pêcheur Braall.

— Par la couronne de Gormon le Vieux, dit-il, je croyais qu’il n’y avait en ce moment en Norvège qu’un seul homme qui ne fût pas sûr de son nom. C’est le noble baron de Thorvick, qui va s’appeler maintenant, assure-t-on, le comte de Danneskiold, à cause de son glorieux mariage avec la fille du chancelier. C’est du moins, ma bonne Maase, la plus fraîche nouvelle que j’aie apportée de Drontheim. — Je vous félicite, seigneur étranger, de cette conformité avec le fils du vice-roi, le grand comte Guldenlew.

— Puisque votre courtoisie, ajouta la femme avec un visage enflammé de curiosité, paraît ne pouvoir rien nous dire de ce qui lui touche, ne pourrait-elle pas nous apprendre quelque chose de ce qui se passe en ce moment; par exemple, de ce fameux mariage dont mon seigneur et mari a recueilli la nouvelle?

— Oui, reprit celui-ci d’un air important, c’est ce qu’il y a de plus nouveau. Avant un mois, le fils du vice-roi épouse la fille du grand-chancelier.

— J’en doute, dit Ordener.

— Vous en doutez, seigneur! Je puis vous affirmer, moi, que la chose est sûre. Je la tiens de bonne source. Celui qui m’en a fait part l’a appris du seigneur Poël, le domestique favori du noble baron de Thorvick, c’est-à-dire du noble comte de Danneskiold. Est-ce qu’un orage aurait troublé l’eau, depuis six jours? Cette grande union serait-elle rompue?

— Je le crois, répondit le jeune homme en souriant.

— S’il en est ainsi, seigneur, j’avais tort. Il ne faut pas allumer le feu pour frire le poisson avant que le filet ne se soit refermé sur lui. Mais cette rupture est-elle certaine? de qui en tenez-vous la nouvelle?

— De personne, dit Ordener. C’est moi qui arrange cela ainsi dans ma tête.

À ces mots naïfs, le pêcheur ne put s’empêcher de déroger à la courtoisie norvégienne par un long éclat de rire.

— Mille pardons, seigneur. Mais il est aisé de voir que vous êtes en effet un voyageur, et sans doute un étranger. Vous imaginez-vous donc que les événements suivront vos caprices, et que le temps se rembrunira ou s’éclaircira selon votre volonté?

Ici, le pêcheur, versé dans les affaires nationales, comme tous les pasyans norvégiens, se mit à expliquer à Ordener pour quelles raisons ce mariage ne pouvait manquer; il était nécessaire aux intérêts de la famille d’Ahlefeld; le vice-roi ne pouvait le refuser au roi, qui le désirait; on affirmait en outre qu’une passion véritable unissait les deux futurs époux. En un mot, le pêcheur Braall ne doutait pas que cette alliance n’eût lieu; il eût voulu être aussi sûr de tuer, le lendemain, le maudit chien de mer qui infestait l’étang de Master-Bick.

Ordener se sentait peu disposé à soutenir une conversation politique avec un aussi rude homme d’état, quand la survenue d’un nouveau personnage vint le tirer d’embarras.

— C’est lui, c’est mon frère! s’écria la vieille Maase.

Et il ne fallait rien moins que l’arrivée d’un frère pour l’arracher de l’admiration contemplative avec laquelle elle écoutait les longues paroles de son mari.

Celui-ci, pendant que les deux enfants se jetaient bruyamment au cou de leur oncle, lui tendit la main gravement.

— Sois le bienvenu, mon frère.

Puis, se tournant vers Ordener:

— Seigneur, c’est notre frère, le renommé chasseur Kennybol, des montagnes de Kole.

— Je vous salue tous cordialement, dit le montagnard en ôtant son bonnet de peau d’ours. Frère, je fais mauvaise chasse sur vos côtes, comme tu ferais sans doute mauvaise pêche dans nos montagnes. Je crois que je remplirais encore plutôt ma gibecière en cherchant des lutins et des follets dans les forêts brumeuses de la reine Mab. Soeur Maase, vous êtes la première mouette à laquelle j’ai pu dire bonjour de près aujourd’hui. Tenez, amis, Dieu vous maintienne en paix! c’est pour ce méchant coq de bruyère que le premier chasseur du Drontheimhus a couru les clairières jusqu’à cette heure et par ce temps.

En parlant ainsi, il tira de sa carnassière et déposa sur la table une gelinotte blanche, en affirmant que cette bête maigre n’était pas digne d’un coup de mousquet.

— Mais, ajouta-t-il entre ses dents, fidèle arquebuse de Kennybol, tu chasseras bientôt de plus gros gibier. Si tu n’abats plus des robes de chamois ou d’élan, tu auras à percer des casaques vertes et des justaucorps rouges.

Ces mots, à demi entendus, frappèrent la curieuse Maase.

— Hein! demanda-t-elle, que dites-vous donc là, mon bon frère?

— Je dis qu’il y a toujours un farfadet qui danse sous la langue des femmes.

— Tu as raison, frère Kennybol, s’écria le pêcheur. Ces filles d’Eve sont toutes curieuses comme leur mère. — Ne parlais-tu pas de casaques vertes?

— Frère Braall, répliqua le chasseur d’un air d’humeur, je ne confie mes secrets qu’à mon mousquet, parce que je suis sûr qu’il ne les répétera pas.

— On parle dans le village, poursuivit intrépidement le pêcheur, d’une révolte des mineurs. Frère, saurais-tu quelque chose de cela?

Le montagnard reprit son bonnet, et l’enfonça sur ses yeux en jetant un regard oblique sur l’étranger; puis il se baissa vers le pêcheur, et dit d’une voix brève et basse:

— Silence!

Celui-ci secoua la tête à plusieurs reprises.

— Frère Kennybol, le poisson a beau être muet, il n’en tombe pas moins dans la nasse.

Il se fit un moment de silence. Les deux frères se regardaient d’un air expressif; les enfants tiraient les plumes de la gelinotte déposée sur la table; la bonne femme écoutait ce qu’on ne disait pas; et Ordener observait.

— Si vous faites maigre chère aujourd’hui, dit tout à coup le chasseur, cherchant visiblement à changer de conversation, il n’en sera pas de même demain. Frère Braall, tu peux pêcher le roi des poissons, je te promets de l’huile d’ours pour l’assaisonner.

— De l’huile d’ours! s’écria Maase. Est-ce qu’on a vu un ours dans les environs? — Patrick, Regner, mes enfants, je vous défends de sortir de cette cabane. — Un ours!

— Tranquillisez-vous, soeur, vous n’aurez plus à le craindre demain.

Oui, c’est un ours en effet que j’ai aperçu à deux milles environ de Surb; un ours blanc. Il paraissait emporter un homme, ou un animal plutôt.

— Mais non, ce pouvait être un chevrier qu’il enlevait, car les chevriers se vêtissent de peaux de bêtes. — Au reste, l’éloignement ne m’a pas permis de distinguer. Ce qui m’a étonné, c’est qu’il portait sa proie sur son dos et non entre ses dents.

— Vraiment, frère?

— Oui, et il fallait que l’animal fût mort, car il ne faisait aucun mouvement pour se défendre.

— Mais, demanda judicieusement le pêcheur, s’il était mort, comment était-il soutenu sur le dos de l’ours?

— C’est ce que je n’ai pu comprendre. Au reste, il aura fait le dernier repas de l’ours. En entrant dans ce village je viens de prévenir six bons compagnons; et demain, soeur Maase, je vous apporterai la plus belle fourrure blanche qui ait jamais couru sur les neiges d’une montagne.

— Prenez garde, frère, dit la femme, vous avez remarqué en effet de singulières choses. Cet ours est peut-être le diable.

— Êtes-vous folle? interrompit le montagnard en riant; le diable se changer en ours! En chat, en singe, à la bonne heure, cela s’est vu; mais en ours! ah! par saint Eldon l’exorciseur, vous feriez pitié à un enfant ou à une vieille femme avec vos superstitions!

La pauvre femme baissa la tête.

— Frère, vous étiez mon seigneur avant que mon vénéré mari jetât les yeux sur moi, agissez comme votre ange gardien vous inspirera d’agir.

— Mais, demanda le pêcheur au montagnard, de quel côté as-tu donc rencontré cet ours?

— Dans la direction du Smiasen à Walderhog.

— Walderhog! dit la femme avec un signe de croix.

— Walderhog! répéta Ordener.

— Mais, mon frère, reprit le pêcheur, ce n’est pas toi, j’espère, qui te dirigeais vers cette grotte de Walderhog?

— Moi! Dieu m’en garde! C’était l’ours.

— Est-ce que vous irez le chercher là demain? interrompit Maase avec terreur.

— Non vraiment; comment voulez-vous, mes amis, qu’un ours même ose prendre pour retraite une caverne où…?

Il s’arrêta, et tous trois firent un signe de croix.

— Tu as raison, répondit le pêcheur, il y a un instinct qui avertit les bétes de ces choses-là.

— Mes bons hôtes, dit Ordener, qu’y a-t-il donc de si effrayant dans cette grotte de Walderhog?

Ils se regardèrent tous trois avec un étonnement stupide, comme s’ils ne comprenaient pas une pareille question.

— C’est là qu’est le tombeau du roi Walder? ajouta le jeune homme.

— Oui, reprit la femme, un tombeau de pierre qui chante.

— Et ce n’est pas tout, dit le pêcheur.

— Non, continua-t-elle, la nuit on y a vu danser les os des trépassés.

— Et ce n’est pas tout, dit le montagnard.

Tous se turent, comme s’ils n’osaient poursuivre.

— Eh bien, demanda Ordener, qu’y a-t-il donc encore de surnaturel?

— Jeune homme, dit gravement le montagnard, il ne faut pas parler si légèrement quand vous voyez frissonner un vieux loup gris tel que moi.

Le jeune homme répondit en souriant doucement:

— J’aurais pourtant voulu savoir tout ce qui se passe de merveilleux dans cette grotte de Walderhog; car c’est là précisément que je vais.

Ces mots pétrifièrent de terreur les trois auditeurs.

— À Walderhog! ciel! vous allez à Walderhog?

— Et il dit cela, reprit le pêcheur, comme on dirait: Je vais à Loevig vendre ma morue! ou à la clairière de Ralph pêcher le hareng! — A Walderhog, grand Dieu!

— Malheureux jeune homme! s’écriait la femme, vous êtes donc né sans ange gardien? aucun saint du ciel n’est donc votre patron? Hélas! cela est trop vrai, puisque vous paraissez ne savoir même, pas votre nom.

— Et quel motif, interrompit le montagnard, peut donc conduire votre courtoisie à cet effroyable lieu?

— J’ai quelque chose à demander à quelqu’un, répondit Ordener.

L’étonnement des trois hôtes redoublait avec leur curiosité.

— Écoutez, seigneur étranger; vous paraissez ne pas bien connaître ce pays; votre courtoisie se trompe sans doute, ce ne peut être à Walderhog qu’elle veut aller.

— D’ailleurs, ajouta le montagnard, si elle veut parler à quelque être humain, elle n’y trouverait personne.

— Que le démon, reprit la femme.

— Le démon! quel démon?

— Oui, continua-t-elle, celui pour qui chante le tombeau et dansent les trépassés.

— Vous ne savez donc pas, seigneur, dit le pêcheur en baissant la voix et en se rapprochant d’Ordener, vous ne savez donc pas que la grotte de Walderhog est la demeure ordinaire de….

La femme l’arrêta.

— Mon seigneur et mari, ne prononcez pas ce nom, il porte malheur.

— La demeure de qui? demanda Ordener.

— D’un Belzébuth incarné, dit Kennybol.

— En vérité, mes braves hôtes, je ne sais ce que vous voulez dire. On m’avait bien appris que Walderhog était habité par Han d’Islande.

Un triple cri d’effroi s’éleva dans la chaumière.

— Eh bien! — Vous le saviez! — C’est ce démon!

La femme baissa sa coiffe de bure en attestant tous les saints que ce n’était pas elle qui avait prononcé ce nom.

Quand le pêcheur fut un peu revenu de sa stupéfaction, il regarda fixement Ordener, comme s’il y avait en ce jeune homme quelque chose qu’il ne pouvait comprendre.

— Je croyais, seigneur voyageur, quand j’aurais dû vivre une vie encore plus longue que celle de mon père, qui est mort âgé de cent vingt ans, n’avoir jamais à indiquer le chemin de Walderhog à une créature humaine douée de sa raison et croyant en Dieu.

— Sans doute, s’écria Maase, mais sa courtoisie n’ira pas à cette grotte maudite; car, pour y mettre le pied, il faut vouloir faire un pacte avec le diable!

— J’irai, mes bons hôtes, et le plus grand service que vous pourrez me rendre sera de m’indiquer le plus court chemin.

— Le plus court pour aller où vous voulez aller, dit le pêcheur, c’est de vous précipiter du haut du rocher le plus voisin dans le torrent le plus proche.

— Est-ce donc arriver au même but, demanda Ordener d’une voix tranquille, que de préférer une mort stérile à un danger utile?

Braall secoua la tête, tandis que son frère attachait sur le jeune aventurier un regard scrutateur.

— Je comprends, s’écria tout à coup le pêcheur, vous voulez gagner les mille écus royaux que le haut syndic promet pour la tête de ce démon d’Islande.

Ordener sourit.

— Jeune seigneur, continua le pêcheur avec émotion, croyez-moi, renoncez à ce projet. Je suis pauvre et vieux, et je ne donnerais pas ce qui me reste de vie pour vos mille écus royaux, ne me restât-il qu’un jour.

L’oeil suppliant et compatissant de la femme épiait l’effet que produirait sur le jeune seigneur la prière de son mari. Ordener se hâta de répondre:

— C’est un intérêt plus grand qui me fait chercher ce brigand que vous appelez un démon; c’est pour d’autres que pour moi…

Le montagnard, qui n’avait pas quitté Ordener du regard, l’interrompit.

— Je vous comprends à mon tour, je sais pourquoi vous cherchez le démon islandais.

— Je veux le forcer à combattre, dit le jeune homme.

— C’est cela, dit Kennybol, vous êtes chargé de grands intérêts, n’est-ce pas?

— Je viens de le dire.

Le montagnard s’approcha du jeune homme d’un air d’intelligence, et ce ne fut pas sans un extrême étonnement qu’Ordener l’entendit lui dire à l’oreille, à demi-voix:

— C’est pour le comte Schumacker de Griffenfeld, n’est-il pas vrai?

— Brave homme, s’écria-t-il, comment savez-vous?…

Et en effet, il lui était difficile de s’expliquer comment un montagnard norvégien pouvait savoir un secret qu’il n’avait confié à personne, pas même au général Levin.

Kennybol se pencha vers lui.

— Je vous souhaite bon succès, reprit-il du même ton mystérieux; vous êtes un noble jeune homme de servir ainsi les opprimés.

La surprise d’Ordener était si grande qu’il trouvait à peine des paroles pour demander au montagnard comment il était instruit du but de son voyage.

— Silence, dit Kennybol en mettant son doigt sur la bouche, j’espère que vous obtiendrez de l’habitant de Walderhog ce que vous désirez; mon bras est dévoué, comme le vôtre, au prisonnier de Munckholm.

Puis élevant la voix, avant qu’Ordener eût pu répliquer:

— Frère, bonne soeur Maase, poursuivit-il, recevez ce respectable jeune homme comme un frère de plus. Allons, je crois que le souper est prêt.

— Quoi! interrompit Maase, vous avez sans doute décidé sa courtoisie à renoncer à son projet de visiter le démon?

— Soeur, priez pour qu’il ne lui arrive point de mal. C’est un noble et digne jeune homme. Allons, brave seigneur, prenez quelque nourriture et quelque repos avec nous. Demain je vous montrerai votre chemin, et nous irons à la recherche, vous de votre diable, et moi de mon ours.

XXIX

Compagnon, eh! compagnon, de quel compagnon es-tu donc né? de quel enfant des hommes es-tu provenu pour oser ainsi attaquer Fafnir?

Edda

Le premier rayon du soleil levant rougissait à peine la plus haute cime des rochers qui bordent la mer, lorsqu’un pêcheur, qui était venu avant l’aube jeter ses filets à quelques portées d’arquebuse du rivage, en face de l’entrée de la grotte de Walderhog, vit comme une figure enveloppée d’un manteau, ou d’un linceul, descendre le long des roches et disparaître sous la voûte formidable de la caverne. Frappé de terreur, il recommanda sa barque et son âme à saint Usuph, et courut raconter à sa famille effrayée qu’il avait aperçu l’un des spectres qui habitent le palais de Han d’Islande rentrer dans la grotte au lever du jour.

Ce spectre, l’entretien et l’effroi futur des longues veillées d’hiver, c’était Ordener, le noble fils du vice-roi de Norvège, qui, tandis que les deux royaumes le croyaient livré à de doux soins auprès de son altière fiancée, venait, seul et inconnu, exposer sa vie pour celle à qui il avait donné son coeur et son avenir, pour la fille d’un proscrit.

De tristes présages, de sinistres prédictions l’avaient accompagné à ce but de son voyage; il venait de quitter la famille du pêcheur, et en lui disant adieu la bonne Maase s’était mise en prières pour lui devant le seuil de sa porte. Le montagnard Kennybol et ses six compagnons, qui lui avaient indiqué le chemin, s’étaient séparés de lui à un demi-mille de Walderhog, et ces intrépides chasseurs, qui allaient en riant affronter un ours, avaient longtemps attaché un oeil d’épouvante sur le sentier que suivait l’aventureux voyageur.

Le jeune homme entra dans la grotte de Walderhog, comme on entre dans un port longtemps désiré. Il éprouvait une joie céleste en songeant qu’il allait accomplir l’objet de sa vie, et que dans quelques instants peut-être il aurait donné tout son sang pour son Éthel. Près d’attaquer un brigand redouté d’une province entière, un monstre, un démon peut-être, ce n’était point cette effrayante figure qui apparaissait à son imagination; il ne voyait que l’image de la douce vierge captive, priant pour lui sans doute devant l’autel de sa prison. S’il se fût dévoué pour toute autre qu’elle, il aurait pu songer un moment, pour les mépriser, aux périls qu’il venait chercher de si loin; mais est-ce qu’une réflexion trouve place dans un jeune coeur au moment où il bat de la double exaltation d’un beau dévouement et d’un noble amour?

Il s’avança, la tête haute, sous la voûte sonore dont les mille échos multipliaient le bruit de ses pas, sans même jeter un coup d’oeil sur les stalactites, sur les basaltes séculaires qui pendaient au-dessus de sa tête parmi des cônes de mousses, de lierre et de lichen; assemblages confus de formes bizarres, dont la crédulité superstitieuse des campagnards norvégiens avait fait plus d’une fois des foules de démons ou des processions de fantômes.

Il passa avec la même indifférence devant ce tombeau du roi Walder, auquel se rattachaient tant de traditions lugubres, et il n’entendit d’autre voix que les longs sifflements de la bise sous ces funèbres galeries.

Il continua sa marche sous de tortueuses arcades, éclairées faiblement par des crevasses à demi obstruées d’herbes et de bruyères. Son pied heurtait souvent je ne sais quelles ruines, qui roulaient sur le roc avec un son creux, et présentaient dans l’ombre à ses yeux des apparences de crânes brisés, ou de longues rangées de dents blanches et dépouillées jusqu’à leurs racines.

Mais aucune terreur ne montait jusqu’à son âme. Il s’étonnait seulement de n’avoir pas encore rencontré le formidable habitant de cette horrible grotte.

Il arriva dans une sorte de salle ronde, naturellement creusée dans le flanc du rocher. Là aboutissait la route souterraine qu’il avait suivie, et les parois de la salle n’offraient plus d’autre ouverture que de larges fentes, à travers lesquelles on apercevait les montagnes et les forêts extérieures.

Surpris d’avoir ainsi infructueusement parcouru toute la fatale caverne, il commença à désespérer de rencontrer le brigand. Un monument de forme singulière, situé au milieu de la salle souterraine, appela son attention. Trois pierres longues et massives, posées debout sur le sol, en soutenaient une quatrième, large et carrée, comme trois piliers portent un toit. Sous cette espèce de trépied gigantesque s’élevait une sorte d’autel, formé également d’un seul quartier de granit, et percé circulairement au milieu de sa face supérieure. Ordener reconnut une de ces colossales constructions druidiques qu’il avait souvent observées dans ses voyages en Norvège, et dont les modèles les plus étonnants peut-être sont, en France, les monuments de Lokmariaker et de Carnac. Édifices étranges qui ont vieilli, posés sur la terre comme des tentes d'un jour, et où la solidité naît de la seule pesanteur.

Le jeune homme, livré à ses rêveries, s'appuya machinalement sur cet autel, dont la bouche de pierre était brunie, tant elle avait bu profondément le sang des victimes humaines.

Tout à coup il tressaillit; une voix, qui semblait sortir de la pierre, avait frappé son oreille:

— Jeune homme, c'est avec des pieds qui touchent au sépulcre que tu es venu dans ce lieu.

Il se leva brusquement, et sa main se jeta sur son sabre, tandis qu'un écho, faible comme la voix d'un mort, répétait distinctement dans les profondeurs de la grotte:

— Jeune homme, c'est avec des pieds qui touchent au sépulcre que tu es venu dans ce lieu.

En ce moment, une tête effroyable se leva de l'autre côté de l'autel druidique, avec des cheveux rouges et un rire atroce.

— Jeune homme, répéta-t-elle, oui, tu es venu dans ce lieu avec des pieds qui touchent au sépulcre.

— Et avec une main qui touche une épée, répondit le jeune homme sans s'émouvoir.

Le monstre sortit entièrement de dessous l'autel, et montra ses membres trapus et nerveux, ses vêtements sauvages et sanglants, ses mains crochues et sa lourde hache de pierre.

— C'est moi, dit-il avec un grondement de bête fauve.

— C'est moi, répondit Ordener.

— Je t'attendais.

— Je faisais plus, repartit l'intrépide jeune homme, je te cherchais.

Le brigand croisa les bras.

— Sais-tu qui je suis?

— Oui.

— Et tu n'as point de peur?

— Je n'en ai plus.

— Tu as donc éprouvé une crainte en venant ici?

Et le monstre balançait sa tête d'un air triomphant.

— Celle de ne pas te rencontrer.

— Tu me braves, et tes pas viennent de trébucher contre des cadavres humains!

— Demain, peut-être, ils trébucheront contre le tien.

Un tremblement de colère saisit le petit homme. Ordener, immobile, conservait son attitude calme et fière.

— Prends garde! murmura le brigand; je vais fondre sur toi, comme la grêle de Norvège sur un parasol.

— Je ne voudrais point d’autre bouclier contre toi.

On eût dit qu’il y avait dans le regard d’Ordener quelque chose qui dominait le monstre. Il se mit à arracher avec ses ongles les poils de son manteau, comme un tigre qui dévore l’herbe avant de s’élancer sur sa proie.

— Tu m’apprends ce que c’est que la pitié, dit-il.

— Et à moi, ce que c’est que le mépris.

— Enfant, ta voix est douce, ton visage est frais, comme la voix et le visage d’une jeune fille; — quelle mort veux-tu de moi?

— La tienne.

Le petit homme rit.

— Tu ne sais point que je suis un démon, que mon esprit est l’esprit d’Ingolphe l’Exterminateur.

— Je sais que tu es un brigand, que tu commets le meurtre pour de l’or.

— Tu te trompes, interrompit le monstre, c’est pour du sang.

— N’as-tu pas été payé par les d’Ahlefeld pour assassiner le capitaine Dispolsen?

— Que me dis-tu là? Quels sont ces noms?

— Tu ne connais pas le capitaine Dispolsen, que tu as assassiné sur la grève d’Urchtal?

— Cela se peut, mais je l’ai oublié, comme je t’aurai oublié dans trois jours.

— Tu ne connais pas le comte d’Ahlefeld, qui t’a payé pour enlever au capitaine un coffret de fer?

— D’Ahlefeld! Attends; oui, je le connais. J’ai bu hier le sang de son fils dans le crâne du mien.

Ordener frissonna d’horreur.

— Est-ce que tu n’étais pas content de ton salaire?

— Quel salaire? demanda le brigand.

— Écoute; ta vue me pèse; il faut en finir. Tu as dérobé, il y a huit jours, une cassette de fer à l’une de tes victimes, à un officier de Munckholm?

Ce mot fit tressaillir le brigand.

— Un officier de Munckholm! dit-il entre ses dents.

Puis il reprit, avec un mouvement de surprise:

— Serais-tu aussi un officier de Munckholm, toi?

— Non, dit Ordener.

— Tant pis!

Et les traits du brigand se rembrunirent.

— Écoute, reprit l’opiniâtre Ordener, où est cette cassette que tu as dérobée au capitaine?

Le petit homme parut méditer un instant.

— Par Ingolphe! voilà une méchante boîte de fer qui occupe bien des esprits. Je te réponds que l’on cherchera moins celle qui contiendra tes os, si jamais ils sont recueillis dans un cercueil.

Ces paroles, en montrant à Ordener que le brigand connaissait la cassette dont il lui parlait, lui rendirent l’espoir de la reconquérir.

— Dis-moi ce que tu as fait de cette cassette. Est-elle au pouvoir du comte d’Ahlefeld?

— Non.

— Tu mens, car tu ris.

— Crois ce que tu voudras. Que m’importe?

Le monstre avait en effet pris un air railleur qui inspirait de la défiance à Ordener. Il vit qu’il n’y avait plus rien à faire que de le mettre en fureur, ou de l’intimider, s’il était possible.

— Entends-moi, dit-il en élevant la voix, il faut que tu me donnes cette cassette.

L’autre répondit par un ricanement farouche.

— Il faut que tu me la donnes! répéta le jeune homme d’une voix tonnante.

— Est-ce que tu es accoutumé à donner des ordres aux buffles et aux ours? répliqua le monstre avec le même rire.

— J’en donnerais au démon dans l’enfer.

— C’est ce que tu seras à même de faire tout à l’heure.

Ordener tira son sabre, qui étincela dans l’ombre comme un éclair.

— Obéis!

— Allons, reprit l’autre en secouant sa hache, il ne tenait qu’à moi de briser tes os et de sucer ton sang quand tu es arrivé, mais je me suis contenu; j’étais curieux de voir le moineau franc fondre sur le vautour.

— Misérable, cria Ordener, défends-toi!

— C’est la première fois qu’on me le dit, murmura le brigand en grinçant des dents.

En parlant ainsi, il sauta sur l’autel de granit et se ramassa sur lui-même, comme le léopard qui attend le chasseur au haut d’un rocher pour se précipiter sur lui à l’improviste.

De là son oeil fixe plongeait sur le jeune homme et semblait chercher de quel côté il pourrait le mieux s’élancer sur lui. C’en était fait du noble Ordener, s’il eût attendu un instant. Mais il ne donna pas au brigand le temps de réfléchir, et se jeta impétueusement sur lui en lui portant la pointe de son sabre au visage.

Alors commença le combat le plus effrayant que l’imagination puisse se figurer. Le petit homme, debout sur l’autel, comme une statue sur son piédestal, semblait une des horribles idoles qui, dans les siècles barbares, avaient reçu dans ce même lieu des sacrifices impies et de sacrilèges offrandes.

Ses mouvements étaient si rapides que de quelque côté qu’Ordener l’attaquât, il rencontrait toujours la face du monstre et le tranchant de sa hache. Il aurait été mis en pièces dès les premiers chocs s’il n’avait eu l’heureuse inspiration de rouler son manteau autour de son bras gauche, en sorte que la plupart des coups de son furieux ennemi se perdaient dans ce bouclier flottant. Ils firent ainsi inutilement, pendant plusieurs minutes, des efforts inouïs pour se blesser l’un et l’autre. Les yeux gris et enflammés du petit homme sortaient de leur orbite. Surpris d’être si vigoureusement et si audacieusement combattu par un adversaire en apparence si faible, une rage sombre avait remplacé ses ricanements sauvages. L’atroce immobilité des traits du monstre, le calme intrépide de ceux d’Ordener contrastaient singulièrement avec la promptitude de leurs mouvements et la vivacité de leurs attaques.

On n’entendait d’autre bruit que le cliquetis des armes, les pas tumultueux du jeune homme, et la respiration pressée des deux combattants, quand le petit homme poussa un rugissement terrible. Le tranchant de sa hache venait de s’engager dans les plis du manteau. Il se roidit; il secoua furieusement son bras, et ne fit qu’embarrasser le manche avec le tranchant dans l’étoffe, qui, à chaque nouvel effort, se tordait de plus en plus à l’entour.

Le formidable brigand vit le fer du jeune homme s’appuyer sur sa poitrine.

— Écoute-moi encore une fois, dit Ordener triomphant; veux-tu me remettre ce coffre de fer que tu as lâchement volé?

Le petit homme garda un moment le silence, puis il dit au milieu d'un rugissement:

— Non, et sois maudit!

Ordener reprit, sans quitter son attitude victorieuse et menaçante:

— Réfléchis!

— Non; je t'ai dit que non, répéta le brigand.

Le noble jeune homme baissa son sabre.

— Eh bien! dit-il, dégage ta hache des plis de mon manteau, afin que nous puissions continuer.

Un rire dédaigneux fut la réponse du monstre.

— Enfant, tu fais le généreux, comme si j'en avais besoin!

Avant qu'Ordener surpris eût pu tourner la tête, il avait posé son pied sur l'épaule de son loyal vainqueur, et d'un bond il était à douze pas dans la salle.

D'un autre bond il était sur Ordener. Il s'était suspendu à lui tout entier, comme la panthère s'attache de la gueule et des griffes aux flancs du grand lion. Ses ongles s'enfonçaient dans les épaules du jeune homme; ses genoux noueux pressaient ses hanches, tandis que son affreux visage présentait aux yeux d'Ordener une bouche sanglante et des dents de bête fauve prêtes à le déchirer. Il ne parlait plus; aucune parole humaine ne s'échappait de son gosier pantelant; un mugissement sourd, entremêlé de cris rauques et ardents, exprimait seul sa rage. C'était quelque chose de plus hideux qu'une bête féroce, de plus monstrueux qu'un démon; c'était un homme auquel il ne restait rien d'humain.

Ordener avait chancelé sous l'assaut du petit homme, et serait tombé à ce choc inattendu, si l'un des larges piliers du monument druidique ne se fût trouvé derrière lui pour le soutenir. Il resta donc à demi renversé sur le dos, et haletant sous le poids de son formidable ennemi. Qu'on pense que tout ce que nous venons de décrire s'était passé en aussi peu de temps qu'il faut pour se le figurer, et l'on aura quelque idée de ce que présentait d'horrible ce moment de la lutte.

Nous l'avons dit, le noble jeune homme avait chancelé, mais il n'avait pas tremblé. Il se hâta de donner une pensée d'adieu à son Éthel. Cette pensée d'amour fut comme une prière; elle lui rendit des forces. Il enlaça le monstre de ses deux bras; puis, saisissant la lame de son sabre par le milieu, il lui appuya perpendiculairement la pointe sur l'épine du dos. Le brigand atteint poussa une clameur effrayante, et d'un soubresaut, qui ébranla Ordener, il se dégagea des bras de son intrépide adversaire et alla tomber à quelques pas en arrière, emportant dans ses dents un lambeau du manteau vert qu'il avait mordu dans sa fureur.

Il se releva, souple et agile comme un jeune chamois, et le combat recommença pour la troisième fois, d'une manière plus terrible encore. Le hasard avait jeté près du lieu où il se trouvait un amas de quartiers de rochers, entre lesquels les mousses et les ronces croissaient paisiblement depuis des siècles. Deux hommes de force ordinaire auraient à peine pu soulever la moindre de ces masses. Le brigand en saisit une de ses deux bras et l'éleva au-dessus de sa tête en la balançant vers Ordener. Son regard fut affreux dans ce moment. La pierre, lancée avec violence, traversa lourdement l'espace; le jeune homme n'eut que le temps de se détourner. Le quartier de granit s'était brisé en éclats au pied du mur souterrain avec un bruit épouvantable, que se renvoyèrent longtemps les échos profonds de la grotte.

Ordener étourdi avait à peine eu le temps de reprendre son sang-froid, qu'une seconde masse de pierre se balançait dans les mains du brigand. Irrité de se voir ainsi lapider lâchement, il s'élança vers le petit homme, le sabre haut, afin de changer de combat; mais le bloc formidable, parti comme un tonnerre, rencontra, en roulant dans l'atmosphère épaisse et sombre de la caverne, la lame frêle et nue sur son passage; elle tomba en éclats comme un morceau de verre, et le rire farouche du monstre remplit la voûte.

Ordener était désarmé.

— As-tu, cria le monstre, quelque chose à dire à Dieu ou au diable avant de mourir?

Et son oeil lançait des flammes, et tous ses muscles s'étaient roidis de rage et de joie, et il s'était précipité avec un frémissement d'impatience sur sa hache laissée à terre dans les plis du manteau. — Pauvre Éthel!

Tout à coup un rugissement lointain se fait entendre au dehors. Le monstre s'arrête. Le bruit redouble; des clameurs d'hommes se mêlent aux grondements plaintifs d'un ours. Le brigand écoute. Les cris douloureux continuent. Il saisit brusquement la hache et s'élance, non vers Ordener, mais vers l'une des crevasses dont nous avons parlé et qui donnaient passage au jour. Ordener, au comble de la surprise de se voir ainsi oublié, se dirige comme lui vers l'une de ces portes naturelles, et voit, dans une clairière assez voisine, un grand ours blanc réduit aux abois par sept chasseurs, parmi lesquels il croit même distinguer ce Kennybol dont les paroles l'avaient tant frappé la veille.

Il se retourne. Le brigand n'était plus dans la grotte, et il entend au dehors une voix effrayante qui criait:

— Friend! Friend! je suis à toi! me voici!

XXX

Pierre le bon enfant aux dés a tout perdu.

RÉGNIER.

Le régiment des arquebusiers de Munckholm est en marche à travers les défilés qui se trouvent entre Drontheim et Skongen. Tantôt il côtoie un torrent, et l’on voit la file des bayonnettes ramper dans les ravines comme un long serpent dont les écailles brillent au jour; tantôt il tourne en spirale à l’entour d’une montagne, qui ressemble alors à ces colonnes triomphales autour desquelles montent des bataillons de bronze.

Les soldats marchent, les armes basses et les manteaux déployés, d’un air d’humeur et d’ennui, parce que ces nobles hommes n’aiment que le combat ou le repos. Les grosses railleries, les vieux sarcasmes qui faisaient hier leurs délices ne les égayent pas aujourd’hui; l’air est froid, le ciel est brumeux. Il faut au moins, pour qu’un rire passager s’élève dans les rangs, qu’une cantinière se laisse tomber maladroitement du haut de son petit cheval barbe, ou qu’une marmite de fer-blanc roule de rocher en rocher jusqu’au fond d’un précipice.

C’est pour se distraire un moment de l’ennui de cette route que le lieutenant Randmer, jeune baron danois, aborda le vieux capitaine Lory, soldat de fortune. Le capitaine marchait, sombre et silencieux, d’un pas pesant, mais assuré; le lieutenant, leste et léger, faisait siffler une baguette qu’il avait arrachée aux broussailles dont le chemin était bordé.

— Eh bien, capitaine, qu’avez-vous donc? vous êtes triste.

— C’est qu’apparemment j’en ai sujet, répondit le vieil officier sans lever la tête.

— Allons, allons, point de chagrin; regardez-moi, suis-je triste? et pourtant je gage que j’en aurais au moins autant sujet que vous.

— J’en doute, baron Randmer; j’ai perdu mon seul bien, j’ai perdu toute ma richesse.

— Capitaine Lory, notre infortune est précisément la même. Il n’y a pas quinze jours que le lieutenant Alberick m’a gagné d’un coup de dé mon beau château de Randmer et ses dépendances. Je suis ruiné; me voit-on moins gai pour cela?

Le capitaine répondit d’une voix bien triste:

— Lieutenant, vous n’avez perdu que votre beau château; moi, j’ai perdu mon chien.

À cette réponse, la figure frivole du jeune homme resta indécise entre le rire et l’attendrissement.

— Capitaine, dit-il, consolez-vous; tenez, moi qui ai perdu mon château…

L’autre l’interrompit.

— Qu’est-ce que cela? D’ailleurs, vous regagnerez un autre château.

— Et vous retrouverez un autre chien.

Le vieillard secoua la tête.

— Je retrouverai un chien; je ne retrouverai pas mon pauvre Drake.

Il s’arrêta; de grosses larmes roulaient dans ses yeux et tombaient une à une sur son visage dur et rude.

— Je n’avais, continua-t-il, jamais aimé que lui; je n’ai connu ni père ni mère; que Dieu leur fasse paix, comme à mon pauvre Drake! — Lieutenant Randmer, il m’avait sauvé la vie dans la guerre de Poméranie; je l’appelai Drake pour faire honneur au fameux amiral. — Ce bon chien! il n’avait jamais changé pour moi, lui, selon ma fortune. Après le combat d’Oholfen, le grand général Schack l’avait flatté de la main en me disant: Vous avez là un bien beau chien, sergent Lory! — car à cette époque je n’étais encore que sergent.

— Ah! interrompit le jeune baron en agitant sa baguette, cela doit paraître singulier d’être sergent.

Le vieux soldat de fortune ne l’entendait pas; il paraissait, se parler à lui-même, et l’on entendait à peine quelques paroles inarticulées s’échapper de sa bouche.

— Ce pauvre Drake! être revenu tant de fois sain et sauf des brèches et des tranchées pour se noyer, comme un chat, dans le maudit golfe de Drontheim!

— Mon pauvre chien! mon brave ami! tu étais digne de mourir comme moi sur le champ de bataille.

— Brave capitaine, cria le lieutenant, comment pouvez-vous rester triste? nous nous battrons peut-être demain.

— Oui, répondit dédaigneusement le vieux capitaine, contre de fiers ennemis!

— Comment, ces brigands de mineurs! ces diables de montagnards!

— Des tailleurs de pierres, des voleurs de grands chemins! des gens qui ne sauront seulement pas former en bataille la tête de porc ou le coin de Gustave-Adolphe! voilà de belle canaille en face d’un homme tel que moi, qui ai fait toutes les guerres de Poméranie et de Holstein! les campagnes de Scanie et de Dalécarlie! qui ai combattu sous le glorieux général Schack, sous le vaillant comte de Guldenlew!

— Mais vous ne savez pas, interrompit Randmer, qu’on donne à ces bandes un redoutable chef, un géant fort et sauvage comme Goliath, un brigand qui ne boit que du sang humain, un démon qui porte en lui tout Satan.

— Qui donc? demanda l’autre.

— Eh! le fameux Han d’Islande!

— Brrr! je gage que ce formidable général ne sait seulement pas armer un mousquet en quatre mouvements ou charger une carabine à l’impériale!

Randmer éclata de rire.

— Oui, riez, poursuivit le capitaine. Il sera fort gai en effet de croiser de bons sabres avec de viles pioches, et de nobles piques avec des fourches à fumier! voilà de dignes ennemis! mon brave Drake n’aurait pas daigné leur mordre les jambes!

Le capitaine continuait de donner un cours énergique à son indignation, lorsqu’il fut interrompu par l’arrivée d’un officier qui accourait vers eux tout essoufflé.

— Capitaine Lory! mon cher Randmer!

— Eh bien? dirent-ils tous deux à la fois.

— Mes amis, je suis glacé d’horreur! — D’Ahlefeld! le lieutenant d’Ahlefeld! le fils du grand-chancelier! vous savez, mon cher baron Randmer, ce Frédéric… si élégant… si fat!…

— Oui, répondit le jeune baron, très élégant! Cependant, au dernier bal de Charlottenbourg, mon déguisement était d’un meilleur goût que le sien. — Mais que lui est-il donc arrivé?

— Je sais de qui vous voulez parler, disait en même temps Lory, c’est Frédéric d’Ahlefeld, le lieutenant de la troisième compagnie, qui a les revers bleus. Il fait assez négligemment son service.

— On ne s’en plaindra plus, capitaine Lory.

— Comment? dit Randmer.

— Il est en garnison à Walhstrom, continua froidement le vieux capitaine.

— Précisément, reprit l’autre, le colonel vient de recevoir un messager… Ce pauvre Frédéric!

— Mais qu’est-ce donc? capitaine Bollar, vous m’effrayez. Le vieux

Lory poursuivit:

— Brrr! notre fat aura manqué aux appels, comme à son ordinaire; le capitaine aura envoyé en prison le fils du grand-chancelier; et voilà, j’en suis sûr, le malheur qui vous décompose le visage.

Bollar lui frappa sur l’épaule.

— Capitaine Lory, le lieutenant d’Ahlefeld a été dévoré tout vivant.

Les deux capitaines se regardèrent fixement, et Randmer, un moment étonné, se mit tout à coup à rire aux éclats.

— Ah! ah! capitaine Bollar, je vois que vous êtes toujours mauvais plaisant. Mais je ne donnerai pas dans celle-là, je vous en préviens.

Et le lieutenant, croisant ses deux bras, donna un libre essor à toute sa gaieté, en jurant que ce qui l’amusait le plus, c’était la crédulité avec laquelle Lory accueillait les amusantes inventions de Bollar. Le conte, disait-il, était vraiment drôle, et c’était une idée tout à fait divertissante que de faire dévorer tout cru ce Frédéric qui avait de sa peau un soin si tendre et si ridicule.

— Randmer, dit gravement Bollar, vous êtes un fou. Je vous dis que d’Ahlefeld est mort. Je le tiens du colonel; — mort!

— Oh! qu’il joue bien son rôle! reprit le baron toujours en riant; qu’il est amusant!

Bollar haussa les épaules, et se tourna vers le vieux Lory, qui lui demanda avec sang-froid quelques détails.

— Oui vraiment, mon cher capitaine Bollar, ajouta le rieur inextinguible, contez-nous donc par qui ce pauvre diable a été ainsi mangé. A-t-il fait le déjeuner d’un loup, ou le souper d’un ours?

— Le colonel, dit Bollar, vient de recevoir en route une dépêche, qui l’instruit d’abord que la garnison de Walhstrom se replie vers nous, devant un parti considérable d’insurgés.

Le vieux Lory fronça le sourcil.

— Ensuite, poursuivit Bollar, que le lieutenant Frédéric d’Ahlefeld, ayant été, il y a trois jours, chasser dans les montagnes, du côté de la ruine d’Arbar, y a rencontré un monstre, qui l’a emporté dans sa caverne et l’a dévoré.

Ici le lieutenant Randmer redoubla ses joyeuses exclamations.

— Oh! oh! comme ce bon Lory croit aux contes d’enfants! C’est bien, gardez votre sérieux, mon cher Bollar. Vous êtes admirablement drôle. Mais vous ne nous direz pas quel est ce monstre, cet ogre, ce vampire qui a emporté et mangé le lieutenant comme un chevreau de six jours!

— Je ne vous le dirai pas, à vous, murmura Bollar avec impatience; mais je le dirai à Lory, qui n’est pas follement incrédule. — Mon cher Lory, le monstre qui a bu le sang de Frédéric, c’est Han d’Islande.

— Le colonel des brigands! s’écria le vieux officier.

— Eh bien, mon brave Lory, reprit le railleur Randmer, a-t-on besoin de savoir l’exercice à l’impériale, quand on fait si bien manoeuvrer sa mâchoire?

— Baron Randmer, dit Bollar, vous avez le même caractère que d’Ahlefeld; prenez garde d’avoir le même sort.

— J’affirme, s’écria le jeune homme, que ce qui m’amuse le plus, c’est le sérieux imperturbable du capitaine Bollar.

— Et moi, répliqua Bollar, ce qui m’effraie le plus, c’est la gaieté intarissable du lieutenant Randmer.

En ce moment un groupe d’officiers, qui paraissaient s’entretenir vivement, se rapprocha de nos trois interlocuteurs.

— Ah! pardieu, s’écria Randmer, il faut que je les amuse de l’invention de Bollar. — Camarades, ajouta-t-il en s’avançant vers eux, vous ne savez pas? ce pauvre Frédéric d’Ahlefeld vient d’être croqué tout vivant par le barbare Han d’Islande.

En achevant ces paroles, il ne put réprimer un éclat de rire, qui, à sa grande surprise, fut accueilli des nouveaux-venus presque avec des cris d’indignation.

— Comment! vous riez! — Je ne croyais pas que Randmer dût répéter de cette manière une semblable nouvelle. — Rire d’un pareil malheur!

— Quoi! dit Randmer troublé, est-ce que cela serait vrai?

— Eh! c’est vous qui nous le répétez! lui cria-t-on de toutes parts.

Est-ce que vous n’avez pas foi en vos paroles?

— Mais je croyais que c’était une plaisanterie de Bollar.

Un vieux officier prit la parole.

— La plaisanterie eût été de mauvais goût; mais ce n’en est malheureusement pas une. Le baron Voethaün, notre colonel, vient de recevoir cette fatale nouvelle.

— Une affreuse aventure! c’est effrayant! répétèrent une foule de voix.

— Nous allons donc, disait l’un, combattre des loups et des ours à face humaine!

— Nous recevrons des coups d’arquebuse, disait l’autre, sans savoir d’où ils partiront; nous serons tués un à un, comme de vieux faisans dans une volière.

— Cette mort de d’Ahlefeld, cria Bollar d’une voix solennelle, fait frissonner. Notre régiment est malheureux. La mort de Dispolsen, celle de ces pauvres soldats trouvés à Cascadthymore, celle de d’Ahlefeld, voilà trois tragiques événements en bien peu de temps.

Le jeune baron Randmer, qui était resté muet, sortit de sa rêverie.

— Cela est incroyable, dit-il; ce Frédéric qui dansait si bien!

Et après cette réflexion profonde, il retomba dans le silence, tandis que le capitaine Lory affirmait qu’il était très affligé de la mort du jeune lieutenant, et faisait remarquer au second arquebusier, Toric Belfast, que le cuivre de sa bandoulière était moins brillant qu’à l’ordinaire.

«Chut! chut! voilà un homme qui descend de là-haut par le moyen d’une échelle.

………………………………….

— Oh oui, c’est un espion.

— Le ciel ne pouvait m’accorder une plus grande faveur que celle de pouvoir vous livrer… ma vie. Je suis à vous; mais dites-moi, de grâce, à qui appartient cette armée.

— Au comte de Barcelone.

— Quel comte?

…………………………..

— Qu’est-ce donc?

— Général, voilà un espion de l’ennemi.

— D’où viens-tu?

— Je venais ici, bien éloigné de songer à ce que je devais y trouver; je ne m’attendais pas à ce que je vois.»

LOPE DE VBGA. La Fuerza lastimosa.

Il y a quelque chose de sinistre et de désolé dans l’aspect d’une campagne rase et nue, quand le soleil a disparu, lorsqu’on est seul, qu’on marche en brisant du pied des tronçons de paille sèche, au cri monotone de la cigale, et qu’on voit de grands nuages déformés se coucher lentement sur l’horizon, comme des cadavres de fantômes.

Telle était l’impression qui se mêlait aux tristes pensées d’Ordener, le soir de son inutile rencontre avec le brigand d’Islande. Étourdi un moment de sa brusque disparition, il avait d’abord voulu le poursuivre; mais il s’était égaré dans les bruyères, et il avait erré toute la journée dans des terres de plus en plus incultes et sauvages, sans rencontrer trace d’homme. À la chute du jour, il se trouvait dans une plaine spacieuse, qui ne lui offrait de tous côtés qu’un horizon égal et circulaire, où rien ne promettait un abri au jeune voyageur exténué de fatigue et de besoin.

Encore si ses souffrances corporelles n’eussent pas été aggravées par les tristesses de son âme; mais c’en était fait! il avait atteint le terme de son voyage, sans en remplir le but. Il ne lui restait même plus ces folles illusions d’espérance qui l’avaient entraîné à la poursuite du brigand; et maintenant que rien ne soutenait plus son coeur, mille pensées décourageantes, qui n’y trouvaient point place la veille, venaient l’assaillir. Qu’allait-il faire? comment revenir vers Schumacker sans lui apporter le salut d’Éthel? de quelle effrayante nature étaient les malheurs que la conquête de la fatale cassette eût prévenus? Et son mariage, avec Ulrique d’Ahlefeld! S’il pouvait du moins enlever son Éthel à cette indigne captivité; s’il pouvait fuir avec elle, et emporter son bonheur dans quelque lointain exil!

Il s’enveloppa de son manteau et se coucha sur la terre. Le ciel était noir; une lueur orageuse apparaissait par intervalles dans les nues comme à travers un crêpe funèbre, et s’éteignait; un vent froid tournait sur la plaine. Le jeune homme songeait à peine à ces signes d’une tempête violente et prochaine; et d’ailleurs, quand il eût pu trouver un asile où fuir l’orage et se reposer de ses fatigues, en eût-il trouvé un où fuir son malheur et se reposer de ses pensées?

Tout à coup des sons confus de voix humaines arrivèrent à son oreille. Surpris, il se souleva sur le coude, et aperçut, à quelque distance de lui, comme des ombres se mouvoir dans l’obscurité. Il regarda; une lumière brilla au milieu du groupe mystérieux, et Ordener vit, avec un étonnement facile à concevoir, chacune de ces figures fantasmagoriques s’enfoncer successivement dans la terre. — Tout disparut.

Ordener était au-dessus des superstitions de son temps et de son pays. Son esprit grave et mûr ignorait ces crédulités vaines, ces terreurs étranges qui tourmentent l’enfance des peuples de même que l’enfance des hommes. Il y avait cependant dans cette apparition singulière quelque chose de surnaturel qui lui inspira une religieuse défiance de sa raison; car nul ne sait si les esprits des morts ne reviennent pas quelquefois sur la terre.

Il se leva, fit un signe de croix, et se dirigea vers le lieu où la vision avait disparu. De larges gouttes de pluie commençaient à tomber; son manteau se gonflait comme une voile, et la plume de sa toque, tourmentée par le vent, battait son visage.

Il s’arrêta tout à coup. — Un éclair venait de lui montrer devant ses pas une sorte de puits large et circulaire, où il se serait infailliblement précipité sans la lueur bienfaisante de l’orage. Il s’approcha du gouffre. Une lumière vague y brillait à une profondeur effrayante, et répandait une teinte rougeâtre sur l’extrémité inférieure de cet immense cylindre creusé dans les entrailles de la terre. Ce rayon, qui semblait un feu magique allumé par les gnomes, accroissait en quelque sorte l’incommensurable étendue des ténèbres que l’oeil était contraint de traverser pour l’atteindre.

L’intrépide jeune homme, penché sur l’abîme, écouta. Un bruit lointain de voix monta à son oreille. Il ne douta plus que les êtres qui avaient étrangement paru et disparu à ses yeux ne se fussent plongés dans ce gouffre, et il sentit un désir invincible, parce qu’il était sans doute dans sa destinée, d’y descendre après eux, dût-il suivre des spectres dans une des bouches de l’enfer. D’ailleurs, la tempête commençait avec fureur, et ce gouffre lui présentait un abri contre elle. Mais comment y descendre? quel chemin avaient pris ceux qu’il voulait suivre, si ce n’étaient pas des fantômes? — Un second éclair vint à son secours, et lui fit voir à ses pieds l’extrémité supérieure d’une échelle, qui se prolongeait dans les profondeurs du puits. C’était une forte solive verticale, que traversaient horizontalement, de distance en distance, de courtes barres de fer destinées à recevoir les pieds et les mains de ceux qui oseraient s’aventurer dans ce gouffre.

Ordener ne balança pas. Il se suspendit audacieusement à la formidable échelle, et s’enfonça dans l’abîme, sans savoir même si elle le conduirait jusqu’au fond, sans songer qu’il ne reverrait peut-être plus le soleil. Bientôt, dans les ténèbres qui couvraient sa tête, il ne distingua plus le ciel qu’aux éclairs bleuâtres qui l’illuminaient fréquemment. Bientôt la pluie abondante, qui battait la surface de la terre, n’arriva plus à lui qu’en rosée fine et vaporeuse. Bientôt le tourbillon de vent qui s’engouffrait impétueusement dans le puits se perdit au-dessus de lui en long sifflement. Il descendit, il descendit encore, et à peine paraissait-il s’être rapproché de la lumière souterraine. Il continua sans se décourager, en évitant seulement d’abaisser son regard dans le gouffre, de peur d’y être précipité par un étourdissement.

Cependant, l’air de plus en plus étouffé, le bruit de voix de plus en plus distinct, le reflet pourpre qui commençait à colorer la muraille circulaire du puits, l’avertirent enfin qu’il n’était pas loin du fond. Il descendit encore quelques échelons, et son regard put voir clairement, au bas de l’échelle, l’entrée d’un souterrain éclairée d’une lueur tremblante et rouge, tandis que son oreille était frappée par des paroles qui attirèrent toute son attention.

— Kennybol n’arrive pas, disait une voix du ton de l’impatience.

— Qui peut le retenir? répétait la même voix après un moment de silence.

— Nous l’ignorons, seigneur Hacket, répondait-on.

— Il a dû passer la nuit chez sa soeur Maase Braall, du village de Surb, ajoutait une autre voix.

— Vous le voyez, reprenait la première, je tiens, moi, tous mes engagements. Je devais vous amener Han d'Islande pour chef; je vous l'amène.

Un murmure, dont il était difficile de deviner le sens, répondit à ces paroles. La curiosité d'Ordener, déjà éveillée par le nom de ce Kennybol, qui lui avait tant causé de surprise la veille, redoubla au nom de Han d'Islande.

La même voix reprit:

— Mes amis, Jonas, Norbith, si Kennybol est en retard, qu'importe! nous sommes assez nombreux pour ne plus rien craindre; avez-vous trouvé vos enseignes dans les ruines de Crag?

— Oui, seigneur Hacket, répondirent plusieurs voix.

— Eh bien! levez l'étendard, il en est temps! Voici de l'or! voici votre invincible chef. Courage! marchez à la délivrance du noble Schumacker, de l'infortuné comte de Griffenfeld!

— Vive! vive Schumacker! répétèrent une foule de voix, et le nom de Schumacker se prolongea d'échos en échos dans les replis des voûtes souterraines.

Ordener, conduit de curiosité en curiosité, d'étonnement en étonnement, écoutait, respirant à peine. Il ne pouvait croire ni comprendre ce qu'il entendait. Schumacker mêlé à Kennybol, à Han d'Islande! Quel était ce drame ténébreux dont, spectateur ignoré, il entrevoyait une scène? De qui défendait-on les jours? de qui jouait-on la tête?

— Écoutez, reprit la même voix, vous voyez l'ami, le confident du noble comte de Griffenfeld. C'était la première fois qu'Ordener entendait cette voix. Elle poursuivit:

— …..Accordez-moi votre confiance, comme il m'accorde la sienne. Amis, tout vous favorise; vous arriverez à Drontheim sans rencontrer un ennemi.

— Seigneur Hacket, interrompit une voix, marchons. Peters m'a dit avoir vu dans les défilés tout le régiment de Munckholm en marche contre nous.

— Il vous a trompé, répondit l'autre avec autorité. Le gouvernement ignore encore votre révolte, et sa tranquillité est telle, que celui qui a repoussé vos justes plaintes, votre oppresseur, l'oppresseur de l'illustre et malheureux Schumacker, le général Levin de Knud a quitté Drontheim pour aller dans la capitale assister aux fêtes du fameux mariage de son élève Ordener Guldenlew avec Ulrique d’Ahlefeld.

Qu’on juge de l’émotion d’Ordener. Dans ce pays sauvage et désert, sous cette voûte mystérieuse, entendre des inconnus prononcer tous les noms qui l’intéressaient, et jusqu’au sien propre! Un doute affreux s’éleva dans son coeur. Serait-il vrai? était-ce en effet un agent du comte de Griffenfeld dont il entendait la voix? Quoi! Schumacker, ce vieillard vénérable, le noble père de sa noble Éthel, se révoltait contre le roi son seigneur, soudoyait des brigands, allumait une guerre civile! Et c’était pour cet hypocrite, pour ce rebelle, qu’il avait, lui, fils du vice-roi de Norvège, élève du général Levin, compromis son avenir, exposé sa vie! c’était pour lui qu’il avait cherché et combattu ce brigand islandais avec lequel Schumacker paraissait être d’intelligence, puisqu’il le plaçait à la tête de ces bandits! Qui sait même si cette cassette, pour laquelle lui, Ordener, avait été sur le point de donner son sang, ne contenait pas quelques-uns des indignes secrets de cette trame odieuse? Ou plutôt le vindicatif prisonnier de Munckholm ne s’était-il pas joué de lui? Peut-être il avait découvert son nom; peut-être, et combien cette pensée fut douloureuse pour le magnanime jeune homme! n’avait-il désiré, en le poussant à ce fatal voyage, que la perte du fils d’un ennemi?

Hélas! lorsqu’on a longtemps porté le nom d’un malheureux en vénération et en amour, quand dans le secret de sa pensée on a juré à son infortune un attachement inviolable, c’est un moment bien amer que celui où l’on reçoit son salaire d’ingratitude, où l’on sent que l’on est désenchanté de la générosité, et qu’il faut renoncer à ce bonheur si pur et si doux du dévouement. On a vieilli en un instant de la plus triste des vieillesses, on est devenu vieux d’expérience; et l’on a perdu la plus belle des illusions de la vie, qui n’a de beau que les illusions.

Telles étaient les désolantes pensées qui se pressaient confusément dans l’âme d’Ordener. Le noble jeune homme eût voulu mourir dans ce fatal moment; il lui semblait que toute la félicité de sa vie lui échappait. Il y avait bien dans les assertions de celui qui parlait comme envoyé de Griffenfeld des choses qui lui paraissaient mensongères ou douteuses; mais comme elles n’étaient destinées qu’à abuser de malheureux campagnards, Schumacker n’en était que plus coupable à ses yeux; et ce Schumacker était le père de son Éthel!

Ces réflexions agitèrent d’autant plus violemment son coeur qu’elles s’y précipitèrent toutes à la fois. Il chancela sur les barreaux qui le soutenaient, et continua d’écouter; car on attend parfois avec une impatience inexplicable et une affreuse avidité les malheurs que l’on redoute le plus.

— Oui, poursuivit la voix de l’envoyé, vous êtes commandés par le formidable Han d’Islande. Qui osera vous combattre? Votre cause est celle de vos femmes, de vos enfants indignement dépouillés de votre héritage; d’un noble infortuné, depuis vingt ans plongé injustement dans une infâme prison. Allons, Schumacker et la liberté vous attendent. Guerre aux tyrans!

— Guerre! répétèrent mille voix; et l’on entendit dans les détours du souterrain un long bruit d’armes se mêler aux sons rauques de la trompe des montagnes.

— Arrêtez! cria Ordener. — Il avait descendu précipitamment le reste de l’échelle. L’idée d’épargner un crime à Schumacker et tant de malheurs à son pays s’était emparée impérieusement de tout son être. Mais, au moment où il était apparu sur le seuil du souterrain, la crainte de perdre, par d’imprudentes déclamations, le père de son Éthel, et peut-être son Éthel elle-même, avait remplacé tout autre sentiment en lui; et il était resté là, pâle et jetant un regard étonné sur le tableau singulier qui s’offrait à sa vue.

C’était comme une immense place d’une ville souterraine, dont les limites se perdaient derrière une foule de piliers qui soutenaient les voûtes. Ces piliers brillaient comme des pilastres de cristal aux rayons d’un millier de torches que portait une multitude d’hommes bizarrement armés et répandus confusément dans les profondeurs de la place. On eût dit, à voir tous ces points lumineux et toutes ces figures effrayantes errer dans les ténèbres, une de ces assemblées fabuleuses dont parlent les vieilles chroniques, de sorciers et de démons qui portaient des étoiles pour flambeaux, et illuminaient la nuit les vieux bois et les châteaux écroulés.

Un long cri s’éleva.

— Un étranger! Mort! mort!

Cent bras étaient déjà levés sur Ordener. Il porta la main à son côté pour y chercher son sabre. — Noble jeune homme! dans son généreux élan il avait oublié qu’il était seul et désarmé.

— Attendez, attendez! cria une voix, la voix de celui en qui Ordener voyait l’envoyé de Schumacker.

C’était un petit homme gras, vêtu de noir, à l’oeil gai et faux. Il s’avança vers Ordener.

— Qui êtes-vous? lui dit-il.

Ordener ne répondit pas; il était saisi de toutes parts, et il n'y avait pas une place sur sa poitrine où ne s'appuyât la pointe d'une épée ou le canon d'un pistolet.

— Est-ce que tu as peur? demanda le petit homme avec un sourire.

— Si ta main était sur mon coeur au lieu de ces épées, dit froidement le jeune homme, tu verrais qu'il ne bat pas plus vite que le tien, en supposant que tu aies un coeur.

— Ah! ah! dit le petit homme, il fait le fier! eh bien! qu'il meure. — Et il tourna le dos.

— Donne-moi la mort, répliqua Ordener; c'est tout ce que je veux te devoir.

— Un instant, seigneur Hacket, dit un vieillard à barbe touffue, qui se tenait appuyé sur un long mousquet. Vous êtes ici chez moi, et j'ai seul le droit d'envoyer ce chrétien raconter aux morts ce qu'il a vu ici.

Le seigneur Hacket se mit à rire. — Ma foi, mon cher Jonas, comme il vous plaira! Peu m'importe que cet espion soit jugé par vous, pourvu qu'il soit condamné.

Le vieillard se tourna vers Ordener:

— Allons, dis-nous qui tu es, toi qui souhaitais si audacieusement de savoir qui nous sommes.

Ordener garda le silence. Entouré des étranges partisans de ce Schumacker, pour lequel il aurait si volontiers donné son sang, il n'éprouvait en ce moment qu'un désir infini de la mort.

— Sa courtoisie ne veut pas répondre, dit le vieillard. Quand le renard est pris, il ne crie plus. Tuez-le.

— Mon brave Jonas, reprit Hacket, que la mort de cet homme soit le premier exploit de Han d'Islande parmi vous.

— Oui, oui! crièrent une foule de voix.

Ordener étonné, mais toujours intrépide, chercha des yeux ce Han d'Islande, auquel il avait si vaillamment disputé sa vie le matin même, et vit, avec un redoublement de surprise, s'avancer vers lui un homme d'une stature colossale, vêtu du costume des montagnards. Ce géant fixa sur Ordener un regard atrocement stupide, et demanda une hache.

— Tu n'es pas Han d'Islande, dit Ordener avec force.

— Qu'il meure! qu'il meure! cria Hacket d'une voix furieuse.

Ordener vit qu'il fallait mourir. Il mit la main dans sa poitrine, afin d'en tirer les cheveux de son Éthel et de leur donner un dernier baiser. Ce mouvement fit tomber un papier de sa ceinture.

— Quel est ce papier? dit Hacket; Norbith, prenez ce papier.

Ce Norbith était un jeune homme dont les traits noirs et durs avaient une expression de noblesse. Il ramassa le papier et le déploya.

— Grand Dieu! s'écria-t-il, c'est la passe de mon pauvre ami Christophorus Nedlam, de ce malheureux camarade qu'ils ont exécuté, il n'y a pas huit jours, sur la place publique de Skongen, pour fausse monnaie.

— Eh bien! dit Hacket avec l'accent d'une attente trompée, gardez ce chiffon de papier. Je le croyais plus important. Vous, mon cher Han d'Islande, expédiez votre homme.

Le jeune Norbith se plaça devant Ordener, et s'écria:

— Cet homme est sous ma protection. Ma tête tombera avant qu'il tombe un cheveu de la sienne. Je ne souffrirai pas que le sauf-conduit de mon ami Christophorus Nedlam soit violé.

Ordener, si miraculeusement protégé, baissa la tête et s'humilia; car il se rappelait combien il avait dédaigneusement accueilli en lui-même le voeu touchant de l'aumônier Athanase Munder: — Puisse le don du mourant être un bienfait pour le voyageur!

— Bah! bah! dit Hacket, vous dites là des folies, mon brave Norbith.

Cet homme est un espion; il faut qu'il meure.

— Donnez-moi ma hache, répéta le géant.

— Il ne mourra pas! cria Norbith. Que dirait l'esprit de mon pauvre Nedlam, qu'ils ont indignement pendu? Je vous assure qu'il ne mourra pas; car Nedlam ne veut pas qu'il meure.

— En effet, dit le vieux Jonas, Norbith a raison. Comment voulez-vous qu'on tue cet étranger, seigneur Hacket? il a la passe de Christophorus Nedlam.

— Mais c'est un espion, c'est un espion, reprit Hacket.

Le vieillard se plaça près du jeune homme, devant Ordener, et tous deux dirent gravement:

— Il a la passe de Christophorus Nedlam, qui a été pendu à Skongen.

Hacket vit qu'il fallait céder; car tous les autres commençaient à murmurer, en disant que cet étranger ne pouvait mourir, puisqu'il portait le sauf-conduit de Nedlam le faux-monnayeur.

— Allons, dit-il entre ses dents avec une rage concentrée, qu'il vive donc. Au reste, c'est votre affaire.

— Ce serait le diable que je ne le tuerais point, dit Norbith triomphant.

En parlant ainsi, il se tourna vers Ordener.

— Écoute, poursuivit-il, tu dois être un bon frère, puisque tu as la passe de Nedlam, mon pauvre ami. Nous sommes les mineurs royaux. Nous nous révoltons pour qu'on nous délivre de la tutelle. Le seigneur Hacket, que tu vois, dit que nous prenons les armes pouf un certain comte Schumacker; mais moi je ne le connais pas. Étranger, notre cause est juste. Écoute, et réponds-moi comme si tu répondais à ton saint patron. Veux-tu être des nôtres?

Une idée passa dans l'esprit d'Ordener.

— Oui, répondit-il.

Norbith lui présenta un sabre, qu'il reçut en silence

— Frère, dit le jeune chef, si tu veux nous trahir, tu commenceras par me tuer.

En ce moment le son de la trompe retentit sous les arceaux de la mine, et l'on entendit des voix éloignées qui disaient: Voilà Kennybol.

XXXII

Il a des pensées dans la tête qui vont jusqu'aux cieux.
Romances espagnoles.

L'âme a quelquefois des inspirations subites, des illuminations soudaines, dont un volume entier de pensées et de réflexions n'exprimerait pas mieux l'étendue, ne sonderait pas plus la profondeur, que la clarté de mille flambeaux ne rendrait la lueur immense et rapide de l'éclair.

On n'essaiera donc pas d'analyser ici l'impulsion impérieuse et secrète qui, à la proposition du jeune Norbith, jeta le noble fils du vice-roi de Norvège parmi les bandits qui se révoltaient pour un proscrit. Ce fut tout à la fois, sans doute, un généreux désir d'approfondir, à tout prix, cette ténébreuse aventure, mêlé à un dégoût amer de la vie, à un insouciant désespoir de l'avenir; peut-être je ne sais quel doute de la culpabilité de Schumacker, inspiré par tout ce qu'offraient de louche et de faux les apparences diverses qui avaient frappé le jeune homme, par un instinct inconnu de la vérité, et surtout par son amour pour Éthel. Enfin, ce fut certainement une révélation intime du bien qu'un ami clairvoyant de Schumacker pourrait lui faire, au milieu de ses aveugles partisans.

Est-ce là le chef? ses regards m'effraient, je n'oserais lui parler.
MATURIN, Bertram.

Aux cris qui annonçaient le fameux chasseur Kennybol, Hacket s'élança précipitamment au-devant de lui, en laissant Ordener avec les deux autres chefs.

— Vous voila enfin, mon cher Kennybol! Venez que je vous présente à votre formidable chef, Han d'Islande.

À ce nom, Kennybol, qui arrivait pâle, haletant, les cheveux hérissés, le visage inondé de sueur et les mains teintes de sang, recula de trois pas.

— Han d'Islande!

— Allons, dit Hacket, rassurez-vous! il vient pour vous seconder. Ne voyez en lui qu'un ami, qu'un compagnon.

Kennybol ne l'entendait pas.

— Han d'Islande ici! répéta-t-il.

— Eh oui, dit Hacket, en réprimant un rire équivoque; allez-vous en avoir peur?

— Quoi! interrompit pour la troisième fois le chasseur, vous m'affirmez… Han d'Islande dans — cette mine!…

Hacket se tourna vers ceux qui l'entouraient:

— Est-ce que notre brave Kennybol est fou? Puis, s'adressant à Kennybol:

— Je vois que c'est la crainte de Han d'Islande qui vous a retardé.

Kennybol leva la main au ciel:

— Par Etheldera, la sainte martyre norvégienne, ce n'est pas la crainte de Han d'Islande, seigneur Hacket, mais bien Han d'Islande lui-même, je vous jure, qui m'a empêché d'être ici plus tôt.

Ces paroles firent éclater un murmure d'étonnement parmi la foule de montagnards et de mineurs qui entouraient les deux interlocuteurs, et jetèrent sur le front de Hacket le même nuage que l'aspect et le salut d'Ordener y avaient déjà fait naître un moment auparavant.

— Comment! que dites-vous? demanda-t-il en baissant la voix.

— Je dis, seigneur Hacket, que sans votre maudit Han l'Islandais j'aurais été ici avant le premier cri de la chouette.

— En vérité! Que vous a-t-il donc fait?

— Oh! ne me le demandez pas; je veux seulement que ma barbe blanchisse en un jour, comme le poil d’une hermine, si l’on me surprend de ma vie, puisqu’il est vrai que je vis encore, à la chasse d’un ours blanc.

— Est-ce que vous avez failli être dévoré par un ours? Kennybol haussa les épaules en signe de mépris:

— Un ours! voilà un redoutable ennemi! Kennybol dévoré par un ours!

Pour qui me prenez-vous, seigneur Hacket?

— Ah! pardon, dit Hacket en souriant.

— Si vous saviez ce qui m’est arrivé, mon brave seigneur, interrompit le vieux chasseur en baissant la voix, vous ne me répéteriez point que Han d’Islande est ici.

Hacket parut de nouveau un moment déconcerté. Il arrêta brusquement Kennybol par le bras, comme s’il craignait qu’il n’approchât davantage du point de la place souterraine où l’on apercevait, au-dessus des têtes des mineurs, la tête énorme du géant.

— Mon cher Kennybol, dit-il d’une voix presque solennelle, contez-moi, je vous prie, ce qui a causé votre retard. Vous sentez qu’au moment où nous sommes, tout peut être d’une haute importance.

— Cela est vrai, dit Kennybol après un moment de réflexion.

Alors, cédant aux instances réitérées de Hacket, il lui raconta comment il avait, le matin même, aidé de six compagnons, poussé un ours blanc jusqu’aux environs de la grotte de Walderhog, sans s’apercevoir, dans l’ardeur de la chasse, qu’il était si près de ce lieu redoutable; comment les plaintes de l’ours aux abois avaient attiré un petit homme, un monstre, un démon, qui, armé d’une hache de pierre, s’était jeté sur eux à la défense de l’ours. L’apparition de cette espèce de diable, qui ne pouvait être autre que Han, le démon islandais, les avait glacés tous sept de terreur; enfin, ses six malheureux camarades avaient été victimes des deux monstres, et lui, Kennybol, n’avait dû son salut qu’à une prompte fuite, qui n’avait pas été entravée, grâce à son agilité, à la fatigue de Han d’Islande, et, avant tout, à la protection du bienheureux patron des chasseurs, saint Sylvestre.

— Vous voyez, seigneur Hacket, dit-il en terminant son récit encore plein de son épouvante, et orné de toutes les fleurs de la rhétorique des montagnes, vous voyez que si je viens tard, ce n’est pas moi qu’il faut accuser, et qu’il est impossible que le démon d’Islande, que j’ai laissé ce matin avec son ours, s’acharnant sur les cadavres de mes six pauvres camarades dans la bruyère de Walderhog, soit maintenant, comme notre ami, dans cette mine d'Apsyl-Corh, à notre rendez-vous. Je vous proteste que cela ne se peut. Je le connais, à présent, ce démon incarné; je l'ai vu!

Hacket, qui avait tout écouté attentivement, prit la parole et dit d'une voix grave:

— Mon brave ami Kennybol, quand vous parlez de Han d'Islande ou de l'enfer, ne croyez rien impossible. Je savais tout ce que vous venez de me dire.

L'expression de l'extrême étonnement et de la plus naïve crédulité se peignit sur les traits sauvages du vieux chasseur des monts de Kole.

— Comment?

— … Oui, poursuivit Hacket, sur le visage duquel un observateur plus adroit eût peut-être démêlé quelque chose de triomphant et de sardonique, je savais tout, excepté pourtant que vous fussiez le héros de cette triste aventure. Han d'Islande me l'avait contée en me suivant ici.

— Vraiment! dit Kennybol; et son regard attaché sur Hacket venait de prendre un air de crainte et de respect.

Hacket continua avec le même sang-froid:

— Sans doute; mais maintenant, soyez tranquille, je vais vous conduire à ce formidable Han d'Islande.

Kennybol poussa un cri d'effroi.

— Soyez tranquille, vous dis-je, reprit Hacket. Voyez en lui votre chef et votre camarade; gardez-vous seulement de lui rappeler en rien ce qui s'est passé ce matin. Vous comprenez?

Il fallut céder, mais ce ne fut pas sans une vive répugnance intérieure qu'il consentit à se laisser présenter au démon. Ils s'avancèrent vers — le groupe où étaient Ordener, Jonas et Norbith.

— Mon bon Jonas, mon cher Norbith, dit Kennybol, que Dieu vous assiste!

— Nous, en avons besoin, Kennybol, dit Jonas. En ce moment le regard de Kennybol s'arrêta sur celui d'Ordener, qui cherchait le sien.

— Ah! vous voilà, jeune homme, dit-il en s'approchant vivement de lui et lui tendant sa main ridée et rude, soyez le bienvenu. Il paraît que votre hardiesse a eu bon succès?

Ordener, qui ne comprenait pas que ce montagnard parût le comprendre si bien, allait provoquer une explication, quand Norbith s'écria:

— Vous connaissez donc cet étranger, Kennybol?

— Par mon ange gardien, si je le connais! Je l'aime et je l'estime. Il est dévoué comme nous tous à la bonne cause que nous servons.

Et il lança vers Ordener un second regard d'intelligence, auquel celui-ci se préparait à répondre, lorsque Hacket, qui était allé chercher son géant, que tous ces bandits semblaient fuir avec effroi, les aborda tous quatre en disant:

— Mon brave chasseur Kennybol, voici votre chef, le fameux Han de Klipstadur!

Kennybol jeta sur le brigand gigantesque un coup d'oeil où il y avait plus de surprise encore que de crainte, et se pencha vers l'oreille de Hacket:

— Seigneur Hacket, le Han d'Islande que j'ai laissé ce matin à Walderhog était un petit homme.

Hacket lui répondit à voix basse:

— Vous oubliez, Kennybol! un démon!

— Il est vrai, dit le crédule chasseur, il aura changé de forme.

Et il se détourna en tremblant pour faire furtivement un signe de croix.

LESSING.

C'est dans une sombre forêt de vieux chênes, où pénètre à peine le pâle crépuscule du matin, qu'un homme de petite taille en aborde un autre qui est seul, et qui paraît l'attendre. L'entretien suivant commence à voix basse:

— Daigne votre grâce me pardonner si je l'ai fait attendre! Plusieurs incidents m'ont retardé.

— Lesquels?

— Le chef des montagnards, Kennybol, n'est arrivé au rendez-vous qu'à minuit; et nous avons en revanche été troublés par un témoin inattendu.

— Qui donc?

— C'est un homme qui s'est jeté comme un fou dans la mine au milieu de notre sanhédrin. J'ai pensé d'abord que c'était un espion, et j'ai voulu le faire poignarder; mais il s'est trouvé porteur de la sauvegarde de je ne sais quel pendu fort respecté de nos mineurs, et ils l'ont pris sous leur protection. Je pense, en y réfléchissant, que ce n'est sans doute qu'un voyageur curieux ou un savant imbécile. En tout cas, j'ai disposé mes mesures à son égard.

— Tout va-t-il bien du reste?

— Fort bien. Les mineurs de Guldbranshal et de Fa-roër, commandés par le jeune Norbith et le vieux Jonas, les montagnards de Kole, conduits par Kennybol, doivent être en marche en ce moment. À quatre milles de l'Étoile-Bleue, leurs compagnons de Hubfallo et de Sund-Moër les joindront; ceux de Kongsberg et la troupe des forgerons du Smiasen, qui ont déjà forcé la garnison de Walhstrom de se retirer, comme le noble comte le sait, les attendent quelques milles plus loin. — Enfin, mon cher et honoré maître, toutes ces bandes réunies feront halte cette nuit à deux milles de Skongen, dans les gorges du Pilier-Noir.

— Mais votre Han d'Islande, comment l'ont-ils reçu?

— Avec une entière crédulité.

— Que ne puis-je venger la mort de mon fils sur ce monstre! Quel malheur qu'il nous ait échappé!

— Mon noble seigneur, usez d’abord du nom de Han d’Islande pour vous venger de Schumacker; vous aviserez ensuite au moyen de vous venger de Han lui-même. Les révoltés marcheront aujourd’hui tout le jour et feront halte ce soir, pour passer la nuit dans le défilé du Pilier-Noir, à deux milles de Skongen.

— Comment! vous laisseriez pénétrer si près de Skongen un rassemblement aussi considérable? — Musdoemon!…

— Un soupçon, noble comte! Que votre grâce daigne envoyer, à l’instant même, un messager au colonel Voethaün, dont le régiment doit être en ce moment à Skongen; informez-le que toutes les forces des insurgés seront campées cette nuit sans défiance dans le défilé du Pilier-Noir, qui semble avoir été créé exprès pour les embuscades.

— Je vous comprends; mais pourquoi, mon cher, avoir tout disposé de façon que les rebelles soient si nombreux?

— Plus l’insurrection sera formidable, seigneur, plus le crime de Schumacker et votre mérite seront grands. D’ailleurs il importe qu’elle soit entièrement éteinte d’un seul coup.

— Bien! mais pourquoi le lieu de la halte est-il si voisin de Skongen?

— Parce que, dans toutes les montagnes, c’est le seul où la défense soit impossible. Il ne sortira de là que ceux qui sont désignés pour figurer devant le tribunal.

— À merveille! — Quelque chose, Musdoemon, me dit de terminer promptement cette affaire. Si tout est rassurant de ce côté, tout est inquiétant de l’autre. Vous savez que nous avons fait faire à Copenhague des recherches secrètes sur les papiers qui pouvaient être tombés au pouvoir de ce Dispolsen?

— Eh bien, seigneur?

— Eh bien, je viens d’apprendre à l’instant que cet intrigant avait eu des rapports mystérieux avec ce maudit astrologue Cumbysulsum.

— Qui est mort dernièrement?

— Oui; et que le vieux sorcier avait en mourant remis à l’agent de Schumacker des papiers.

— Damnation! il avait des lettres de moi, un exposé de notre plan!

— De votre plan, Musdoemon!

— Mille pardons, noble comte! Mais aussi pourquoi votre grâce avait-elle été se livrer à ce charlatan de Cumbysulsum? le vieux traître!

— Écoutez, Musdoemon, je ne suis pas comme vous un être sans croyance et sans foi. — Ce n’est pas sans de justes raisons, mon cher, que j’ai toujours eu confiance dans la science magique du vieux Cumbysulsum.

— Que votre grâce n’a-t-elle eu autant de défiance de sa fidélité que de confiance en sa science? Au surplus, ne nous alarmons pas, mon noble maître, Dispolsen est mort, ses papiers sont perdus; dans quelques jours il ne sera plus question de ceux auxquels ils pourraient servir.

— En tout cas quelle accusation pourrait monter jusqu’à moi?

— Ou jusqu’à moi, protégé par votre grâce?

— Oh oui, mon cher, vous pouvez, certes, compter sur moi; mais hâtons, je vous prie, le dénoûment de tout ceci; je vais envoyer le messager au colonel. Venez, mes gens m’attendent derrière ces halliers, et il faut reprendre le chemin de Drontheim, que le mecklembourgeois a quitté sans doute. Allons, continuez à me bien servir, et, malgré tous les Cumbysulsum et les Dispolsen de la terre, comptez sur moi à la vie et à la mort!

— Je prie votre grâce de croire… Diable!

Ici ils s’enfoncèrent tous deux dans le bois, dans les détours duquel leurs voix s’éteignirent peu à peu; et bientôt après on n’y entendit plus que le bruit des pas des deux chevaux qui s’éloignaient.

Romances espagnoles.

Pendant que la conversation qu’on vient de lire avait lieu dans une des forêts qui avoisinent le Smiasen, les révoltés, divisés en trois colonnes, sortirent de la mine de plomb d’Apsyl-Corh, par l’entrée principale, qui s’ouvre de plain-pied sur un ravin profond. Ordener, qui, malgré son désir de se rapprocher de Kennybol, avait été rangé dans la bande de Norbith, ne vit d’abord qu’une longue procession de torches, dont les feux, luttant avec les premières lueurs du jour, se réfléchissaient sur des haches, des fourches, des pioches, des massues armées de pointes de fer, d’énormes marteaux, des pics, des leviers et toutes les armes grossières que la révolte peut emprunter au travail, mêlées à d’autres armes régulières, qui annonçaient que cette révolte était une conspiration, des mousquets, des piques, des sabres, des carabines et des arquebuses. Quand le soleil eut paru, et que la lumière des torches ne fut plus que de la fumée, il put mieux observer l’aspect de cette singulière armée, qui s’avançait en désordre, avec des chants rauques et des cris sauvages, pareille à un troupeau de loups affamés qui vont à la conquête d'un cadavre. Elle était partagée en trois divisions, ou plutôt en trois foules. D'abord marchaient les montagnards de Kole, commandés par Kennybol, auquel ils ressemblaient tous par leur costume de peaux de bêtes, et presque par leur mine farouche et hardie. Puis venaient les jeunes mineurs de Norbith et les vieux de Jonas, avec leurs grands feutres, leurs larges pantalons, leurs bras entièrement nus et leurs visages noirs, qui tournaient vers le soleil des yeux stupides. Au-dessus de ces bandes tumultueuses flottaient pêle-mêle des bannières couleur de feu, sur lesquelles on lisait différentes devises, telles que: Vive Schumacker! — Délivrons notre libérateur! — Liberté aux mineurs! Liberté au comte de Griffenfeld! — Mort à Guldenlew! — Mort aux oppresseurs! Mort à d'Ahlefeld! — Les rebelles paraissaient plutôt considérer ces enseignes comme des fardeaux que comme des ornements, et elles passaient de main en main quand les porte-étendards étaient fatigués ou voulaient mêler le son discordant de leur trompe aux psalmodies et aux vociférations de leurs camarades.

L'arrière-garde de cette étrange armée se composait de dix chariots traînés par des rennes et de grands ânes, destinés sans doute à porter les munitions; et l'avant-garde, du géant amené par Hacket, qui marchait seul, armé d'une massue et d'une hache, et bien loin duquel venaient, avec une sorte de terreur, les premiers rangs commandés par Kennybol, qui ne le quittait pas des yeux, comme pour pouvoir suivre son chef diabolique dans les diverses transfigurations qu'il lui plairait de subir.

Ce torrent de rebelles descendait ainsi avec une rumeur confuse et en remplissant les bois de pins du bruit de la trompe des montagnes du Drontheimhus septentrional. Il fut bientôt grossi par les diverses bandes de Sund-Moër, de Hubfallo, de Kongsberg, et la troupe des forgerons du Smiasen, qui présentait un contraste bizarre avec le reste des révoltés. C'étaient des hommes grands et forts, armés de pinces et de marteaux, ayant pour cuirasses de larges tabliers de cuir, ne portant pour enseigne qu'une haute croix de bois, qui marchaient gravement et en cadence, avec une régularité plus réligieuse encore que militaire sans autre chant de guerre que les psaumes et les cantiques de la bible. Ils n'avaient de chef que leur porte-croix, qui s'avançait sans armes à leur tête.

Tout ce ramas d'insurgés ne rencontrait pas un être humain sur son passage. À leur approche, le chevrier poussait son troupeau dans une caverne, et le paysan désertait son village; car l’habitant des plaines et des vallées est partout le même, il craint la trompe des bandits de même que le cor des archers.

Ils traversèrent ainsi des collines et des forêts semées de rares bourgades, suivirent des routes sinueuses où l’on voyait plus de traces de bêtes fauves que de pas d’hommes, côtoyèrent des lagunes, franchirent des torrents, des ravins, des marais. Ordener ne connaissait aucun de ces lieux. Une fois seulement, son regard, se levant, rencontra a l’horizon l’apparence lointaine et bleuâtre d’une grande roche courbée. Il se pencha vers un de ses grossiers compagnons de voyage:

— Ami, quel est ce rocher là-bas, au sud, à droite?

— C’est le Cou-de-Vautour, le rocher d’Oëlmoe, répondit l’autre.

Ordener soupira profondément.

Ma fille, Dieu vous garde et vous veuille bénir!

RÉGNIER.

Guenon, perroquets, peignes et rubans, tout était prêt chez la comtesse d’Ahlefeld pour recevoir le lieutenant Frédéric. Elle avait fait venir à grands frais le dernier roman de la fameuse Scudéry. On l’avait, par son ordre, revêtu d’une riche reliure à fermoirs de vermeil ciselé, et placé entre les flacons d’essence et les boîtes de mouches, sur l’élégante toilette à pieds dorés, ornée de mosaïque de bois, dont elle avait meublé le boudoir futur de son cher enfant Frédéric. Quand elle eut ainsi parcouru le cercle minutieux de ces petits soins maternels, qui l’avaient un moment distraite de la haine, elle songea qu’elle n’avait plus autre chose à faire que de nuire à Schumacker et à Éthel. Le départ du général Levin les lui livrait sans défense.

Il s’était passé depuis peu dans le donjon de Munckholm une foule de choses sur lesquelles elle n’avait pu obtenir que des données très vagues. — Quel était le serf, vassal ou paysan, qui, à en croire les paroles très ambiguës et très embarrassées de Frédéric, s’était fait aimer de la fille de l’ex-chancelier? — Quels étaient les rapports du baron Ordener avec les prisonniers de Munckholm? — Quels étaient les motifs incompréhensibles de l’absence si singulière d’Ordener, dans un moment où les deux royaumes n’étaient occupés que de son prochain mariage avec cette Ulrique d’Ahlefeld qu’il paraissait dédaigner? — Enfin, que s’était-il passé entre Levin de Knud et Schumacker? — L’esprit de la comtesse se perdait en conjectures. Elle résolut enfin, pour éclaircir tous ces mystères, de hasarder une descente à Munckholm, conseil que lui donnaient à la fois sa curiosité de femme et ses intérêts d’ennemie.

Un soir qu’Éthel, seule dans le jardin du donjon, venait de graver, pour la sixième fois, avec le diamant d’une bague, je ne sais quel chiffre mystérieux sur le pilier noir de la poterne qui avait vu disparaître son Ordener, cette porte s’ouvrit. La jeune fille tressaillit. C’était la première fois que cette poterne s’ouvrait, depuis qu’elle s’était refermée sur lui.

Une grande femme pâle, vêtue de blanc, était devant elle. Elle présentait à Éthel un sourire doux comme du miel empoisonné, et il y avait, derrière son regard paisible et bienveillant, comme une expression de haine, de dépit et d'admiration involontaire.

Éthel la considéra avec étonnement, presque avec crainte. Depuis sa vieille nourrice, qui était morte entre ses bras, c'était la première femme qu'elle voyait dans la sombre enceinte de Munckholm.

— Mon enfant, dit doucement l'étrangère, vous êtes la fille du prisonnier de Munckholm?

Éthel ne put s'empêcher de détourner la tête; quelque chose en elle ne sympathisait pas avec l'étrangère, et il lui semblait qu'il y avait du venin dans le souffle qui accompagnait cette douce voix. — Elle répondit:

— Je m'appelle Éthel Schumacker. Mon père dit qu'on me nommait, dans mon berceau, comtesse de Tongsberg et princesse de Wollin.

— Votre père vous dit cela! s'écria la grande femme avec un accent qu'elle réprima aussitôt. Puis elle ajouta: — Vous avez éprouvé bien des malheurs!

— Le malheur m'a reçue à ma naissance dans ses bras de fer, répondit la jeune prisonnière; mon noble père dit qu'il ne me quittera qu'à ma mort.

Un sourire passa sur les lèvres de l'étrangère, qui reprit du ton de la pitié:

— Et vous ne murmurez pas contre ceux qui ont jeté votre vie dans ce cachot? vous ne maudissez pas les auteurs de votre infortune?

— Non, de peur que notre malédiction n'attire sur eux des maux pareils à ceux qu'ils nous font souffrir.

— Et, continua la femme blanche avec un front impassible, connaissez-vous les auteurs de ces maux dont vous vous plaignez?

Éthel réfléchit un moment et dit:

— Tout s'est fait par la volonté du ciel.

— Votre père ne vous parle jamais du roi?

— Le roi? c'est celui pour lequel je prie matin et soir sans le connaître.

Éthel ne comprit pas pourquoi l'étrangère se mordit les lèvres à cette réponse.

— Votre malheureux père ne vous nomme jamais, dans sa colère, ses implacables ennemis, le général Arensdorf, l'évêque Spollyson, le chancelier d'Ahlefeld?

— J'ignore de qui vous me parlez.

— Et connaissez-vous le nom de Levin de Knud?

Le souvenir de la scène qui s'était passée la surveille entre le gouverneur de Drontheim et Schumacker était trop récent dans l'esprit d'Éthel, pour que le nom de Levin de Knud ne la frappât point.

— Levin de Knud? dit-elle; il me semble que c'est cet homme pour lequel mon père a tant d'estime et presque tant d'affection.

— Comment! s'écria la grande femme.

— Oui, reprit la jeune fille, c'est ce Levin de Knud que mon seigneur et père défendait si vivement avant-hier contre le gouverneur de Drontheim.

Ces paroles redoublèrent la surprise de l'autre:

— Contre le gouverneur de Drontheim! Ne vous jouez pas de moi, ma fille. Ce sont vos intérêts qui m'amènent. Votre père prenait contre le gouverneur de Drontheim le parti du général Levin de Knud!

— Du général! il me semble que c'était du capitaine… Mais non; vous avez raison. — Mon père, poursuivit Éthel, paraissait conserver autant d'attachement à ce général Levin de Knud qu'il témoignait de haine au gouverneur du Drontheimhus.

— Voilà encore un étrange mystère! dit en elle-même la grande femme pâle, dont la curiosité s'allumait de plus en plus. — Ma chère enfant, que s'est-il donc passé entre votre père et le gouverneur de Drontheim?

L'interrogatoire fatiguait la pauvre Éthel, qui regarda fixement la grande femme.

— Suis-je donc une criminelle pour que vous m'interrogiez ainsi?

À ce mot si simple, l'inconnue parut interdite, comme si elle sentait le fruit de son adresse lui échapper. Elle reprit néanmoins, d'une voix légèrement émue:

— Vous ne me parleriez pas ainsi si vous saviez pourquoi et pour qui je viens.

— Quoi! dit Éthel, viendriez-vous de sa part? m'apporteriez-vous un message de lui?

Et tout son sang rougissait son beau visage; et tout son coeur s'était soulevé dans son sein, gonflé d'impatience et d'inquiétude.

— … De qui? demanda l'autre.

La jeune fille s'arrêta au moment de prononcer le nom adoré. Elle avait vu luire dans l'oeil de l'étrangère un éclair de sombre joie qui semblait un rayon de l'enfer. Elle dit tristement:

— Vous ne savez pas de qui je veux parler. L'expression de l'attente trompée se peignit pour la seconde fois sur le visage bienveillant de l'autre.

— Pauvre jeune fille! s'écria-t-elle, que pourrais-je faire pour vous?

Éthel n’entendait pas. Sa pensée était derrière les montagnes du septentrion, à la suite de l’aventureux voyageur. Sa tête s’était baissée sur son sein, et ses mains s’étaient jointes comme d’elles-mêmes.

— Votre père espère-t-il sortir de cette prison? Cette question, que l’inconnue répéta deux fois, ramena Éthel à elle-même.

— Oui, dit-elle.

Et une larme roula dans ses yeux.

Ceux de l’étrangère s’étaient animés à cette réponse.

— Il l’espère, dites-moi! et comment? par quel moyen? quand?

— Il espère sortir de cette prison, parce qu’il espère sortir de la vie.

Il y a quelquefois dans la simplicité d’une âme douce et jeune une puissance qui se joue des ruses d’un coeur vieilli dans la méchanceté. Cette pensée parut agiter l’esprit de la grande femme, car l’expression de son visage changea tout à coup; et, posant sa main froide sur le bras d’Éthel:

— Écoutez-moi, dit-elle d’un ton qui était presque de la franchise; avez-vous entendu dire que les jours de votre père sont de nouveau menacés d’une enquête juridique? qu’il est soupçonné d’avoir fomenté une révolte parmi les mineurs du Nord?

Ces mots de révolte et d’enquête n’offraient pas d’idée claire à Éthel; elle leva son grand oeil noir sur l’inconnue:

— Que voulez-vous dire?

— Que votre père conspire contre l’état; que son crime est presque découvert; que ce crime entraîne la peine de mort.

— Mort! crime!… s’écria la pauvre enfant.

— Crime et mort, dit gravement la femme étrangère.

— Mon père! mon noble père! poursuivit Éthel.

Hélas! lui qui passe ses jours à m’entendre lire l’Edda et l’Évangile! lui, conspirer! Que vous a-t-il donc fait?

— Ne me regardez pas ainsi; je vous le répète, je suis loin d’être votre ennemie. Votre père est soupçonné d’un grand crime, je vous en avertis. Peut-être, au lieu de ces témoignages de haine, aurais-je droit à quelque reconnaissance.

Ce reproche toucha Éthel.

— Oh! pardon, noble dame! pardon! Jusqu’ici quel être humain avons-nous vu qui ne fût de nos ennemis? J’ai été défiante envers vous; vous me le pardonnez, n’est-ce pas?

L’étrangère sourit.

— Quoi! ma fille! est-ce que jusqu’à ce jour vous n’avez pas encore rencontré un ami?

Une vive rougeur enflamma les joues d’Éthel. Elle hésita un moment.

— Oui. — Dieu connaît la vérité. Nous avons trouvé un ami, noble dame.

Un seul!

— Un seul! dit précipitamment la grande femme. Nommez-le-moi, de grâce; vous ne savez pas combien il est important. C’est pour le salut de votre père. Quel est cet ami?

— Je l’ignore, dit Éthel. L’inconnue pâlit.

— Est-ce parce que je veux vous servir que vous vous jouez de moi? Songez qu’il s’agit des jours de votre père. Quel est, dites, quel est l’ami dont vous me parliez?

— Le ciel sait, noble dame, que je ne connais de lui que son nom, qui est Ordener.

Éthel dit ces mots avec cette peine que l’on éprouve à prononcer devant un indifférent le nom sacré qui réveille en nous tout ce qui aime.

— Ordener! Ordener! répéta l’inconnue avec une émotion étrange, tandis que ses mains froissaient vivement la blanche broderie de son voile. — Et quel est le nom de son père? demanda-t-elle d’une voix troublée.

— Je ne sais, répondit la jeune fille. Qu’importent sa famille et son père! Cet Ordener, noble dame, est le plus généreux des hommes.

Hélas! l’accent qui accompagnait cette parole avait livré tout le secret du coeur d’Éthel à la pénétration de l’étrangère.

L’étrangère prit un air calme et composé, et fit cette demande sans quitter la jeune fille du regard:

— Avez-vous entendu parler du prochain mariage du fils du vice-roi avec la fille du grand-chancelier actuel, d’Ahlefeld?

Il fallut recommencer cette question, pour ramener l’esprit d’Éthel à des idées qui ne semblaient point l’intéresser.

— Je crois que oui, fut toute sa réponse.

Sa tranquillité, son air indifférent parurent surprendre l’inconnue.

— Eh bien! que pensez-vous de ce mariage?

Il lui fut impossible d’apercevoir la moindre altération dans les grands yeux d’Éthel tandis qu’elle répondait:

— En vérité, rien. Puisse leur union être heureuse!

— Les comtes Guldenlew et d’Ahlefeld, pères des deux fiancés, sont deux grands ennemis de votre père.

— Puisse, répéta doucement Éthel, l’union de leurs enfants être heureuse!

— Il me vient une idée, poursuivit l’astucieuse inconnue. Si les jours de votre père sont menacés, vous pourriez, à l’occasion de ce grand mariage, faire obtenir sa grâce par le fils du comte vice-roi.

— Les saints vous récompenseront de tous vos bons soins pour nous, noble dame; mais comment faire parvenir ma prière jusqu’au fils du vice-roi?

Ces paroles étaient prononcées avec tant de bonne foi qu’elles arrachèrent à l’étrangère un geste d’étonnement.

— Quoi! est-ce que vous ne le connaissez pas?

— Ce puissant seigneur! s’écria Éthel; vous oubliez qu’aucun de mes regards n’a encore franchi l’enceinte de cette forteresse.

— Mais vraiment, murmura entre ses dents la grande femme, que me disait donc ce vieux fou de Levin? Elle ne le connaît pas. — Impossible cependant! dit-elle en élevant la voix; vous devez avoir vu le fils du vice-roi, il est venu ici.

— Cela se peut, noble dame; de tous les hommes qui sont venus ici je n’ai jamais vu que lui, mon Ordener.

— Votre Ordener! interrompit l’inconnue. — Elle continua, sans paraître s’apercevoir de la rougeur d’Éthel: — Connaissez-vous un jeune homme au visage noble, à la taille élégante, à la démarche grave et assurée? son oeil est doux et austère, son teint frais comme celui d’une jeune fille, ses cheveux châtains.

— Oh! s’écria la pauvre Éthel, c’est lui, c’est mon fiancé, mon adoré Ordener! Dites-moi, noble et chère dame, m’apportez-vous de ses nouvelles? Où l’avez-vous rencontré? Il vous a dit qu’il daignait m’aimer, n’est-il pas vrai? Il vous a dit qu’il avait tout mon amour. Hélas! une malheureuse prisonnière n’a que son amour au monde. Ce noble ami! Il n’y a pas huit jours, je le voyais encore à cette même place, avec son manteau vert, sous lequel bat un si généreux coeur, et cette plume noire qui se balançait avec tant de grâce sur son beau front.

Elle n’acheva pas. Elle vit la grande femme inconnue trembler, pâlir et rougir, et crier d’une voix foudroyante à ses oreilles:

— Malheureuse! tu aimes Ordener Guldenlew, le fiancé d'Ulrique d'Ahlefeld, le fils du mortel ennemi de ton père, du vice-roi de Norvège!

Éthel tomba évanouie.

TUCAPEL.

Qu’entends-je? serions-nous découverts?

LOPE DE VEGA, l’Arauque dompté.

— Dis-moi, Guldon Stayper, mon vieux camarade, sais-tu que la bise du soir commence à me rabattre vigoureusement les poils de mon bonnet sur le visage?

C’était Kennybol, qui, détachant un moment son regard du géant qui marchait en tête des révoltés, s’était tourné à demi vers l’un des montagnards que le hasard d’une course désordonnée avait placé près de lui.

Celui-ci secoua la tête, et changea d’épaule la bannière qu’il portait, avec un grand soupir de lassitude.

— Hum! je crois, notre capitaine, que dans ces maudites gorges du Pilier-Noir, où le vent se précipite comme un torrent, nous n’aurons pas tout à fait aussi chaud cette nuit qu’une flamme qui danse sur la braise.

— Il faudra faire de tels feux que les vieilles chouettes en soient éveillées au haut des rochers, dans leurs palais de ruines. Je n’aime pas les chouettes; dans cette horrible nuit où j’ai vu la fée Ubfem, elle avait la forme d’une chouette.

— Par saint Sylvestre! interrompit Guldon Stayper en détournant la tête, l’ange du vent nous donne de furieux coups d’ailes! — Si l’on m’en croit, capitaine Kennybol, on mettra le feu à tous les sapins d’une montagne.

D’ailleurs ce sera une belle chose à voir qu’une armée se chauffant avec une forêt.

— À Dieu ne plaise, mon cher Guldon! et les chevreuils! et les gerfauts! et les faisans! fais cuire le gibier, à merveille; mais ne le fais pas brûler.

Le vieux Guldon se mit à rire:

— Notre capitaine, tu es bien toujours le même démon Kennybol, le loup des chevreuils, l’ours des loups, et le buffle des ours!

— Sommes-nous encore loin du Pilier-Noir? demanda une voix parmi les chasseurs.

— Compagnon, répondit Kennybol, nous entreront dans les gorges à la nuit tombante; nous voici dans un instant aux Quatre-Croix. Il se fit un moment de silence, pendant lequel on n’entendit que le bruit multiplié des pas, le gémissement de la bise, et le chant éloigné de la bande des forgerons du lac Smiasen.

— Ami Guldon Stayper, reprit Kennybol après avoir sifflé l’air du chasseur Rollon, tu viens de passer quelques jours à Drontheim?

— Oui, notre capitaine; notre frère Georges Stayper le pêcheur était malade, et j’ai été le remplacer pendant quelque temps dans sa barque, afin que sa pauvre famille ne mourût pas de faim pendant qu’il serait mort de maladie.

— Et puisque tu arrives de Drontheim, as-tu eu occasion de voir ce comte, le prisonnier… Schumacker… Gleffenhem… quel est son nom déjà? cet homme enfin au nom duquel nous nous révoltons contre la tutelle royale, et dont tu portes sans doute les armoiries brodées sur cette grande bannière couleur de feu?

— Elle est bien lourde! dit Guldon. — Tu veux parler du prisonnier du château-fort de Munckholm, le comte?… enfin soit. Et comment veux-tu, notre brave capitaine, que je l’aie vu? il m’aurait fallu, ajouta-t-il en baissant la voix, les yeux de ce démon qui marche devant nous, sans pourtant laisser derrière lui l’odeur du soufre, de ce Han d’Islande qui voit à travers les murs, ou l’anneau de la fée Mab qui passe par le trou des serrures. — Il n’y a en ce moment parmi nous, j’en suis sûr, qu’un seul homme qui ait vu le comte… le prisonnier dont tu me parles.

— Un seul? Ah! le seigneur Hacket? Mais ce Hacket n’est plus parmi nous. Il nous a quittés cette nuit pour retourner…

— Ce n’est point le seigneur Hacket que je veux dire, notre capitaine.

— Et qui donc?

— Ce jeune homme au manteau vert, à la plume noire, qui est tombé au milieu de nous cette nuit.

— Eh bien?

— Eh bien! dit Guldon en se rapprochant de Kennybol, c’est celui-là qui connaît le comte… ce fameux comte, enfin, comme je te connais, notre capitaine Kennybol.

Kennybol regarda Guldon, cligna de l’oeil gauche en faisant claquer ses dents, et lui frappa sur l’épaule avec cette exclamation triomphale qui échappe à notre amour-propre, quand nous sommes contents de notre pénétration: — Je m’en doutais!

— Oui, notre capitaine, poursuivit Guldon Stayper en replaçant l’étendard couleur de feu sur l’épaule délassée, je te proteste que le jeune homme vert a vu le comte… — je ne sais comment tu l’appelles, celui donc pour qui nous allons nous battre. — dans le donjon même de Munckholm, et qu’il ne paraissait pas attacher moins d’importance à entrer dans cette prison, que toi ou moi à pénétrer dans un parc royal.

— Et comment sais-tu cela, notre frère Guldon?

Le vieux montagnard saisit le bras de Kennybol, puis, entr’ouvrant sa peau de loutre avec une précaution presque soupçonneuse: — Regarde! lui dit-il.

— Par mon très saint patron! s’écria Kennybol, cela brille comme du diamant!

C’était en effet une riche boucle de diamants, qui attachait le grossier ceinturon de Guldon Stayper.

— Et il est aussi vrai que c’est du diamant, repartit celui-ci en laissant tomber le pan de sa casaque, qu’il est vrai que la lune est à deux journées de marche de la terre, et que le cuir de mon ceinturon est du cuir de buffle mort.

Mais les traits de Kennybol s’étaient rembrunis, et avaient passé de l’étonnement à la sévérité. Il baissa les yeux vers la terre en disant avec une sorte de solennité sauvage:

— Guldon Stayper, du village de Chol-Soe, dans les montagnes de Kole, ton père, Medprath Stayper, est mort à cent deux ans, sans avoir rien à se reprocher, car ce ne sont pas des forfaitures que de tuer par mégarde un daim ou un élan du roi. — Guldon Stayper, tu as sur ta tête grise cinquante-sept bonnes années, ce qui n’est jeunesse que pour le hibou. — Guldon Stayper, notre camarade, j’aimerais mieux pour toi que les diamants de cette boucle fussent des grains de mil, si tu ne l’as pas acquise légitimement, aussi légitimement que le faisan royal acquiert la balle de plomb du mousquet.

En prononçant cette singulière admonestation, il y avait dans l’accent du chef montagnard à la fois de la menace et de l’onction.

— Aussi vrai que notre capitaine Kennybol est le plus hardi chasseur de Kole, répondit Guldon sans s’émouvoir, et que ces diamants sont des diamants, je les possède en légitime propriété.

— Vraiment! reprit Kennybol avec une inflexion de voix qui tenait le milieu entre la confiance et le doute.

— Dieu et mon patron béni savent, reprit Guldon, que c’était un soir, au moment où je venais d’indiquer le Spladgest de Drontheim à des enfants de notre bonne mère la Norvège, qui apportaient le corps d’un officier trouvé sur les grèves d’Urchtal. — Il y a de ceci huit jours environ. — Un jeune homme s’avança vers ma barque: — À Munckholm! me dit-il. Je m’en souciais peu, notre capitaine; un oiseau ne vole pas volontiers autour d’une cage. Cependant le jeune seigneur avait la mine haute et fière, il était suivi d’un domestique qui menait deux chevaux; il avait sauté dans ma barque d’un air d’autorité; je pris mes rames, — c’est-à-dire les rames de mon frère. C’était mon bon ange qui le voulait. En arrivant, le jeune passager, après avoir parlé au seigneur sergent, qui commandait sans doute le fort, m’a jeté pour paiement, et Dieu m’entend, notre capitaine, oui, cette boucle de diamants que je viens de te montrer, et qui eût dû appartenir à mon frère Georges, et non à moi, si, à l’heure où le voyageur, que le ciel assiste, m’a pris, la journée que je faisais pour Georges n’eût été finie. Cela est la vérité, capitaine Kennybol.

— Bien.

Peu à peu la physionomie du chef reprit autant de sérénité que son expression, naturellement sombre et dure, le lui permettait, et il demanda à Guldon, d’une voix radoucie:

— Et tu es sûr, notre vieux camarade, que ce jeune homme est le même qui est maintenant derrière nous avec ceux de Norbith?

— Sûr. Je n’oublierais pas, entre mille visages, le visage de celui qui a fait ma fortune. D’ailleurs, c’est le même manteau, la même plume noire.

— Je te crois, Guldon.

— Et il est clair qu’il allait voir le fameux prisonnier; car, si ce n’eût pas été pour quelque grand mystère, il n’eût point récompensé ainsi le batelier qui l’amenait; et d’ailleurs, maintenant qu’il se retrouve avec nous…

— Tu as raison.

— Et j’imagine, notre capitaine, que le jeune étranger est peut-être bien plus en crédit auprès du comte que nous allons délivrer, que le seigneur Hacket, qui ne me semble bon, sur mon âme, qu’à miauler comme un chat sauvage.

Kennybol fit un signe de tête expressif.

— Notre camarade, tu as dit ce que j’allais dire. Je serais, dans toute cette affaire, bien plus tenté d’obéir à ce jeune seigneur qu’à l’envoyé Hacket. Que saint Sylvestre et saint Olaüs me soient en aide; si le démon islandais nous commande, je pense, camarade Guldon, que nous le devons beaucoup moins au corbeau bavard Hacket, qu’à cet inconnu.

— Vrai, notre capitaine? demanda Guldon. Kennybol ouvrait la bouche pour répondre, quand il se sentit frapper sur l’épaule. C’était Norbith.

— Kennybol, nous sommes trahis! Gormon Woëstroem vient du sud. Tout le régiment des arquebusiers marche contre nous. Les hulans de Slesvig sont à Sparbo; trois compagnies de dragons danois attendent des chevaux au village de Loevig. Tout le long de la route, il a vu autant de casaques vertes que de buissons. Hâtons-nous de gagner Skongen; ne faisons point halte avant d’y être entrés. Là, du moins, nous pourrons nous défendre. Encore, Gormon croit-il avoir vu des mousquetons briller à travers les broussailles, en longeant les gorges du Pilier-Noir.

Le jeune chef était pâle, agité; cependant son regard et le son de sa voix annonçaient encore l’audace et la résolution.

— Impossible! s’écria Kennybol.

— Certain! certain! dit Norbith.

— Mais le seigneur Hacket…

— Est un traître ou un lâche. Sois sûr de ce que je dis, camarade

Kennybol. — Où est-il, ce Hacket?

En ce moment le vieux Jonas aborda les deux chefs. Au découragement profond empreint dans tous ses traits, il était facile de voir qu’il était instruit de la fatale nouvelle.

Les regards des deux vieillards, Jonas et Kennybol, se rencontrèrent, et tous deux se mirent à hocher la tête comme d’un mutuel accord.

— Eh bien! Jonas? Eh bien! Kennybol? dit Norbith.

Cependant le vieux chef des mineurs de Fa-roër avait passé lentement sa main sur son front ridé, et il répondait à voix basse au coup d’oeil du vieux chef des montagnards de Kole:

— Oui, cela est trop vrai, cela est trop sûr. C’est Gormon Woëstroem qui les a vus.

— Si la chose est ainsi, dit Kennybol, que faire?

— Que faire? répliqua Jonas.

— J’estime, camarade Jonas, que nous agirions sagement de nous arrêter.

— Et plus sagement encore, notre frère Kennybol, de reculer.

— S’arrêter! reculer! s’écria Norbith. Il faut avancer!

Les deux vieillards tournèrent vers le jeune homme un regard froid et surpris.

— Avancer! dit Kennybol. Et les arquebusiers de Munckholm!

— Et les hulans de Slesvig! ajouta Jonas.

— Et les dragons danois! reprit Kennybol. Norbith frappa la terre du pied.

— Et la tutelle royale! et ma mère, qui meurt de faim et de froid!

— Démons! la tutelle royale! dit le mineur Jonas, avec une sorte de frémissement.

— Qu’importe! dit le montagnard Kennybol. Jonas prit Kennybol par la main.

— Notre compagnon le chasseur, vous n’avez pas l’honneur d’être pupille de notre glorieux souverain Christiern IV. Puisse le saint roi Olaüs. qui est au ciel, nous délivrer de la tutelle!

— Demande ce bienfait à ton sabre! dit Norbith d’une voix farouche.

— Les paroles hardies coûtent peu à un jeune homme, camarade Norbith, répondit Kennybol, mais songez que si nous allons plus loin, toutes ces casaques vertes…

— Je songe que nous aurons beau rentrer dans nos montagnes, comme des renards devant les loups, on connaît nos noms et notre révolte; et, mourir pour mourir, j’aime mieux la balle d’une arquebuse que la corde d’un gibet.

Jonas remua la tête de haut en bas en signe d’adhésion.

— Diable! la tutelle pour nos frères! le gibet pour nous! Norbith pourrait bien avoir raison.

— Donne-moi la main, mon brave Norbith, dit Kennybol; il y a danger des deux côtés. Il vaut mieux marcher droit au précipice qu’y tomber à reculons.

— Allons! allons donc! s’écria le vieux Jonas, en faisant sonner le pommeau de son sabre.

Norbith leur serra vivement la main.

— Frères, écoutez! Soyez audacieux comme moi, je serai prudent comme vous. Ne nous arrêtons aujourd’hui qu’à Skongen; la garnison est faible et nous l’écraserons. Franchissons, puisqu’il le faut, les défilés du Pilier-Noir, mais dans un profond silence. Il faut les traverser, quand même ils seraient surveillés par l’ennemi.

— Je crois que les arquebusiers ne sont pas encore au pont de l’Ordals, avant Skongen. Mais, n’importe. Silence!

— Silence! soit, répéta Kennybol.

— Maintenant, Jonas, reprit Norbith, retournons tous deux à notre poste. Demain peut-être nous serons à Drontheim, malgré les arquebusiers, les hulans, les dragons et tous les justaucorps verts du midi.

Les trois chefs se quittèrent. Bientôt le mot d’ordre silence! passa de rang en rang, et cette bande de rebelles, un moment auparavant si tumultueuse, ne fut plus, dans ces déserts rembrunis par les approches de la nuit, que comme une troupe de fantômes muets, qui se promène sans bruit dans les sentiers tortueux d’un cimetière.

Cependant la route qu’ils suivaient se rétrécissait de moment en moment, et semblait s’enfoncer par degrés entre deux remparts de rochers qui devenaient de plus en plus escarpés. À l’instant où la lune rougeâtre se leva au milieu d’un amas froid de nuages qui déroulaient autour d’elle leurs formes bizarres avec une mobilité fantastique, Kennybol s’inclina vers Guldon Stayper:

— Nous allons entrer dans le défilé du Pilier-Noir. Silence!

En effet, on entendait déjà le bruit du torrent qui suit entre les deux montagnes tous les détours du chemin, et l’on voyait au midi l’énorme pyramide oblongue de granit, qu’on a nommée le Pilier-Noir, se dessiner sur le gris du ciel et sur la neige des montagnes environnantes; tandis que l’horizon de l’ouest, chargé de brouillards, était borné par l’extrémité de la forêt du Sparbo et par un long amphithéâtre de rochers, étagés comme un escalier de géants.

Les révoltés, contraints d’allonger leurs colonnes dans ces routes tortueuses étranglées entre deux montagnes, continuèrent leur marche. Ils pénétrèrent dans ces gorges profondes sans allumer de torches, sans pousser de clameurs. Le bruit même de leurs pas ne s’entendait point au milieu du fracas assourdissant des cascades et des rugissements d'un vent violent qui ployait les forêts druidiques et faisait tournoyer les nuées autour des pitons revêtus de glace et de neige. Perdue dans les sombres profondeurs du défilé, la lumière souvent voilée de la lune, ne descendait pas jusqu'aux fers de leurs piques, et les aigles blancs qui passaient par intervalles au-dessus de leurs têtes ne se doutaient pas qu'une aussi grande multitude d'hommes troublât en ce moment leurs solitudes.

Une fois le vieux Guldon Stayper toucha l'épaule de Kennybol de la crosse de sa carabine.

— Capitaine! notre capitaine! je vois quelque chose reluire derrière cette touffe de houx et de genêts.

— Je le vois également, répondit le chef montagnard; c'est l'eau du torrent qui réfléchit les nuages.

Et l'on passa outre.

Une autre fois Guldon arrêta brusquement son chef par le bras.

— Regarde, lui dit-il, ne sont-ce pas des mousquetons qui brillent là-haut dans l'ombre de ce rocher?

Kennybol secoua la tête, puis après un moment d'attention: — Rassure-toi, frère Guldon. C'est un rayon de la lune qui tombe sur un pic de glace.

Aucun sujet d'alarme ne se présenta plus autour d'eux, et les diverses bandes, paisiblement déroulées dans les sinuosités du défilé, oublièrent insensiblement tout ce que la position du lieu présentait de danger.

Après deux heures de marche souvent pénible, au milieu des troncs d'arbres et des quartiers de granit dont le chemin était obstrué, l'avant-garde entra dans le montueux bouquet de sapins qui termine la gorge du Pilier-Noir, et au-dessus duquel pendent de hauts rochers noirs et moussus.

Guldon Stayper se rapprocha de Kennybol, affirmant qu'il se félicitait d'être enfin sur le point de sortir de ce maudit coupe-gorge, et qu'il fallait rendre grâce à saint Silvestre de ce que le Pilier-Noir ne leur avait pas été fatal.

Kennybol se mit à rire, jurant qu'il n'avait jamais partagé ces terreurs de vieilles femmes; car pour la plupart des hommes, quand le péril est passé, il n'a point existé, et l'on cherche alors à prouver, par l'incrédulité que l'on montre, le courage qu'on n'aurait peut-être pas montré.

En ce moment, deux petites lueurs rondes, pareilles à deux charbons ardents, qui se mouvaient dans l'épaisseur du taillis, appelèrent son attention.

— Par le salut de mon âme! dit-il à voix basse, en secouant le bras de Guldon, voilà, certes, deux yeux de braise qui doivent appartenir au plus beau chatpard qui ait jamais miaulé dans un hallier.

— Tu as raison, répondit le vieux Stayper, et s’il ne marchait pas devant nous, je croirais plutôt que ce sont les yeux maudits du démon d’Isl…

— Chut! cria Kennybol.

Puis, saisissant sa carabine:

— En vérité, poursuivit-il, il ne sera pas dit qu’une aussi belle pièce aura passé impunément sous les yeux de Kennybol.

Le coup était parti avant que Guldon Stayper, qui s’était jeté sur le bras de l’imprudent chasseur, eût pu l’arrêter. — Ce ne fut pas la plainte aiguë d’un chat sauvage qui répondit à la bruyante détonation de la carabine, ce fut un affreux grondement de tigre, suivi d’un éclat de rire humain, plus affreux encore.

On n’entendit pas le retentissement du coup de feu se prolonger, et mourir d’écho en écho dans les profondeurs des montagnes; car à peine la lumière de la carabine eut-elle brillé dans la nuit, à peine le bruit fatal de la poudre eut-il éclaté dans le silence, qu’un millier de voix formidables s’élevèrent inattendues sur les monts, dans les gorges, dans les forêts; qu’un cri de vive le Roi! immense comme un tonnerre, roula sur la tête des rebelles, à leurs côtés, devant et derrière eux, et que la lueur meurtrière d’une mousqueterie terrible, éclatant de toutes parts, les frappant et les éclairant à la fois, leur fit voir, parmi les rouges tourbillons de fumée, un bataillon derrière chaque rocher, et un soldat derrière chaque arbre.

XXXVIII

Aux armes! aux armes! capitaines!

Le captif d’Ochali.

Qu’on veuille bien recommencer avec nous la journée qui vient de s’écouler, et se transporter à Skongen, où, tandis que les insurgés sortaient de la mine de plomb d’Apsyl-Corh, est entré le régiment des arquebusiers, que nous avons vu en marche au trentième chapitre de cette très véridique narration.

Après avoir donné quelques ordres pour le logement des soldats qu’il commandait, le baron Voethaün, colonel des arquebusiers, allait franchir le seuil de l’hôtel qui lui était destiné près de la porte de la ville, quand il sentit une main lourde se poser familièrement sur son épaule. Il se retourna.

C’était un homme de petite taille, dont un grand chapeau d’osier, qui couvrait ses traits, ne laissait apercevoir que la barbe rousse et touffue. Il était soigneusement enveloppé des plis d’une espèce de manteau de bure grise, qui, à un reste de capuchon qu’on y voyait pendre, paraissait avoir été une robe d’ermite, et ne laissait apercevoir que ses mains cachées sous de gros gants.

— Brave homme, demanda brusquement le colonel, que diable me voulez-vous?

— Colonel des arquebusiers de Munckholm, répondit l’homme avec une expression bizarre, suis-moi un instant, j’ai un avis à te donner.

À cette étrange invitation, le baron resta un moment surpris et muet.

— Un avis important, colonel, répéta l’homme aux gros gants.

Cette insistance détermina le baron Voethaün. Dans le moment de crise où se trouvait la province, et avec la mission qu’il remplissait, aucun renseignement n’était à dédaigner. — Allons, dit-il.

Le petit homme marcha devant lui, et dès qu’ils furent hors de la ville il s’arrêta: — Colonel, as-tu bonne envie d’exterminer d’un seul coup tous les révoltés?

Le colonel se prit à rire:

— Mais ce ne serait point mal commencer la campagne.

— Eh bien! fais placer dès aujourd’hui en embuscade tous tes soldats dans les gorges du Pilier-Noir, à deux milles de cette ville; les bandes y camperont cette nuit. Au premier feu que tu verras briller, fonds sur eux avec les tiens. La victoire sera aisée.

— Brave homme, l’avis est bon, et je vous en remercie. Mais comment savez-vous ce que vous me dites?

— Si tu me connaissais, colonel, tu me demanderais plutôt comment il se pourrait faire que je ne le susse point.

— Qui donc êtes-vous?

L’homme frappa du pied.

— Je ne suis point venu ici pour te dire cela.

— Ne craignez rien. Qui que vous soyez, le service que vous rendez sera votre sauvegarde. Peut-être étiez-vous du nombre des rebelles?

— J’ai refusé d’en être.

— Alors pourquoi taire votre nom, puisque vous êtes un fidèle sujet du roi?

— Que t’importe?

Le colonel voulut tirer encore quelques éclaircissements de ce singulier donneur d’avis.

— Dites-moi, est-il vrai que les brigands soient commandés par le fameux Han d’Islande?

— Han d’Islande! répéta le petit homme avec une inflexion de voix extraordinaire.

Le baron recommença sa question. Un éclat de rire, qui eût pu passer pour un rugissement, fut toute la réponse qu’il put obtenir. Il essaya plusieurs autres questions sur le nombre et les chefs des mineurs; le petit homme lui ferma la bouche.

— Colonel des arquebusiers de Munckholm, je t’ai dit tout ce que j’avais à te dire. Embusque-toi dès aujourd’hui dans le défilé du Pilier-Noir avec ton régiment entier, et tu pourras écraser tout ce troupeau d’hommes.

— Vous ne voulez pas me dévoiler qui vous êtes; ainsi vous vous privez de la reconnaissance du roi; mais il n’en est pas moins juste que le baron Voethaün vous témoigne sa gratitude du service que vous lui rendez.

Le colonel jeta sa bourse aux pieds du petit homme.

— Garde ton or, colonel, dit celui-ci. Je n’en ai pas besoin; et, ajouta-t-il, en montrant un gros sac suspendu à sa ceinture de corde, s’il te fallait un salaire pour tuer ces hommes, j’aurais encore, colonel, de l’or à te donner en paiement de leur sang.

Avant que le colonel fût revenu de l’étonnement où l’avaient jeté les inexplicables paroles de cet être mystérieux, il avait disparu.

Le baron Voethaün retourna lentement sur ses pas, en se demandant ce qu’on devait ajouter de foi aux avis de cet homme. Au moment où il rentrait dans son hôtel, on lui remit une lettre scellée des armes du grand-chancelier. C’était en effet un message du comte d’Ahlefeld, où le colonel retrouva, avec une surprise facile à concevoir, le même avis et le même conseil que venait de lui donner aux portes de la ville l’incompréhensible personnage au chapeau d’osier et aux gros gants.

XXXIX

Cent bannières flottaient sur les têtes des braves, des ruisseaux de sang coulaient de toutes parts, et la mort paraissait préférable à la fuite. Un barde saxon aurait appelé cette nuit la fête des épées; le cri des aigles fondant sur leur proie, ce bruit de guerre, aurait été plus flatteur à son oreille que les chants joyeux d’un festin de noces.

WALTER SCOTT. Ivanhoë.

On n’entreprendra pas de décrire ici l’épouvantable confusion qui rompit les colonnes déjà désordonnées des rebelles, quand le fatal défilé leur montra soudain toutes ses cimes hérissées, tous ses antres peuplés d’ennemis inattendus. Il eût été difficile de distinguer si le long cri, formé de mille cris, qui s’échappa de leurs rangs ainsi inopinément foudroyés, était un cri de désespoir, d’épouvante ou de rage. Le feu terrible que vomissaient sur eux de toutes parts les pelotons démasqués des troupes royales s’accroissait de moment en moment; et, avant qu’il fût parti de leurs lignes un autre coup de mousquet que le funeste coup de Kennybol, ils ne voyaient déjà plus autour d’eux qu’un nuage étouffant de fumée embrasée à travers lequel volait aveuglément la mort, où chacun d’eux, isolé, ne reconnaissait que soi-même, et distinguait à peine de loin les arquebusiers, les dragons, les hulans, qui se montraient confusément au front des rochers et sur la lisière des taillis, comme des diables dans une fournaise.

Toutes ces bandes, ainsi éparses dans une longueur d’environ un mille, sur un chemin étroit et tortueux, bordé d’un côté d’un torrent profond, de l’autre d’une muraille de rochers, ce qui leur ôtait toute facilité de se replier sur elles-mêmes, ressemblaient à ce serpent que l’on brise en le frappant sur le dos, lorsqu’il a déroulé tous ses anneaux, et dont les tronçons vivants se roulent longtemps dans leur écume, cherchant encore à se réunir.

Quand la première surprise fut passée, le même désespoir parut animer, comme une âme commune, tous ces hommes naturellement farouches et intrépides. Furieux de se voir ainsi écraser sans défense, cette foule de brigands poussa une clameur comme un seul corps, une clameur qui couvrit un moment tout le bruit des ennemis triomphants; et quand ceux-ci les virent sans chefs, sans ordre, presque sans armes, gravir, sous un feu terrible, des rochers à pic, s’attacher des dents et des poings à des ronces au-dessus des précipices, en agitant des marteaux et des fourches de fer, ces soldats si bien armés, si bien rangés, si sûrement postés, et qui n'avaient pas encore perdu un seul des leurs, ne purent se défendre d'un mouvement d'effroi involontaire.

Il y eut plusieurs fois de ces barbares qui parvinrent, tantôt sur des ponts de morts, tantôt en s'élevant sur les épaules de leurs camarades, appliqués aux pentes des rocs comme des échelles vivantes, jusqu'aux sommets occupés par les assaillants; mais à peine avaient-ils crié: Liberté! à peine avaient-ils élevé leurs haches ou leurs massues noueuses; à peine avaient-ils montré leurs noirs visages, tout écumants d'une rage convulsive, qu'ils étaient précipités dans l'abîme, entraînant avec eux ceux de leurs hasardeux compagnons qu'ils rencontraient dans leur chute suspendus à quelque buisson ou embrassant quelque pointe de roche.

Les efforts de ces infortunés pour fuir et pour se défendre étaient vains; toutes les issues du défilé étaient fermées; tous les points accessibles étaient hérissés de soldats. La plupart de ces malheureux rebelles expiraient en mordant le sable de la route, après avoir brisé leurs bisaiguës ou leurs coutelas sur quelque éclat de granit; quelques-uns, croisant les bras, l'oeil fixé à terre, s'asseyaient sur des pierres au bord du chemin, et là ils attendaient, en silence et immobiles, qu'une balle les jetât dans le torrent. Ceux d'entre eux que la prévoyance de Hacket avait armés de mauvaises arquebuses dirigeaient au hasard quelques coups perdus vers la crête des rochers, vers l'ouverture des cavernes d'où tombaient sans cesse sur eux de nouvelles pluies de balles. Une rumeur tumultueuse, où l'on distinguait les cris furieux des chefs et les commandements tranquilles des officiers, se mêlait incessamment au fracas intermittent et fréquent des décharges, tandis qu'une sanglante vapeur montait et fuyait au-dessus du lieu de carnage, jetant au front des montagnes de grandes lueurs tremblantes; et que le torrent, blanchi d'écume, passait comme un ennemi, entre ces deux troupes d'hommes ennemis, emportant avec lui sa proie de cadavres.

Mais, dès les premiers moments de l'action, ou plutôt de la boucherie, c'étaient les montagnards de Kole, commandés par le brave et imprudent Kennybol, qui avaient le plus souffert. On se souvient qu'ils formaient l'avant-garde de l'armée rebelle, et qu'ils étaient engagés dans le bois de pins qui termine le défilé. A peine le malencontreux Kennybol eut-il armé son arquebuse, que ce bois, peuplé soudain, en quelque sorte par magie, de tirailleurs ennemis, les enferma d'un cercle de feu; tandis que, du sommet d'une hauteur en esplanade dominée par quelques grandes roches penchées, un bataillon entier du régiment de Munckholm, formé en équerre, les foudroyait sans relâche d’une mousqueterie épouvantable. Dans cette horrible crise, Kennybol, éperdu, jeta les yeux vers le mystérieux géant, n’attendant plus de salut que d’un pouvoir surhumain, tel que celui de Han d’Islande; mais il ne vit point le formidable démon déployer soudain deux ailes immenses, et s’élever au-dessus des combattants en vomissant des flammes et des foudres sur les arquebusiers; il ne le vit point grandir tout à coup jusqu’aux nuages, et renverser une montagne sur les assaillants, ou frapper du pied la terre, et ouvrir un abîme sous le bataillon embusqué. Ce formidable Han d’Islande recula comme lui dès la première bordée d’arquebusades, et vint à lui d’un visage presque troublé, demandant une carabine, attendu, disait-il avec une voix assez ordinaire, qu’en un pareil moment sa hache lui était aussi inutile que la quenouille d’une vieille femme.

Kennybol, étonné, mais toujours aussi crédule, remit son propre mousqueton au géant avec un effroi qui lui faisait presque oublier la crainte des balles qui pleuvaient autour de lui. Espérant toujours un prodige, il s’attendit encore à voir son arme fatale devenir entre les mains de Han d’Islande aussi grosse qu’un canon, ou se métamorphoser en un dragon ailé lançant du feu par les yeux, la gueule et les narines. Il n’en fut rien, et l’étonnement du pauvre chasseur fut au comble quand il vit le démon charger comme lui la carabine de poudre et de plomb ordinaire, la mettre en joue à sa manière, et lâcher tout simplement son coup, sans même ajuster aussi bien que lui, Kennybol, aurait pu le faire. Il le regarda avec une morne stupeur répéter cette opération toute machinale plusieurs fois de suite; et, convaincu enfin qu’il fallait renoncer à un miracle, il songea à tirer ses compagnons et lui-même du mauvais pas où ils se trouvaient, par quelque moyen humain. Déjà son pauvre vieux camarade Guldon Stayper était tombé à ses côtés, criblé de blessures; déjà tous les montagnards, épouvantés et ne pouvant fuir, cernés de toutes parts, se serraient les uns contre les autres, sans songer à se défendre, avec de lamentables clameurs. Kennybol comprit et vit combien cet amas d’hommes donnait de sûreté aux coups de l’ennemi, dont chaque décharge lui enlevait une vingtaine des siens. Il ordonna à ses malheureux compagnons de s’éparpiller, de se jeter dans les taillis qui longent le chemin, beaucoup plus large en cet endroit que dans le reste de la gorge du Pilier-Noir, de se cacher sous les broussailles, et de riposter de leur mieux au feu de plus en plus meurtrier des tirailleurs et du bataillon. Les montagnards, pour la plupart bien armés, parce qu’ils étaient tous chasseurs, exécutèrent l’ordre de leur chef avec une soumission qu’il n’eût peut-être pas obtenue dans un moment moins critique; car, en face du danger, les hommes en général perdent la tête, et alors ils obéissent assez volontiers à celui qui se charge d’avoir du sang-froid et de la présence d’esprit pour tous.

Cette mesure sage était loin cependant d’être la victoire, ou seulement le salut. Il y avait déjà plus de montagnards étendus hors de combat qu’il n’en restait debout, et, malgré l’exemple et les encouragements de leur chef et du géant, plusieurs d’entre eux, s’appuyant sur leurs mousquets inutiles, ou s’étendant auprès des blessés, avaient pris obstinément le parti de recevoir la mort sans avoir la peine de la donner. On s’étonnera peut-être que ces hommes, accoutumés tous les jours à braver la mort en courant de glaciers en glaciers à la poursuite des bêtes féroces, eussent si tôt perdu courage; mais, qu’on ne s’y trompe pas, dans les coeurs vulgaires, le courage est local; on peut rire devant la mitraille, et trembler dans les ténèbres ou au bord d’un précipice; on peut affronter chaque jour les animaux farouches, franchir des abîmes d’un bond, et fuir devant une décharge d’artillerie. Il arrive souvent que l’intrépidité n’est qu’habitude, et que, pour avoir cessé de craindre la mort sous telle ou telle forme, on ne l’en redoute pas moins.

Kennybol, entouré des monceaux de ses frères expirants, commençait lui-même à désespérer, quoiqu’il n’eût encore reçu qu’une légère atteinte au bras gauche, et qu’il vît le diabolique géant continuer son office de mousquetaire avec l’impassibilité la plus rassurante. Tout à coup il aperçut, dans le fatal bataillon rangé sur la hauteur, se manifester une confusion extraordinaire, et qui ne pouvait être certainement causée par le peu de dommage que lui faisait éprouver le très faible feu de ses montagnards. Il entendit d’affreux cris de détresse, des imprécations de mourants, des paroles d’épouvante, s’élever de ce peloton victorieux. Bientôt la mousqueterie se ralentit, la fumée s’éclaircit, et il put voir distinctement d’énormes quartiers de granit tomber sur les arquebusiers de Munckholm du haut de la roche élevée qui dominait le plateau où ils étaient en bataille. Ces éclats de rocs se suivaient dans leur chute avec une horrible rapidité; on les entendait se briser à grand bruit les uns sur les autres, et rebondir parmi les soldats, qui, rompant leurs lignes, se hâtaient de descendre en désordre de la hauteur et fuyaient dans toutes les directions.

À ce secours inattendu, Kennybol tourna la tête; — le géant était pourtant encore là! Le montagnard resta interdit, car il avait pensé que Han d’Islande avait enfin pris son vol et s’était placé au haut de ce rocher d’où il écrasait l’ennemi. Il éleva les yeux vers le sommet d’où tombaient les formidables masses, et ne vit rien. Il ne pouvait donc supposer qu’une partie des rebelles étaient parvenus à ce redoutable poste, puisqu’on ne voyait point briller d’armes, puisqu’on n’entendait point de cris de triomphe.

Cependant le feu du plateau avait entièrement cessé; l’épaisseur des arbres cachait les débris du bataillon qui se ralliait sans doute au bas de la hauteur. La mousqueterie des tirailleurs était même devenue moins vive. Kennybol, en chef habile, profita de cet avantage bien inespéré; il ranima ses compagnons, et leur montra, à la sombre lueur qui rougissait toute cette scène de carnage, le monceau de cadavres entassés sur l’esplanade parmi les quartiers de rocs qui continuaient de tomber d’intervalle en intervalle. Alors les montagnards répondirent à leur tour par des clameurs de victoire aux gémissements de leurs ennemis; ils se formèrent en colonne, et, bien que toujours incommodés par les tirailleurs épars dans les halliers, ils résolurent, pleins comme d’un courage nouveau, de sortir de vive force de ce funeste défilé.

La colonne ainsi formée allait s’ébranler; déjà Kennybol donnait le signal avec sa trompe, au bruit des acclamations Liberté! liberté! Plus de tutelle! quand le son du tambour et du cor, sonnant la charge, se fit entendre devant eux; puis le reste du bataillon de l’esplanade, grossi de quelques renforts de soldats frais, déboucha à portée de carabine d’un tournant de la route, et montra aux montagnards un front hérissé de piques et de bayonnettes, soutenu de rangs nombreux dont l’oeil ne pouvait sonder la profondeur. Arrivé ainsi à l’improviste en vue de la colonne de Kennybol, le bataillon fit halte, et celui qui paraissait le commander agita une petite bannière blanche en s’avançant vers les montagnards, escorté d’un trompette.

L’apparition imprévue de cette troupe n’avait point déconcerté Kennybol. Il y a un point, dans le sentiment du danger, où la surprise et la crainte sont impossibles. Aux premiers bruits du cor et du tambour, le vieux renard de Kole avait arrêté ses compagnons. Au moment où le front du bataillon se déploya en bon ordre, il fit charger toutes les carabines et disposa ses montagnards deux par deux, afin de présenter moins de surface aux décharges de l’ennemi. Il se plaça lui-même en tête, à côté du géant, avec lequel, dans la chaleur de l’action, il commençait presque à se familiariser, ayant osé remarquer que ses yeux n’étaient pas précisément aussi flamboyants que la fournaise d’une forge, et que les prétendues griffes de ses mains ne s’éloignaient pas autant qu’on le disait de la forme des ongles humains.

Quand il vit le commandant des arquebusiers royaux s’avancer ainsi comme pour capituler, et le feu des tirailleurs s’éteindre tout à fait, bien que leurs cris d’appel, qui retentissaient de toutes parts, décelassent encore leur présence dans le bois, il suspendit un instant ses préparatifs de défense.

Cependant l’officier à la bannière blanche était parvenu au milieu de l’espace qui divisait les deux colonnes; il s’arrêta, et le trompette qui l’accompagnait sonna trois fois la sommation. Alors l’officier cria d’une voix forte, que les montagnards entendirent distinctement, malgré le fracas toujours croissant dont le combat remplissait derrière eux les gorges de la montagne:

— Au nom du roi! la grâce du roi est accordée à ceux des rebelles qui mettront bas les armes, et livreront leurs chefs à la souveraine justice de sa majesté!

Le parlementaire avait à peine prononcé ces paroles qu’un coup de feu partit d’un taillis voisin. L’officier frappé chancela; il fit quelques pas en élevant sa bannière, et tomba en s’écriant: — Trahison!

Nul ne sut de quelle main venait le coup fatal.

— Trahison! lâcheté! répéta le bataillon des arquebusiers avec des frémissements de rage.

Et une effroyable salve de mousqueterie foudroya les montagnards.

— Trahison! reprirent à leur tour les montagnards, furieux de voir leurs frères tomber à leurs côtés.

Et une décharge générale répondit à la bordée inattendue des soldats royaux.

— Sur eux! camarades! mort à ces lâches! Mort! crièrent les officiers des arquebusiers.

— Mort! mort! répétèrent les montagnards. Et les combattants des deux partis s’élancèrent les sabres nus, et les deux colonnes se rencontrèrent presque sur le corps du malheureux officier, avec un horrible bruit d’armes et de clameurs.

Les rangs enfoncés se mêlèrent. Chefs rebelles, officiers royaux, soldats, montagnards, tous, pêle-mêle, se heurtèrent, se saisirent, s’étreignirent, comme deux troupeaux de tigres affamés qui se joignent dans un désert. Les longues piques, les bayonnettes, les pertuisanes étaient devenues inutiles; les sabres et les haches brillaient seuls au-dessus des têtes; et beaucoup de combattants, luttant corps à corps, ne pouvaient même plus employer d'autres armes que le poignard ou les dents.

Une égale fureur, une pareille indignation animait les montagnards et les arquebusiers; le même cri trahison! vengeance! était vomi par toutes les bouches. La mêlée en était arrivée à ce point où la férocité entre dans tous les coeurs, où l'on préfère à sa vie la mort d'un ennemi que l'on ne connaît pas, où l'on marche avec indifférence sur des amas de blessés et de cadavres parmi lesquels le mourant se réveille, pour combattre encore de sa morsure celui qui le foule aux pieds.

C'est dans ce moment qu'un petit homme, que plusieurs combattants, à travers les fumées et les vapeurs du sang, prirent d'abord, à son vêtement de peaux de bêtes, pour un animal sauvage, se jeta au milieu du carnage, avec d'horribles rires et des hurlements de joie. Nul ne savait d'où il venait, ni pour quel parti il combattait, car sa hache de pierre ne choisissait pas ses victimes, et fendait également le crâne d'un rebelle et le ventre d'un soldat. Il paraissait néanmoins massacrer plus volontiers les arquebusiers de Munckholm. Tout s'écartait devant lui; il courait dans la mêlée comme un esprit; et sa hache sanglante tournoyait sans cesse autour de lui, faisant jaillir de tous côtés des lambeaux de chair, des membres rompus, des ossements fracassés. Il criait vengeance! comme tous les autres, et prononçait des paroles bizarres, parmi lesquelles le nom de Gill revenait souvent. Ce formidable inconnu était dans le carnage comme dans une fête.

Un montagnard sur lequel son regard meurtrier s'était arrêté vint tomber aux pieds du géant dans lequel Kennybol avait placé tant d'espérances déçues, en criant:

— Han d'Islande, sauve-moi!

— Han d'Islande! répéta le petit homme.

Il s'avança vers le géant.

— Est-ce que tu es Han d'Islande? dit-il.

Le géant pour réponse leva sa hache de fer. Le petit homme recula, et le tranchant, dans sa chute, s'enfonça dans le crâne même du malheureux qui implorait le secours du géant.

L'inconnu se mit à rire.

— Ho! ho! par Ingolfe! je croyais Han d'Islande plus adroit.

— C’est ainsi que Han d’Islande sauve qui l’implore! dit le géant.

— Tu as raison. Les deux formidables champions s’attaquèrent avec rage. La hache de fer et la hache de pierre se rencontrèrent; elles se heurtèrent si violemment, que les deux tranchants volèrent en éclats avec mille étincelles.

Plus prompt que la pensée, le petit homme désarmé saisit une lourde massue de bois, laissée à terre par un mourant, et, évitant le géant qui se courbait pour le saisir entre ses bras, il asséna, à mains jointes, un coup furieux de massue sur le large front de son colossal adversaire.

Le géant poussa un cri étouffé et tomba. Le petit homme triomphant le foula aux pieds, en écumant de joie.

— Tu portais un nom trop lourd pour toi, dit-il.

Et, agitant sa massue victorieuse, il alla chercher d’autres victimes.

Le géant n’était pas mort. La violence du coup l’avait étourdi, il était tombé presque sans vie. Il commençait à rouvrir les yeux et à faire quelques faibles mouvements, lorsqu’un arquebusier l’aperçut dans le tumulte, et se jeta sur lui en criant:

— Han d’Islande est pris! victoire!

— Han d’Islande est pris! répétèrent toutes les voix avec des accents de triomphe ou de détresse.

Le petit homme avait disparu.

Il y avait déjà quelque temps que les montagnards se sentaient succomber sous le nombre; car aux arquebusiers de Munckholm s’étaient joints les tirailleurs de la forêt, et des détachements de hulans et de dragons démontés, qui arrivaient de moment en moment de l’intérieur des gorges, où la reddition des principaux chefs rebelles avait arrêté le carnage. Le brave Kennybol, blessé au commencement de l’action, avait été fait prisonnier. La capture de Han d’Islande acheva d’abattre tout le reste du courage des montagnards. Ils mirent bas les armes.

Quand les premières blancheurs de l’aube éclairèrent la cime aiguë des hauts glaciers encore à demi submergés dans l’ombre, il n’y avait plus dans les défilés du Pilier-Noir qu’un morne repos, qu’un affreux silence parfois entremêlé de faibles plaintes dont se jouait le vent léger du matin. De noires nuées de corbeaux accouraient vers ces fatales gorges de tous les points du ciel; et quelques pauvres chevriers, ayant passé pendant le crépuscule sur la lisière des rochers, revinrent effrayés dans leurs cabanes, affirmant qu’ils avaient vu, dans le défilé du Pilier-Noir, une bête à face humaine, qui buvait du sang, assise sur des monceaux de morts.

XL

Brûle donc qui voudra sous ces feux couverts!

BRANTÔME.

— Ma fille, ouvrez cette fenêtre; ces vitraux sont bien sombres, je voudrais voir un peu le jour.

— Voyez le jour, mon père! la nuit approche à grands pas.

— Il y a encore des rayons de soleil sur les collines qui bordent le golfe. J'ai besoin de respirer cet air libre à travers les barreaux de mon cachot. — Le ciel est si pur!

— Mon père, un orage vient derrière l'horizon.

— Un orage, Éthel! où le voyez-vous?

— C'est parce que le ciel est pur; mon père, que j'attends un orage.

Le vieillard jeta un regard surpris sur la jeune fille.

— Si j'avais pensé cela dès ma jeunesse, je ne serais point ici. Puis il ajouta d'un ton moins ému:

— Ce que vous dites est juste, mais n'est pas de votre âge. Je ne comprends point comment il se fait que votre jeune raison ressemble à ma vieille expérience.

Éthel baissa les yeux, comme troublée par cette réflexion grave et simple. Ses deux mains se joignirent douloureusement, et un soupir profond souleva sa poitrine.

— Ma fille, dit le vieux captif, depuis quelques jours vous êtes pâle, comme si jamais la vie n'avait échauffé le sang de vos veines. Voilà plusieurs matins que vous m'abordez avec des paupières rouges et gonflées, avec des yeux qui ont pleuré et veillé. Voilà plusieurs journées, Éthel, que je passe dans le silence, sans que votre voix essaie de m'arracher à la sombre méditation de mon passé. Vous êtes auprès de moi plus triste que moi; et cependant vous n'avez pas, comme votre père, le fardeau de toute une vie de néant et de vide qui pèse sur votre âme. L'affliction entoure votre jeunesse, mais ne peut pénétrer jusqu'à votre coeur. Les nuages du matin se dissipent promptement. Vous êtes à cette époque de l'existence où l'on se choisit dans ses rêves un avenir indépendant du présent, quel qu'il soit. Qu'avez-vous donc, ma fille? Grâce à cette monotone captivité, vous êtes à l'abri des malheurs imprévus. Quelle faute avez-vous commise? — Je ne puis croire que ce soit sur moi que vous vous affligiez; vous devez être accoutumée à mon irrémédiable infortune. L'espérance, à la vérité, n'est plus dans mes discours; mais ce n'est pas un motif pour que je lise le désespoir dans vos yeux.

En parlant ainsi, la voix sévère du prisonnier s'était attendrie presque jusqu'à l'accent paternel. Éthel, muette, se tenait debout devant lui. Tout à coup, elle se détourna d'un mouvement presque convulsif, tomba à genoux sur la pierre, et cacha son visage dans ses mains, comme pour étouffer les larmes et les sanglots qui s'échappaient tumultueusement de son sein.

Trop de douleur gonflait le coeur de l'infortunée jeune fille. Qu'avait-elle donc fait à cette fatale étrangère, pour lui révéler le secret qui détruisait toute sa vie? Hélas! depuis que le nom de son Ordener lui était connu tout entier, la pauvre enfant n'avait pas encore pu livrer ses yeux au sommeil, ni son âme au repos. La nuit elle n'éprouvait d'autre soulagement que celui de pouvoir pleurer en liberté. C'en était donc fait! il n'était point à elle, celui qui lui appartenait par tous ses souvenirs, par toutes ses douleurs, par toutes ses prières, celui dont elle s'était crue l'épouse sur la foi de ses rêves. Car la soirée où Ordener l'avait si tendrement serrée dans ses bras n'était plus dans sa pensée que comme un songe. Et en effet, ce doux songe, chacune de ses nuits le lui avait rendu depuis. C'était donc une tendresse coupable que celle qu'elle conservait encore malgré elle à cet ami absent! Son Ordener était le fiancé d'une autre! Et qui peut dire ce qu'éprouva ce coeur virginal quand le sentiment étrange et inconnu de la jalousie vint s'y glisser comme une vipère? quand elle s'agita pendant les longues heures de l'insomnie sur son lit brûlant, se figurant son Ordener, peut-être en ce moment même, dans les bras d'une autre femme plus belle, plus riche et plus noble qu'elle? — Car, se disait-elle, j'étais bien folle de croire qu'il avait été chercher la mort pour moi. Ordener est le fils d'un vice-roi, d'un puissant seigneur, et moi, je ne suis rien qu'une pauvre prisonnière; rien, que l'enfant méprisée d'un proscrit. Il est parti, lui qui est libre! et parti, sans doute, pour aller épouser sa belle fiancée, la fille d'un chancelier, d'un ministre, d'un orgueilleux comte! — Mais il m'a donc trompée, mon Ordener? ô Dieu! qui m'eût dit que cette voix pût tromper?

Et la malheureuse Éthel pleurait et pleurait encore, et elle voyait devant ses yeux son Ordener, celui dont elle avait fait le dieu ignoré de tout son être, cet Ordener paré de l'éclat de son rang, marchant à l'autel au milieu d'une fête, et se tournant vers l'autre avec ce sourire qui était jadis sa joie.

Cependant, au sein de son inexprimable désolation, elle n’avait pas un moment oublié sa tendresse filiale. Cette faible fille avait fait les plus héroïques efforts pour dérober son malheur à son infortuné père; car c’est ce qu’il y a de plus douloureux dans la douleur que d’en comprimer l’explosion extérieure, et les larmes qu’on dévore sont bien plus amères que celles qu’on répand. Il avait fallu plusieurs jours pour que le silencieux vieillard s’aperçût du changement de son Éthel, et les questions presque affectueuses qu’il venait de lui adresser avaient enfin fait jaillir tout à coup ses larmes trop longtemps renfermées dans son coeur.

Le père regarda quelque temps sa fille pleurer avec un sourire amer, et en secouant la tête.

— Éthel, dit-il enfin, toi qui ne vis pas parmi les hommes, pourquoi pleures-tu?

Il achevait à peine ces paroles que la noble et douce fille se releva. Elle avait, par je ne sais quelle puissance, arrêté les larmes dans ses yeux, qu’elle essuyait avec son écharpe.

— Mon père, dit-elle avec force, mon seigneur et père, pardonnez-moi; c’était un moment de faiblesse.

Puis elle leva sur lui des regards qui s’efforçaient de sourire.

Elle alla au fond de la chambre chercher l’Edda, vint se rasseoir près de son père taciturne, et ouvrit le livre au hasard. Alors, calmant l’émotion de sa voix, elle se mit à lire; mais sa lecture inutile passait sans être écoutée, ni d’elle, ni du vieillard.

Celui-ci fit un geste de la main.

— Assez, assez, ma fille.

Elle ferma le livre.

— Éthel, ajouta Schumacker, songez-vous encore quelquefois à Ordener?

La jeune fille, interdite, tressaillit.

— Oui, continua-t-il; à cet Ordener, qui est parti….

— Mon seigneur et père, interrompit Éthel, pourquoi nous occuper de lui? Je pense, comme vous, qu’il est parti pour ne pas revenir.

— Pour ne pas revenir, ma fille! Je n’ai pu dire cela. Je ne sais quel pressentiment m’avertit au contraire qu’il reviendra.

— Telle n’était point votre pensée, mon noble père, quand vous me parliez avec tant de défiance de ce jeune homme.

— En ai-je donc parlé avec défiance?

— Oui, mon père, et je me range en cela de votre avis; je pense qu'il nous a trompés.

— Qu'il nous a trompés, ma fille! Si je l'ai jugé ainsi, j'ai agi comme tous les hommes qui condamnent sans preuve. Je n'ai reçu de cet Ordener que des témoignages de dévouement.

— Et savez-vous, mon vénérable père, si ces paroles cordiales ne cachaient pas des pensées perfides?

— D'ordinaire, les hommes ne s'empressent point autour du malheur et de la disgrâce. Si cet Ordener ne m'était point attaché, il ne serait pas ainsi venu dans ma prison sans but.

— Êtes-vous sûr, reprit Éthel d'une voix faible, qu'en venant ici il n'ait eu aucun but?

— Et lequel? demanda vivement le vieillard.

Éthel se tut.

L'effort était trop grand pour elle, de continuer à accuser le bien-aimé Ordener, qu'elle défendait autrefois contre son père.

— Je ne suis plus le comte de Griffenfeld, poursuivit celui-ci. Je ne suis plus le grand-chancelier de Danemark et de Norvège, le dispensateur favori des grâces royales, le tout-puissant ministre. Je suis un misérable prisonnier d'état, un proscrit, un pestiféré politique. C'est déjà du courage que de parler de moi sans exécration à tous ces hommes que j'ai comblés d'honneurs et de biens; c'est du dévouement que de franchir le seuil de ce cachot, si l'on n'est pas un geôlier ou un bourreau; c'est de l'héroïsme, ma fille, que de le franchir en se disant mon ami. — Non, je ne serai point ingrat comme toute cette race humaine. Ce jeune homme a mérité ma reconnaissance, ne fût-ce que pour m'avoir montré un visage bienveillant et fait entendre une voix consolatrice.

Éthel écoutait péniblement ce langage, qui l'eût ravie quelques jours plus tôt, lorsque cet Ordener était encore dans son coeur son Ordener. Le vieillard, après s'être arrêté un moment, reprit d'une voix solennelle:

— Écoutez-moi, ma fille, car ce que je vais vous dire est grave. Je me sens dépérir lentement; la vie se retire peu à peu de moi; oui, ma fille, ma fin approche.

Éthel l'interrompit par un gémissement étouffé.

— O Dieu, mon père, ne parlez pas ainsi! de grâce, épargnez votre pauvre fille! Hélas! est-ce que vous voulez l'abandonner aussi? Que deviendra-t-elle, seule au monde, quand votre protection lui manquera?

— La protection d’un proscrit! dit le père en remuant la tête. — Au reste, c’est à cela que j’ai pensé. Oui, votre bonheur futur m’occupe plus encore que mes malheurs passés. — Écoutez-moi donc, et ne m’interrompez plus. Cet Ordener ne mérite pas d’être jugé aussi sévèrement par vous, ma fille, et j’avais cru jusqu’ici que vous n’aviez point tant d’aversion pour lui. Ses dehors sont francs et nobles; ce qui ne prouve rien à la vérité, mais je dois dire qu’il ne me paraît pas peut-être sans quelques vertus, bien qu’il lui suffise de porter une âme d’homme pour renfermer en lui le germe de tous les vices et de tous les crimes. Toute flamme donne sa fumée.

Le vieillard s’arrêta encore une fois, et, fixant son regard sur sa fille, il ajouta:

— Averti intérieurement de l’approche de ma mort, j’ai médité sur lui et sur vous, Éthel; et s’il revient, comme j’en ai l’espérance, — je vous le donne pour protecteur et pour mari.

Éthel pâlit, trembla; c’était au moment où son rêve de bonheur venait de s’envoler pour jamais, que son père essayait de le réaliser. Cette pensée si amère: J’aurais donc pu être heureuse! vint rendre à son désespoir toute sa violence. Elle resta un moment sans pouvoir parler, de peur de laisser échapper les larmes brûlantes qui roulaient dans ses yeux.

Le père attendait.

— Quoi! dit-elle enfin d’une voix éteinte, vous me le destiniez pour mari, mon seigneur et père, sans connaître sa naissance, sa famille, son nom?

— Je ne vous le destinais point, ma fille, je vous le destine.

Le ton du vieillard était presque impérieux; Éthel soupira.

— … Je vous le destine, dis-je; et que m’importe sa naissance? je n’ai pas besoin de connaître sa famille, puisque je connais sa personne. Songez-y; c’est la seule ancre de salut qui vous reste. Je crois qu’il n’a heureusement pas pour vous la même répugnance que vous montrez pour lui.

La pauvre jeune fille leva les yeux au ciel.

— Vous m’entendez, Éthel; je le répète, que me fait sa naissance? Il est sans doute d’un rang obscur, car on n’enseigne pas à ceux qui naissent dans les palais à fréquenter les prisons. Oui, et ne manifestez pas d’orgueilleux regrets, ma fille; n’oubliez pas qu’Éthel Schumacker n’est plus princesse de Wollin et comtesse de Tongsberg; vous êtes redescendue plus bas que le point d’où votre père s’est élevé. Soyez donc heureuse si cet homme accepte votre main, quelle que soit sa famille. S’il est d’une humble naissance, tant mieux, ma fille; vos jours du moins seront à l’abri des orages qui ont tourmenté les jours de votre père. Vous coulerez, loin de l’envie et de la haine des hommes, sous quelque nom inconnu, une existence ignorée, bien différente de la mienne, car elle s’achèvera mieux qu’elle n’aura commencé.

Éthel était tombée à genoux devant le prisonnier.

— O mon père! grâce!

Il ouvrit ses bras avec surprise.

— Que voulez-vous dire, ma fille?

— Au nom du ciel, ne me peignez pas ce bonheur, il n’est pas fait pour moi!

— Éthel, reprit sévèrement le vieillard, ne vous jouez pas de toute votre vie. J’ai refusé la main d’une princesse de sang royal, d’une princesse de Holstein-Augustenbourg, entendez-vous cela? Et mon orgueil a été cruellement puni. Vous dédaignez celle d’un homme obscur, mais loyal; tremblez que le vôtre ne soit aussi tristement châtié.

— Plût au ciel, murmura Éthel, que ce fût un homme obscur et loyal!

Le vieillard se leva et fit quelques pas dans l’appartement avec agitation.

— Ma fille, dit-il, c’est votre pauvre père qui vous en prie et qui vous l’ordonne. Ne me laissez pas à ma mort une inquiétude sur votre avenir; promettez-moi d’accepter cet étranger pour époux.

— Je vous obéirai toujours, mon père, mais n’espérez pas son retour.

— J’ai pesé les probabilités, et je pense, d’après l’accent dont cet

Ordener prononçait votre nom….

— Qu’il m’aime! interrompit Éthel amèrement; oh! non, ne le croyez pas.

Le père répondit froidement:

— J’ignore si, pour employer votre expression de jeune fille, il vous aime; mais je sais qu’il reviendra.

— Abandonnez cette idée, mon noble père. D’ailleurs, vous ne voudriez peut-être pas qu’il fût votre gendre si vous le connaissiez.

— Éthel, il le sera, quels que soient son nom et son rang.

— Eh bien! reprit-elle, si ce jeune homme, en qui vous avez vu un consolateur, en qui vous voulez voir un soutien pour votre fille, monseigneur et père, si c’était le fils d’un de vos mortels ennemis, du vice-roi de Norvège, du comte de Guldenlew?

Schumacker recula de deux pas.

— Que dites-vous, grand Dieu! Ordener! cet Ordener. — Cela est impossible!….

L’indicible expression de haine qui venait de s’allumer dans les yeux ternes du vieillard glaça le coeur tremblant d’Éthel, qui se repentit vainement de la parole imprudente qu’elle venait de prononcer.

Le coup était porté. Schumacker resta quelques instants immobile et les bras croisés; tout son corps tressaillait comme s’il avait été sur un gril ardent; ses prunelles flamboyantes sortaient de leur orbite, et son regard, fixé sur les dalles de pierre, paraissait vouloir les enfoncer. Enfin quelques paroles sortirent de ses lèvres bleues, prononcées d’une voix aussi faible que celle d’un homme qui rêve.

— Ordener! — Oui, c’est cela, Ordener Guldenlew!

— C’est bien. Allons! Schumacker, vieux insensé, ouvre-lui donc tes bras, ce loyal jeune homme vient pour te poignarder.

Tout à coup il frappa le sol du pied, et sa voix devint tonnante.

— Ils m’ont donc envoyé toute leur infâme race pour m’insulter dans ma chute et dans ma captivité! j’avais déjà vu un d’Ahlefeld; j’ai presque souri à un Guldenlew! Les monstres! Qui eût dit cela de cet Ordener, qu’il portait une pareille âme et un pareil nom! Malheur à moi! malheur à lui! Puis il tomba anéanti sur son fauteuil, et tandis que sa poitrine oppressée se dégonflait par de longs soupirs, la pauvre Éthel, palpitante d’effroi, pleurait à ses pieds.

— Ne pleure pas, ma fille, dit-il d’une voix sinistre, viens, oh! viens sur mon coeur.

Et il la pressa dans ses bras.

Éthel ne savait comment s’expliquer cette caresse dans un moment de rage, lorsqu’il reprit:

— Du moins, jeune fille, tu as été plus clairvoyante que ton vieux père. Tu n’as point été trompée par le serpent aux yeux doux et venimeux. Viens, que je te remercie de la haine que tu m’as fait voir pour cet exécrable Ordener.

Elle frémit de cet éloge, hélas! si peu mérité.

— Mon seigneur et père, dit-elle, calmez-vous!

— Promets-moi, poursuivait Schumacker, de vouer toujours les mêmes sentiments au fils de Guldenlew; jure-le-moi.

— Dieu défend le serment, mon père.

— Jure-le, ma fille, répéta Schumacker avec véhémence. N’est-il pas vrai que tu conserveras toujours le même coeur pour cet Ordener Guldenlew?

Éthel n’eut pas de peine à répondre:

— Toujours.

Le vieillard l’attira sur sa poitrine.

— Bien, ma fille! que je te lègue au moins ma haine pour eux; si je ne puis te léguer les biens et les honneurs qu’ils m’ont ravis. Écoute, ils ont enlevé à ton vieux père son rang et sa gloire, ils l’ont traîné d’un échafaud dans les fers, comme pour le souiller de toutes les infamies en le faisant passer par tous les supplices. Les misérables! Et c’est à moi qu’ils devaient le pouvoir qu’ils ont tourné contre moi! Oh! que le ciel et l’enfer m’entendent, et qu’ils soient tous maudits dans leur existence, et maudits dans leur postérité!

Il se tut un moment; puis, embrassant sa pauvre fille, épouvantée de ses imprécations:

— Mais, mon Éthel, toi qui es ma seule gloire et mon seul bien, dis-moi, comment ton instinct a-t-il été plus habile que le mien? Comment as-tu découvert que ce traître portait l’un des noms abhorrés qui sont écrits au fond de mon coeur avec du fiel? Comment as-tu pénétré ce secret?

Elle rassemblait toutes ses forces pour répondre, quand la porte s’ouvrit.

Un homme vêtu de noir, portant à sa main une verge d’ébène et à son cou une chaîne d’acier bruni, parut sur le seuil, environné de hallebardiers également vêtus de noir.

— Que me veux-tu? demanda le captif avec aigreur et étonnement.

L’homme, sans lui répondre et sans le regarder, déroula un long parchemin, auquel pendait, à des fils de soie, un sceau de cire verte, et lut à haute voix:

— Au nom de sa majesté notre miséricordieux souverain et seigneur,

Christiern, roi,

Il est enjoint à Schumacker, prisonnier d’état dans la forteresse royale de Munckholm, et à sa fille, de suivre le porteur dudit ordre. —

Schumacker répéta sa question:

— Que me veux-tu?

L’homme noir, toujours impassible, se mit en devoir de recommencer sa lecture.

— Il suffit, dit le vieillard.

Alors, se levant, il fit signe à Éthel, surprise et épouvantée, de suivre avec lui cette lugubre escorte.

XLI

Un signal lugubre est donné, un ministre abject de la justice vient frapper à sa porte, et l’avertir qu’on a besoin de lui.

JOSEPH DE MAISTRE.

La nuit venait de tomber; un vent froid sifflait autour de la Tour-Maudite, et les portes de la ruine de Vygla tremblaient dans leurs gonds, comme si la même main les eût secouées toutes à la fois.

Les farouches habitants de la tour, le bourreau et sa famille, étaient réunis autour du foyer allumé au milieu de la salle du premier étage, qui jetait des rougeurs vacillantes sur leurs visages sombres et sur leurs vêtements d’écarlate. Il y avait dans les traits des enfants quelque chose de féroce comme le rire de leur père, et de hagard comme le regard de leur mère. Leurs yeux, ainsi que ceux de Bechlie, étaient tournés vers Orugix, qui, assis sur une escabelle de bois, paraissait reprendre haleine, et dont les pieds, couverts de poussière, annonçaient qu’il venait d’arriver de quelque lointaine expédition.

— Femme, écoute; écoutez, enfants. Ce n’est pas pour apporter de mauvaises nouvelles que j’ai été absent deux jours entiers. Si, avant un mois, je ne suis pas exécuteur royal, je veux ne savoir pas serrer un noeud coulant ou manier une hache. Réjouissez-vous, mes petits louveteaux, votre père vous laissera peut-être pour héritage l’échafaud même de Copenhague.

— Nychol, demanda Bechlie, qu’y a-t-il donc?

— Et toi, ma vieille bohémienne, reprit Nychol avec son rire pesant, réjouis-toi aussi! tu peux t’acheter des colliers de verre bleu pour orner ton cou de cigogne étranglée. Notre engagement expire bientôt; mais va, dans un mois, quand tu me verras le premier bourreau des deux royaumes, tu ne refuseras pas de casser une autre cruche avec moi.

— Qu’y a-t-il donc, qu’y a-t-il donc, mon père? demandèrent les enfants, dont l’aîné jouait avec un chevalet tout sanglant, tandis que le plus petit s’amusait à plumer vivant un petit oiseau qu’il avait pris à sa mère dans le nid même.

— Ce qu’il y a, mes enfants? — Tue donc cet oiseau, Haspar, il crie comme une mauvaise scie; et d’ailleurs il ne faut pas être cruel. Tue-le. — Ce qu’il y a? Rien, peu de chose vraiment, sinon, dame Bechlie, qu’avant huit jours d’ici l’ex-chancelier Schumacker, qui est prisonnier à Munckholm, après avoir vu mon visage de si près à Copenhague, et le fameux brigand d'Islande Han de Klipstadur, me passeront peut-être tous deux à la fois par les mains.

L'oeil égaré de la femme rouge prit une expression d'étonnement et de curiosité.

— Schumacker! Han d'Islande! comment cela, Nychol?

— Voilà tout. J'ai rencontré hier matin, sur la route de Skongen, au pont de l'Ordals, tout le régiment des arquebusiers de Munckholm, qui s'en retournait à Drontheim d'un air très victorieux. J'ai questionné un des soldats, qui a daigné me répondre, parce qu'il ignorait sans doute pourquoi ma casaque et ma charrette sont rouges; j'ai appris que les arquebusiers revenaient des gorges du Pilier-Noir, où ils avaient mis en pièces des bandes de brigands, c'est-à-dire de mineurs insurgés. Or, tu sauras, Bechlie la bohémienne, que ces rebelles se révoltaient pour Schumacker, et étaient commandés par Han d'Islande. Tu sauras que cette levée de boucliers constitue pour Han d'Islande un bon crime d'insurrection contre l'autorité royale, et pour Schumacker un bon crime de haute trahison; ce qui amène tout naturellement ces deux honorables seigneurs à la potence ou au billot. Ajoute à ces deux superbes exécutions, qui ne peuvent manquer de me rapporter au moins quinze ducats d'or chacune, et de me faire le plus grand honneur dans les deux royaumes, celles, moins importantes, à la vérité, de quelques autres….

— Mais quoi! interrompit Bechlie, Han d'Islande a donc été pris?

— Pourquoi interrompez-vous votre seigneur et maître, femme de perdition? dit le bourreau. Oui, sans doute, ce fameux, cet imprenable Han d'Islande a été pris, avec quelques autres chefs de brigands, ses lieutenants, qui me rapporteront bien aussi chacun douze écus par tête, sans compter la vente des cadavres. Il a été pris, vous dis-je, et je l'ai vu, puisqu'il faut satisfaire entièrement votre curiosité, passer entre les rangs des soldats.

La femme et les enfants se rapprochèrent vivement d'Orugix.

— Quoi! tu l'as vu, père? demandèrent les enfants.

— Taisez-vous, enfants. Vous criez comme un coquin qui se dit innocent. Je l'ai vu. C'est une espèce de géant; il marchait les bras croisés, enchaînés derrière le dos, et le front bandé. C'est que, sans doute, il a été blessé à la tête. Mais, qu'il soit tranquille, avant peu je l'aurai guéri de cette blessure.

Après avoir mêlé à ces horribles paroles un horrible geste, le bourreau continua:

— Il y avait derrière lui quatre de ses compagnons, également prisonniers, blessés de même, et qu'on menait comme lui à Drontheim, où ils seront jugés, avec l'ex-grand-chancelier Schumacker, par un tribunal où siégera le haut-syndic, et que présidera le grand-chancelier actuel.

— Père, quel visage avaient les autres prisonniers?

— Les deux premiers étaient deux vieillards, dont l'un portait le feutre de mineur, et l'autre le bonnet de montagnard. Tous deux paraissaient désespérés. Des deux autres, l'un était un jeune mineur, qui marchait la tête haute, en sifflant; l'autre…. — Te souviens-tu, ma damnée Bechlie, de ces voyageurs qui sont entrés dans cette tour, il y a une dizaine de jours, la nuit de ce violent orage?

— Comme Satan se souvient du jour de sa chute, répondit la femme.

— Avais-tu remarqué parmi ces étrangers un jeune homme qui accompagnait ce vieux docteur fou à grande perruque? un jeune homme, te dis-je, vêtu d'un grand manteau vert et coiffé d'une toque à plume noire?

— En vérité, je crois l'avoir encore devant les yeux, me disant:

Femme, nous avons de l'or.

— Eh bien! la vieille, je veux n'avoir jamais étranglé que des coqs de bruyère, si le quatrième prisonnier n'est pas ce jeune homme. Sa figure m'était, à la vérité, entièrement cachée par sa plume, sa toque, ses cheveux et son manteau; d'ailleurs, il baissait la tête. Mais c'est bien le même vêtement, les mêmes bottines, le même air. Je veux avaler d'une bouchée le gibet de pierre de Skongen, si ce n'est pas le même homme! Que dis-tu de cela, Bechlie? Ne serait-il pas plaisant qu'après avoir reçu de moi de quoi soutenir sa vie, cet étranger en reçût également de quoi l'abréger, et qu'il exerçât mon habileté après avoir éprouvé mon hospitalité?

Le bourreau prolongea quelque temps son gros rire sinistre; puis il reprit:

— Allons, réjouissez-vous donc tous, et buvons; oui, Bechlie, donne-moi un verre de cette bière qui râpe le gosier comme si l'on buvait des limes, que je le vide à mon avancement futur. — Allons, honneur et santé au seigneur Nychol Orugix, exécuteur royal en perspective! — Je t'avouerai, vieille pécheresse, que j'ai eu de la peine à me rendre au bourg de Noes pour y pendre obscurément je ne sais quel ignoble voleur de choux et de chicorée. Cependant, en y réfléchissant, j'ai pensé que trente-deux ascalins n'étaient pas encore à dédaigner, et que mes mains ne se dégraderaient en exécutant de simples voleurs et autres canailles de ce genre que lorsqu'elles auraient décapité le noble comte ex-grand-chancelier et le fameux démon d'Islande. Je me suis donc résigné, en attendant mon diplôme de maître royal des hautes-oeuvres, à expédier le pauvre misérable du bourg de Noes; et voici, ajouta-t-il en tirant une bourse de cuir de son havresac, voici les trente-deux ascalins que je t'apporte, la vieille.

En ce moment, le bruit du cor se fit entendre à trois reprises différentes, en dehors de la tour.

— Femme, cria Orugix en se levant, ce sont les archers du haut-syndic.

À ces mots, il descendit en toute hâte.

Un instant après il reparut, portant un grand parchemin, dont il avait rompu le sceau.

— Tiens, dit-il à sa femme, voilà ce que le haut-syndic m'envoie. Déchiffre-moi cela, toi qui lirais le grimoire de Satan. Ce sont peut-être déjà mes lettres de promotion; car, puisque le tribunal aura un grand-chancelier pour président et un grand-chancelier pour accusé, il conviendrait que le bourreau qui exécutera son arrêt fût un bourreau royal.

La femme reçut le parchemin, et, après y avoir quelque temps promené ses yeux, elle lut à haute voix, tandis que les enfants jetaient sur elle un regard hébété et stupide:

— «Au nom du haut-syndic du Drontheimhus! — il est ordonné à Nychol

Orugix, bourreau de la province, de se transporter sur-le-champ à Drontheim, et de se munir de la hache d'honneur, du billot et des tentures noires.»

— C'est là tout? demanda le bourreau d'une voix mécontente.

— C'est là tout, répondit Bechlie.

— Bourreau de la province! murmura Orugix entre ses dents.

Il resta un moment jetant sur le parchemin syndical des regards d'humeur.

— Allons, dit-il enfin, il faut obéir et partir. Voici pourtant qu'on me demande la hache d'honneur et les tentures noires. — Tu auras soin, Bechlie, d'enlever les gouttes de rouille qui ont délustré ma hache, et de voir si la draperie n'est pas tachée en plusieurs endroits. En somme, il ne faut pas se décourager, ils ne veulent peut-être m'accorder d'avancement que comme salaire de cette belle exécution. Tant pis pour les condamnés, ils n'auront pas la satisfaction d'être mis à mort par un exécuteur royal.

ELVINE.

Qu’est devenu le pauvre Sanche? Il n’a point paru dans la ville.
NUNO.
Sanche aura su se mettre à couvert.
LOPE DE VEGA. Le meilleur alcade est le roi.

Le comte d’Ahlefeld, traînant une ample simarre de satin noir doublée d’hermine, la tête et les épaules cachées par une large perruque magistrale, et la poitrine chargée de plusieurs étoiles et décorations, parmi lesquelles on distinguait les colliers des ordres royaux de l’éléphant et de Dannebrog; revêtu, en un mot, du costume complet de grand-chancelier de Danemark et de Norvège, se promenait d’un air soucieux dans l’appartement de la comtesse d’Ahlefeld, seule avec lui en ce moment.

— Allons, il est neuf heures, le tribunal va entrer en séance; il ne faut pas le faire attendre, car il est nécessaire que l’arrêt soit rendu dans la nuit, afin qu’on l’exécute demain matin au plus tard. Le haut-syndic m’a assuré que le bourreau serait ici avant l’aube. — Elphége! avez-vous ordonné qu’on apprêtât la barque qui doit me transporter à Munckholm?

— Monseigneur, elle vous attend depuis une demi-heure au moins, répondit la comtesse en se soulevant sur son fauteuil.

— Et ma litière est-elle à la porte?

— Oui, monseigneur.

— Allons!…. — Vous dites donc, Elphége, ajouta le comte en se frappant le front, qu’il existe une intrigue amoureuse entre Ordener Guldenlew et la fille de Schumacker?

— Très amoureuse, je vous jure! répliqua la comtesse en souriant de colère et de dédain.

— Qui se fût imaginé cela? — Pourtant, je vous assure que je m’en étais déjà douté.

— Et moi aussi, dit la comtesse. — C’est un tour que ce maudit Levin nous a joué.

— Vieux scélérat de mecklembourgeois! murmura le chancelier; va, je te recommanderai à Arensdorf.

— Si je pouvais le faire disgracier! — Eh! mais, écoutez donc, Elphége, voici un trait de lumière.

— Quoi donc?

— Vous savez que les individus que nous allons juger dans le château de Munckholm sont au nombre de six: — Schumacker, que je ne redouterai plus, j'espère, demain à pareille heure; ce montagnard colosse, notre faux Han d'Islande, qui a juré de soutenir le rôle jusqu'à la fin, dans l'espérance que Musdoemon, dont il a déjà reçu de fortes sommes d'argent, le fera évader. — Ce Musdoemon a des idées vraiment diaboliques! — Les quatre autres accusés sont les trois chefs des rebelles, et un quidam qui s'est trouvé, on ne sait comment, au milieu du rassemblement d'Apsyl-Corh, et que les précautions prises par Musdoemon ont fait tomber dans nos mains. Musdoemon pense que cet homme est un espion de Levin de Knud. Et, en effet, en arrivant ici prisonnier, sa première parole a été pour demander le général; et quand il a appris l'absence du mecklembourgeois, il a paru consterné. Du reste, il n'a voulu répondre à aucune des questions que lui a adressées Musdoemon.

— Mon cher seigneur, interrompit la comtesse, pourquoi ne l'avez-vous pas interrogé vous-même?

— En vérité, Elphége, comment l'aurais-je pu au milieu de tous les soins qui m'accablent depuis mon arrivée? Je me suis reposé de cette affaire sur Musdoemon, qu'elle intéresse autant que moi. D'ailleurs, ma chère, cet homme n'est d'aucune importance par lui-même; c'est quelque pauvre vagabond. Nous n'en pourrons tirer parti qu'en le présentant comme un agent de Levin de Knud, et, comme il a été pris dans les rangs des rebelles, cela pourra prouver entre le mecklembourgeois et Schumacker une connivence coupable, qui suffira pour provoquer, sinon la mise en accusation, du moins la disgrâce du maudit Levin.

La comtesse parut méditer un moment.

— Vous avez raison, monseigneur. Mais cette fatale passion du baron Thorvick pour Éthel Schumacker….

Le chancelier se frotta le front de nouveau; puis tout à coup haussant les épaules:

— Écoutez, Elphége, nous ne sommes plus ni l'un ni l'autre jeunes et novices dans la vie, et pourtant nous ne connaissons pas les hommes! Quand Schumacker aura été une seconde fois flétri par un jugement de haute trahison, quand il aura subi sur l'échafaud une condamnation infamante, quand sa fille, retombée au-dessous des derniers rangs de la société, sera souillée à jamais publiquement de tout l'opprobre de son père, pensez-vous, Elphége, qu'alors Ordener Guldenlew se souvienne un seul instant de cette amourette d'enfance, que vous nommez passion, d'après les discours exaltés d'une jeune folle prisonnière, et qu'il balance un seul jour entre la fille déshonorée d'un misérable criminel et la fille illustre d'un glorieux chancelier? Il faut juger les hommes d'après soi, ma chère; où avez-vous vu que le coeur humain fût ainsi fait?

— Je souhaite que vous ayez encore raison. — Vous ne trouverez cependant pas inutile, n'est-il pas vrai, la demande que j'ai faite au syndic pour que la fille de Schumacker assiste au procès de son père, et soit placée dans la même tribune que moi? Je suis curieuse d'étudier cette créature.

— Tout ce qui peut nous éclairer sur cette affaire est précieux, dit le chancelier avec flegme. — Mais, dites-moi, sait-on où cet Ordener est en ce moment?

— Personne au monde ne le sait; c'est le digne élève de ce vieux Levin, un chevalier errant comme lui. Je crois qu'il visite en ce moment Ward-Hus.

— Bien, bien, notre Ulrique le fixera. Allons, j'oublie que le tribunal m'attend.

La comtesse arrêta le grand-chancelier.

— Encore un mot, monseigneur. — Je vous en ai parlé hier, mais votre esprit était occupé, et je n'ai pu obtenir de réponse. Où est mon Frédéric?

— Frédéric! dit le comte avec une expression lugubre, et en portant la main sur son visage.

— Oui; répondez-moi, mon Frédéric! Son régiment est de retour à Drontheim sans lui. Jurez-moi que Frédéric n'était pas dans cette horrible gorge du Pilier-Noir. Pourquoi votre figure a-t-elle changé au nom de Frédéric? Je suis dans une mortelle inquiétude.

Le chancelier reprit sa physionomie impassible.

— Elphége, tranquillisez-vous. Je vous jure qu'il n'était point dans le défilé du Pilier-Noir. D'ailleurs, on a publié la liste des officiers tués ou blessés dans cette rencontre.

— Oui, dit la comtesse calmée, vous me rassurez. Deux officiers seulement ont été tués, le capitaine Lory et le jeune baron Randmer, qui a fait tant de folies avec mon pauvre Frédéric dans les bals de Copenhague!

Oh! j’ai lu et relu la liste, je vous assure. Mais dites-moi, monseigneur, mon fils est donc resté à Walhstrom?

— Il y est resté, répondit le comte.

— Eh bien, cher ami, dit la mère avec un sourire qu’elle s’efforçait de rendre tendre, je ne vous demande qu’une grâce, c’est de faire revenir vite mon Frédéric de cet affreux pays.

Le chancelier se dégagea péniblement de ses bras suppliants.

— Madame, dit-il, le tribunal m’attend. Adieu, ce que vous me demandez ne dépend pas de moi.

Et il sortit brusquement.

La comtesse demeura sombre et pensive.

— Cela ne dépend pas de lui! se dit-elle; et il lui suffirait d’un mot pour me rendre mon fils! — Je l’ai toujours pensé, cet homme-là est vraiment méchant.

XLIII

Est-ce ainsi qu'on traite un homme de ma charge? est-ce ainsi qu'on perd le respect dû à la justice?

CALDERON. Louis Perez de Galice.

La tremblante Éthel, que les gardes ont séparée de son père à la sortie du donjon du Lion de Slesvig, a été conduite, à travers de ténébreux corridors, jusqu'alors inconnus d'elle, dans une sorte de cellule obscure, qu'on a refermée sur son entrée. Du côté de la cellule opposée à la porte est une grande ouverture grillée, à travers laquelle pénètre une lumière de torches et de flambeaux. Devant cette ouverture est une banquette sur laquelle est placée une femme voilée et vêtue de noir, qui lui fait signe de s'asseoir auprès d'elle. Elle obéit en silence et interdite.

Ses yeux se portent au delà de l'ouverture grillée. Un tableau sombre et imposant est devant elle.

À l'extrémité d'une salle, tendue de noir, et faiblement éclairée par des lampes de cuivre suspendues à la voûte, s'élève un tribunal noir arrondi en fer à cheval, occupé par sept juges vêtus de robes noires, dont l'un, placé au centre sur un siège plus élevé, porte sur sa poitrine des chaînes de diamants et des plaques d'or qui étincellent. Le juge assis à la droite de celui-ci se distingue des autres par une ceinture blanche et un manteau d'hermine, insigne du haut-syndic de la province. À droite du tribunal est une estrade couverte d'un dais, où siège un vieillard, revêtu d'habits pontificaux; à gauche, une table chargée de papiers, derrière laquelle se tient debout un homme de petite taille, coiffé d'une énorme perruque, et enveloppé des plis d'une longue robe noire.

On remarque, en face des juges, un banc de bois entouré de hallebardiers qui portent des torches, dont la lueur, réfléchie par une forêt de piques, de mousquets et de pertuisanes, répand de vagues rayons sur les têtes tumultueuses d'une foule de spectateurs, pressés contre la grille de fer qui les sépare du tribunal.

Éthel observait ce spectacle comme si elle eût assisté éveillée à un rêve; cependant elle était loin de se sentir indifférente à ce qui allait se passer sous ses yeux. Elle entendait en elle comme une voix intime qui l'avertissait d'être attentive, parce qu'elle touchait à l'une des crises de sa vie. Son coeur était en proie à deux agitations différentes en même temps; elle eût voulu savoir sur-le-champ en quoi elle était intéressée à la scène qu’elle contemplait, ou ne le savoir jamais. Depuis plusieurs jours, l’idée que son Ordener était perdu pour elle lui avait inspiré le désir désespéré d’en finir d’une fois avec l’existence, et de pouvoir lire d’un coup d’oeil tout le livre de sa destinée. C’est pourquoi, comprenant qu’elle entrait dans l’heure décisive de son sort, elle examina le tableau lugubre qui s’offrait à elle, moins avec répugnance qu’avec une sorte de joie impatiente et funèbre.

Elle vit le président se lever, en proclamant, au nom du roi, que l’audience de justice était ouverte.

Elle entendit le petit homme noir, placé à la gauche du tribunal, lire, d’une voix basse et rapide, un long discours où le nom de son père, mêlé aux mots de conspiration, de révolte des mines, de haute-trahison, revenait fréquemment. Alors elle se rappela ce que la fatale inconnue lui avait dit, dans le jardin du donjon, de l’accusation dont son père était menacé; et elle frémit quand elle entendit l’homme à la robe noire terminer son discours par le mot de mort, fortement articulé.

Épouvantée, elle se tourna vers la femme voilée, pour laquelle un sentiment qu’elle ne s’expliquait pas lui inspirait de la crainte:

— Où sommes-nous? qu’est-ce que tout ceci? demanda-t-elle timidement.

Un geste de sa mystérieuse compagne l’invita au silence et à l’attention. Elle reporta sa vue dans la salle du tribunal.

Le vieillard vénérable, en habits épiscopaux, venait de se lever; et Éthel recueillit ces paroles, qu’il prononça distinctement:

— Au nom du Dieu tout-puissant et miséricordieux, — moi, Pamphile-Éleuthère, évêque de la royale ville de Drontheim et de la royale province du Drontheimhus, je salue le respectable tribunal qui juge au nom du roi, notre seigneur après Dieu;

Et je dis — qu’ayant remarqué que les prisonniers amenés devant ce tribunal étaient des hommes et des chrétiens, et qu’ils n’avaient point de procureurs, je déclare aux respectables juges que mon intention est de les assister de mon faible secours, dans la cruelle position où le ciel les a voulu mettre;

Priant Dieu de daigner donner sa force à notre infirme faiblesse, et sa lumière à notre profonde cécité.

C’est ainsi que moi, évêque de ce royal diocèse, je salue le respectable et judicieux tribunal. —

Après avoir parlé ainsi, l’évêque descendit de son trône pontifical, et alla s’asseoir sur le banc de bois destiné aux accusés, tandis qu’un murmure d’approbation éclatait parmi le peuple.

Le président se leva, et dit d’une voix sèche:

— Hallebardiers, qu’on fasse silence! — Seigneur évêque, le tribunal remercie votre révérence, au nom des prisonniers. — Habitants du Drontheimhus, soyez attentifs à la haute justice du roi; le tribunal va juger sans appel. Archers, — qu’on amène les accusés.

Il se fit dans l’auditoire un silence d’attente et de terreur; seulement toutes les têtes s’agitèrent dans l’ombre, comme les sombres vagues d’une mer orageuse, sur laquelle le tonnerre s’apprête à gronder.

Bientôt Éthel entendit une rumeur sourde et un mouvement extraordinaire se prolonger au-dessous d’elle, dans les sinistres avenues de la salle; puis l’auditoire se rangea avec un frémissement d’impatience et de curiosité; des pas multipliés retentirent; des hallebardes et des mousquets brillèrent; et bientôt six hommes enchaînés et entourés de gardes pénétrèrent, la tête nue, dans l’enceinte du tribunal. Éthel ne vit que le premier de ces six prisonniers; c’était un vieillard à barbe blanche, vêtu d’une simarre noire; c’était son père.

Elle s’appuya défaillante sur la balustrade de pierre qui était devant sa banquette; les objets roulaient sous ses yeux comme dans un nuage confus, et il lui semblait que son coeur palpitait à son oreille. Elle-dit d’une voix faible:

— O Dieu, secourez-moi!

La femme voilée se pencha vers elle, et lui fit respirer des sels qui la réveillèrent de sa léthargie.

— Noble dame, dit-elle ranimée, de grâce, un mot de votre voix pour me convaincre que je ne suis pas ici le jouet des fantômes de l’enfer.

Mais l’inconnue, sourde à sa prière, avait retourné sa tête vers le tribunal; et la pauvre Éthel, qui avait retrouvé quelque force, se résigna à l’imiter en silence.

Le président s’était levé, et avait dit d’une voix lente et solennelle:

— Prisonniers, on vous amène devant nous pour que nous ayons à examiner si vous êtes coupables de haute-trahison, de conspiration, de révolte par les armes contre l’autorité du roi notre souverain seigneur Méditez maintenant dans vos consciences, car une accusation de lèse-majesté au premier chef pèse sur vos têtes.

En ce moment un rayon de lumière tomba sur le visage d'un des six accusés, d'un jeune homme qui tenait sa tête penchée sur sa poitrine, comme pour dérober ses traits sous les boucles pendantes de ses longs cheveux. Éthel tressaillit, et une sueur froide sortit de tous ses membres; elle avait cru reconnaître…. — Mais non, c'était une cruelle illusion; la salle était faiblement éclairée, et les hommes s'y mouvaient comme des ombres; à peine distinguait-on le grand christ d'ébène poli, placé au-dessus du fauteuil du président.

Cependant ce jeune homme était enveloppé d'un manteau qui de loin paraissait vert, ses cheveux en désordre avaient des reflets châtains, et le rayon inattendu qui avait dessiné ses traits…. Mais non, cela n'était pas, cela ne pouvait être! c'était une horrible illusion.

Les prisonniers étaient assis sur le banc où était descendu l'évêque. Schumacker s'était placé à l'une des extrémités; il était séparé du jeune homme aux cheveux châtains par ses quatre compagnons d'infortune, qui portaient des vêtements grossiers, et au nombre desquels on remarquait une espèce de géant. L'évêque siégeait à l'autre extrémité du banc.

Éthel vit le président se tourner vers son père.

— Vieillard, dit-il d'une voix sévère, dites-nous votre nom et qui vous êtes.

Le vieillard souleva sa tête vénérable.

— Autrefois, répondit-il en regardant fixement le président, on m'appelait comte de Griffenfeld et de Tongsberg, prince de Wollin, prince du Saint-Empire, chevalier de l'ordre royal de l'éléphant, chevalier de l'ordre royal de Dannebrog; chevalier de la toison d'or d'Allemagne et de la jarretière d'Angleterre, premier ministre, inspecteur général des universités, grand-chancelier de Danemark et de….

Le président l'interrompit.

— Accusé, le tribunal ne vous demande ni comment on vous a nommé, ni ce que vous avez été, mais comment on vous nomme, et ce que vous êtes.

— Eh bien, reprit vivement le vieillard, maintenant je m'appelle Jean Schumacker, j'ai soixante-neuf ans, et je ne suis rien, que votre ancien bienfaiteur, chancelier d'Ahlefeld.

Le président parut interdit.

— Je vous ai reconnu, seigneur comte, ajouta l'ex-chancelier, et comme j'ai cru voir qu'il n'en était pas de même à mon égard de votre côté, j'ai pris la liberté de rappeler à votre grâce que nous sommes de vieilles connaissances.

— Schumacker, dit le président d'un ton où l'on sentait l'accent de la colère concentrée, épargnez les moments du tribunal.

Le vieux captif l'interrompit encore:

— Nous avons changé de rôle, noble chancelier; autrefois c'était moi qui vous appelais simplement d'Ahlefeld, et vous qui me disiez seigneur comte.

— Accusé, répliqua le président, vous nuisez à votre cause en rappelant le jugement infamant dont vous êtes déjà flétri.

— Si ce jugement est infamant pour quelqu'un, comte d'Ahlefeld, ce n'est pas pour moi.

Le vieillard s'était levé à demi en prononçant ces paroles avec force.

Le président étendit la main vers lui.

— Asseyez-vous. N'insultez pas, devant un tribunal, et aux juges qui vous ont condamné, et au roi qui vous a donné ces juges. Rappelez-vous que sa majesté a daigné vous accorder la vie, et bornez-vous ici à vous défendre.

Schumacker ne répondit qu'en haussant les épaules.

— Avez-vous, demanda le président, quelques aveux à faire au tribunal touchant le crime capital dont vous êtes accusé?

Voyant que Schumacker gardait le silence, le président répéta sa question.

— Est-ce que c'est à moi que vous parlez? dit l'ex-grand-chancelier. Je croyais, noble comte d'Ahlefeld, que vous vous parliez à vous-même. De quel crime m'entretenez-vous? Est-ce que j'ai jamais donné le baiser d'Iscariote à un ami? Ai-je emprisonné, condamné, déshonoré un bienfaiteur? dépouillé celui à qui je devais tout? J'ignore, en vérité, seigneur chancelier actuel, pourquoi l'on m'amène ici. C'est sans doute pour juger de votre habileté à faire tomber des têtes innocentes. Je ne serai point fâché en effet de voir si vous saurez aussi bien me perdre que vous perdez le royaume, et s'il vous suffira d'une virgule pour causer ma mort, comme il vous a suffi d'une lettre de l'alphabet pour provoquer la guerre avec la Suède.[*]

[*] Il y avait eu en effet de très graves différends entre le Danemark et la Suède, parce que le comte d'Ahlefeld avait exigé, dans une négociation, qu'un traité entre les deux états donnât au roi de Danemark le titre de rex

Gothorum, ce qui semblait attribuer au monarque danois la souveraineté de la Gothie, province suédoise; tandis que les Suédois ne voulaient lui accorder que la qualité de rex Gotorum, dénomination vague qui équivalait à l'ancien titre des souverains danois, roi des Gots.

C'est à cette h, cause, non d'une guerre, mais de longues et menaçantes négociations, que Schumacker faisait sans doute allusion.

À peine achevait-il cette raillerie amère, que l'homme placé devant la table à gauche du tribunal se leva.

— Seigneur président, dit-il, après s'être incliné profondément, seigneurs juges, je demande que la parole soit interdite à Jean Schumacker, s'il continue d'injurier ainsi sa grâce le président de ce respectable tribunal.

La voix calme de l'évêque s'éleva:

— Seigneur secrétaire intime, on ne peut interdire la parole à un accusé.

— Vous avez raison, révérend évêque, s'écria le président avec précipitation. Notre intention est de laisser le plus de liberté possible à la défense. — J'engage seulement l'accusé à modérer son langage, s'il comprend ses véritables intérêts.

Schumacker secoua la tête et dit froidement:

— Il parait que le comte d'Ahlefeld est plus sûr de son fait qu'en 1677.

— Taisez-vous, dit le président; et s'adressant sur-le-champ au prisonnier voisin du vieillard, il lui demanda quel était son nom. C'était un montagnard d'une taille colossale, dont le front était entouré de bandages, qui se leva en disant:

— Je suis Han, de Klipstadur, en Islande.

Un frémissement d'épouvante erra quelque temps dans la foule, et Schumacker, soulevant sa tête pensive déjà retombée sur sa poitrine, jeta un brusque regard sur son formidable voisin, dont tous les autres co-accusés se tenaient éloignés.

— Han d'Islande, demanda le président quand le trouble fut dissipé, qu'avez-vous à dire au tribunal?

De tous les spectateurs, Éthel n'avait pas été la moins frappée de la présence du brigand fameux qui, depuis si longtemps, lui apparaissait dans toutes ses terreurs. Elle attacha avec une avidité craintive son regard sur le géant monstrueux que son Ordener avait peut-être combattu, dont il avait peut-être été la victime. Cette idée se retourna dans son coeur sous toutes ses formes douloureuses. Aussi, entièrement absorbée par une foule d'émotions déchirantes, elle entendit à peine la réponse qu'adressait au président, dans un langage grossier et embarrassé, ce Han d'Islande, en qui elle voyait presque le meurtrier de son Ordener. Elle comprit seulement que le brigand se déclarait le chef des bandes rebelles.

— Est-ce de vous-même, demanda le président, ou par une instigation étrangère, que vous avez pris le commandement des insurgés?

Le brigand répondit:

— Ce n'est pas de moi-même.

— Qui vous a provoqué à ce crime?

— Un homme qui s'appelait Hacket.

— Quel était ce Hacket?

— Un agent de Schumacker, qu'il nommait aussi comte de Griffenfeld.

Le président s'adressa à Schumacker:

— Schumacker, connaissez-vous ce Hacket?

— Vous m'avez prévenu, comte d'Ahlefeld, repartit le vieillard; j'allais vous adresser la même question.

— Jean Schumacker, dit le président, vous êtes mal conseillé par votre haine. Le tribunal appréciera votre système de défense.

L'évêque prit la parole.

— Seigneur secrétaire intime, dit-il en se tournant vers l'homme de petite taille, qui paraissait faire les fonctions de greffier et d'accusateur, ce Hacket est-il parmi mes clients?

— Non, votre révérence, répondit le secrétaire.

— Sait-on ce qu'il est devenu?

— On n'a pu le saisir; il a disparu.

On eût dit qu'en parlant ainsi le seigneur secrétaire intime composait sa voix.

— Je crois plutôt qu'il s'est évanoui, dit Schumacker.

L'évêque continua:

— Seigneur secrétaire, fait-on poursuivre ce Hacket? A-t-on son signalement?

Avant que le secrétaire intime eût pu répondre, un des prisonniers se leva; c'était un jeune mineur d'un visage âpre et fier.

— Il serait aisé de l'avoir, dit-il d'une voix forte. Ce misérable Hacket, l'agent de Schumacker, est un homme de petite stature, d'une figure ouverte, mais ouverte comme une bouche de l'enfer. — Tenez, seigneur évêque, sa voix ressemble beaucoup à celle de ce seigneur qui écrit là sur cette table, et que votre révérence appelle, je crois, secrétaire intime. Et même, si cette salle était moins sombre, et que le seigneur secrétaire intime eût moins de cheveux pour lui cacher le visage, j’assurerais presque qu’il y a dans ses traits quelque ressemblance avec ceux du traître Hacket.

— Notre frère dit vrai, s’écrièrent les deux prisonniers voisins du jeune mineur.

— Vraiment! murmura Schumacker avec une expression de triomphe.

Cependant le secrétaire avait fait un mouvement involontaire, soit de crainte, soit de l’indignation qu’il ressentait d’être comparé à ce Hacket. Le président, qui lui-même avait paru troublé, se hâta d’élever la voix.

— Prisonniers, n’oubliez pas que vous ne devez parler que lorsque le tribunal vous interroge; et surtout n’outragez pas les ministres de la justice par d’indignes comparaisons.

— Cependant, seigneur président, dit l’évêque, ceci n’est qu’une question de signalement. Si le coupable Hacket offre quelques points de ressemblance avec le secrétaire, cela pourrait être utile.

Le président l’interrompit.

— Han d’Islande, vous qui avez eu tant de rapports avec Hacket, dites-nous, pour satisfaire le révérend évêque, si cet homme ressemble en effet à notre très honoré secrétaire intime.

— Nullement, seigneur, répondit le géant sans hésiter.

— Vous voyez, seigneur évêque, ajouta le président.

L’évêque prononça d’un signe de tête qu’il était satisfait; et le président, s’adressant à un autre accusé, prononça la formule usitée:

— Quel est votre nom?

— Wilfrid Kennybol, des montagnes de Kole.

— Étiez-vous parmi les insurgés?

— Oui, seigneur; la vérité vaut mieux que la vie. J’ai été pris dans les gorges maudites du Pilier-Noir. J’étais le chef des montagnards.

— Qui vous a poussé au crime de rébellion?

— Nos frères les mineurs se plaignaient de la tutelle royale, et cela était tout simple, n’est-ce pas, votre courtoisie? Vous n’auriez qu’une hutte de boue et deux mauvaises peaux de renard, que vous ne seriez pas fâché d’en être le maître. Le gouvernement n’a pas écouté leurs prières. Alors, seigneur, ils ont songé à se révolter, et nous ont priés de les aider. Un si petit service ne se refuse pas entre frères qui récitent les mêmes oraisons et chôment les mêmes saints. Voilà tout.

— Personne, dit le président, n'a-t-il éveillé, encouragé et dirigé votre insurrection?

— C'était un seigneur Hacket, qui nous parlait sans cesse de délivrer un comte prisonnier à Munckholm, dont il se disait l'envoyé. Nous le lui avons promis, parce qu'une liberté de plus ne nous coûtait rien.

— Ce comte ne s'appelait-il pas Schumacker ou Griffenfeld?

— Justement, votre courtoisie.

— Vous ne l'avez jamais vu?

— Non, seigneur; mais si c'est ce vieillard qui vous a dit tout à l'heure tant de noms, je ne puis faire autrement que de convenir….

— De quoi? interrompit le président.

— Qu'il a une bien belle barbe blanche, seigneur, presque aussi belle que celle du père du mari de ma soeur Maase, de la bourgade de Surb, lequel a vécu jusqu'à cent vingt ans.

L'ombre répandue dans la salle empêcha de voir si le président paraissait désappointé de la naïve réponse du montagnard. Il ordonna aux archers de déployer quelques bannières couleur de feu déposées devant le tribunal.

— Wilfrid Kennybol, dit-il, reconnaissez-vous ces bannières?

— Oui, votre courtoisie; elles nous ont été données par Hacket, au nom du comte Schumacker. Le comte fit distribuer aussi des armes aux mineurs; car nous n'en avions pas besoin, nous autres montagnards, qui vivons de la carabine et de la gibecière. Et moi, seigneur, tel que vous me voyez, attaché ici comme une méchante poule qu'on va rôtir, j'ai plus d'une fois, du fond de nos vallées, atteint de vieux aigles, lorsqu'au plus haut de leur vol ils ne semblaient que des alouettes ou des grives.

— Vous entendez, seigneurs juges, observa le secrétaire intime; l'accusé Schumacker a fait distribuer par Hacket des armes et des drapeaux aux rebelles.

— Kennybol, reprit le président, n'avez-vous plus rien à déclarer?

— Rien, votre courtoisie, sinon que je ne mérite pas la mort. Je n'ai fait que prêter assistance, en bon frère, aux mineurs, et j'ose affirmer à toutes vos courtoisies que le plomb de ma carabine, tout vieux chasseur que je suis, n'a jamais touché un daim du roi.

Le président, sans répondre à ce plaidoyer, interrogea les deux compagnons de Kennybol. C'étaient des chefs de mineurs. Le plus vieux, qui déclara se nommer Jonas, répéta, en d'autres termes, ce qu'avait avoué Kennybol. L'autre, qui était le jeune homme dont les yeux avaient saisi tant de ressemblance entre le secrétaire intime et le perfide Hacket, dit s’appeler Norbith, confessa fièrement sa part dans la révolte, mais refusa de rien révéler touchant Hacket et Schumacker. Il avait, disait-il, prêté serment de se taire, et ne se souvenait plus que de ce serment. Le président eut beau l’interroger par toutes les menaces et par toutes les prières, l’obstiné jeune homme resta inflexible. D’ailleurs il assurait ne point s’être révolté pour Schumacker, mais seulement parce que sa vieille mère avait faim et froid. Il ne niait point qu’il n’eût peut-être mérité la mort; mais il affirmait que l’on commettrait une injustice en le condamnant, parce qu’en le tuant on tuerait aussi sa pauvre mère, qui ne l’avait pas mérité.

Quand Norbith eut cessé de parler, le secrétaire intime résuma en peu de mots les charges accablantes qui pesaient jusqu’à ce moment sur les accusés, surtout sur Schumacker. Il lut quelques-unes des devises séditieuses inscrites sur les bannières, et fit ressortir contre l’ex-grand-chancelier l’unanimité des réponses de ses complices, et jusqu’au silence de ce jeune Norbith, lié par un serment fanatique. — Il ne reste plus, ajouta-t-il en terminant, qu’un accusé à interroger, et nous avons de hautes raisons de le croire agent secret de l’autorité qui a si mal veillé à la tranquillité du Drontheimhus. Cette autorité a favorisé, sinon par sa connivence coupable, du moins par sa fatale négligence, l’explosion de la révolte qui va perdre tous ces malheureux, et rendre à l’échafaud ce Schumacker, que la clémence du roi en avait si généreusement sauvé.

Éthel, qui de ses craintes pour Ordener était revenue, par une cruelle transition, à ses craintes pour son père, frémit à ce langage sinistre, et un torrent de larmes s’échappa de ses yeux, quand elle vit son père se lever, en disant d’une voix tranquille: — Chancelier d’Ahlefeld, j’admire tout ceci. Avez-vous eu la prévoyance de faire mander le bourreau?

L’infortunée crut en ce moment qu’elle épuisait sa dernière douleur; elle se trompait.

Le sixième accusé venait de se lever; noble et superbe, il avait écarté les cheveux qui couvraient son visage, et aux questions que le président lui avait adressées, il avait répondu d’une voix ferme et haute:

— Je m’appelle Ordener Guldenlew, baron de Thorvick, chevalier de Dannebrog.

Un cri de surprise échappa au secrétaire:

— Le fils du vice-roi!

— Le fils du vice-roi! répétèrent toutes les voix, comme si la salle eût eu en ce moment mille échos.

Le président avait reculé sur son siège; les juges, jusqu'alors immobiles dans le tribunal, se penchaient tumultueusement les uns vers les autres, ainsi que des arbres qui seraient battus à la fois de vents opposés. L'agitation était plus grande encore dans l'auditoire; les spectateurs montaient sur les corniches de pierre et les grilles de fer; la foule entière parlait comme d'une seule bouche; et les gardes, oubliant de réclamer le silence, mêlaient leurs paroles de surprise à la rumeur universelle.

Quelle âme assez accoutumée aux soudaines émotions de la vie pourrait concevoir ce qui se passa dans l'âme d'Éthel? Qui pourrait rendre ce mélange inouï de joie déchirante et de délicieuse douleur? cette attente inquiète, qui était à la fois de la crainte et de l'espérance, et n'en était cependant pas? — Il était devant elle, sans qu'elle fût devant lui! c'était lui qu'elle voyait et qui ne la voyait pas! c'était son bien-aimé Ordener, son Ordener, qu'elle avait cru mort, qu'elle savait perdu pour elle, son ami qui l'avait trompée et qu'elle adorait comme d'une adoration nouvelle. Il était là; oui, il était là. Un vain songe ne l'abusait pas; oh! c'était bien lui, cet Ordener, hélas! qu'elle avait rêvé plus souvent encore qu'elle ne l'avait vu.

— Mais apparaissait-il dans cette enceinte solennelle comme un ange sauveur ou comme un fatal génie? Devait-elle espérer en lui ou trembler pour lui? — Mille conjectures oppressaient à la fois sa pensée et l'étouffaient comme une flamme que trop d'aliment éteint; toutes les idées, toutes les sensations que nous venons d'indiquer parcoururent son esprit comme un éclair, au moment où le fils du vice-roi de Norvège prononça son nom. Elle fut la première à le reconnaître, et les autres ne l'avaient pas encore reconnu, qu'elle était évanouie.

Elle reprit bientôt ses sens, pour la seconde fois, grâce aux soins de sa mystérieuse voisine. Pâle, elle rouvrit ses yeux dans lesquels les larmes s'étaient subitement taries. Elle jeta avidement sur le jeune homme, toujours debout et calme dans le tumulte général, un de ces regards qui embrassent tout un être; et le trouble avait cessé dans le tribunal et le peuple, que le nom d'Ordener Guldenlew retentissait encore à son oreille. Elle remarqua avec une douloureuse inquiétude qu'il portait son bras en écharpe, et que ses mains étaient chargées de fers; elle remarqua que son manteau était déchiré en plusieurs endroits, que son sabre fidèle ne pendait plus à sa ceinture. Rien n'échappa à sa sollicitude; car l'oeil d'une amante ressemble à l’oeil d’une mère. Elle environna de toute son âme celui qu’elle ne pouvait couvrir de tout son corps; et, il faut le dire à la honte et à la gloire de l’amour, dans cette salle qui renfermait son père et les persécuteurs de son père, Éthel ne vit plus qu’un seul homme.

Le silence s’était rétabli peu à peu. Le président se mit en devoir de commencer l’interrogatoire du fils du vice-roi.

— Seigneur baron…. dit-il d’une voix tremblante.

— Je ne m’appelle point ici seigneur baron, répondit Ordener d’une voix ferme, je m’appelle Ordener Guldenlew, comme celui qui a été comte de Griffenfeld s’appelle Jean Schumacker.

Le président resta un moment comme interdit.

— Eh bien donc! reprit-il, Ordener Guldenlew, c’est sans doute par un hasard malheureux que vous êtes amené devant nous. Les rebelles vous auront pris voyageant, vous auront forcé de les suivre, et c’est ainsi, sans doute, que vous avez été trouvé dans leurs rangs.

Le secrétaire se leva:

— Nobles juges, le nom seul du fils du vice-roi de Norvège est un plaidoyer suffisant pour lui. Le baron Ordener Guldenlew ne peut être un rebelle. Notre illustre président a parfaitement expliqué sa fâcheuse arrestation parmi les rebelles. Le seul tort du noble prisonnier est de n’avoir pas dit plus tôt son nom. Nous demandons qu’il soit mis sur-le-champ en liberté, abandonnant toute accusation à son égard, et regrettant qu’il se soit assis sur le banc souillé par le criminel Schumacker et ses complices.

— Que faites-vous donc? s’écria Ordener.

— Le secrétaire intime, dit le président, se désiste de toute poursuite à votre égard.

— Il a tort, répliqua Ordener, d’une voix haute et sonore; je dois ici être seul accusé, seul jugé, et seul condamné. — Il s’arrêta un moment, et ajouta d’un accent moins ferme: — Car je suis seul coupable.

— Seul coupable! s’écria le président.

— Seul coupable! répéta le secrétaire intime.

Une nouvelle explosion de surprise se manifesta dans l’auditoire. La malheureuse Éthel frémit; elle ne songeait pas que cette déclaration de son amant sauvait son père. Elle avait devant les yeux la mort de son Ordener.

— Hallebardiers, qu’on fasse silence! dit le président, profitant peut-être du moment de rumeur pour rallier ses idées et reprendre sa présence d’esprit. — Ordener Guldenlew, reprit-il, expliquez-vous.

Le jeune homme resta, un instant rêveur, puis soupira avec effort, puis prononça ces paroles d’un ton calme et résigné:

— Oui, je sais qu’une mort infâme m’attend; je sais que la vie pourrait m’être belle et glorieuse. Mais Dieu lira au fond de mon coeur! à la vérité, Dieu seul! — Je vais accomplir le premier devoir de mon existence; je vais lui sacrifier mon sang, mon honneur peut-être; mais je sens que je mourrai sans remords et sans repentir. Ne vous étonnez pas de mes paroles, seigneurs juges; il y a dans l’âme et dans la destinée humaine des mystères que vous ne pouvez pénétrer et qui ne sont jugés qu’au ciel. Écoutez-moi donc; et agissez envers moi selon vos consciences, quand vous aurez absous ces infortunés, et surtout ce déplorable Schumacker, qui a déjà, dans sa captivité, expié bien plus de crimes qu’un homme n’en peut commettre. — Oui, je suis coupable, nobles juges, et seul coupable. Schumacker est innocent; ces autres malheureux ne sont qu’égarés. L’auteur de la rébellion des mineurs, c’est moi.

— Vous! s’écrièrent à la fois, et avec une expression étrange, le président et le secrétaire intime.

— Moi! et ne m’interrompez plus, seigneurs. Je suis pressé de terminer, car en m’accusant je justifie ces infortunés. C’est moi qui ai soulevé les mineurs au nom de Schumacker; c’est moi qui ai fait distribuer aux rebelles des bannières; qui leur ai envoyé, au nom du prisonnier de Munckholm, de l’or et des armes. Hacket était mon agent.

À ce nom de Hacket, le secrétaire intime fit un geste de stupeur. Ordener continua:

— J’épargne vos moments, seigneurs. J’ai été pris dans les rangs des mineurs, que j’avais poussés à la révolte. J’ai seul tout fait. Maintenant, jugez. Si j’ai prouvé mon crime, j’ai prouvé également l’innocence de Schumacker et celle des pauvres misérables que vous croyez ses complices.

Le jeune homme parlait ainsi, les yeux levés au ciel. Éthel, presque inanimée, respirait à peine; il lui semblait seulement qu’Ordener, tout en justifiant son père, prononçait bien amèrement son nom. Les discours du jeune homme l’étonnaient et l’épouvantaient, sans qu’elle pût les comprendre. Dans tout ce qui frappait ses sens, elle ne voyait clairement que le malheur.

Un sentiment du même genre paraissait préoccuper le président. On eût dit qu’il ne pouvait croire à ce qu’il entendait de ses oreilles. Il adressa néanmoins la parole au fils du vice-roi:

— Si vous êtes en effet l’unique auteur de cette révolte, dans quel but l’avez-vous excitée?

— Je ne puis le dire.

Un frisson saisit Éthel, lorsqu’elle entendit le président répliquer d’une voix presque irritée:

— N’aviez-vous point une intrigue avec la fille de Schumacker?

Mais Ordener, enchaîné, avait fait un pas vers le tribunal, et s’était écrié, avec l’accent de l’indignation:

— Chancelier d’Ahlefeld, contentez-vous de ma vie que je vous livre; respectez une noble et innocente fille. Ne tentez pas de la déshonorer une seconde fois.

La pauvre Éthel, qui avait senti son sang remonter à son visage, ne comprit pas ce que signifiaient ces mots, une seconde fois, sur lesquels son défenseur appuyait avec énergie; mais à la colère qui se peignait sur les traits du président, on eût dit qu’il les comprenait.

— Ordener Guldenlew, n’oubliez pas vous-même le respect que vous devez à la justice du roi et à ses suprêmes officiers. Je vous réprimande au nom du tribunal. — À présent, je vous somme de nouveau de me déclarer dans quel but vous avez commis le crime dont vous vous accusez.

— Je vous répète que je ne puis vous le dire.

— N’était-ce pas, reprit le secrétaire, pour délivrer Schumacker?

Ordener garda le silence.

— Ne soyez pas muet, accusé Ordener, dit le président; il est prouvé que vous entreteniez des intelligences avec Schumacker, et l’aveu de votre culpabilité accuse, plus qu’il ne justifie, le prisonnier de Munckholm. Vous alliez souvent à Munckholm, et certes vous attachiez à ces visites plus qu’un intérêt de curiosité ordinaire. Témoin cette boucle de diamants.

Le président prit sur le bureau, et montra à Ordener une boucle de brillants qui y était déposée.

— La reconnaissez-vous pour vous avoir appartenu?

— Oui. Par quel hasard?….

— Eh bien! un des rebelles l’a remise, avant d’expirer, à notre secrétaire intime, en déclarant qu’il l’avait reçue de vous en paiement, pour vous avoir transporté du port de Drontheim à la forteresse de Munckholm. Or, je vous le demande, seigneurs juges, un pareil salaire donné à un simple matelot n’annoncet-il pas quelle importance l’accusé Ordener Guldenlew attachait à parvenir jusqu’à cette prison, qui est celle de Schumacker?

— Ah! s'écria l'accusé Kennybol, ce que dit sa courtoisie est vrai, je reconnais la boucle; c'est l'histoire de notre pauvre frère Guldon Stayper.

— Silence, dit le président, laissez répondre Ordener Guldenlew.

— Je ne cacherai pas, repartit Ordener, que je désirais voir Schumacker. Mais cette boucle ne signifie rien. On ne peut entrer avec des diamants dans le fort; le matelot qui m'avait amené s'était plaint, dans la traversée, de sa misère; je lui ai jeté cette boucle, que je ne pouvais garder sur moi.

— Pardon, votre courtoisie, interrompit le secrétaire intime, le règlement excepte de cette mesure le fils du vice-roi. Vous pouviez donc….

— Je ne voulais pas me nommer.

— Pourquoi? demanda le président.

— C'est ce que je ne puis dire.

— Vos intelligences avec Schumacker et sa fille prouvent que le but de votre complot était de les délivrer.

Schumacker, qui, jusqu'alors, n'avait donné d'autre signe d'attention que de dédaigneux mouvements d'épaules, se leva:

— Me délivrer! Le but de cette infernale trame était de me compromettre et de me perdre, comme il l'est encore. Croyez-vous qu'Ordener Guldenlew eût avoué sa participation au crime, s'il n'eût été pris parmi les révoltés? Oh! je vois qu'il a hérité de la haine de son père pour moi. Et quant aux intelligences qu'on lui suppose avec moi et ma fille, qu'il sache, cet exécré Guldenlew, que ma fille a hérité aussi de ma haine pour lui, pour la race des Guldenlew et des d'Ahlefeld!

Ordener soupira profondément, tandis qu'Éthel désavouait tout bas son père, et que celui-ci retombait sur son banc, palpitant encore de colère.

— Le tribunal jugera, dit le président.

Ordener, qui, aux paroles de Schumacker, avait baissé les yeux en silence, parut se réveiller:

— Oh! nobles juges, écoutez. Vous allez descendre dans vos consciences; n'oubliez pas qu'Ordener Guldenlew est coupable seul; Schumacker est innocent. Ces autres infortunés ont été trompés par Hacket, qui était mon agent. J'ai fait tout le reste.

Kennybol l'interrompit:

— Sa courtoisie dit vrai, seigneurs juges; car c'est elle qui s'est chargée de nous amener le fameux Han d'Islande, dont je souhaite que le nom ne me porte pas malheur. Je sais que c'est ce jeune seigneur qui a osé l'aller trouver dans la caverne de Walderhog, pour lui proposer d'être notre chef. Il m’a confié le secret de son entreprise au hameau de Surb, chez mon frère Braall. Et, pour le reste encore, le jeune seigneur dit vrai; nous avons été abusés par ce Hacket maudit; d’où il suit que nous ne méritons pas la mort.

— Seigneur secrétaire intime, dit le président, les débats sont clos.

Quelles sont vos conclusions?

Le secrétaire se leva, salua plusieurs fois le tribunal, passa quelque temps la main entre les plis de son rabat de dentelle, sans quitter un moment des yeux les yeux du président. Enfin, il fit entendre ces paroles d’une voix sourde et lugubre:

— Seigneur président, respectables juges! l’accusation demeure victorieuse. Ordener Guldenlew, qui ternit à jamais la splendeur de son glorieux nom, n’a réussi qu’à prouver sa culpabilité sans démontrer l’innocence de l’ex-chancelier Schumacker, et de ses complices Han d’Islande, Wilfrid Kennybol, Jonas et Norbith. — Je demande à la justice du tribunal que les six accusés soient déclarés coupables du crime de haute-trahison et de lèse-majesté, au premier chef.

Un murmure vague s’éleva de la foule. Le président allait proclamer la formule de clôture, quand l’évêque réclama un moment d’attention.

— Doctes juges, il est convenable que la défense des accusés se fasse entendre la dernière. Je souhaiterais qu’elle eût un meilleur organe; car je suis vieux et faible, et je n’ai plus en moi d’autre force que celle qui me vient de Dieu. — Je m’étonne des sévères requêtes du secrétaire intime. Rien ici ne prouve le crime de mon client Schumacker. On ne peut établir contre lui aucune participation directe à l’insurrection des mineurs; et puisque mon autre client Ordener Guldenlew déclare avoir abusé du nom de Schumacker, et, de plus, être l’unique auteur de cette condamnable sédition, toutes les présomptions qui pesaient sur Schumacker s’évanouissent; vous devez donc l’absoudre. Je recommande à votre indulgence chrétienne les autres accusés, qui n’ont été qu’égarés, comme la brebis du bon pasteur; et même le jeune Ordener Guldenlew, qui a du moins le mérite, bien grand devant le Seigneur, de confesser son crime. Songez, seigneurs juges, qu’il est encore dans l’âge où l’homme peut faillir, et même tomber, sans que Dieu refuse de le soutenir ou de le relever. Ordener Guldenlew porte à peine le quart de ce fardeau de l’existence qui pèse déjà presque entier sur ma tête. Mettez dans la balance de vos jugements sa jeunesse et son inexpérience, et ne lui retirez pas si tôt cette vie que le Seigneur vient à peine de lui donner.

Le vieillard se tut et se plaça près d'Ordener, qui souriait; tandis qu'à l'invitation du président, les juges se levaient du tribunal, et passaient en silence le seuil de la formidable salle de leurs délibérations.

Pendant que quelques hommes décidaient de six destinées dans ce terrible sanctuaire, les accusés immobiles étaient restés assis sur leur banc entre deux rangs de hallebardiers. Schumacker, la tête sur sa poitrine, paraissait endormi dans une rêverie profonde; le géant promenait à droite et à gauche des regards où se peignait une assurance stupide; Jonas et Kennybol, les mains jointes, priaient à voix basse, tandis que leur camarade Norbith frappait par intervalles la terre du pied, ou secouait ses chaînes avec des tressaillements convulsifs. Entre lui et le vénérable évêque, qui lisait les psaumes de la pénitence, se tenait Ordener, les bras croisés et les yeux levés au ciel.

Derrière eux on entendait le bruit de la foule, qui avait impétueusement éclaté à la sortie des juges. C'était le fameux captif de Munckholm, c'était le redoutable démon d'Islande, c'était surtout le fils du vice-roi, qui occupaient toutes les pensées, toutes les paroles, tous les regards. La rumeur, mêlée de plaintes, de rires et de cris confus, qui s'échappait de l'auditoire, s'abaissait et s'élevait comme une flamme qui ondoie sous le vent.

Ainsi se passèrent plusieurs heures d'attente, si longues que chacun s'étonnait qu'elles fussent contenues dans la même nuit. De temps en temps on jetait un regard vers la porte de la chambre des délibérations; mais on n'y voyait rien, que les deux soldats qui se promenaient avec leurs pertuisanes étincelantes devant le seuil fatal, comme deux fantômes muets.

Enfin, les torches et les lampes commençaient à pâlir, et quelques rayons blancs de l'aube traversaient les vitraux étroits de la salle, quand la porte redoutable s'ouvrit. Un silence profond remplaça sur-le-champ, comme par magie, tout le tumulte du peuple, et l'on n'entendit plus que le bruit des respirations pressées et le mouvement vague et sourd de la foule en suspens.

Les juges, sortant à pas lents de la chambre des délibérations, reprirent place au tribunal, le président à leur tête.

Le secrétaire intime, qui avait paru absorbé dans ses réflexions pendant leur absence, s'inclina:

— Seigneur président, quel est l'arrêt que le tribunal, jugeant sans appel, a rendu au nom du roi? Nous sommes prêts à l'entendre avec un respect religieux. Le juge placé à droite du président se leva, tenant un parchemin dans ses mains:

— Sa grâce, notre glorieux président, fatigué par la longueur de cette audience, daigne nous charger, nous, haut-syndic du Drontheimhus, président naturel de ce tribunal respectable, de lire à sa place la sentence rendue au nom du roi. Nous allons remplir ce devoir honorable et pénible, rappelant à l'auditoire de se taire devant l'infaillible justice du roi.

Alors la voix du haut-syndic prit une inflexion solennelle et grave, et tous les coeurs palpitèrent.

— Au nom de notre vénéré maître et légitime seigneur Christiern, roi! — voici l'arrêt que nous, juges du haut tribunal du Drontheimhus, nous rendons dans nos consciences, touchant Jean Schumacker, prisonnier d'État; Wilfrid Kennybol, habitant des montagnes de Kole; Jonas, mineur royal; Norbith, mineur royal; Han, de Klipstadur, en Islande; et Ordener Guldenlew, baron de Thorvick, chevalier de Dannebrog; tous accusés des crimes de haute trahison et de lèse-majesté au premier chef; Han d'Islande étant de plus prévenu des crimes d'assassinat, d'incendie et de brigandage.

1° Jean Schumacker n'est point coupable;

2° Wilfrid Kennybol, Jonas et Norbith sont coupables; mais le tribunal les excuse, parce qu'ils ont été égarés;

3° Han d'Islande est coupable de tous les crimes qu'on lui impute;

4° Ordener Guldenlew est coupable de haute trahison et de lèse-majesté au premier chef.» Le juge s'arrêta un moment comme pour prendre haleine. Ordener attachait sur lui un regard plein d'une joie céleste.

— Jean Schumacker, continua le juge, le tribunal vous absout et vous renvoie dans votre prison.

Kennybol, Jonas et Norbith, le tribunal réduit la peine que vous avez encourue à une détention perpétuelle et à l'amende de mille écus royaux chacun.

Han, de Klipstadur, assassin et incendiaire, vous serez ce soir conduit sur la place d'armes de Munckholm, et pendu par le cou jusqu'à ce que mort s'ensuive.

Ordener Guldenlew, traître, après avoir été dégradé de vos titres devant ce tribunal, vous serez conduit ce soir au même lieu, avec un flambeau à la main, pour y avoir la tête tranchée, le corps brûlé, et pour que vos cendres soient jetées au vent et votre tête exposée sur la claie.

Retirez-vous tous. Tel est l'arrêt rendu par la justice du roi. —

À peine le haut-syndic avait-il achevé cette funèbre lecture, qu’on entendit dans la salle un cri. Ce cri glaça les assistants plus même que l’effrayant appareil de la sentence de mort; ce cri fit pâlir un moment le front serein et radieux d’Ordener condamné.

XLIV

C’était le malheur qui les rendait égaux.

CHARLES NODIER.

C’en est donc fait; tout va s’accomplir, ou plutôt tout est déjà accompli. Il a sauvé le père de celle qu’il aimait, il l’a sauvée elle-même, en lui conservant l’appui paternel. La noble conspiration du jeune homme pour la vie de Schumacker a réussi; maintenant le reste n’est rien; il n’a plus qu’à mourir.

Que ceux qui l’ont cru coupable ou insensé le jugent maintenant, ce généreux Ordener, comme il se juge lui-même dans son âme avec un saint ravissement. Car ce fut toujours sa pensée, en entrant dans les rangs des rebelles, que, s’il ne pouvait empêcher l’exécution du crime de Schumacker, il pourrait du moins en empêcher le châtiment, en l’appelant sur sa propre tête.

— Hélas! s’était-il dit, sans doute Schumacker est coupable; mais, aigri par sa captivité et son malheur, son crime est pardonnable. Il ne veut que sa délivrance; il la tente, même par la rébellion. — D’ailleurs, que deviendra mon Éthel si on lui enlève son père; si elle le perd par l’échafaud, si un nouvel opprobre vient flétrir sa vie, que deviendra-t-elle, sans soutien, sans secours, seule dans son cachot, ou errante dans un monde d’ennemis? Cette pensée l’avait déterminé à son sacrifice, et il s’y était préparé avec joie; car le plus grand bonheur d’un être qui aime est d’immoler son existence, je ne dis pas à l’existence, mais à un sourire, à une larme de l’être aimé.

Il a donc été pris parmi les rebelles, il a été traîné devant les juges qui devaient condamner Schumacker, il a commis son généreux mensonge, il a été condamné, il va mourir d’une mort cruelle, d’un supplice ignominieux, il va laisser une mémoire souillée; mais que lui importe au noble jeune homme? il a sauvé le père de son Éthel.

Il est maintenant assis sur ses chaînes dans un cachot humide, où la lumière et l’air ne pénètrent qu’à peine par de sombres soupiraux; près de lui est la nourriture du reste de son existence, un pain noir, une cruche pleine d’eau. Un collier de fer pèse sur son cou, des bracelets, des carcans de fer pressent ses mains et ses pieds. Chaque heure qui s’écoule lui emporte plus de vie qu’une année n’en enlève aux autres mortels. — Il rêve délicieusement.

— Peut-être mon souvenir ne périra-t-il pas avec moi, du moins dans un des coeurs qui battent parmi les hommes! peut-être daignera-t-elle me donner une larme pour mon sang! peut-être consacrera-t-elle quelquefois un regret à celui qui lui a dévoué sa vie! peut-être, dans ses rêveries virginales, aura-t-elle parfois présente la confuse image de son ami! Qui sait d'ailleurs ce qui est derrière la mort? Qui sait si les âmes délivrées de leur prison matérielle ne peuvent pas quelquefois revenir veiller sur les âmes qu'elles aiment, commercer mystérieusement avec ces douces compagnes encore captives, et leur apporter en secret quelque vertu des anges et quelque joie du ciel?

Toutefois des idées amères se mêlaient à ces consolantes méditations. La haine que Schumacker lui avait témoignée au moment même de son sacrifice oppressait son coeur. Le cri déchirant qu'il avait entendu en même temps que son arrêt de mort l'avait ébranlé profondément; car, seul dans l'auditoire, il avait reconnu cette voix et compris cette douleur. Et puis, ne la reverra-t-il donc plus, son Éthel? ses derniers moments se passeront-ils dans la prison même qui la renferme, sans qu'il puisse encore une fois toucher la douce main, entendre la douce voix de celle pour qui il va mourir?

Il abandonnait ainsi son âme à cette vague et triste rêverie, qui est à la pensée ce que le sommeil est à la vie, quand le cri rauque des vieux verrous rouillés heurta rudement son oreille, déjà en quelque sorte attentive aux concerts de l'autre sphère où il allait s'envoler. — C'était la lourde porte de fer de son cachot, qui s'ouvrait en grondant sur ses gonds. Le jeune condamné se leva tranquille et presque joyeux, car il pensa que c'était le bourreau qui venait le chercher, et il avait déjà dépouillé l'existence comme le manteau qu'il foulait à ses pieds.

Il fut trompé dans son attente; une figure blanche et svelte venait d'apparaître au seuil de son cachot, pareille à une vision lumineuse. Ordener douta de ses yeux, et se demanda s'il n'était pas déjà dans le ciel. C'était elle, c'était son Éthel.

La jeune fille était tombée dans ses bras enchaînés; elle couvrait les mains d'Ordener de larmes, qu'essuyaient les longues tresses noires de ses cheveux épars; baisant les fers du condamné, elle meurtrissait ses lèvres pures sur les infâmes carcans; elle ne parlait pas, mais tout son coeur semblait prêt à s'échapper dans la première parole qui passerait à travers ses sanglots.

Lui, il éprouvait la joie la plus céleste qu'il eût éprouvée depuis sa naissance. Il serrait doucement son Éthel sur sa poitrine, et les forces réunies de la terre et de l'enfer n'eussent pu en ce moment dénouer les deux bras dont il l'environnait. Le sentiment de sa mort prochaine mêlait quelque chose de solennel à son ravissement, et il s'emparait de son Éthel comme s'il en eût déjà pris possession pour l'éternité.

Il ne demanda pas à cet ange comment elle avait pu pénétrer jusqu'à lui. Elle était là, pouvait-il penser à autre chose? D'ailleurs il ne s'en étonnait pas. Il ne se demandait pas comment cette jeune fille proscrite, faible, isolée, avait pu, malgré les triples portes de fer, et les triples rangs de soldats, ouvrir sa propre prison et celle de son amant; cela lui semblait simple; il portait en lui la conscience intime de ce que peut l'amour.

À quoi bon se parler avec la voix quand on se peut parler avec l'âme? Pourquoi ne pas laisser les corps écouter en silence le langage mystérieux des intelligences? — Tous deux se taisaient, parce qu'il y a des émotions qu'on ne saurait exprimer qu'en se taisant.

Cependant la jeune fille souleva enfin sa tête appuyée sur le coeur tumultueux du jeune homme.

— Ordener, dit-elle, je viens te sauver; et elle prononça cette parole d'espérance avec une angoisse douloureuse.

Ordener secoua la tête en souriant.

— Me sauver, Éthel! tu t'abuses; la fuite est impossible.

— Hélas! je le sais trop. Ce château est peuplé de soldats, et toutes les portes qu'il faut traverser pour arriver ici sont gardées par des archers et des geôliers qui ne dorment pas. — Elle ajouta avec effort: Mais je t'apporte un autre moyen de salut.

— Va, ton espérance est vaine. Ne te berce pas de chimères, Éthel; dans quelques heures un coup de hache les dissiperait trop cruellement.

— Oh! n'achève pas! Ordener! tu ne mourras pas. Oh! dérobe-moi cette affreuse pensée, ou plutôt, oui, présente-la-moi dans toute son horreur, pour me donner la force d'accomplir ton salut et mon sacrifice.

Il y avait dans l'accent de la jeune fille une expression indéfinissable, Ordener la regarda doucement:

— Ton sacrifice! que veux-tu dire?

Elle cacha son visage dans ses mains, et sanglota en disant d'une voix inarticulée: — O Dieu!

Cet abattement fut de courte durée; elle se releva; ses yeux brillaient, sa bouche souriait. Elle était belle comme un ange qui remonte de l’enfer au ciel.

— Écoutez, mon Ordener, votre échafaud ne s’élèvera pas. Pour que vous viviez, il suffit que vous promettiez d’épouser Ulrique d’Ahlefeld.

— Ulrique d’Ahlefeld! ce nom dans ta bouche, mon Éthel!

— Ne m’interrompez pas, poursuivit-elle avec le calme d’une martyre qui subit sa dernière torture; je viens ici envoyée par la comtesse d’Ahlefeld. On vous promet d’obtenir votre grâce du roi, si l’on obtient en échange votre main pour la fille du grand-chancelier. Je viens ici vous demander le serment d’épouser Ulrique et de vivre pour elle. On m’a choisie pour messagère, parce qu’on a pensé que ma voix aurait quelque puissance sur vous.

— Éthel, dit le condamné d’une voix glacée, adieu; en sortant de ce cachot, dites qu’on fasse venir le bourreau.

Elle se leva, resta un moment devant lui debout, pâle et tremblante; puis ses genoux fléchirent, elle tomba à genoux sur la pierre en joignant les mains.

— Que lui ai-je fait? murmura-t-elle d’une voix éteinte.

Ordener, muet, fixait son regard sur la pierre.

— Seigneur, dit-elle, se traînant à genoux jusqu’à lui, vous ne me répondez pas? Vous ne voulez donc plus me parler? — Il ne me reste plus qu’à mourir.

Une larme roula dans les yeux du jeune homme.

— Éthel, vous ne m’aimez plus.

— O Dieu! s’écria la pauvre jeune fille, serrant dans ses bras les genoux du prisonnier, je ne l’aime plus! Tu dis que je ne t’aime plus, mon Ordener. Est-il bien vrai que tu as pu dire cela?

— Vous ne m’aimez plus, puisque vous me méprisez.

Il se repentit à l’instant même d’avoir prononcé cette parole cruelle; car l’accent d’Éthel fut déchirant, quand elle jeta ses bras adorés autour de son cou, en criant d’une voix étouffée par les larmes:

— Pardonne-moi, mon bien-aimé Ordener, pardonne-moi comme je te pardonne. Moi! te mépriser, grand Dieu! n’es-tu pas mon bien, mon orgueil, mon idolâtrie? — Dis-moi, est-ce qu’il y avait dans mes paroles autre chose qu’un profond amour, qu’une brûlante admiration pour toi? Hélas! ton langage sévère m’a fait bien du mal, quand je venais pour te sauver, mon Ordener adoré, en immolant tout mon être au tien.

— Eh bien, répondit le jeune homme radouci en essuyant les pleurs d’Éthel avec des baisers, n’était-ce pas me montrer peu d’estime que de me proposer de racheter ma vie par l’abandon de mon Éthel, par un lâche oubli de mes serments, par le sacrifice de mon amour? — Il ajouta, l’oeil fixé sur Éthel: — De mon amour, pour lequel je verse aujourd’hui tout mon sang. Un long gémissement précéda la réponse d’Éthel.

— Écoute-moi encore, mon Ordener, ne m’accuse pas si vite. J’ai peut-être plus de force qu’il n’appartient d’ordinaire à une pauvre femme. — Du haut de notre donjon on voit construire, dans la place d’Armes l’échafaud qui t’est destiné. Ordener! tu ne connais pas cette affreuse douleur de voir lentement se préparer la mort de celui qui porte avec lui notre vie! La comtesse d’Ahlefeld, près de laquelle j’étais quand j’ai entendu prononcer ton arrêt funèbre, est venue me trouver au donjon, où j’étais rentrée avec mon père. Elle m’a demandé si je voulais te sauver, elle m’a offert cet odieux moyen; mon Ordener, il fallait détruire ma pauvre destinée, renoncer à toi, te perdre pour jamais, donner à une autre cet Ordener, toute la félicité de la délaissée Éthel, ou te livrer au supplice; on me laissait le choix entre mon malheur et ta mort; je n’ai pas balancé.

Il baisa avec respect la main de cet ange.

— Je ne balance pas non plus, Éthel. Tu ne serais pas venue m’offrir la vie avec la main d’Ulrique d’Ahlefeld si tu avais su comment il se fait que je meurs.

— Quoi? Quel mystère?….

— Permets-moi d’avoir un secret pour toi, mon Éthel bien-aimée. Je veux mourir sans que tu saches si tu me dois de la reconnaissance ou de la haine pour ma mort.

— Tu veux mourir! Tu veux donc mourir! O Dieu! et cela est vrai, et l’échafaud se dresse en ce moment, et aucune puissance humaine ne peut délivrer mon Ordener qu’on va tuer! Dis-moi, jette un regard sur ton esclave, sur ta compagne, et promets-moi, bien-aimé Ordener, de m’entendre sans colère. Es-tu bien sûr, réponds à ton Éthel comme à Dieu, que tu ne pourrais mener une vie heureuse auprès de cette femme, de cette Ulrique d’Ahlefeld? en es-tu bien sûr, Ordener? Elle est peut-être, sans doute même, belle, douce, vertueuse; elle vaut mieux que celle pour qui tu péris. — Ne détourne pas la tête, cher ami, mon Ordener. Tu es si noble et si jeune pour monter sur un échafaud! Eh bien! tu irais vivre avec elle dans quelque brillante ville où tu ne penserais plus à ce funeste donjon; tu laisserais couler paisiblement tes jours sans t’informer de moi; j’y consens, tu me chasserais de ton coeur, même de ton souvenir, Ordener. Mais vis, laisse-moi ici seule, c’est à moi de mourir. Et, crois-moi, quand je te saurai dans les bras d’une autre, tu n’auras pas besoin de t’inquiéter de moi; je ne souffrirai pas longtemps.

Elle s’arrêta; sa voix se perdait dans les larmes. Cependant on lisait dans son regard désolé le désir douloureux de remporter la victoire fatale dont elle devait mourir.

Ordener lui dit:

— Éthel, ne me parle plus de cela. Qu’il ne sorte en ce moment de nos bouches d’autres noms que le tien et le mien.

— Ainsi, reprit-elle, hélas! hélas! tu veux donc mourir?

— Il le faut. J’irai avec joie à l’échafaud pour toi; j’irais avec horreur à l’autel pour toute autre femme. Ne m’en parle plus; tu m’affliges et tu m’offenses.

Elle pleurait en murmurant toujours: — Il va mourir, ô Dieu! et d’une mort infâme!

Le condamné répondit avec un sourire:

— Crois-moi, Éthel, il y a moins de déshonneur dans ma mort que dans la vie telle que tu me la proposes.

En ce moment, son regard, se détachant de son Éthel éplorée, aperçut un vieillard vêtu d’habits ecclésiastiques, qui se tenait debout dans l’ombre, sous la voûte basse de la porte:

— Que voulez-vous? dit-il brusquement.

— Seigneur, je suis venu avec l’envoyée de la comtesse d’Ahlefeld. Vous ne m’avez point aperçu, et j’attendais en silence que vos yeux tombassent sur moi.

En effet, Ordener n’avait vu que son Éthel, et celle-ci, voyant

Ordener, avait oublié son compagnon.

— Je suis, continua le vieillard, le ministre chargé….

— J’entends, dit le jeune homme. Je suis prêt.

Le ministre s’avança vers lui.

— Dieu est prêt aussi à vous recevoir, mon fils.

— Seigneur ministre, reprit Ordener, votre visage ne m’est pas inconnu. Je vous ai vu quelque part. Le ministre s’inclina.

— Je vous reconnais aussi, mon fils. C’était dans la tour de Vygla. Nous avons tous deux montré ce jour-là combien les paroles humaines ont peu de certitude. Vous m’avez promis la grâce de douze malheureux condamnés, et moi je n’ai point cru en votre promesse, ne pouvant deviner que vous fussiez ce que vous êtes, le fils du vice-roi; et vous, seigneur, qui comptiez sur votre puissance et sur votre rang, en me donnant cette assurance….

Ordener acheva la pensée qu’Athanase Munder n’osait compléter.

— Je ne puis aujourd’hui obtenir aucune grâce, pas même la mienne; vous avez raison, seigneur ministre. Je respectais trop peu l’avenir; il m’en a puni, en me montrant sa puissance supérieure à la mienne.

Le ministre baissa la tête.

— Dieu est fort, dit-il.

Puis il releva ses yeux bienveillants sur Ordener en ajoutant:

— Dieu est bon.

Ordener, qui paraissait préoccupé, s’écria, après un court silence:

— Écoutez, seigneur ministre, je veux tenir la promesse que je vous ai faite dans la tour de Vygla. Quand je serai mort, allez trouver à Berghen mon père, le vice-roi de Norvège, et dites-lui que la dernière grâce que lui demande son fils, c’est celle de vos douze protégés. Il vous l’accordera, j’en suis sûr.

Une larme d’attendrissement mouilla le visage vénérable d’Athanase.

— Mon fils, il faut que de nobles pensées remplissent votre âme, pour savoir, dans la même heure, rejeter avec courage votre propre grâce et solliciter avec bonté celle des autres. Car j’ai entendu vos refus; et, tout en blâmant le dangereux excès d’une passion humaine, j’en ai été profondément touché. Maintenant je me dis: Unde scelus? Comment se fait-il qu’un homme qui approche tant du vrai juste se soit souillé du crime pour lequel il est condamné?

— Mon père, je ne l’ai point dit à cet ange, je ne puis vous le dire.

Croyez seulement que la cause de ma condamnation n’est point un crime.

— Comment? expliquez-vous, mon fils.

— Ne me pressez pas, répondit le jeune homme avec fermeté. Laissez-moi emporter dans le tombeau le secret de ma mort.

— Ce jeune homme ne peut être coupable, murmura le ministre.

Alors il tira de son sein un crucifix noir, qu’il plaça sur une sorte d’autel grossièrement formé d’une dalle de granit adossée au mur humide de la prison. Près du crucifix il posa une petite lampe de fer allumée, qu'il avait apportée avec lui, et une bible ouverte.

— Mon fils, priez et méditez. Je reviendrai dans quelques heures. — Allons, ajouta-t-il, se tournant vers Éthel, qui, pendant tout l'entretien d'Ordener et d'Athanase, avait gardé le silence du recueillement, il faut quitter le prisonnier. Le temps s'écoule.

Elle se leva radieuse et tranquille; quelque chose de divin enflammait son regard:

— Seigneur ministre, je ne puis vous suivre encore. Il faut auparavant que vous ayez uni Éthel Schumacker à son époux Ordener Guldenlew.

Elle regarda Ordener:

— Si tu étais encore puissant, libre et glorieux, mon Ordener, je pleurerais et j'éloignerais ma fatale destinée de la tienne. — Mais maintenant que tu ne crains plus la contagion de mon malheur, que tu es ainsi que moi captif, flétri, opprimé, maintenant que tu vas mourir, je viens à toi, espérant que tu daigneras du moins, Ordener, mon seigneur, permettre à celle qui n'aurait pu être la compagne de ta vie, d'être la compagne de ta mort; car tu m'aimes assez, n'est-il pas vrai, pour n'avoir pas douté un instant que je n'expire en même temps que toi?

Le condamné tomba à ses pieds et baisa le bas de sa robe.

— Vous, vieillard, continua-t-elle, vous allez nous tenir lieu de familles et de pères; ce cachot sera le temple; cette pierre, l'autel.
Voici mon anneau, nous sommes à genoux devant Dieu et devant vous.
Bénissez-nous et lisez les paroles saintes qui vont unir Éthel
Schumacker à Ordener Guldenlew, son seigneur.

Et ils s'étaient agenouillés ensemble devant le prêtre, qui les contemplait avec un étonnement mêlé de pitié.

— Comment, mes enfants! que faites-vous?

— Mon père, dit la jeune fille, le temps presse. Dieu et la mort nous attendent.

On rencontre quelquefois dans la vie des puissances irrésistibles, des volontés auxquelles on cède soudain comme si elles avaient quelque chose de plus que les volontés humaines. Le prêtre leva les yeux en soupirant.

— Que le Seigneur me pardonne si ma condescendance est coupable! Vous vous aimez, vous n'avez plus que bien peu de temps à vous aimer sur la terre; je ne crois pas manquer à nos saints devoirs en légitimant votre amour.

La douce et redoutable cérémonie s'accomplit. Ils se levèrent tous deux sous la dernière bénédiction du prêtre; ils étaient époux.

Le visage du condamné brillait d'une douloureuse joie; on eût dit qu'il commençait à sentir l'amertume de la mort, à présent qu'il essayait la félicité de la vie. Les traits de sa compagne étaient sublimes de grandeur et de simplicité; elle était encore modeste comme une jeune vierge, et déjà presque fière comme une jeune épouse.

— Écoute-moi, mon Ordener, dit-elle; n'est-il pas vrai que nous sommes maintenant heureux de mourir, puisque la vie ne pouvait nous réunir? Tu ne sais pas, ami, ce que je ferai, — je me placerai aux fenêtres du donjon de manière à te voir monter sur l'échafaud, afin que nos âmes s'envolent ensemble dans le ciel. Si j'expire avant que la hache ne tombe, je t'attendrai; car nous sommes époux, mon Ordener adoré, et ce soir le cercueil sera notre lit nuptial.

Il la pressa sur son coeur gonflé et ne put prononcer que ces mots, qui étaient l'idée de toute son existence:

— Éthel, tu es donc à moi!

— Mes enfants, dit la voix attendrie de l'aumônier, dites-vous adieu.

Il est temps.

— Hélas! s'écria Éthel.

Toute sa force d'ange lui revint, et elle se prosterna devant le condamné:

— Adieu! mon Ordener bien-aimé; mon seigneur, donnez-moi votre bénédiction.

Le prisonnier accomplit ce voeu touchant, puis il se retourna pour saluer le vénérable Athanase Munder. Le vieillard était également agenouillé devant lui.

— Qu'attendez-vous, mon père? demanda-t-il surpris.

Le vieillard le regarda d'un air humble et doux:

— Votre bénédiction, mon fils.

— Que le ciel vous bénisse et appelle sur vous toutes les félicités que vos prières appellent sur vos frères les autres hommes, répondit Ordener d'un accent ému et solennel.

Bientôt la voûte sépulcrale entendit les derniers adieux et les derniers baisers; bientôt les durs verrous se refermèrent bruyamment, et la porte de fer sépara les deux jeunes époux, qui allaient mourir après s’être donné rendez-vous dans l’éternité.

XLV

À qui me livrera Louis Perez, mort ou vif, Je lui donne deux mille écus.
CALDERON. Louis Perez de Galice.

— Baron Voethaün, colonel des arquebusiers de Munckholm, quel est celui des soldats qui ont combattu sous vos ordres au Pilier-Noir, qui a fait Han d'Islande prisonnier? Nommez-le au tribunal, afin qu'il reçoive les mille écus royaux promis pour cette capture.

Ainsi parle au colonel des arquebusiers le président du tribunal. Le tribunal est assemblé; car, selon l'usage ancien de Norvège, les juges qui prononcent sans appel doivent rester sur leurs sièges jusqu'à ce que l'arrêt qu'ils ont rendu soit exécuté. Devant eux est le géant, qu'on vient de ramener, portant à son cou la corde qui doit le porter à son tour dans quelques heures.

Le colonel, assis près de la table du secrétaire intime, se lève. Il salue le tribunal et l'évêque, qui est remonté sur son trône.

— Seigneurs juges, le soldat qui a pris Han d'Islande est dans cette enceinte. Il se nomme Toric Belfast, second arquebusier de mon régiment.

— Qu'il vienne donc, reprend le président, recevoir la récompense promise.

Un jeune soldat, en uniforme d'arquebusier de Munckholm, se présente.

— Vous êtes Toric Belfast? demande le président.

— Oui, votre grâce.

— C'est vous qui avez fait Han d'Islande prisonnier?

— Oui, avec l'aide de saint Belzébuth, s'il plaît à votre excellence.

On apporte sur le tribunal un sac pesant.

— Vous reconnaissez bien cet homme pour le fameux Han d'Islande? ajoute le président, montrant le géant enchaîné.

— Je connaissais mieux le minois de la jolie Cattie que celui de Han d'Islande; mais j'affirme, par la gloire de saint Belphégor, que, si Han d'Islande est quelque part, c'est sous la forme de ce grand démon.

— Approchez, Toric Belfast, reprit le président. Voici les mille écus promis par le haut-syndic.

Le soldat s'avançait précipitamment vers le tribunal, quand une voix s'éleva dans la foule:

— Arquebusier de Munckholm, ce n’est pas toi qui as pris Han d’Islande!

— Par tous les bienheureux diables, s’écria le soldat en se retournant, je n’ai en propriété que ma pipe et la minute où je parle, mais je promets de donner dix mille écus d’or à celui qui vient de dire cela, s’il peut prouver ce qu’il a dit.

Et, croisant les deux bras, il promenait un regard assuré sur l’auditoire.

— Eh bien! que celui qui vient de parler se montre donc!

— C’est moi! dit un petit homme qui fendait la presse pour pénétrer dans l’enceinte.

Ce nouveau personnage était enveloppé d’une natte de jonc et de poil de veau marin, vêtement des Groënlandais, qui tombait autour de lui comme le toit conique d’une hutte. Sa barbe était noire, et d’épais cheveux de même couleur, couvrant ses sourcils roux, cachaient son visage, dont tout ce qu’on distinguait était hideux. On ne voyait ni ses bras ni ses mains.

— Ah! c’est toi? dit le soldat avec un éclat de rire. Et qui donc, selon toi, mon beau sire, a eu l’honneur de prendre ce diabolique géant?

Le petit homme secoua la tête et dit avec une sorte de sourire malicieux:

— C’est moi!

En ce moment, le baron Voethaün crut reconnaître en cet homme singulier l’être mystérieux qui lui avait donné à Skongen l’avis de l’arrivée des rebelles; le chancelier d’Ahlefeld, l’hôte de la ruine d’Arbar; et le secrétaire intime, un certain paysan d’Oëlmoe, qui portait une natte pareille et lui avait si bien indiqué la retraite de Han d’Islande. Mais, séparés tous trois, ils ne purent se communiquer leur impression fugitive, que les différences de costume et de traits qu’ils remarquèrent ensuite eurent bientôt effacée.

— Vraiment, c’est toi! répondit le soldat ironiquement. — Sans ton costume de phoque du Groënland, au regard que tu me lances, je serais tenté de reconnaître en toi un autre nain grotesque, qui m’a de même cherché querelle dans le Spladgest, il y a environ quinze jours; — c’était le jour où on apporta le cadavre du mineur Gill Stadt.

— Gill Stadt! interrompit le petit homme en tressaillant.

— Oui, Gill Stadt, affirma le soldat avec indifférence, l’amoureux rebuté d’une fille qui était la maîtresse d’un de nos camarades, et pour laquelle il est mort comme un sot.

Le petit homme dit sourdement:

— N’y avait-il pas aussi au Spladgest le corps d’un officier de ton régiment?

— Précisément, je me rappellerai toute ma vie ce jour-là; j’ai oublié l’heure de la retraite dans le Spladgest, et j’ai failli être dégradé en rentrant au fort. Cet officier, c’était le capitaine Dispolsen.

À ce nom le secrétaire intime se leva.

— Ces deux individus abusent de la patience du tribunal. Nous prions le seigneur président d’abréger cet entretien inutile.

— Par l’honneur de ma Cattie, je ne demande pas mieux, dit Toric Belfast, pourvu que vos courtoisies m’adjugent les mille écus promis pour la tête de Han, car c’est moi qui l’ai fait prisonnier.

— Tu mens! s’écria le petit homme.

Le soldat chercha son sabre à son côté.

— Tu es bien heureux, drôle, que nous soyons devant la justice, en présence de laquelle un soldat, fût-il arquebusier de Munckholm, doit se tenir désarmé comme un vieux coq.

— C’est à moi, dit froidement le petit homme, qu’appartient le salaire, car sans moi on n’aurait pas la tête de Han d’Islande.

Le soldat furieux jura que c’était lui qui avait pris Han d’Islande lorsque, tombé sur le champ de bataille, il commençait à rouvrir les yeux.

— Eh bien, dit son adversaire, il se peut que ce soit toi qui l’aies pris, mais c’est moi qui l’ai terrassé; sans moi tu n’aurais pu l’emmener prisonnier; donc les mille écus m’appartiennent.

— Cela est faux, répliqua le soldat, ce n’est pas toi qui l’as terrassé, c’est un esprit vêtu de peaux de bêtes.

— C’est moi!

— Non, non.

Le président ordonna aux deux parties de se taire; puis, demandant de nouveau au colonel Voethaün si c’était bien Toric Belfast qui lui avait amené Han d’Islande prisonnier, sur la réponse affirmative, il déclara que la récompense appartenait au soldat.

Le petit homme grinça des dents, et l’arquebusier étendit avidement les mains pour recevoir le sac.

— Un instant! cria le petit homme. — Sire président, cette somme, d’après l’édit du haut-syndic, n’appartient qu’à celui qui livrera Han d’Islande.

— Eh bien? dirent les juges.

Le petit homme se tourna vers le géant:

— Cet homme n’est pas Han d’Islande.

Un murmure d’étonnement parcourut la salle. Le président et le secrétaire intime s’agitaient sur leurs sièges.

— Non, répéta avec force le petit homme, l’argent n’appartient pas à l’arquebusier maudit de Munckholm, car cet homme n’est point Han d’Islande.

— Hallebardiers, dit le président, qu’on emmène ce furieux, il a perdu la raison.

L’évêque éleva la voix:

— Me permette le respectable président de lui faire observer qu’on peut, en refusant d’entendre cet homme, briser la planche du salut sous les pieds du condamné ici présent. Je demande au contraire que la confrontation continue.

— Révérend évêque, le tribunal va vous satisfaire, répondit le président; et s’adressant au géant: — Vous avez déclaré être Han d’Islande; confirmez-vous devant la mort votre déclaration?

— Le condamné répondit: — Je la confirme, je suis Han d’Islande.

— Vous entendez, seigneur évêque?

Le petit homme criait en même temps que le président:

— Tu mens, montagnard de Kole! tu mens! Ne t’obstine pas à porter un nom qui t’écrase; souviens-toi qu’il t’a déjà été funeste.

— Je suis Han, de Klipstadur, en Islande, répéta le géant, l’oeil fixé sur le secrétaire intime.

Le petit homme s’approcha du soldat de Munckholm, qui, comme l’auditoire, observait cette scène avec curiosité.

— Montagnard de Kole, on dit que Han d’Islande boit du sang humain. Si tu l’es, bois-en. — En voici.

Et à peine ces paroles étaient-elles prononcées, qu’écartant son manteau de natte, il avait plongé un poignard dans le coeur de l’arquebusier, et jeté le cadavre aux pieds du géant.

Un cri d’effroi et d’horreur s’éleva; les soldats qui gardaient le géant reculèrent. Le petit homme, prompt comme le tonnerre, s’élança sur le montagnard découvert, et d’un nouveau coup de poignard il le fit tomber sur le corps du soldat. Alors, dépouillant sa natte de jonc, sa fausse chevelure et sa barbe noire, il dévoila ses membres nerveux, hideusement revêtus de peaux de bêtes, et un visage qui répandit plus d’horreur encore parmi les assistants que le poignard sanglant dont il élevait le fer dégouttant de deux meurtres.

— Hé! juges, où est Han d’Islande?

— Gardes, qu’on saisisse ce monstre! cria le président épouvanté.

Han jeta dans la salle son poignard.

— Il m’est inutile, s’il n’y a plus ici de soldats de Munckholm. En parlant ainsi, il se livra sans résistance aux hallebardiers et aux archers qui l’entouraient, se préparant à l’assiéger comme une ville. On enchaîna le monstre sur le banc des accusés, et une litière emporta ses deux victimes, dont l’une, le montagnard, respirait encore.

Il est impossible de peindre les divers mouvements de terreur, d’étonnement et d’indignation qui, pendant cette scène horrible, avaient agité le peuple, les gardes et les juges. Quand le brigand eut pris place, calme et impassible, sur le banc fatal, le sentiment de la curiosité imposa silence à toute autre impression, et l’attention rétablit la tranquillité.

L’évêque vénérable se leva:

— Seigneurs juges…. dit-il.

Le brigand l’interrompit:

— Évêque de Drontheim, je suis Han d’Islande; ne prends pas la peine de me défendre.

Le secrétaire intime se leva.

— Noble président….

Le monstre lui coupa la parole:

— Secrétaire intime, je suis Han d’Islande; ne prends pas le soin de m’accuser.

Alors, les pieds dans le sang, il promena son oeil farouche et hardi sur le tribunal, les archers et la foule, et l’on eût dit que tous ces hommes palpitaient d’épouvante sous le regard de cet homme désarmé, seul et enchaîné.

— Écoutez, juges, n’attendez pas de moi de longues paroles. Je suis le démon de Klipstadur. Ma mère est cette vieille Islande, l’île des volcans. Elle ne formait autrefois qu’une montagne, mais elle a été écrasée par la main d’un géant qui s’appuya sur sa cime en tombant du ciel. Je n’ai pas besoin de vous parler de moi; je suis le descendant d’Ingolphe l’Exterminateur, et je porte en moi son esprit. J’ai commis plus de meurtres et allumé plus d’incendies que vous n’avez à vous tous prononcé d’arrêts iniques dans votre vie. J’ai des secrets communs avec le chancelier d’Ahlefeld. — Je boirais tout le sang qui coule dans vos veines avec délices. Ma nature est de haïr les hommes, ma mission de leur nuire. Colonel des arquebusiers de Munckholm, c’est moi qui t’ai donné avis du passage des mineurs au Pilier-Noir, certain que tu tuerais un grand nombre d’hommes dans ces gorges; c’est moi qui ai écrasé un bataillon de ton régiment avec des quartiers de rochers; je vengeais mon fils. — Maintenant, juges, mon fils est mort; je viens ici chercher la mort. L’âme d’Ingolphe me pèse, parce que je la porte seul et que je ne pourrai la transmettre à aucun héritier. Je suis las de la vie, puisqu’elle ne peut plus être l’exemple et la leçon d’un successeur. J’ai assez bu de sang; je n’ai plus soif. À présent, me voici; vous pouvez boire le mien.

Il se tut, et toutes les voix répétèrent sourdement chacune de ses effroyables paroles.

L’évêque lui dit:

— Mon fils, dans quelle intention avez-vous donc commis tant de crimes?

Le brigand se mit à rire.

— Ma foi, je te jure, révérend évêque, que ce n’était pas, comme ton confrère l’évêque de Borglum, dans l’intention de m’enrichir. [Footnote: Quelques chroniqueurs affirment qu’en 1525 un évêque de Borglum se rendit fameux par divers brigandages. Il soudoyait des pirates, disent-ils, qui infestaient les côtes de-Norvège.] Quelque chose était en moi, qui me poussait.

— Dieu ne réside pas toujours dans tous ses ministres, répondit humblement le saint vieillard. Vous voulez m’insulter, je voudrais pouvoir vous défendre.

— Ta révérence perd son temps. Va demander à ton autre confrère l’évêque de Scalholt, en Islande. Par Ingolphe, ce sera une chose étrange que deux évêques aient pris soin de ma vie, l’un près de mon berceau, l’autre près de mon sépulcre. — Évêque, tu es un vieux fou.

— Mon fils, croyez-vous en Dieu?

— Pourquoi non? Je veux qu’il soit un Dieu pour pouvoir blasphémer.

— Arrêtez, malheureux! vous allez mourir, et vous ne baisez pas les pieds du Christ!

Han d’Islande haussa les épaules.

— Si je le faisais, ce serait à la manière du gendarme de Roll, qui fit tomber le roi en lui baisant le pied.

L’évêque se rassit, profondément ému.

— Allons, juges, poursuivit Han d’Islande, qu’attendez-vous? Si j’avais été à votre place et vous à la mienne, je ne vous aurais point fait attendre si longtemps votre arrêt de mort. Le tribunal se retira. Après une courte délibération, il rentra dans l’audience, et le président lut à haute voix une sentence qui, selon les formules, condamnait Han d’Islande à être pendu par le cou jusqu’à ce que mort s’ensuivît.

— Voilà qui est bien, dit le brigand. Chancelier d’Ahlefeld, j’en sais assez sur ton compte pour t’en faire obtenir autant. Mais vis, puisque tu fais du mal aux hommes. — Allons, je suis sûr maintenant de ne point aller dans le Nysthiem. [Footnote: Selon les croyances populaires, le Nysthiem était l’enfer de ceux qui mouraient de maladie ou de vieillesse.]

Le secrétaire intime ordonna aux gardes qui l’emmenaient de le déposer dans le donjon du Lion de Slesvig, pendant qu’on lui préparerait un cachot, pour y attendre son exécution, dans le quartier des arquebusiers de Munckholm.

— Dans le quartier des arquebusiers de Munckholm! répéta le monstre avec un grondement de joie.

XLVI

Cependant le cadavre de Ponce de Léon qui était resté auprès de la fontaine, ayant été défiguré par le soleil, les Maures des Alpuxares s’en emparèrent et le portèrent à Grenade.

E.H. Le Captif d’Ochali.

Cependant, avant l’aube du jour dans lequel nous sommes déjà assez avancés, à l’heure même où la sentence d’Ordener se prononçait à Munckholm, le nouveau gardien du Spladgest de Drontheim, l’ancien lieutenant et le successeur actuel de Benignus Spiagudry, Oglypiglap, avait été brusquement réveillé sur son grabat par le retentissement de la porte de l’édifice sous plusieurs coups violents. Il s’était levé à regret, avait pris sa lampe de cuivre dont la faible lumière blessait ses yeux endormis, et était allé, en jurant de l’humidité de la salle des morts, ouvrir à ceux qui l’arrachaient si tôt à son sommeil.

C’étaient des pêcheurs du lac de Sparbo, qui apportaient sur une litière couverte de joncs, d’algues et de limoselle des marais, un cadavre trouvé dans les eaux du lac.

Ils déposèrent leur fardeau dans l’intérieur de l’édifice funèbre, et Oglypiglap leur donna un reçu du mort afin qu’ils pussent réclamer leur salaire.

Resté seul dans le Spladgest, il commença à déshabiller le cadavre, qui était remarquable par sa longueur et sa maigreur. Le premier objet qui se présenta à ses yeux, quand il eut soulevé le voile dont il était enveloppé, fut une énorme perruque.

— En vérité, se dit-il, cette perruque de forme étrangère m’a déjà passé par les mains, c’était celle de ce jeune élégant français… Mais, continua-t-il en poursuivant ses opérations, voici les bottes fortes du pauvre postillon Cramner que ses chevaux ont écrasé, et… — que diable est-ce que cela signifie? — l’habit noir complet du professeur Syngramtax, ce vieux savant qui s’est noyé dernièrement. — Quel est donc ce nouveau venu qui m’arrive avec la dépouille de toutes mes vieilles connaissances?

Il promena sa lampe sur le visage du mort, mais inutilement; les traits, déjà décomposés, avaient perdu leur forme et leur couleur. Il fouilla dans les poches de l’habit, et en tira quelques vieux parchemins imprégnés d’eau et souillés de vase; il les essuya fortement avec son tablier de cuir, et parvint à lire sur l’un d’eux ces mots sans suite à demi effacés: « — Rudbeck. Saxon le grammairien. Arngrim, évêque de Holum. — Il n’y a en Norvège que deux comtés, Larvig et Jarlsberg, et une baronnie… — On ne trouve de mines d’argent qu’à Kongsberg; de l’aimant, des aspestes, qu’à Sundmoër; de l’améthyste, qu’à Guldbranshal; des calcédoines, des agates, du jaspe, qu’aux îles Fa-roër. — À Noukahiva, en temps de famine, les hommes mangent leurs femmes et leurs enfants. — Thormodus Thorfoeus; Isleif, évêque de Scalholt, premier historien islandais. — Mercure joua aux échecs avec la Lune, et lui gagna la soixante-douzième partie du jour. — Malstrom, gouffre. — Hirundo, hirudo. — Cicéron, pois chiche; gloire. — Frode le savant. — Odin consultait la tête de Mimer, sage. — (Mahomet et son pigeon, Sertorius et sa biche). — Plus le sol… moins il renferme de gypse…»

— Je ne puis en croire encore mes yeux! s’écria-t-il, laissant tomber le parchemin; c’est l’écriture de mon ancien maître, Benignus Spiagudry!

Alors, examinant de nouveau le cadavre, il reconnut les longues mains, les cheveux rares, et toute l’habitude du corps de l’infortuné.

— Ce n’est pas à tort, pensa-t-il en secouant la tête, qu’on a lancé contre lui une accusation de sacrilège et de nécromancie. Le diable l’a enlevé pour le noyer dans le Sparbo. — Ce que c’est que de nous! qui eût jamais pensé que le docteur Spiagudry, après avoir si longtemps gardé les autres dans cette hôtellerie des morts, viendrait un jour de loin s’y faire garder lui-même!

Le petit lapon philosophe soulevait le corps pour le porter sur l’une de ses six couches de granit, lorsqu’il s’aperçut que quelque chose de lourd était attaché par un lien de cuir au cou du malheureux Spiagudry.

— C’est sans doute la pierre avec laquelle le démon l’a précipité dans le lac, murmura-t-il.

Il se trompait; c’était une petite cassette de fer, sur laquelle, en la regardant de près, après l’avoir soigneusement essuyée, il remarqua un large fermoir en écusson.

— Il y a sans doute quelque diablerie dans cette boîte, se dit-il; cet homme était sacrilège et sorcier. Allons déposer cette cassette chez l’évêque, elle renferme peut-être un démon.

Alors, la détachant du cadavre, qu’il déposa dans la salle d’exposition, il sortit en toute hâte pour se rendre au palais épiscopal, murmurant en chemin quelques prières contre la redoutable boîte qu’il portait.

XLVII

Est-ce un homme ou un esprit infernal qui parle ainsi? Quel est donc l’esprit malfaisant qui te tourmente? Montre-moi l’ennemi implacable qui habite ton coeur.

MATURIN.

Han d’Islande et Schumacker sont dans la même salle du donjon de Slesvig. L’ex-chancelier absous se promène à pas lents, les yeux chargés de pleurs amers; le brigand condamné rit de ses chaînes, environné de gardes.

Les deux prisonniers s’observent longtemps en silence; on dirait qu’ils se sentent tous deux et se reconnaissent mutuellement ennemis des hommes.

— Qui es-tu? demande enfin l’ex-chancelier au brigand.

— Je te dirai mon nom, reprit l’autre, pour te faire fuir. Je suis Han d’Islande.

Schumacker s’avance vers lui:

— Prends ma main! dit-il.

— Est-ce que tu veux que je la dévore?

— Han d’Islande, reprend Schumacker, je t’aime parce que tu hais les hommes.

— Voilà pourquoi je te hais.

— Écoute, je hais les hommes, comme toi, parce que je leur ai fait du bien, et qu’ils m’ont fait du mal.

— Tu ne les hais pas comme moi; je les hais, moi, parce qu’ils m’ont fait du bien, et que je leur ai rendu du mal.

Schumacker frémit du regard du monstre. Il a beau vaincre sa nature, son âme ne peut sympathiser avec celle-là.

— Oui, s’écrie-t-il, j’exècre les hommes, parce qu’ils sont fourbes, ingrats, cruels. Je leur ai dû tout le malheur de ma vie.

— Tant mieux! — je leur ai dû, moi, tout le bonheur de la mienne.

— Quel bonheur?

— Le bonheur de sentir des chairs palpitantes frémir sous ma dent, un sang fumant réchauffer mon gosier altéré; la volupté de briser des êtres vivants contre des pointes de rochers, et d’entendre le cri de la victime se mêler au bruit des membres fracassés. Voilà les plaisirs que m’ont procurés les hommes.

Schumacker recula avec épouvante devant le monstre dont il s'était approché presque avec l'orgueil de lui ressembler. Pénétré de honte, il voila son visage vénérable de ses mains; car ses yeux étaient pleins de larmes d'indignation, non contre la race humaine, mais contre lui-même. Son coeur noble et grand commençait à s'effrayer de la haine qu'il portait aux hommes depuis si longtemps en la voyant reproduite dans le coeur de Han d'Islande comme par un miroir effrayant.

— Eh bien! dit le monstre en riant, ennemi des hommes, oses-tu te vanter d'être semblable à moi?

Le vieillard frissonna.

— O Dieu! plutôt que de les haïr comme toi, j'aimerais mieux les aimer.

Les gardes vinrent chercher le monstre, pour l'emmener dans un cachot plus sûr. Schumacker rêveur resta seul dans le donjon; mais il n'y restait plus d'ennemi des hommes.

XLVIII

…… Quand le méchant m’épie, Me ferez-vous tomber, Seigneur, entre ses mains? C’est lui qui sous mes pas a rompu vos chemins. Ne me châtiez point, car mon crime est son crime.

A. DE VIGNY.

L’heure fatale était arrivée; le soleil ne montrait plus que la moitié de son disque au-dessus de l’horizon. Les postes étaient doublés dans tout le château fort de Munckholm; devant chaque porte se promenaient des sentinelles silencieuses et farouches. La rumeur de la ville arrivait plus tumultueuse et plus bruyante aux sombres tours de la forteresse, livrée elle-même à une agitation extraordinaire. On entendait dans toutes les cours le bruit lugubre des tambours voilés de crêpes; le canon de la tour basse grondait par intervalles; la lourde cloche du donjon se balançait lentement avec des sons graves et prolongés, et, de tous les points du port, des embarcations chargées de peuple se pressaient vers le redoutable rocher. Un échafaud tendu de noir, autour duquel s’épaississait et se grossissait sans cesse une foule impatiente, s’élevait dans la place d’armes du château, au centre d’un carré de soldats. Sur l’échafaud se promenait un homme vêtu de serge rouge, tantôt s’appuyant sur une hache qu’il tenait à la main, tantôt remuant un billot et une claie que portait l’estrade funèbre. Près de là était préparé un bûcher devant lequel brûlaient quelques torches de résine. Entre l’échafaud et le bûcher, on avait planté un pieu auquel était suspendu un écriteau: Ordener Guldenlew, traître. — On apercevait, de la place d’Armes, flotter au haut du donjon de Slesvig un grand drapeau noir.

C’est dans ce moment que parut, devant le tribunal toujours assemblé dans la salle d’audience, Ordener condamné. L’évêque seulement était absent; son ministère de défenseur avait cessé.

Le fils du vice-roi était vêtu de noir, et portait à son cou le collier de Dannebrog. Son visage était pâle, mais fier. Il était seul; car on était venu le chercher pour le supplice avant que l’aumônier Athanase Munder fût revenu dans son cachot.

Ordener avait déjà consommé intérieurement son sacrifice. Cependant l’époux d’Éthel songeait encore avec quelque amertume à la vie, et eût peut-être voulu pouvoir choisir pour sa première nuit de noces une autre nuit que celle du tombeau. Il avait prié et surtout rêvé dans sa prison.

Maintenant il était debout devant le terme de toute prière et de tout rêve. Il se sentait fort de la force que donnent Dieu et l'amour. La foule, plus émue que le condamné, le considérait avec une attention avide. L'éclat de son rang, l'horreur de son sort, éveillaient toutes les envies et toutes les pitiés. Chacun assistait à son châtiment sans s'expliquer son crime. Il y a au fond des hommes un sentiment étrange qui les pousse, ainsi qu'à des plaisirs, au spectacle des supplices. Ils cherchent avec un horrible empressement à saisir la pensée de la destruction sur les traits décomposés de celui qui va mourir, comme si quelque révélation du ciel ou de l'enfer devait apparaître, en ce moment solennel, dans les yeux du misérable; comme pour voir quelle ombre jette l'aile de la mort planant sur une tête humaine; comme pour examiner ce qui reste d'un homme quand l'espérance l'a quitté. Cet être, plein de force et de santé, qui se meut, qui respire, qui vit, et qui, dans un moment, cessera de se mouvoir, de respirer, de vivre, environné d'êtres pareils à lui, auxquels il n'a rien fait, qui le plaignent tous, et dont nul ne le secourra; ce malheureux, mourant sans être moribond, courbé à la fois sous une puissance matérielle et sous un pouvoir invisible; cette vie que la société n'a pu donner, et qu'elle prend avec appareil, toute cette cérémonie imposante du meurtre judiciaire, ébranlent vivement les imaginations. Condamnés tous à mort avec des sursis indéfinis, c'est pour nous un objet de curiosité étrange et douloureuse, que l'infortuné qui sait précisément à quelle heure son sursis doit être levé.

On se souvient qu'avant d'aller à l'échafaud Ordener devait être amené devant le tribunal, pour être dégradé de ses titres et de ses honneurs. À peine le mouvement excité dans l'assemblée par son arrivée eut-il fait place au calme, que le président se fit apporter le livre héraldique des deux royaumes, et les statuts de l'ordre de Dannebrog.

Alors, ayant invité le condamné à mettre un genou en terre, il recommanda aux assistants le silence et le respect, ouvrit le livre des chevaliers de Dannebrog, et commença à lire d'une voix haute et sévère:

« — Christiern, par la grâce et miséricorde du Tout-Puissant, roi de Danemark et de Norvège, des Vandales et des Goths, duc de Slesvig, de Holstein, de Stormarie et de Dytmarse, comte d'Oldenbourg et de Delmenhurst, savoir faisons — qu'ayant rétabli, sur la proposition de notre grand-chancelier, comte de Griffenfeld (la voix du président passa si rapidement sur ce nom qu'on l'entendit à peine), l'ordre royal de Dannebrog, fondé par notre illustre aïeul saint Waldemar, «Sur ce que nous avons considéré que cet ordre vénérable ayant été créé en souvenir de l’étendard Dannebrog, envoyé du ciel à notre royaume béni, «Ce serait mentir à la divine institution de l’ordre si quelqu’un des chevaliers pouvait impunément forfaire à l’honneur et aux saintes lois de l’église et de l’état, Nous ordonnons, à genoux devant Dieu, que quiconque, parmi les chevaliers de l’ordre, aura livré son âme au démon par quelque félonie ou trahison, après avoir été blâmé publiquement par un juge, sera à jamais dégradé du rang de chevalier de notre royal ordre de Dannebrog.» Le président referma le livre.

— Ordener Guldenlew, baron de Thorvick, chevalier de Dannebrog, vous vous êtes rendu coupable de haute trahison, crime pour lequel votre tête va être tranchée, votre corps brûlé, et votre cendre jetée au vent. — Ordener Guldenlew, traître, vous vous êtes rendu indigne de prendre rang parmi les chevaliers de Dannebrog. Je vous invite à vous humilier, car je vais vous dégrader publiquement au nom du roi.

Le président étendit la main sur le livre de l’ordre, et s’apprêtait à prononcer la formule fatale sur Ordener, calme et immobile, lorsqu’une porte latérale s’ouvrit à droite du tribunal. Un huissier ecclésiastique parut, annonçant sa révérence l’évêque de Drontheimhus.

C’était lui en effet. Il entra précipitamment dans la salle, accompagné d’un autre ecclésiastique qui le soutenait.

— Arrêtez! seigneur président, cria-t-il avec une force qui semblait n’être plus de son âge; arrêtez! — Le ciel soit béni! j’arrive à temps:

L’assemblée redoubla d’attention, prévoyant quelque nouvel événement.

Le président se tourna vers l’évêque avec humeur:

— Votre révérence me permettra de lui faire remarquer, que sa présence est inutile ici. Le tribunal va dégrader le condamné, qui touche au moment de subir sa peine.

— Gardez-vous, dit l’évêque, de toucher à celui qui est pur devant le Seigneur. Ce condamné est innocent. Rien ne peut se comparer au cri d’étonnement qui retentit dans l’auditoire, si ce n’est le cri d’épouvante que poussèrent le président et le secrétaire intime.

— Oui, tremblez, juges, poursuivit l’évêque avant que le président eût eu le temps de reprendre son sang-froid; tremblez! car vous alliez verser le sang innocent.

Pendant que l’émotion du président se calmait, Ordener s’était levé consterné. Le noble jeune homme craignait que sa généreuse ruse ne fût découverte, et qu’on n’eût trouvé des preuves de la culpabilité de Schumacker.

— Seigneur évêque, dit le président, dans cette affaire, le crime semble vouloir nous échapper, en passant de tête en tête. Ne vous fiez pas à quelque vaine apparence. Si Ordener Guldenlew est innocent, quel est donc alors le coupable?

— Votre grâce va le savoir, répondit l’évêque. — Puis, montrant au tribunal une cassette de fer qu’un serviteur portait derrière lui: — Nobles seigneurs, vous avez jugé dans les ténèbres; dans cette cassette est la lumière miraculeuse qui doit les dissiper.

Le président, le secrétaire intime et Ordener parurent frappés en même temps, à l’aspect de la mystérieuse cassette. L’évêque poursuivit:

— Nobles juges, écoutez-nous. Aujourd’hui, au moment où nous rentrions dans notre palais épiscopal, afin de nous reposer des fatigues de la nuit, et de prier pour les condamnés, on nous a remis cette boîte de fer scellée. Le gardien du Spladgest l’avait, nous a-t-on dit, apportée ce matin à notre palais pour qu’elle nous fût remise, affirmant qu’elle renfermait sans doute quelque mystère satanique, attendu qu’il l’avait trouvée sur le corps du sacrilège Benignus Spiagudry, dont on a retiré le cadavre du Sparbo.

L’attention d’Ordener redoubla. Tout l’auditoire se taisait religieusement. Le président et le secrétaire courbaient la tête comme deux condamnés. On eût dit qu’ils avaient tous deux oublié leur astuce et leur audace. Il y a un moment dans la vie du méchant où sa puissance s’en va.

— Après avoir béni cette cassette, continua l’évêque, nous en avons brisé le sceau, qui portait, comme vous pouvez le voir encore, les anciennes armoiries abolies de Griffenfeld. Nous y avons trouvé en effet un secret satanique. Vous allez en juger, vénérables seigneurs. Prêtez-nous toute votre attention; car il s’agit ici du sang des hommes, et le Seigneur en pèse chaque goutte.

Alors, ouvrant la formidable cassette, il en tira un parchemin au dos duquel était écrite l’attestation suivante:

«Moi, Blaxtham Cumbysulsum, docteur, je déclare, au moment de mourir, remettre au capitaine Dispolsen, procureur, à Copenhague, de l’ancien comte de Griffenfeld, la pièce suivante, entièrement écrite de la main de Turiaf Musdoemon, serviteur du chancelier comte d’Ahlefeld, afin que le susnommé capitaine en fasse l’usage qu’il lui plaira. — Et je prie

Dieu de me pardonner mes crimes. — À Copenhague, le onzième jour du mois de janvier mil six cent quatre-vingt-dix-neuf.

«CUMBYSULSUM.»

Le secrétaire intime tremblait d'un tremblement convulsif. Il voulut parler et ne le put. L'évêque cependant remettait le parchemin au président pâle et agité.

— Que vois-je? s'écria celui-ci en déployant le parchemin. — Note au noble comte d'Ahlefeld, sur le moyen de se défaire juridiquement de Schumacker!…. — Je vous jure, révérend évêque….

Le parchemin tomba des mains du président.

— Lisez, lisez, seigneur, poursuivit l'évêque. Je ne doute pas que votre indigne serviteur n'ait abusé de votre nom, comme il a abusé de celui du malheureux Schumacker. Voyez seulement ce qu'a produit votre haine peu charitable pour votre prédécesseur tombé. Un de vos courtisans a machiné en votre nom sa perte, espérant sans doute s'en faire un mérite auprès de votre grâce.

En montrant au président que les soupçons de l'évêque, qui connaissait tout le contenu de la cassette, ne tombaient pas sur lui, ces paroles le ranimèrent. Ordener respirait également. Il commençait à entrevoir que l'innocence du père de son Éthel allait éclater en même temps que la sienne propre. Il éprouvait un profond étonnement de cette destinée bizarre qui l'avait conduit à la poursuite d'un formidable brigand pour retrouver cette cassette, que son vieux guide Benignus Spiagudry portait sur lui; en sorte qu'elle le suivait pendant qu'il la cherchait. Il méditait aussi la grave leçon des événements qui, après l'avoir perdu par cette fatale cassette, le sauvaient par elle.

Le président, rappelant son sang-froid, lut alors, avec les signes d'une indignation que partageait tout l'auditoire, une longue note, où Musdoemon expliquait en détail l'abominable plan que nous lui avons vu suivre dans le cours de cette histoire. Plusieurs fois le secrétaire intime voulut se lever pour se défendre; mais à chaque fois la rumeur publique le repoussait sur son siège. Enfin l'odieuse lecture se termina au milieu d'un murmure d'horreur.

— Hallebardiers, qu'on saisisse cet homme! dit le président, désignant le secrétaire intime.

Le misérable, sans force et sans parole, descendit de son siège, et fut jeté sur le banc d'infamie, parmi les huées de la populace.

— Seigneurs juges, dit l'évêque, frémissez et réjouissez-vous. La vérité, qui vient d'être portée à vos consciences, va encore vous être confirmée par ce que l'aumônier des prisons de cette royale ville, notre honoré frère Athanase Munder, ici présent, va vous apprendre.

C'était en effet Athanase Munder qui accompagnait l'évêque. Il s'inclina devant son pasteur et devant le tribunal, puis, sur un signe du président, il s'exprima ainsi:

— Ce que je vais dire est la vérité. Me punisse le ciel si je profère ici une parole dans une intention autre que celle de bien faire! — J'avais, d'après ce que j'avais vu ce matin dans le cachot du fils du vice-roi, pensé en moi-même que ce jeune homme n'était point coupable, quoique vos seigneuries l'aient condamné sur ses aveux. Or, j'ai été appelé, il y a quelques heures, pour donner les derniers secours spirituels au malheureux montagnard qui a été si cruellement assassiné devant vous, et que vous aviez condamné, respectables seigneurs, comme étant Han d'Islande. Voici ce que m'a dit ce moribond: «Je ne suis point Han d'Islande; j'ai été bien puni d'avoir pris ce nom. Celui qui m'a payé pour jouer ce rôle est le secrétaire intime de la grande chancellerie; il se nomme Musdoemon, et il a machiné toute la révolte sous le nom de Hacket. Je crois qu'il est le seul coupable dans tout ceci.» Alors il m'a demandé ma bénédiction et recommandé de venir en toute hâte reporter ses dernières paroles au tribunal. Dieu est témoin de ce que je dis. Puisse-je sauver le sang de l'innocent, et ne point faire verser celui du coupable!

Il se tut, saluant de nouveau son évêque et les juges.

— Votre grâce voit, seigneur, dit l'évêque au président, que l'un de mes clients n'avait point saisi à tort tant de ressemblance entre ce Hacket et votre secrétaire intime.

— Turiaf Musdoemon; demanda le président au nouvel accusé, qu'avez-vous à alléguer pour votre défense?

Musdoemon leva sur son maître un regard qui l'effraya. Toute son assurance lui était revenue. Il répondit après un moment de silence:

— Rien, seigneur.

Le président reprit d'une voix altérée et faible:

— Vous vous avouez donc coupable du crime qui vous est imputé? Vous vous avouez auteur d'une conspiration tramée à la fois contre l'état et contre un individu nommé Schumacker.

— Oui, seigneur, répondit Musdoemon. L'évêque se leva.

— Seigneur président, pour qu'il ne reste aucun doute dans cette affaire, que votre grâce demande à l'accusé s'il a eu des complices.

— Des complices! répéta Musdoemon.

Il parut réfléchir un moment. Un horrible malaise se peignit sur le front du président.

— Non, seigneur évêque, dit-il enfin.

Le président jeta sur lui un regard soulagé qui rencontra le sien.

— Non, je n'ai point eu de complices, répéta Musdoemon avec plus de force. J'avais tramé tout ce complot par attachement pour mon maître, qui l'ignorait, pour perdre son ennemi Schumacker.

Les regards de l'accusé et du président se rencontrèrent encore.

— Votre grâce, reprit l'évêque, doit sentir que, puisque Musdoemon n'a point eu de complices, le baron Ordener Guldenlew ne peut être coupable.

— S'il ne l'était pas, révérend évêque, comment se serait-il avoué criminel?

— Seigneur président, comment ce montagnard s'est-il obstiné à se dire Han d'Islande au péril de sa tête? Dieu seul sait ce qui existe au fond des coeurs.

Ordener prit la parole.

— Seigneurs juges, je puis vous le dire, maintenant que le vrai coupable est découvert. Oui, je me suis faussement accusé, pour sauver l'ancien chancelier Schumacker, dont la mort eût laissé sa fille sans protecteur.

Le président se mordit les lèvres.

— Nous demandons au tribunal, dit l'évêque, que l'innocence de notre client Ordener soit proclamée par lui.

Le président répondit par un signe d'adhésion; et, sur la demande du haut-syndic, on acheva l'examen de la redoutable cassette, qui ne renfermait plus que le diplôme et les titres de Schumacker mêlés à quelques lettres du prisonnier de Munckholm au capitaine Dispolsen, lettres amères sans être coupables, et qui ne pouvaient effrayer que le chancelier d'Ahlefeld.

Bientôt le tribunal se retira, et après une courte délibération, tandis que les curieux rassemblés dans la place d'Armes attendaient avec une impatience opiniâtre le fils du vice-roi condamné, et que le bourreau se promenait nonchalamment sur l'échafaud, le président prononça, d'une voix presque éteinte, l'arrêt qui condamnait à mort Turiaf Musdoemon, et réhabilitait Ordener Guldenlew, le réintégrant dans tous ses honneurs, titres et privilèges.

XLIX

Combien me vendras-tu ta carcasse, mon drôle? Je n’en donnerais pas, en honneur, une obole.

Saint Michel à Satan. Mystère.
